

NEW DICTIONARY of CHRISTIAN ETHICS & PASTORAL THEOLOGY

Editors: David J. Atkinson, David F. Field, Arthur Holmes, Oliver O'Donovan

- More than 700 articles
- Biographical articles on key figures
- Lucidly written entries
- A wide range of contributors

NEW DICTIONARY of CHRISTIAN ETHICS & PASTORAL THEOLOGY

EDITORS

DAVID J. ATKINSON

Canon Chancellor of Southwark Cathedral, London; formerly Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford

DAVID F. FIELD

Director of Professional Ministry, Church Pastoral Aid Society, Warwick; formerly Vice-Principal and Lecturer in Christian Ethics, Oak Hill College, London

CONSULTING EDITORS

ARTHUR HOLMES

Professor of Philosophy, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois

OLIVER O'DONOVAN

Regius Professor of Moral and Pastoral Theology, Oxford University; Canon of Christ Church, Oxford

IVP Academic
An imprint of InterVarsity Press
Downers Grove, Illinois

Inter-Varsity Press
Nottingham, England

InterVarsity Press, USA
P.O. Box 1400
Downers Grove, IL 60515-1426, USA
World Wide Web: www.ivpress.com
Email: email@ivpress.com

Inter-Varsity Press, England
Norton Street, Nottingham NG7 3HR, England
Website: www.ivpbooks.com
Email: ivp@ivpbooks.com

©Universities and Colleges Christian Fellowship, Leicester, England, 1995

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of InterVarsity Press.

InterVarsity Press[□], USA, is the book-publishing division of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA[□], as student movement active on campus at hundreds of universities, colleges and schools of nursing in the United States of America, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. For information about local and regional activities, write Public Relations Dept., InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA, 6400 Schroeder Rd., P.O. Box 7895, Madison, WI 53707-7895, or visit the IVCF website at www.intervarsity.org.

Inter-Varsity Press, England, is closely linked with the Universities and Colleges Christian Fellowship, a student movement connecting Christian Unions in universities and colleges throughout Great Britain, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. Website: www.uccf.org.uk.

All Scripture quotations, unless otherwise indicated, are taken from the Holy Bible, New International Version[□]. NIV[□]. Copyright © 1973, 1978, 1984 by International Bible Society. Used by permission of Zondervan Publishing House. Distributed in the U.K. by permission of Hodder and Stoughton Ltd. All rights reserved. "NIV" is a registered trademark of International Bible Society. UK trademark number 1448790.

USA ISBN 978-0-8308-9618-9 (digital)

USA ISBN 978-0-8308-1408-4 (print)

UK ISBN 978-0-85110-650-2 (print)

Contents

Preface	vii
How to use this Dictionary	ix
Abbreviations	xi
List of Contributors.	xv
Part One	1
1. God	3
2. Love	10
3. Justice and Peace	17
4. Humanity	23
5. Sin and Salvation.	30
6. History of Christian Ethics	37
7. Practical and Pastoral Theology	46
8. Old Testament Ethics	53
9. New Testament Ethics.	61
10. Character	70
11. Sexuality.	77
12. Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy.	85
13. Life, Health and Death.	94
14. Ethics of Medical Care	100
15. Global Ethics	108
16. Community Ethics.	117
17. Economic Ethics	125
18. Christian Moral Reasoning	132

Part Two	139
A	141
B	199
C	231
D	311
E	367
F.	413
G	451
H	479
I.	533
J.	570
K	592
L.	603
M.	634
N	697
O	718
P	729
Q	808
R	811
S.	853
T	939
U	984
V	988
W.	1002
Z	1027
About the Editors	1029
More Titles from InterVarsity Press.	1030

Preface

In bringing together articles on Christian ethics and pastoral theology, the editors hope that this Dictionary will provide a major resource for pastors, social workers, doctors and counsellors working in a Christian context, as well as for clergy, ordinands, teachers, religious-studies students and interested lay people. We have attempted to integrate as far as possible, within the terms of the subject matter, both moral theology and pastoral and practical theology. Decision-making often raises questions of pastoral psychology, individual temperament, social and personal factors, and determinants of various psychological, sociological, economic and ideological kinds. Behind these lies a certain moral framework, centred on the general question 'What should be done?', and implying a network of values, duties and moral principles. And behind these again lies a certain set of basic assumptions about the way the world is, and the way people are - in other words, a certain 'theology'.

Our theological stance derives from the fundamental conviction that God has made himself known in Jesus Christ, his Son, and that he continues to disclose himself to us through the Holy Spirit within the life of his church. The Bible is our authoritative guide to God's self-disclosure: the Word of God in written form. The traditions of Christian thinking throughout the centuries illuminate for us ways in which God has guided his people in interpreting the Bible in different contexts, and in discerning his truth and his will. The Holy Spirit, who is given to guide us into truth, informs and sanctifies our reason, so that with our minds, as well as our hearts and souls, we can find appropriate expressions for our love of God and love of neighbour, and for manifesting justice in all human affairs.

One unique feature of this Dictionary is that in Part One we have drawn together eighteen major 'keynote' articles. These articles are arranged not in the traditional alphabetical order but in a theological order (numbered one to eighteen, and for ease of reference the numerals appear in tinted blocks down the outer edge of the pages). They give a basic introduction to the main themes of Christian ethics and pastoral theology - like a main river, from which many smaller rivers flow. Their theological order illustrates our method. We begin, as all Christian thinking ought, with God, and then explore the implications of his character of love and justice. Our attention is drawn next to the nature of the human moral agent, and the gospel themes of sin and salvation. After general historical surveys of Christian ethics and of practical and pastoral theology, we focus on particular areas of interest. Old Testament and New Testament ethics are treated in separate articles, and then follow specific discussions on issues such as sexuality, medical ethics and economic concerns. We conclude the keynote articles with a major essay from Professor O'Donovan illustrating method and meaning in Christian moral reasoning.

Our hope is that these keynote articles may be used as a textbook, offering the reader a broad survey of the field, and inviting further exploration of specific and detailed issues through cross-referencing to the many articles in Part Two. A reader of 'Economic Ethics', for example, may be referred for more detail to articles in Part Two on such subjects as banking, monetarism, multinational corporations and taxation.

The Dictionary may also be used in reverse order, moving from the specific to the more general. Readers may turn to an article in Part Two on remarriage, to find that they wish to explore more fully the Christian theological traditions of thinking on marriage and divorce; and then be referred back to the major keynote article on 'Sexuality' in Part One.

In any selection of articles, gaps are inevitable. The task of weighing the interests of our readers against the need to keep this volume to a manageable size has not been easy. With one or two justifiable exceptions, we have not included biographical articles on persons who are still living.

Though the editors are aware that some users of this Dictionary prefer the term ‘Two-Thirds World’ to ‘Third World’, the latter is so well established in popular usage (e.g. in the phrase ‘Third World aid’) that it is difficult, if not impossible, to displace it from the public consciousness. They have therefore preferred the term ‘Third World’ in spite of the criticisms some have of it.

We are very grateful to the many authors who have contributed their expertise. We have been greatly helped by the editorial staff at IVP, and in particular by the Theological Books Editor, the Revd David Kingdon, and by Jane Horner, who has been a very efficient administrative co-ordinator for this ambitious project. Hazel Medcalf has contributed much expertise and not a little patience as copy-editor, and Dr Philip Hillyer has checked bibliographies and supplied many missing dates of persons. Jo Bramwell and Simon Fox have been diligent proofreaders. Our consulting editors, Professors Oliver O’Donovan and Arthur Holmes, have greatly helped us by their wisdom and counsel. Thanks are also due to Action Typesetting Limited, Gloucester, for their skills and ready co-operation in undertaking what has proved to be a complex volume.

It is our hope that this Dictionary will prove to be a useful resource to a wide circle of Christian people, to aid them in the mission and ministry of the kingdom of God.

David J. Atkinson

David H. Field

How to use this Dictionary

This introduction provides some guidance on how to use this Dictionary to the best advantage.

Arrangement

As soon as its pages are turned, it is obvious that this Dictionary is arranged differently from others. Instead of following the usual alphabetical order throughout, it is in two parts.

Part One, as the Preface explains, is arranged in a theological order, beginning with GOD and ending with CHRISTIAN MORAL REASONING. Each of the eighteen major articles in Part One provides a reasonably comprehensive overview of a major subject area in Christian ethics or pastoral theology, and a list of subjects is given on the Contents page. So, if you want to gain an overall grasp of the topic HUMANITY, for example, you should begin here in Part One with the corresponding article. Having read through the article, you will find at the end a list of references headed 'See especially'. This alerts you to the presence of related articles in Part Two. Thus, in connection with HUMANITY, you may want to explore such matters as ADOLESCENCE, WORK, MARRIAGE, RETIREMENT, and DEATH AND DYING, to mention one possible sequence.

Part Two of the Dictionary contains shorter articles, arranged alphabetically and ranging in length from 2,000 to 250 words. In many of these articles you will find cross-references that include daggers (†), which refer you to the eighteen major articles in Part One. So, for example, the article on BIRTH CONTROL contains the reference '... sexuality (see †) ...'. This refers you to the eleventh article in Part One on the subject of SEXUALITY.

Cross-references

It has been editorial policy in this Dictionary to group smaller topics together and treat them in a single larger article. For example, 'industrial action' is dealt with in the article on STRIKES, and 'closed shop' in the article on TRADE UNIONS. Some of the major articles in Part One also group together a number of topics. For example, PASTORAL CARE, COUNSELLING AND PSYCHOTHERAPY covers a wide range of subjects.

Cross-referencing is therefore an important feature of this Dictionary. Six methods are in use:

1. Numerous one-line entries refer you to the title of the article or articles where the topic is treated: e.g. CONSERVATION, see ENVIRONMENT.
MOURNING, see BEREAVEMENT; GRIEF.
2. An asterisk after a word or phrase indicates that further relevant information will be found in the article under that title. It is equivalent to the abbreviation q.v. You should note:
 - a. The form of the word asterisked will not always be precisely the same as that of the title of the article to which the asterisk refers. For example: 'teleological*' directs you to the article on TELEOLOGY, 'alcohol*' to ALCOHOLISM, and 'surrogacy*' to SURROGATE MOTHERHOOD.
 - b. The asterisk sometimes applies to two or three words rather than to the word asterisked. Thus 'kingdom of God*' sends you to the article KINGDOM OF GOD, not 'God', and 'Thomas Aquinas*' to the entry THOMAS AQUINAS, not 'Aquinas'.
3. A reference in brackets in the body of an article such as '(see Consequentialism*)' is self-explanatory.

4. A reference including a dagger refers you to one of the eighteen major articles in Part One. For example, '(see †)' or '(see Love†)' refers you to the second major article in Part One, entitled LOVE.
5. Cross-references at the end of the eighteen articles in Part One are headed 'See especially'. These refer you to articles in Part Two, though just occasionally they may also refer you to another major article that is of particular relevance.
6. Cross-references at the end of articles in Part Two are headed 'See also'. These usually refer you to other articles in Part Two, and sometimes to one of the major articles in Part One.

Abbreviations

A list of abbreviations used in the Dictionary will be found on the following section.

Authorship of articles

The authors of articles are indicated by their initials at the foot of each article. A full list of contributors will be found after the list of abbreviations, in alphabetical order of initials, not of surnames.

Bibliographies

Guidance for further study has been provided in most articles, sometimes in the body of the article itself, but in most cases in the bibliography at the end. The works listed in a bibliography may include studies which take up a different position from that of the contributor of the article. In biographical articles, writings by the subject of the article are placed first, followed by any studies.

Bible versions

Quotations from the Bible are from the New International Version, unless specified otherwise.

Abbreviations

1. Books and journals

ACPAN
Association of Christians in Planning and Architecture Newsletter, published by UCCF (Leicester, 1983-)

ACW
Ancient Christian Writers (Westminster, MD, and London, etc., 1946-)

AJP
American Journal of Psychiatry (Washington, DC, 1844-)

AJS
American Journal of Sociology (Chicago, IL, 1895-)

AJSMF
Australian Journal of Sex, Marriage and Family (Concord, NSW, 1980-)

AJTP
American Journal of Theology and Philosophy (West Lafayette, IN, 1980-)

Anv
Anvil (Bristol, 1984-)

ASR
American Sociological Review (Washington, DC, 1936-)

AV
Authorized (King James') Version, 1611

BCP
Book of Common Prayer

BDCE
Baker's Dictionary of Christian Ethics, ed. C. F. H. Henry (Grand Rapids and Glasgow, 1973)

BMJ
British Medical Journal (London, 1832-)

CC
Carer and Counsellor (originally The Christian Counsellor; Farnham, 1991-)

CD
Church Dogmatics, Karl Barth, 4 vols. in 13 + index vol. (ET, Edinburgh, 1936-81)

CDP
A Critical Dictionary of Psychoanalysis, C. Rycroft (London, 1968)

CH
Church History (Scottsdale, PA, etc., 1932-)

Con
Contact (Edinburgh, 1960-)

CQR
Church Quarterly Review (London, 1875-1968)

Crim
Criminology (Columbus, OH, 1963-)

CT
Christianity Today (Washington, 1956-)

CTJ
Calvin Theological Journal (Grand Rapids, 1966-)

DCE
A Dictionary of Christian Ethics, ed. J. Macquarrie (London and Philadelphia, 1967)

DCS
A Dictionary of Christian Spirituality, ed. G. S. Wakefield (London, 1983) = The Westminster Dictionary of Christian Spirituality (Philadelphia, 1983)

DME
Dictionary of Medical Ethics, ed. A. S. Duncan, G. R. Dunstan and R. B. Welbourn (London, 1981)

DPC
A Dictionary of Pastoral Care, ed. A. V. Campbell (London and New York, 1987)

DPCC
A Dictionary of Pastoral Care and Counselling, ed. R. J. Hunter (Nashville, TN, 1990)

DSp
Dictionnaire de spiritualité, ed. M. Viller et al. (Paris, 1937-)

DSt
Death Studies (New York, 1977-)

DTC
Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. Vacant et al., 15 vols. (Paris, 1903-50)

EBio
Encyclopedia of Bioethics, ed. W. Reich, 4 vols. (New York, 1968)

ECJ
Encyclopedia of Crime and Justice, ed. S. Kadish (New York, 1983)

EcR Ecumenical Review (Geneva, 1948-)	Inter Interchange (Surrey Hills, NSW, 1967-)	JPalC Journal of Palliative Care (Toronto, 1985-)
EP Encyclopedia of Philosophy , ed. P. Edwards, 8 vols. (New York, 1967)	ISBE International Standard Bible Encyclopedia , ed. J. Orr, 5 vols. (Chicago, ² 1930); new edition, ed. G. W. Bromiley (Grand Rapids, 1979-)	JPC Journal of Pastoral Care (Decatur, GA, 1948-)
ER The Encyclopedia of Religion , ed. M. Eliade, 16 vols. (London and New York, 1987)	ISM In the Service of Medicine , now Journal of the Christian Medical Fellowship (London, 1952-)	JPCo Journal of Pastoral Counselling (New Rochelle, NY, 1966-)
ERE Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics , ed. J. Hastings, 13 vols. (Edinburgh, 1908-26)	ISQ International Studies Quarterly (Stoneham, MA, 1957-)	JPP Journal of Pastoral Practice (Laverock, PA, 1978-)
Eth Ethics (Chicago, 1890-)	JAP Journal of Analytical Psychology (London, 1955-)	JPT Journal of Psychology and Theology (La Mirada, CA, 1973-)
FP Faith and Philosophy (Wilmore, KY, 1984-)	JB Jerusalem Bible, 1966	JR Journal of Religion (Chicago, 1921-)
FT Faith and Thought (London, 1866-)	JBP The New Testament in Modern English , J. B. Phillips (Collins, 1958)	JSOT Journal for the Study of the Old Testament (Sheffield, 1976-)
HS Handbook of Sociology , ed. N. J. Smelser (Newbury Park, CA, 1988)	JCH Journal of Christian Healing (Narberth, PN, 1979-)	JSSR Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion (Wetteren, etc., 1961-)
IDB The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible , ed. G. A. Buttrick, 4 vols. (New York and Nashville, TN, 1962)	JCP Journal of Consulting Psychology , now Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology (Washington, DC, 1968-)	JTS Journal of Theological Studies (Oxford, 1899-)
IESS International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences , ed. D. E. Sills, 17 vols. (New York, 1968)	JETS Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society (Wheaton, IL, 1969-)	JTSA Journal of Theology for Southern Africa (Braamfontein, 1972-)
ILR International Labour Review (Geneva, 1921-)	JFCJ Juvenile and Family Court Journal (Reno, NV, 1949-)	LCC Library of Christian Classics , 26 vols. (London and Philadelphia, 1953-70)
Int Interpretation (Richmond, VA, 1947-)	JJS Journal of Jewish Studies (Oxford, 1948-)	MI Medicine International (Oxford, 1981-; n.s. 1984-)
		Miss Missiology (Denver, CO, etc., 1953-)

NASB New American Standard Bible, 1963	PalM Palliative Medicine (London, 1987-)	Theologische Wörterbuch zum Alten Testament
NCE New Catholic Encyclopedia , ed. W. J. McDonald, 17 vols. (New York, 1967-79)	PP Pastoral Psychology (New York, 1950-)	TE Theological Ethics , H. Thielicke, vol. 1 (² 1958; abridged ET, Philadelphia, 1966, and London, 1968); vol. 2 (² 1959; abridged E T, Philadelphia and London, 1969); and 3-vol. ed. (Grand Rapids, 1978)
NDCE A New Dictionary of Christian Ethics , ed. J. Macquarrie and J. F. Childress (London, 1986)	Psy Psychiatry (New York, 1937-)	Th Theology (London, 1920-)
NDT New Dictionary of Theology (Leicester and Downers Grove, IL, 1988)	PsyM Psychological Medicine (Cam- bridge, 1970-)	Them Themelios (Lausanne, 1962-74; n.s. London, etc., 1975-)
NEJM New England Journal of Medicine (Waltham, MA, 1812-)	PTR Princeton Theological Review (Philadelphia, 1903-29)	ThW Third Way (New Malden, 1977-)
NIDNTT The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology , ed. C. Brown, 3 vols. (Exeter and Grand Rapids, 1975-86)	REB Revised English Bible, 1989	TOS The Other Side (Philadelphia, 1965-)
NIV New International Version of the Bible, 1973, 1978, 1984	RRR Review of Religious Research (Washington, DC, etc., 1959/60-)	Tr Transformation (Exeter, 1984-)
NovT Novum Testamentum (Leiden, 1956-)	RSV Revised Standard Version, NT 1946, ² 1971; OT 1952	TrinJ Trinity Journal (Deerfield, IL, 1971-78; n.s. 1980-)
NPNF A Select Library of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers of the Christian Church , first series, ed. P. Schaff, 14 vols. (New York, 1886-90); second series, ed. H. Wace and P. Schaff, 14 vols. (New York, 1890-1900); new ed. (Grand Rapids, 1980)	SJT Scottish Journal of Theology (Edinburgh, etc., 1948-)	TWOT Theological Wordbook of the Old Testament , ed. R. Laird Harris et al. , 2 vols. (Chicago, 1980)
NRSV New Revised Standard Version, 1989	STh Summa Theologiae , Thomas Aquinas, 60 vols. + index vol. (1265-73; ET, London and New York, 1964-81)	TynB Tyndale Bulletin (London, etc., 1956-)
OED Oxford English Dictionary (Oxford, ² 1989)	TDNT Theological Dictionary of the New Testament , ed. G. W. Bromiley, 10 vols. (Grand Rapids, 1964-76), ET of Theolo- gisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament , ed. G. Kittell and G. Friedrich (Stuttgart, 1932-74)	VE Vox Evangelica (London, etc., 1962-)
	TDOT Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament , ed. G. J. Bot- terweck and H. Ringgren (Grand Rapids, 1974-); ET of	VTSupp Vetus Testamentum Supplements (Leiden, 1953-)
		WTJ Westminster Theological Journal (Philadelphia, 1938-)

2. Biblical books

Books of the Old Testament

Gn., Ex., Lv., Nu., Dt., Jos., Jdg., Ru., 1, 2, Sa., 1, 2 Ki., 1, 2 Ch., Ezr., Ne., Est., Jb., Ps. (Pss.), Pr., Ec., Song, Is., Je., La., Ezk., Dn., Ho., Joel, Am., Ob., Jon., Mi., Na., Hab., Zp., Hg., Zc., Mal.

Books of the New Testament

Mt., Mk., Lk., Jn., Acts, Rom., 1, 2 Cor., Gal., Eph., Phil., Col., 1, 2 Thes., 1, 2 Tim., Tit., Phm., Heb., Jas., 1, 2 Pet., 1, 2, 3 Jn., Jude, Rev.

3. General abbreviations

ad loc.	ad locum (Lat.), at the place
Arab.	Arabic
Aram.	Aramaic
b.	born
c.	circa (Lat.), about, approximately
cf.	confer (Lat.), compare
ch.	(chs.) chapter(s)
col.	(cols.) column(s)
d.	died
Ecclus.	Ecclesiasticus (Apocrypha)
ed. (eds.)	edited by, edition, editor(s)
Eng.	English
ET	English translation
Et al.	et alii (Lat.), and others
EVV	English versions
f. (ff.)	and the following (verse(s), etc.)
fl.	floruit (Lat.), flourished
Fr.	French
Ger.	German
Gk.	Greek
Heb.	Hebrew
ibid.	ibidem (Lat.), the same work
idem	idem (Lat.), the same author
It.	Italian

Lat.	Latin
lit.	literally
loc. cit.	loco citato (Lat.), in the place already quoted
LXX	Septuagint (Gk. version of OT)
Macc.	Maccabees (Apocrypha)
mg.	margin
MS (MSS)	manuscript(s)
n.d.	no date
n.s.	new series
NT	New Testament
op. cit.	opere citato (Lat.), in the work cited above
OT	Old Testament
par.	and parallel(s)
1QS	Rule of the Community (Qumran Text)
repr.	reprinted
Syr.	Syriac
tr.	translated, translation
v. (vv.)	verse(s)
viz.	videlicet (Lat.), namely
vol. (vols.)	volume(s)
W.	Welsh

List of Contributors

A.B. A. Brown, B.A., M. Ed., teacher and freelance writer.

A.B.C. A. B. Cramp, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge.

A.C. A. Chaplin, M.Phil., freelance writer.

A.C.B. A. C. Berry, M.B., B.S., Ph.D., Consultant Clinical Geneticist, Guy's Hospital, London.

A.C.P.S. A.C.P. Sims, M.A., M.D., F.R.C.Psych., F.R.C.P.E., Professor of Psychiatry, University of Leeds.

A.C.T. A. C. Thiselton, B.D., M.Th., Ph.D., D.D., Professor of Christian Theology and Head of the Department of Theology, University of Nottingham.

A.D.V. A. D. Verhey, B.D., Ph.D., The Evert J. and Hattie E. Blekkink Professor of Religion, Hope College, Holland, Michigan.

A.E.McG. A. E. McGrath, M.A., D.Phil., B.D., Research Lecturer in Theology, University of Oxford; Research Professor of Systematic Theology, Regent College, Vancouver; Lecturer in Historical and Systematic Theology, Wycliffe Hall, Oxford.

A.F.H. A. F. Holmes, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

A.F.K. A. F. Kreider, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Theologian-in Residence, Northern Baptist College, Manchester.

A.G.V. A. G. Vos, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy, Western Kentucky University, Bowling Green, Kentucky.

A.H.A.C.E. A. H. A. Crum Ewing, B.A., M.Th, selfemployed artist and etcher.

A.J.H. A. J. Hartropp, B.Sc., Ph.D., Anglican ordinand at Oak Hill Theological College, London; formerly Lecturer in Financial Economics, Brunel University, Uxbridge, Middlesex.

A.J.T. A. J. Townsend, M.B., B.S., M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P., psychodynamic counsellor; Dean for Ministers in Secular Employment, Diocese of Southwark; honorary curate.

A.J.W. A. J. Wing, M.A., D.M., F.R.C.P., Consultant Physician, St Thomas' Hospital, London.

A.N.S.L. A. N. S. Lane, M.A., B.D., Senior Lecturer in Christian Doctrine, London Bible College.

A.O.I. A. O. Igenozu, B.A., Ph.D., Senior Lecturer in Biblical Studies, Head of the Department of Religious Studies, and Vice-Dean, Faculty of Arts, Obafemi Awolowo University, Ile-Ife, Nigeria.

A.P.F. A. P. Foster, B.Sc., B.V.Sc., Cert.S.A.D., M.R.C.V.S., Cats' Protection League Scholar, University of Bristol Veterinary School.

A.P.P. A.P. Parkinson, Pastor of Leeds Reformed Baptist Church; Chairman, Caring for Life, Leeds.

A.R.W.D. A. R. Wingfield Digby, B.A., Cert.Theol., Director, Christians in Sport, Oxford.

A.S. A. Storkey, M.Sc., M.A., Dip.Ed., Ph.D., Lecturer in Sociology, Oak Hill Theological College, London.

B.A.C. B. A. Clouse, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Educational and School Psychology, Indiana State University, Terre Haute, Indiana.

B.B. B. Batson, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Coordinator of the Special Collection in Shakespeare (Shakespeare and the Christian Tradition), Wheaton College; formerly Professor and Chair of the Department of English, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

B.H. B. Harris, B.Sc., M.B., B.S., F.R.C.Psych., D.P.M., Senior Lecturer, University of Wales College of Medicine, Cardiff.

B.K.W. B. K. Waltke, A.B., Th.M., Th.D., Ph.D., Marshall Sheppard Professor of Biblical Studies, Regent College, Vancouver.

B.L.S. B. L. Shelley, B.A., M.D., Ph.D., Senior Professor of Church History, Denver Seminary, Denver, Colorado.

B.S. B. Stanley, M.A., Ph.D., Lecturer in Church History, Trinity College, Bristol.

B.T.A. B. T. Adeney, B.A., B.D., Ph.D., Professor of Ethics and Cross-cultural Studies, Graduate Program in Religion and Society, Satya Wacana Christian University, Salatiga, Java, Indonesia.

B.W.R. B. W. Reynolds, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of History, Asbury College, Wilmore, Kentucky.

C.A.B. C. A. Brown, B.D., M.A., Ph.D., S.Th., Academic Dean, Spurgeon's College, London.

C.E.H. C. E. Hart, B.A., M.A., M.Th., M.Phil., Lecturer in Practical Theology, St John's College, Nottingham.

C.F.A. C. F. Allison, B.A., M.Div., D.Phil., formerly Bishop of South Carolina.

C.F.G. C. F. Green, F.C.I.B., F.B.I.M., F.L.C.M., formerly Director and Deputy Group Chief Executive, National Westminster Bank.

C.G.K. C. G. Kruse, B.D., M. Phil., Ph.D., Senior Lecturer, Ridley College, University of Melbourne.

C.H.S. C. H. Sherlock, B.A., Th.L., M.A., B.D., Th.D., Senior Lecturer, Ridley College, Melbourne.

C.J.H.H. C. J. H. Hingley, M.A., Chaplain, Whitestone School, Bulawayo, Zimbabwe.

C.J.H.W. C. J. H. Wright, M.A., Ph.D., Principal, All Nations Christian College, Ware, Hertfordshire.

C.M.N.S. C. M. N. Sugden, M.A., M.Phil., Ph.D., Principal, Oxford Centre for Mission Studies.

C.P. C. Partee, A.B., M.A., B.D., Ph.D., P. C. Rossin Professor of Church History, Pittsburgh Theological Seminary.

C.S.E. C. S. Evans, B.A., Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy and Curator, Howard and Edna Hong Kierkegaard Library, St Olaf College, Northfield, Minnesota.

C.Y. C. Yeats, M.A., M.Th., M.B.A., Solway Fellow and Chaplain, University College, Durham.

D.A.L. D. A. Lyon, B.Sc., Ph.D., Professor and Head of Sociology, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario.

D.A.N.F. D. A. N. Fergusson, B.Sc., M.B., B.S., M.R.C.G.P., General Secretary, Christian Medical Fellowship, London.

D.A.S. D. A. Stone, M.A., B.M., B.Ch., Vicar of St Jude's Church, South Kensington, London.

D.A.W. D. A. Westberg, B.A., M.A., M.Div., D.Phil., Assistant Professor, Department of Religious Studies, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Virginia.

D.B.F. D. B. Fletcher, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Philosophy, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois; Adjunct Professor of Bioethics, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois.

D.B.G. D. B. Garlington, B.A., M.Div., Th.M., Ph.D., Professor of New Testament, Toronto Baptist Seminary.

D.B.W. D. B. Winter, B.A., Priest-in-Charge, Ducklington, Oxfordshire; formerly Head of Religious Broadcasting, BBC, London.

D.C.S. D. C. Spanner, B.Sc., Ph.D., D.Sc., F.Inst.Biol., Emeritus Professor of Plant Biophysics, Bedford College, University of London; Anglican non-stipendiary minister.

D.D.B. D. D. Burke, B.Sc., M. Phil., Minister of Knighton Evangelical Free Church, Leicester.

D.F.W. D. F. Wright, M.A., Senior Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History, New College, University of Edinburgh.

D.G.B. D. G. Bloesch, B.A., B.D., Ph.D., Emeritus Professor of Theology, University of Dubuque Theological Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa.

D.G.J. D. G. Jones, B.Sc., M.B., B.S., D.Sc., Professor of Anatomy and Structural Biology, University of Otago, Dunedin, New Zealand.

D.H.F. D. H. Field, B.A., Director of Professional Ministry, Church Pastoral Aid Society, Warwick; formerly Vice-Principal and Lecturer in Christian Ethics, Oak Hill College, London.

D.J.A. D. J. Atkinson, B.Sc., M. Litt., Ph.D., M.A., Canon Chancellor of Southwark Cathedral, London; formerly Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford.

D.J.E.A. D. J. E. Attwood, M.A., B.A., Ph.D., Director of Studies, Trinity Theological College, Bristol.

D.J.P. D. J. Pullinger, B.A., M.Sc., Ph.D., Electronic Product Manager, Institute of Physics, Edinburgh.

D.J.T. D. J. Tidball, B.A., B.D., Ph.D., Head of Mission Department, Baptist Union of Great Britain, Didcot, Oxfordshire.

D.L.M. D. L. Mathieson, B.A., LL.B., B.C.L., LL.D., Q.C., formerly Professor of Law, Victoria University of Wellington, New Zealand.

D.L.O. D. L. Okholm, B.A., M.Div., M.A., Th.M., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Theology, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

D.L.P. D. L. Parkyn, B.A., M.Div., Ph.D., Professor of Religious Studies, Messiah College, Grantham, Pennsylvania.

D.M.C. D. M. Cansdale, M.Sc., Assistant Chief Constable, Hertfordshire Constabulary.

D.P.K. D. P. Kingdon, M.A., B.D., Theological Books Editor, Inter-Varsity Press, UK; formerly Principal, Irish Baptist College, Belfast.

D.P.N. D. P. Negus, LL.B., Senior Partner, Ellis-Fermor and Negus, Solicitors, Nottingham.

D.R. D. Ratzsch, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy, Calvin College, Grand Rapids, Michigan.

D.R.G. D. R. Groothuis, B.S., M.A., Ph.D., Assistant Professor of Philosophy of Religion and Ethics, Denver Seminary, Denver, Colorado.

D.R.L.P. D. R. L. Porter, B.A., A.L.A., freelance author and editor.

D.R.S. D. R. Shell, B.Sc., M.A., Senior Lecturer in Politics, University of Bristol.

D.W.A. D. W. Augsburg, B.D., Ph.D., Professor of Pastoral Care and Counseling, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California.

D.W.Be. D. W. Bebbington, M.A., Ph.D., F.R.Hist.S., Reader in History, University of Stirling.

D.W.Br. Dale W. Brown, A.B., B.D., Ph.D., Emeritus Professor of Theology and Director of Peace Studies, Bethany Theological Seminary, Oak Brook, Illinois.

D.W.Bro. David W. Brown, M.A., M.A., Ph.D., Van Mildert Professor of Divinity, University of Durham; Canon of Durham Cathedral.

D.W.G. D. W. Gill, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Applied Ethics, North Park College, Chicago.

D.W.P. D. W. Parish, M.C.I.T., Facilities Development Manager, British Airways.

D.W.V. D. W. Vere, M.D., F.R.C.P., F.F.P.M., Professor of Therapeutics, University of London; Consultant Physician, the Royal London Hospital.

D.W.V.N. D. W. Van Ness, LL.M., J.D., B.A., Visiting Assistant Professor, University of Detroit Mercy School of Law.

E.D.C. E. D. Cook, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., M.A., Director, the Whitefield Institute; Fellow and Chaplain, Green College, Oxford.

E.J.M. E. J. Muskus, B.Sc., Dip.Th., Tutor in Contemporary Theology, Evangelical Theological College of Wales, Bridgend, Mid Glamorgan.

E.M.B.G. E. M. B. Green, M.A., M.A., B.D., D.D., Advisor in Evangelism to the Archbishops of Canterbury and York.

E.M.S. E. M. Smith, B.A., Senior Pastoral Administrator, Caring for Life, Leeds.

E.R.M. E. R. Moberly, M.A., D.Phil., Director of Psychosexual Education and Therapy, BCM International, Upper Darby, Pennsylvania.

F.C. Sir Frederick Catherwood, M.A., F.C.A., President of the Evangelical Alliance; formerly Member of the European Parliament.

F.L. F. Lyall, M.A., LL.B., LL.M., Ph.D., Dean of the Faculty of Law, University of Aberdeen.

F.S. F. Schäfer, B.A., B.A., M.A., D.Phil., psychologist; Chief Human Resources Officer, South African Post Office.

F.V.W. F. V. Waddleton, B.Sc., B.D., Academic Dean, Glasgow Bible College.

F.W.B. F. W. Bridger, M.A., Dip.Th., Ph.D., Vicar of Woodthorpe, Nottingham; Associate Lecturer at St John's College, Nottingham.

G.A.C. G. A. Cole, B.A., B.D., M.Th., Th.D., Principal of Ridley College, University of Melbourne, Australia.

G.B.McG. G. B. McGuinness, B.Sc., M.Sc., G.M.E.C., Associate Minister, Christ Church, Chilwell, with St Barnabas, Inham Nook, Nottingham.

G.C.M. G. C. Meilaender Jr, B.A., M.Div., Ph.D., Professor of Religion, Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio.

G.D. G. Davies, M.B., B.S., F.R.C.Psych., M.Phil., D.P.M., formerly Consultant Psychiatrist, King's College Hospital and the Maudsley Hospital, London.

G.D.S. G. D. Skinner, T.Cert., D.A.S.E.(R.E.), M.Phil., Lecturer in Education, Centre for Ethnic Studies in Education, University of Manchester.

G.H.T. G. H. Twelftree, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Minister of the Uniting Church in Australia, Adelaide.

G.J.J. G. J. Jenkins, B.A., B.A., Curate of St Luke's Church, West Norwood, London.

G.J.P. G. J. Pigott, B.D., M.Phil., Vicar of St Paul's, Wilford Hill, West Bridgford, Nottingham.

G.J.W. G. J. Wenham, M.A., Ph.D., Senior Lecturer in Religious Studies, Cheltenham and Gloucester College of Higher Education, Cheltenham.

G.K.S. G. K. Smith, I.Eng., M.I.Elect.E., M.I.Hosp.E., Postgraduate research student, De Montfort University, Leicester.

G.L.B. G. L. Bray, B.A., D.Litt., Professor of Anglican Studies, Beeson Divinity School, Samford University, Birmingham, Alabama.

G.O.S. G. O. Stone, M.A., M.A., P.G.C.E., Cert.Theol., Team Rector, Bucknall Team Ministry, Stoke-on-Trent.

G.R.C. G. R. Collins, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Executive Director, American Association of Christian Counseling.

G.S. G. Smith, Research Officer, Aston Charities Community Involvement Unit, Newham.

G.S.F. G. S. Forster, M.A., Dip. Soc.Anth., Rector of Northenden, Manchester; Convenor of the Editorial Group for Grove Ethical Studies.

G.S.T. G. S. Tomlin, M.A., M.A., Tutor, Wycliffe Hall, Oxford; Chaplain, Jesus College, Oxford.

G.W.G. G. W. Grogan, B.D., M.Th., Principal Emeritus, Glasgow Bible College.

H.A.G.B. H. A. G. Blocher, B.D., D.D., Professor of Systematic Theology and Dean at the Faculté Libre de Théologie Évangélique, Vaux sur-Seine, France.

H.C.H. H. C. Hendry, B.A., P.G.C.E., M.A., Lecturer in Pastoral Counselling and World Religions, Oak Hill Theological College, London.

H.H.D. H. H. Davis, B.A., Ph.D., Reader in Sociology, University of Kent at Canterbury.

H.K.J. H. K. Jacobsen, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Minister, Northwest Covenant Church, Mt Prospect, Illinois; Adjunct Professor, North Park College, Chicago.

I.D.B. I. D. Bunting, M.A., M.Th., Diocesan Director of Ordinands, Diocese of Southwell, Nottingham.

I.H.M. I. H. Marshall, B.A., B.D., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of New Testament Exegesis, University of Aberdeen.

I.R.D. I. R. Davis, Dip. Arch. R.I.B.A., F.R.G.S., Ph.D., Director, Oxford Centre for Disaster Studies.

I.R.W. I. R. Wallace, M.Sc., M.Sc., Lecturer, Agricultural Extension and Rural Development Department, Reading University.

J.A.H.F. J. A. H. Francis, B.Sc., M.A., C.Q.S.W., psychotherapist and freelance writer.

J.A.M. J. A. Mathisen, M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Sociology, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

J.A.R. J. A. Ross, B.A., B.A., M.Phil., Associate Minister, Trinity Baptist Church, Bexleyheath, Kent; visiting lecturer, Spurgeon's College, London.

J.A.T. J. A. Temple, B.Sc., Ph.D., A.E.P., Group Managing Director, Plessey Tellumat SA Ltd, South Africa.

J.A.V. J. A. Vale, M.D., F.R.C.P., F.F.O.M., F.A.A.C.T., Director, National Poisons Information Service (Birmingham Centre), West Midlands Poisons Unit, Dudley Road Hospital, Birmingham.

J.B.G. J. B. Green, B.S., M.Th., Ph.D., Associate Professor of New Testament, American Baptist Seminary of the West and Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley, California.

J.B.W. J. B. Webster, M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Systematic Theology, Wycliffe College, University of Toronto.

J.C.D. J. C. Doggett, C.B.E., Barrister (Middle Temple); formerly Assistant Solicitor, Inland Revenue.

J.D.H. J. D. Healey, H.N.C., LL.B., L.R.P.S., Marketing Manager, Anthony Collins Solicitors, Birmingham.

J.D.M. J. D. Mason, B.A., Ph.D., Professor of Economics, Gordon College, Wenham, Massachusetts.

J.E. J. Evans, B.Sc., Ph.D., D.Sc., F.I.C.For., Chief Research Officer, Forestry Commission; Director, TEAR Fund, Teddington, Middlesex.

J.E.H. J. E. Hare, B.A., Ph.D., Professor, Department of Philosophy, Calvin College, Grand Rapids, Michigan.

J.G.C. J. G. Child, B.A., B.D., M.Th., Minister of Christ Church, La Lucia, Durban, South Africa.

J.G.McC. J. G. McConville, B.D., M.A., Ph.D., Lecturer in Old Testament, Wycliffe Hall, Oxford.

J.H.C. J. H. Court, B.A., Ph.D., F.B.Ps.S., C.Psychol.Dip.Clin. Hyp., Professor of Psychology and Director, the Psychological Center, Graduate School of Psychology, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California.

J.H.G. J. H. Gillespie, B.A., Ph.D., Dip.Th., Senior Lecturer in French, University of Ulster.

J.H.O. J. H. Olthuis, B.A., B.D., Ph.D., Senior Member in Philosophical Theology, Institute for Christian Studies, Toronto; psychotherapist in private practice.

J.H.S. J. H. Sailhamer, Th.M., M.A., Ph.D., Associate Professor of the Old Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois.

J.I.P. J. I. Packer, M.A., D.Phil., Sangwoo Youtong Chee Professor of Theology, Regent College, Vancouver.

J.K.C. J. K. Cundy, M.A., solicitor in private practice.

J.M.S. J. M. Sentamu, B.A., LL.B., M.A., Ph.D., Vicar of Holy Trinity and St Matthias, Tulse Hill, London.

J.M.V.B. J. M. V. Blanshard, M.A., F.I.F.S.T., Professor of Food Science and Dean of the Faculty of Agricultural and Food Sciences, Nottingham University.

J.N.D.A. Sir Norman Anderson, O.B.E., M.A., LL.D., D.D., F.B.A., Q.C., Emeritus Professor of Oriental Laws, University of London; formerly Director of the Institute of Advanced Legal Studies.

J.N.H. J. N. Hall, B.A., M.Sc., Ph.D., F.B.Ps.S., Consultant Clinical Psychologist and Lecturer in Clinical Psychology, Warneford Hospital, Oxford.

J.P.C. J. P. Chaplin, B.A., M.Phil., Ph.D., Tutor in Politics, Plater College, Oxford.

J.R.G. J. R. Guy, B.A., M.S.W., formerly Assistant Director, Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work, London.

J.R.McG. J. R. McGrath, M.A., M.Phil., Principal Clinical Psychologist, Rivermead Rehabilitation Centre, Oxford.

J.R.P. J. R. Peck, B.D., A.L.B.C., Minister of Earl Soham Baptist Church, Suffolk; Senior Project Worker, College House, Cambridge.

J.S.E. J. S. Escobar, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Thornley B. Wood Professor of Missiology at Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary, Philadelphia; Visiting Professor, Orlando E. Costas School of Missiology, Lima, Peru.

J.W.G. J. W. Gladwin, M.A., Dip. Theol., Provost of Sheffield.

K.E.Y. K. E. Yandell, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy and South Asian Studies, University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wisconsin.

K.F. K. Ferdinanda, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Lecturer at the Institut Supérieur Théologique de Bunia, Zaire.

K.G.E. K. G. Elzinga, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Economics, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Virginia.

L.B.K. L. B. Keeble, J.P., B.D., M.Th., Minister, Hillhead Baptist Church, Glasgow; formerly Tutor and Director in Pastoral Studies, Regent's Park College.

L.E.A.G. L. E. A. Gladwin, M.A., C.Q.S.W., independent social work consultant; formerly Director of Social Work, London Diocesan Board of Social Responsibility.

L.H.O. L. H. Osborn, B.D., M.Sc., Ph.D., Templeton Fellow, Ridley Hall, Cambridge.

L.M.-Y.C.-J. L. M.-Y. Cheung-Judge, B.Sc., M.A., Ph.D., Director of Quality and Equality

Training and Consultancy Services, Oxford.

L.R. L. Ryken, B.A., Ph.D., Professor of English, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

M.A.B. M. A. Bourdeaux, B.D., M.A., Director, Keston Institute, Oxford.

M.A.J. M. A. Jeeves, C.B.E., M.A., Ph.D., Hon.D.Sc., C. Psychol., F.B.Ps.S., F.R.S.E., Honorary Research Professor, School of Psychology, University of St Andrews, St Andrews, Fife.

M.A.N. M. A. Noll, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., McManis Professor of Christian Thought, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

M.A.R. M. A. Reid, B.A., M. Div., Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy and Chairman, Department of Philosophy, Gordon College, Wenham, Massachusetts.

M.A.S. M. A. Swann, M.D., D.C.H., Senior Clinical Medical Officer, Belfast.

McC. Professor the Lord McColl, M.S., F.R.C.S., F.A.C.S., F.R.C.S.E., Chairman, Department of Surgery of the United Medical and Dental Schools of St Thomas' and Guy's Hospitals, London.

M.C.G. M. C. Griffiths, M.A., D.D., Minister at Large, International Fellowship of Evangelical Students; formerly Professor of Mission Studies, Regent College, Vancouver.

M.C.-J. M. Chave-Jones, Dip. Soc.Sci., formerly psychotherapist in private practice, and founder, Care and Counsel, London.

M.D.J. M. D. Jenkins, M.A., M.A., formerly Central Area Manager, Prison Service, UK.

M.E.A. M. E. Alsford, B.A., Ph.D., Senior Lecturer in Theology, University of Greenwich, London.

M.F.G. M. F. Goldsmith, M.A., Lecturer and International Representative, All Nations Christian College, Ware, Hertfordshire.

M.G.B. M. G. Barker, M.B., Ch.B., F.R.C.P.Ed., F.R.C.Psych., D.P.M., Consultant Psychiatrist and Medical Director, Heath House Priory Hospital, Bristol.

M.G.G.S. M. G. G. Schluter, B.A., Ph.D., Director, the Jubilee Centre and the Keep Sunday Special Campaign, Cambridge.

M.J.B. M. J. Bartel, B.A., M.Div., Ph.D. candidate at Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, New Jersey.

M.J.D. M. J. Dowling, B.A., B.D., M.Th., Ph.D., Tutor in Church History and Historical Theology, Irish Baptist College, Belfast.

M.J.E. M. J. Evans, B.Ed., B.A., M. Phil., Lecturer in Old Testament Studies, London Bible College.

M.J.H.A. M. J. H. Allison, M.A., Member of Parliament and Second Church Estates Commissioner, London.

M.J.M. M. J. Moss, S.R.N., C.Q.S.W., Principal Officer, Residential Care Services for Older People, Social Services Department, London Borough of Richmond-upon-Thames.

M.J.N.-A. M. J. Nazir-Ali, M. Litt., Ph.D., Bishop of Rochester; formerly General Secretary, Church Missionary Society, London.

M.K.B. M. K. Batchelor, B.A., freelance author.

M.M. M. Moynagh, M.A., Ph.D., Team Rector, Wicton, Taunton, Somerset.

M.P.C. M. P. Cosgrove, M.S., Ph.D., Professor of Psychology, Taylor University, Upland, Indiana.

M.S.L. M. S. Langley, B.D., M.A., Ph.D., H.Dip.Ed., F.R.A.I., Director of Training, Diocese of Carlisle, and Director of Carlisle Diocesan Training Institute.

M.T.N. M. T. Nelson, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Philosophy, Hampden-Sydney College, Hampden-Sydney, Virginia.

N.J.B. N. J. Biggar, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Master of Christian Studies, Chaplain and Fellow, Oriel College, Oxford; Lecturer in Christian Ethics, Wycliffe Hall, Oxford.

N.J.S. N. J. Smith, B.A., B.D., D. Th., Lecturer at the University of South Africa; Pastor of a black Dutch Reformed Church in Pretoria, South Africa.

N.L.G. N. L. Geisler, B.A., M.A., Th.B., Ph.D., Dean, Southern Evangelical Seminary, Charlotte, North Carolina.

N.M.deS.C. N. M. de S. Cameron, B.D., M.A., Ph.D., Associate Dean of Academic Doctoral Programs and Chair, Department of Systematic Theology, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois.

N.P.H. N. P. Harvey, M.A., S.T.L., freelance writer and lecturer on moral theology; formerly Lecturer in Christian Ethics at Queen's College, Birmingham, and Lecturer in Moral Theology at Downside Abbey.

N.P.W. N. P. Wolterstorff, Ph.D., Noah Porter Professor of Philosophical Theology, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut.

O.M.T.O'D. O. M. T. O'Donovan, M.A., D.Phil., Regius Professor of Moral and Pastoral Theology, Oxford University; Canon of Christ Church, Oxford.

O.R.B. O. R. Barclay, M.A., Ph.D., formerly General Secretary of the Universities and Colleges Christian Fellowship, Leicester.

P.A.H. P. A. Hicks, B.D., M.A., Ph.D., Lecturer and Director of Ministry, London Bible College.

P.A.M. P. A. Marshall, B.Sc., M.Sc., M.A., M.Phil., Ph.D., Senior Fellow in Political Theory, Institute for Christian Studies, Toronto, Ontario.

P.A.Mi. P. A. Mickey, B.A., B.D., Ph.D., formerly Associate Professor of Pastoral Theology, Duke University Divinity School, Durham, North Carolina.

P.D.H. P. D. Hill, B.A., Minister-in-Charge, Pantygydr Baptist Church, Swansea; Baptist Chaplain to Swansea University College.

P.D.McK. P. D. McKenzie, LL.M., B.D., Barrister and Chairman of the New Zealand Securities Commission.

P.D.W. P. D. Woodbridge, B.A., Ph.D., Tutor in Biblical Studies, Oak Hill Theological College, London.

P.E.H. P. E. Hodgson, M.A., D.Sc., Ph.D., A.R.C.S., D.I.C., C.Phys., F.Inst.P., Senior Research Fellow, Corpus Christi College, Oxford; Head of Nuclear Physics Theoretical Group, Department of Physics, University of Oxford.

P.F.S. P. F. Sims, M.B., B.Ch., F.R.C.S., M.R.C.O.G., Consultant Obstetrician and Gynaecologist, Hexham General Hospital, Northumberland.

P.H. P. Helm, M.A., Professor of the History and Philosophy of Religion, King's College, London.

P.H.deV. P. H. deVries, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Ethics Chair, the King's College, New York; President, International Research Institute on Values Changes.

P.H.L. P. H. Lewis, Senior Pastor, Cornerstone Evangelical Church, Nottingham.

P.J.C. P. J. Clarke, B.A., Senior Chaplain at the Mildmay Mission Hospital (AIDS Hospice), London.

P.J.H.A. P. J. H. Adam, B.D., M.Th., Ph.D., Vicar of St Jude's, Carlton, Melbourne, Australia.

P.M.C. P. M. Clifford, B.A., B.D., D.Phil., Lecturer, Magdalen College, Oxford.

P.M.F. P. M. Fackler, A.B., M.A., M.A., Ph.D., Associate Professor and Chair, Department of Communications, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

P.N.H. P. N. Hillyer, B.D., Ph.D., freelance theological author and editor; formerly Lecturer in Theology, Bishop's College, Calcutta.

P.N.P. P. N. Palmer, D.Comm., Professor in the Department of Business Economics, University of South Africa, Pretoria.

P.T. P. Toon, M.A., B.D., M.Th., D.Phil., Professor of Theology, Philadelphia Theological Seminary.

P.W.T. P. W. Timms, M.R.C.Psych., Senior Lecturer in Community Psychiatry, the United Medical and Dental Schools of St Thomas' and Guy's Hospitals, London.

R.A.B. R. A. Burridge, M.A., Ph.D., Dean of King's College, London.

R.A.Hig. R. A. Higginson, M.A., Dip.Th., Cert.Ed., Ph.D., Lecturer in Christian Ethics and Director of the Ridley Hall Foundation, Ridley Hall, Cambridge.

R.A.Hin. R. A. Hines, B.Sc., M.Th., Ph.D., Lecturer in Christian Worship, Oak Hill Theological College, London; Vice-Principal, North Thames Ministerial Training Course, London.

R.A.R. R. A. Russell, B.A., M.A., M.A., M.Ed., P.G.C.E., Dip.H.E.Theol., Vicar of Widcombe, Bath; Director of the Christian Studies Unit, Widcombe, Bath.

R.C.B. R. C. Baldwin, B.Sc., B.M., M.R.C.P., M.R.C.Psych., Consultant in Old Age Psychiatry, Manchester Royal Infirmary.

R.C.C. R. C. Chewning, B.S., M.B.A., Ph.D., Chavanne Professor of Christian Ethics in Business, Baylor University, Waco, Texas.

R.C.M. R. C. Macaulay, B.D., M.A., member of L'Abri Fellowship.

R.C.R. R. C. Roberts, B.A., B.D., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy and Psychological Studies, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

R.E.N.O. R. E. N. Oake, LL.B., Chief Constable, Isle of Man Constabulary.

R.E.P. R. E. Parker, B.A., M.Th., Deputy Director, Acorn Christian Healing Trust, Bordon, Hampshire.

R.F. R. Fowke, M.B., B.Ch., M.R.C.Psych., D.P.M., D.P.A., Consultant Psychiatrist.

R.F.H. R. F. Hurding, M.A., M.B.B.Chir., D.R.C.O.G., counsellor, psychotherapist, retired medical practitioner; Visiting Lecturer in Pastoral Studies, Trinity College, Bristol.

R.G.C. R. G. Clouse, B.A., B.D., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of History, Indiana State University, Terre Haute, Indiana; Minister of First Brethren Church, Clay City, Indiana.

R.G.T. R. G. Twycross, M.A., D.M., F.R.C.P., Macmillan Clinical Reader in Palliative Medicine, University of Oxford.

R.J.B. R. J. Bauckham, M.A., Ph.D., Professor of New Testament Studies, University of St Andrews, Fife.

R.J.Sh. R. J. Sheehan, B.D., Minister, Welwyn Evangelical Church, Welwyn, Hertfordshire.

R.J.Si. R. J. Sider, B.D., M.A., Ph.D., President of Evangelicals for Social Action, USA; Professor of Theology and Culture, Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

R.J.So. R. J. Song, B.A., M.A., D.Phil., Tutor in Ethics, St John's College, Durham.

R.J.T. R. J. Toyn, LL.B., circuit judge (retired).

R.J.W. R. J. Whiteley, B.A., M.A., theological student, Ridley College, Melbourne, Australia.

R.K.McC. R. K. McCloughry, B.Sc., M.Sc., Director of the Kingdom Trust, Nottingham; Lecturer in Social Ethics at St John's College, Nottingham.

R.L.P. R. L. Purtill, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Philosophy, Western Washington University, Bellingham, Washington.

R.L.S. R. L. Sturch, M.A., D.Phil., Rector of Islip, Oxfordshire.

R.M.H. R. M. Hanson, B.A., M. Phil., formerly Honorary Senior Research Fellow, Department of Psychiatry, University of Leeds.

R.P.L. R. P. Loy, A.B., M.A., Professor of Political Science, Taylor University, Upland, Indiana.

R.P.M. The late R. P. Moss, B.Sc., Ph.D., Dip. in Soil Science, latterly Research Professor in Human Ecology, University of Salford.

R.S.A. R. S. Anderson, B.S., B.D., Ph.D., Professor of Theology and Ministry, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California.

R.T.F. R. T. Forster, M.A., Leader, Ichthus Christian Fellowship, Forest Hill, London.

R.V. R. Vincent, B.Sc., M.D., F.R.C.P., A.K.C., F.E.S.C., Consultant Cardiologist, Royal Sussex County Hospital, Brighton, East Sussex; Professor of Medical Science, University of Sussex, Brighton.

R.W.G. R. W. Green, B.A., Member of the Springboard Team (the Archbishops' Initiative for the Decade of Evangelism).

R.W.H. R. W. Heinze, B.S., M.A., Ph.D., College Dean, Oak Hill Theological College, London.

S.D. S. Dex, B.A., M.Sc., Ph.D., on secondment from the University of Keele to Research Professorship at the University of Essex, ESRC Centre for Micro-Social Change.

S.E.Ai. S. E. Alsford, B.A., Ph.D., Senior Lecturer in Theology, University of Greenwich, London.

S.E.At. S. E. Atkinson, B.Sc., A.K.C., primary school teacher and education lecturer.

S.L.J. S. L. Jones, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Professor and Chairperson, Department of Psychology, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

S.M. S. Motyer, M.A., M.Litt., Ph.D., Lecturer, London Bible College.

S.N.W. S. N. Williams, M.A., Ph.D., formerly Professor of Theology, United Theological College, Aberystwyth, Dyfed.

S.S.H. S. S. Harakas, B.A.Th., B.D., Th.D., Archbishop Iakovos Professor of Orthodox Theology, Holy Cross Greek Orthodox School of Theology, Brookline, Massachusetts.

S.W. S. Webley, M.A., Director, British–North American Research Association, London.

T.A.D. T. A. Dearborn, B.A., M.T.S., Th.M., Ph.D., Executive Director of the Seattle Association for Theological Education and Assistant Professor of Practical Theology, Fuller Seminary, Pasadena, California, and Regent College, Vancouver.

T.D. T. Dean, Senior Producer, Religious Programmes, BBC World Service; formerly Editor, Third Way.

T.D.K. T. D. Kennedy, B.A., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Philosophy, Valparaiso University, Valparaiso, Indiana.

T.E.C.H. Sir Timothy Hoare, M.A., M.A., Director, Career Plan Ltd, London.

T.E.E.G. T. E. E. Goodacre, B.Sc., M.B.B.S., F.R.C.S., Consultant Plastic and Reconstructive Surgeon; Radcliffe Infirmary, Oxford.

T.J.Ch. T. J. Chester, B.D., Public Affairs Officer, TEAR Fund, Teddington, Middlesex.

T.J.Co. T. J. Cooling, B.A., Dip. Th., M.A., Ph.D., Projects Officer, Association of Christian Teachers, Nottingham.

T.O.K. T. O. Kay, A.B., M.A., Ph.D., Associate Professor of History, Chair, Department of History, and Coordinator, Interdisciplinary and General Studies, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

T.O.W. T. O. Walker, M.A., Archdeacon of Nottingham.

T.R.A. T. R. Albin, B.A., M.A., Instructor in Christian Spiritual Formation, University of Dubuque Theological Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa.

V.G. V. Griffiths, B.A., M.A., P.G.C.E., formerly Sessional Lecturer, Regent College, Vancouver.

V.K.S. V. K. Samuel, B.Sc., B.D., M.Litt., D.D., Executive Director, International Fellowship of Evangelical Mission Theologians, Oxford.

V.M.S. V. M. Sinton, M.A., Cert. Ed., Dip.H.E.Theol., Director of Pastoral Studies, Wycliffe Hall, Oxford.

W.A.S. W. A. Strange, B.A., B.A. D.Phil., Vicar of Llandeilo Fawr, Dyfed.

W.F.S. W. F. Storrar, M.A., B.D., Ph.D., Lecturer in Practical Theology, Department of Divinity with Religious Studies, University of Aberdeen.

W.J.D. W. J. Dumbrell, B.A., M.A., B.D., M.Th., Th.D., Director of Post-Graduate Studies, Moore Theological College, Newtown, New South Wales.

W.R. W. Riggans, B.D., M.A., Ph.D., General Director, Church's Ministry Among the Jews, St Albans.

Z.G.L. Z. G. Lindblade, B.A., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Sociology, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois.

PART ONE

ONE God

Christian moral theology (see Christian Moral Reasoning†) and pastoral theology (see Practical and Pastoral Theology†) are decisively shaped by Christian convictions about the nature of God. The primary determinant of our understanding of Christian action (moral and pastoral) is properly the gospel of God, proclaimed and embodied in Jesus* Christ. The gospel summons is enacted amongst a community of agents who are shaped by their confession of God's redemptive gift of himself in the life, death and resurrection* of Jesus and in Jesus' presence in the Holy Spirit.* Moral theology and pastoral theology reflect on the acts of the gospel community in the light of their divine source and norm.

1. Historical considerations

Classical Christian theology accords with the opening definition, in that it generally does not treat moral or pastoral questions in isolation from its exposition of the doctrinal substance of Christianity. Such questions receive only relatively independent coverage in works of ethical exhortation (often in a catechetical context), in treatments of disputed questions (such as the propriety of Christian attendance at the Greek games or of military service by Christians), and in controversial writings against pagans or heretics in which ethical polemic often figures large. Similarly, scholastic theology treats ethical and practical issues as an integral part of its Summae or Sentences (though commentaries on Aristotle's* Ethics flourished in the scholastic period). The magisterial Reformers continue this integration of doctrine and morals, as in John Calvin's* account of Christian action in the course of his exposition of the sanctifying work of Christ and the Spirit. Seventeenth-century Protestant scholasticism operates somewhat differently: the wider scope of the biblical account of God's dealings with humanity tends to fall away in favour of a formalized understanding of divine revelation as doctrinal or moral propositions, from which recommendations about human action are deduced by a casuistical* method largely derived from Aristotelian logic (enjoying renewed popularity in the European Protestant academies). Thus the Basel theologian Wollebius (1586-1629), in Book II of his Compendium Theologiae Christianae (tr. in W. Beardslee, ed., Reformed Dogmatics, Oxford and New York, 1965), outlines moral and pastoral theology by expounding the Decalogue* (construed as 'precepts') in such a way that God comes to be understood as 'the heavenly legislator' (II.xi.1). This goes along with an understanding of pastoral practice as extended application of principles for Christian conduct, derived by logical deduction from the biblical text. Whilst this method was often a form for articulating much biblical and practical wisdom – notably in English divines such as Richard Baxter* or John Owen (1616-83) – its formalism threatened to reduce the trinitarian and Christological dimensions of Christian teaching about God to an abstract dogmatic scheme.

It is arguable that this construal of the connection between God and human action as one between precept and obedience prepared the way for the contention of Immanuel Kant* that good moral action can never take its law from outside itself (from, e.g., divine commands) since the moral self is essentially autonomous. For Kant, language about divine law, grace, etc., corrupts our sense of ourselves as moral agents whose freedom from external determination is essential to the attribution of responsibility. Kant's immensely subtle critique of divine 'heteronomy' has largely shaped discussion and critique of Christian moral theology in the modern era. This can be seen in persistent criticism of the politically and psychologically alienating potential of the notion of obedience* to God's will, as articulated in the protest atheism of Ludwig Feuerbach (1804-72), Karl Marx,* Friedrich Nietzsche* and Sigmund Freud.* In a somewhat different vein, mid-20th-century analytical ethicists argued forcefully for the independence of morals from theological commitments (see the representative collection in Ian Ramsey, ed., Christian Ethics and Contemporary Philosophy, London, 1966). In pastoral theology, a parallel development in the present century can be seen in preference (especially in N. American Protestantism) for social scientific rather than theological analysis of the pastoral situation, and for clinical and therapeutic models of pastoral care (see Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy†), often relegating the theological content of pastoral action to posterior ‘theological reflection’.

Some more recent writing in moral and pastoral theology, however, shows considerable interest in the reintegration of these disciplines with Christian doctrine, crucially with the Christian doctrine of God. A major model here is provided by the work of Karl Barth,* whose monumental Church Dogmatics constitutes the most significant attempt since the Reformation to make ethics an essential component of the exposition of the Christian doctrine. The dogmatic basis for this attempt is Barth’s understanding of covenant,* in which God elects from all eternity to be God with humanity in a relation of reciprocal agency, the action of divine grace* evoking the corresponding human work of gratitude. Extending Barth (and sometimes in criticism of his apparently inadequate moral psychology), some propose an analysis of human action in terms of the agent’s convictions about God and the world, especially as those convictions are embodied in narratives which shape the identity of the moral agent (see the works of Stanley Hauerwas in the Bibliography). In a quite different direction, others (such as T. Rendtorff, in Ethics 1, ET, Philadelphia, 1986, and J. Gustafson), continue to urge the independence of ethics from dogmatics, and to locate Christian moral theology alongside the human and social sciences in contributing its particular analysis of common human reality. These different approaches to the theological content of moral and pastoral theology often reflect different accounts of the relation of Christianity to its cultural setting. Those who see significant correlation between faith and its context stress the necessity of integrating secular learning with Christian doctrine; others, unwilling to surrender heavy theological content, tend towards opposition to prevailing cultural trends or modes of knowledge, on the grounds that Christian faith in God proposes a radically distinct account of reality.

2. The Christian doctrine of God

a. Father, Son and Spirit. The Christian doctrine of God is the doctrine of the Trinity. This point is often obscured by treating some questions about ‘God’ (such as proofs of God’s existence) in isolation from questions about the Trinity, a process which results in a reduction of trinitarian doctrine to a particular version of more general theistic ideas, failing to see trinitarian teaching as the distinctively Christian understanding of God. Although sometimes regarded as the fruit of inappropriate metaphysical speculation, trinitarian doctrine is best seen as the attempt to reconstruct the concept of God as creator, redeemer and perfecter of all things, on the basis of God’s self-gift in Jesus Christ. Trinitarian doctrine condenses the scriptural account of the acts and being of God and the church’s experience of salvation (see Sin and Salvation†), furnishing an analysis of the divine identity as subject and agent in those acts.

The biblical writings do not yield explicit trinitarian doctrine, though there are formulae and patterns of argument (especially in the NT epistles and John’s Gospel) through which later trinitarian constructs could be warranted. Trinitarian categories are an implication of the primary Christian confession that the contingent human person Jesus is Lord, that is, he is one whose historical particularity embodies the universal presence and effectiveness of God’s saving rule. Confession of Christ’s lordship accords him more than provisional, partial or local significance: as Lord, he constitutes the most comprehensive framework within which all things are to be known and judged. His person and acts, supremely his death and resurrection, reorder the relation of the entire creation* to God in a fashion so radical and completely effective that it can only be understood as divine in character. Hence Jesus occupies the absolute, i.e. non-relative, place characteristically occupied by God and attracts to himself, in the NT and elsewhere, language characteristically reserved for God alone.

This confession clearly leads to a reconstruction of the concept of God, since severe strain is placed upon received language and concepts by this bringing together of the transcendent (God) and the contingent (Jesus). This does not mean straightforward identification of 'God' and 'Jesus' in which those terms become interchangeable (though passages in early writers like Ignatius of Antioch, c. 35- c. 107, come close to this). In developed patristic thought, the doctrine of God incorporates affirmations of a distinction within the Godhead between Father and Son. This distinction was bound up with a further distinction in incarnational theology between the divinity and humanity of Christ. This latter distinction rooted the man Jesus in the being of God, whilst at the same time preventing unqualified literal ascription of the history of Jesus to God and affirming the unity of the two 'natures' in the one historical 'person' or subject, Jesus of Nazareth. The differentiation between Father and Son was characterized by the awkward notion of the 'begetting' or 'generation' of the Son by the Father. This term identifies the Father as absolute origin or founding purpose, fulfilling his eternal resolve in relation to the Son who is distinct and derivative from, but (against Arius, c. 250- c. 336) in no way subsequent or subordinate to the (ingenerate) Father. Behind these distinctions lies the prime soteriological intention of retaining the divinity of Christ as agent of salvation, without compromise to the freedom or completeness of the being of God. Trinitarian language accomplishes this by making the relation of Jesus to the Father into the embodiment of an intrinsic 'relatedness' within God's very being.

The doctrine is completed by affirmations of the divinity of the Spirit, which stem from an understanding of the radically creative power of Christ present as Spirit in the Christian experience of regeneration. Since the Spirit effects union with Christ and the church's adoption into the divine life, the Spirit's being and agency are divine. For the Western tradition, this third trinitarian distinction has been less secure (partly because of heavy concentration on Christology, partly because Augustine's* interpretation of the trinitarian 'persons' as 'substantial relations' emphasizes unity rather than differentiation). In the East, a more richly elaborated theology of Spirit has encouraged a more pluralistic understanding of the Trinity.

The overall thrust of trinitarian doctrine is thus that the Christian meaning of the term 'God' is established out of the history of Jesus Christ, understood as the embodiment of God's saving will, activity and being, and as presently effective in the Spirit. So defined, God is not an undifferentiated self, but intrinsically relational; God's essential unity consists in the 'relation' of the 'persons' of Father, Son and Spirit (the metaphorical force of 'relation' and 'person' is not to be elided). Crucially, this intra-trinitarian relatedness is the ground of God's relation as creator, redeemer and perfecter to what is outside himself. Hence trinitarian language interprets God's acts towards the creation as the expression of his very being, rather than as external acts conducted through intermediary agencies.

Trinitarian doctrine is, then, fundamental to Christian reflection on ethical and pastoral practice. As an account of the identity of God, the doctrine of the Trinity also establishes the main lines of a Christian understanding of the way the world is and the ways in which human agents are to act in the world. Both the moral field and the moral agent are to be construed out of God's self-manifestation as creator, redeemer and sanctifier. Thus, from a trinitarian perspective, the world will be seen as created by, and related and unconditionally obligated to, God the Father who is the one from whom its purposive ethical order derives. The world will, further, be seen as caught up in and transfigured by the redemptive activity of the Son in which creation's original purpose is renewed and consummated. Finally, as the sphere of the operation of the Spirit, creation (and above all the church* as new creation) will be seen as realities in process of transformation through reorientation towards the purposes of God which they are newly empowered to serve.

b. The attributes of God. Language about God's attributes seeks to characterize God as this particular being in his self-manifestation. The subject of such attribution (God) defines the predicates, and vigilance against inappropriate carry-over from the human contexts of our language is necessary. The attributes have been classified in a large number of ways of greater or lesser elaborateness. Most accounts work with a core distinction between those attributes which display God's absolute freedom and those which display God's unreserved love. As free, God is utterly self-originating, possessing aseity (lit. 'from himself'), undetermined by any reality beyond himself (and hence 'impassible'), governed only by his own will in shaping his intentions and acts, unresolvable into any prior state of affairs. As such, God's relation to creation is gracious, the fruit only of his own disposing of himself, and one in which he retains his absolute majesty, sovereignty, glory and holiness. In his freedom, God transcends the conditions of creaturely existence, such as time, space and contingency, and so God is eternal, unchanging, omnipresent and omnipotent. This transcendence, however, is not such that God is unrelated to contingency or incapable of freely assuming those conditions when the Word becomes flesh. Above all, God's freedom is not to be thought of as absolute lack of constraint but as the liberty in which as Father, Son and Spirit he chooses, creates, sustains, redeems and sanctifies his creation. God's freedom is his freedom to love; his sovereignty is his undefeated rule in favour of his creation; his holiness is his power to sanctify; his righteousness is his act of upholding his cause (and therefore the cause of his creatures) against the disorder of sin; his glory is known in his sharing of his glory with humanity; his unity as the triune God is displayed in his establishment of fellowship with himself by the creation and election of humanity into covenant. God's attributes thus do not describe a divine reality anterior to God's saving self-manifestation, but point to his purposive acts in creation and covenant, sealed in Jesus Christ, as the locus of his being.

3. God, ethics and pastoral theology

a. God, belief and action. Fundamental to Christian conviction about reality is the proposal that 'God is'. Accordingly, any account of Christian moral and pastoral action has to be simultaneously an account of God and God's action: moral theology and pastoral theology are modes of the doctrine of God. Christian agenda cannot be detached without irreparable loss from Christian credenda concerning God's character and purposes. Reflection on Christian action is thus informed by the basic belief-structure of the Christian community. That belief-structure is articulated in a variety of activities, credal, cultic and practical, but above all in Scripture, which furnishes the normative and critical account of Christian identity as it is shaped by the creative and redemptive activity of the triune God. Christian beliefs, encoded in this way, give rise to a certain understanding of self and world on the part of Christian believers. These beliefs characterize the field within which moral and pastoral action take place, and also characterize agents within that field, above all by reference to convictions about God. Belief in God, then, though it has a primary objective reference to God's transcendent reality, also has 'self-involving' aspects intrinsic to it: it describes the world in which Christian agents act, prescribes moral roles, and enjoins or dissuades from certain practices, habits and patterns of deliberation and action (see D. D. Evans, The Logic of Self-Involvement, London, 1963). An account of the connection between belief in God and moral action must go beyond the formal precept-obedience model by filling out the connections between belief-structure, self-understanding and practice.

b. The field of action. The Christian doctrine of God issues in a particular understanding of reality. That understanding is not merely 'theistic' in a generic sense, but more properly an understanding of reality as the sphere of God's creative and redemptive action. Above all, the Christian understanding of reality is specified by Jesus' resurrection from the dead as the anticipation of the re-creation of all things. His resurrection, and the gracious participation in that resurrection by the people of God through the power of the Spirit, constitute the 'new creation' which is determinative of the creation's very being. Out of Jesus' resurrection, creation can be seen as in process of transformation into glorious perfection (Rom. 8:19-23). The 'newness' of the creation means that its eschatological transfiguration is not the realization of latent possibilities, but the entire alteration of creation, precisely so that it can reach its consummation by becoming what God intends.

This eschatological process constitutes the order of reality as creation. The order of creation is not determined primarily by reference to its original ordering 'in the beginning', but by its redemption through Christ in which its true end is accomplished. Thus the moral order of creation – its meaningfulness or orderliness as a sphere for human action – is a divine accomplishment and gift. This means, first, that moral order exists: reality is not mere random process. Secondly, it means that moral order is discovered by obedient action rather than imposed by autonomous agents. Here the Christian faith diverges from existentialist (see Existentialist Ethics*) understandings of moral value as the pure creation of the human will, as well as from exclusively technological understandings of reality as having no order apart from that which is given to it by human purposes. Hence in ethical deliberations concerning the status of the human foetus, for example, the Christian doctrine of God opposes attempts to define (and thereby circumscribe) that status by sole reference to the life-project of either or both parents. Or in approaching ecological issues concerning the use of nature, the doctrine of God will prevent us from locating the meaning of nature simply in its status as raw material for human mastery. Intrinsic, then, to Christian affirmations concerning God is a further affirmation that the human agent is not the point at which moral order is created, but rather the mediator of an order established through God's transcendent acts (see T. F. Torrance, Divine and Contingent Order, Oxford, 1981, pp. 128-142).

As a reality in process of transformation towards its eschatological goal, the new creation exists in antithesis to the old order of sin and death,* which has been decisively set aside in God's work in Christ. Accordingly, Christian theology understands the field of human action as one in which disorder, unrighteousness and opposition to the purposes of God are already 'disarmed' (Col. 2:15), and in which the triumph of God's purposes is securely established. This both limits the scope of Christian action and gives it a distinctive shape. Christian action is limited, in that the triumph of God's new order requires no human actions for its completion, activation or realization, since it is already secured in Christ and effective in the Spirit. This does not mean that Christian action is superfluous, however, but that it takes its generative power as well as its distinctive patterns from God's own achievement, into which it is graciously drawn and to which it exists as humble, provisional but truthful testimony. Moreover, it again requires a different set of categories through which to construe the moral field, interpreting the world and its history and human actions in that history as in correspondence or opposition to the coming reign of God's good order. God's rule in Christ – in which the community of believers participates by grace as it is 'seated ... with him in the heavenly realms' (Eph. 2:6) – constitutes the context in which all reality is to be interpreted. And so in the area of moral action, too, 'The church precedes the world epistemologically' (J. H. Yoder, The Priestly Kingdom, Notre Dame, IN, 1984, p. 10).

c. The agent. Human mediation of the moral order of reality is not a matter of simple intellectual perception of order, but rather of the obedient disposition of the moral self in all its habits, practices and modes of existence, individual and social, to God's saving rule in Jesus Christ. Accordingly, the Christian doctrine of God yields a specific understanding of the nature of the self* and it acts as existing in response and responsibility to God. In formal terms, this means that a Christian account of moral selfhood will be less concerned than some styles of moral philosophy with particular acts, with the will or with the process of deliberation, but more interested in the convictions about reality which are expressed and transmitted in the agent's way of life, amongst which convictions about God are fundamental.

The primary implication of the Christian doctrine of God for an understanding of the human agent is that human persons are creatures of divine grace. Over against the insistence since the Enlightenment* on the dynamics of self-making as basic to moral selfhood, Christian theology views the self as essentially dependent upon the creative and redemptive word and act of God. Hence faith and gratitude are fundamental to the definition of the human person: faith in its widest sense as openness and receptivity towards and trust in divine determination, and gratitude as the orientation of the total life-act of the person to God's grace and goodness. In a redemptive context, this stress on passivity as proper to humanity is worked out in terms of the centrality of God's acts of justification* and sanctification – as primary to the moral psychology of the believer. Both justification and sanctification have deep roots in trinitarian belief: in the eternal saving will of the Father, in the reconciling work of the Son, in the Spirit's subjective realization of reconciliation.* The effect of making these soteriological concepts basic to the definition of the human person is to de-emphasize the significance of human acts in the estimation of human value. Human acts effect neither justification (acceptability in the divine judgment) nor holiness; instead, such acts are properly means whereby the person in Christ corresponds to God's prior act in making the person new. This clearly separates Christian anthropology from that stemming from the Marxist tradition (often expressed in the ethics of some contemporary theologies of justice and liberation; see Liberation Theology*), according to which human labour is the point at which reality is constituted as purposive (see G. Lukacs, The Ontology of Social Being 3: Labour, ET, London, 1980). The Christian doctrine of God relieves the human agent of responsibility for the creation of ultimate moral meaning and order, or for the final establishment and maintenance of the self's identity (since that identity is secured through the sequence of God's acts of election, calling and glorification).

Nevertheless, because as a creature of grace the human person is restored to the covenant broken by sin, he or she re-enters the sphere of covenantal obligation. Grace is teleological: its end is not simply the eradication of sin but the evocation of a life of obedient action in conformity to the will of God. The fundamental passivity of the human creature is thus complemented by a no less fundamental activity as partner to the covenant established by grace. As covenant partner, the moral agent exists under the command of God, the Lord of the covenant. The term 'command' needs careful definition if it is not to suggest mere tyranny by an absolutely superior power. God's absolute commands, as the commands of the creator and redeemer, are the expression of God's loving purposes for his creatures; their goal is not our diminishment or bondage but our liberation to flourish within the good order of the covenant. 'Law' (in the sense of the command of God) is thus a form of grace, and testifies to the mutuality of the covenant in which God's agency calls forth patterns of responsive human action (see C. H. Dodd, Gospel and Law, Cambridge, 1951, and Barth, CD II/2). The command of God, because it is the command of God, claims unreserved obedience. This does not, however, entail a complete rejection of moral deliberation but rather a shift in the meaning of deliberation. Deliberation is not wilful submission of divine commands to human judgment: Dietrich Bonhoeffer's* picture of this as the essence of human sin through the image of 'the Pharisee' who orders all life as good or evil around the self as the point of moral discrimination is entirely apt (see his Ethics, pp. 16f.). Properly speaking, deliberation is the conscious ordering of the self in giving trustful assent and allegiance to the command of God as our ultimate good.

God's election of human partners to the covenant, accomplished in Jesus Christ (Eph. 1:5, 11-12) is thus the source of moral obligation.* God's act in Christ also specifies the shape of human life in obedience to God. This is the force of language about 'the imitation of Christ'. Imitating Christ is not a matter of slavish mimicry, or of collapsing the all-important distinction between the finished work of Christ and Christian ethical action. Imitation is a consequence of God's redemptive action, not its continuation or the realization of its effectiveness. Thus it is a matter of envisaging Jesus as a pattern of human moral agency, following which demands both prior conformity to Christ effected by the Spirit, and stringent demarcation of the distance between Christ's acts and those of the Christian. It is as 'analogies' to Jesus' humanity that human persons come to exist in God's image. Moral and pastoral theology will accordingly be concerned with human virtue,* not as an immanent set of qualities or natural teleology in the human creature, but as the Spirit-produced fruit of participation in the paschal movement of the death and resurrection of Christ.

4. Conclusion

The fate of Christian moral and pastoral theology lies largely in its capacity to articulate its own specific grounds (which, in the end, means its doctrine of God, construed through Christological and trinitarian categories). Only on that basis is it likely to adhere to its own vocation, for both in its content and its method it is – like all Christian theology – determined by reference to the first commandment, supremely manifested in the Word made flesh.

See especially: ATONEMENT; AUTHORITY; BLASPHEMY; BLESSING AND CURSING; CHURCH; CONSCIENCE; CONVERSION; COVENANT; CREATION; DECALOGUE; ESCHATOLOGY AND ETHICS; FAITH; FOLK RELIGION; FORGIVENESS; GODLINESS; GOODNESS; GOSPEL AND ETHICS; GRACE; HEALING; HEAVEN AND HELL; HOLINESS; HOLY SPIRIT; HOLY WAR; HOPE; HYPOCRISY; IMAGE OF GOD; ISLAMIC ETHICS; JESUS; JEWISH ETHICS; JUDGMENT AND THE JUDGMENT; JUSTIFICATION, DOCTRINE OF; KINGDOM OF GOD; LAW AND GOSPEL; MERCY; MISSION, MORALITY OF; NATURAL LAW; POWER; PRAYER; PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGION; RECONCILIATION; RELIGIOUS EDUCATION; REPENTANCE; RESPONSIBILITY; RESURRECTION; REVELATION; RIGHTEOUSNESS; SANCTIFICATION; SPIRITUALITY; SUNDAY; TEMPTATION; THEOCRACY; THEODICY; VOCATION.

Bibliography

On the doctrine of God: K. Barth, CD I/1; H. Berkhof, Christian Faith (ET, Grand Rapids, 1979); C. Braaten and R. Jenson, Christian Dogmatics 1 (Philadelphia, 1984); E. Jüngel, The Doctrine of the Trinity (ET, Edinburgh and Grand Rapids, 1976); W. Kasper, The God of Jesus Christ (ET, New York, 1983; London, 1984); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, 1977); K. Rahner, The Trinity (ET, New York, 1970); T. F. Torrance, The Trinitarian Faith (Edinburgh, 1988); O. Weber, Foundations of Dogmatics 1 (ET, Grand Rapids, 1981).

On moral theology: K. Barth, CD II/2, III/4, IV/4; D. Bonhoeffer, Ethics (ET, London, 1971); J. Gustafson, Theology and Ethics (Chicago and Oxford, 1981); S. Hauerwas, The Peaceable Kingdom (Notre Dame, IN, 1983; London, 1984); idem, Against the Nations (Minneapolis, MN, 1985); J. W. McClendon, Systematic Theology 1: Ethics (Nashville, TN, 1986); O. O'Donovan, Resurrection and Moral Order (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 1994); H. Thielicke, TE.

On pastoral theology: D. Browning (ed.), Practical Theology (New York, 1983); L. Mudge and J. Poling (eds.), Formation and Reflection (Philadelphia, 1987); T. Oden, Pastoral Theology (San Francisco, 1983); M. Thornton, The Function of Theology (London, 1960); E. Thurneysen, A Theology of Pastoral Care (ET, Richmond, VA, 1962).

J.B.W.

TWO

Love

‘This is love,’ wrote John, ‘not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins. Dear friends, since God so loved us, we also ought to love one another’ (1 Jn. 4:10-11).

1. Biblical teaching

These two sentences in the NT encapsulate the four most distinctive features of the Christian love ethic. It is theocentric, because the origin of genuine loving lies in God’s gracious initiative. It is Christocentric, in that the Son is the focal point of the Father’s love. It is active and self-sacrificial, reaching its peak in the death of Christ. And it demands a reciprocal, imitative response from those who are its beneficiaries.

a. God’s love. ‘God is love’, John states in the same context (1 Jn. 4:8, 16b). This is the bottom line. The true meaning of love is comprised in the relationship which binds the three Persons of the Godhead together. ‘Beloved’ is a word the Synoptic Gospels reserve to express the Father’s love for the Son (especially at crucial points of Jesus’ ministry, see Mk. 1:11; 9:7), thus underlining the supreme significance of that bond.

The Son loves the Father, too (Jn. 14:31). The hallmark of his love is obedience,* and the Holy Spirit exhibits the same loving subservience in his relationship to the other two Persons of the Trinity (Jn. 16:13-15; cf. 12:49).

The Bible paints in the warm, supportive, forgiving nature of God’s love, in a series of vivid word pictures. He cares for his people like a farmer for his vineyard and a shepherd for his sheep (Is. 5:1-7; Jn. 10:11-16). His concern is similar to – and greater than – that of parents for their children (Ps. 103:13; Is. 49:15; 66:13; Ho. 11:1). The warmth of his feeling can be compared to a totally committed friendship (Jn. 15:13-17), or even to the passion of falling in love (Is. 54:6-8; Ezk. 16).

It is within the framework of the covenant* that the most striking feature of God’s love is displayed. He will always be faithful to his covenant promises, so his love can rightly be described as ‘everlasting’ (Je. 31:3). His people’s commitment to him may be fickle (Ho. 6:4), but the power of his love will conquer the most outrageous unfaithfulness (Ho. 3:1; 11:8-9).

Paul picks up the same theme in a Christocentric fashion. He lists the most powerful forces which may prompt Christians to desert their Lord, and concludes that the embrace of Jesus’ love will overcome everything (Rom. 8:35-39).

God’s love is practical. This is a note sounded repeatedly in the OT. Israel owed her redemption from Egypt to his loving, mighty intervention (Dt. 4:37-38; 7:8; Ps. 106:6-12). Minority groups, like widows, orphans and immigrants, benefited from his powerful support (Dt. 10:18). And when, for their sins, his people were exiled, their loving Lord exercised his prerogative of mercy and restored them to their homeland (Is. 43:4ff.).

The story of God’s love in action gathers momentum in the NT. It was the Father’s committed concern for his world that prompted him to give the Son (Jn. 3:16). It was the Son’s love for the sinner which led to his own act of self-giving (Gal. 2:20). And the gift of the Holy Spirit is further evidence of divine love ‘poured out into our hearts’ (Rom. 5:5).

Christ’s death and resurrection* provide the supreme practical demonstration of God’s love. Jesus showed his disciples ‘the full extent of his love’, as he led them forward to the cross (Jn. 13:1; 15:13; cf. 1 Jn. 3:16). In his love, he became an atoning sacrifice (see Atonement*) for their sins (1 Jn. 4:10). And the wealth of God’s loving mercy makes them – and all fellow believers – alive with him in his resurrection (Eph. 2:4-10).

The Bible summons men and women again and again to live a life of love. But the model and dynamic of such radical loving are not to be dredged up from the depths of human nature. They pre-exist already in the nature and activity of God.

b. Love for God. Jesus echoed the OT's plain command that people must love God with the whole of their human being (Dt. 6:4-5; Mt. 22:37-38). And if such love for the Father is genuine, he taught, it will inevitably embrace the Son, too (Jn. 8:42; cf. 1 Pet. 1:8).

The cold edge of this demand is softened by the assumption that such love is not coerced. It is the spontaneous response of humankind's overwhelming gratitude to God for his amazing grace.* 'Christ's love compels us', Paul confesses, with the cross in the front of his mind (2 Cor. 5:14). In verses like this, it is hard to decide whether the original meaning is 'Christ's love for us' or 'our love for Christ' (cf. Jn. 5:42). The two merge. Once a person grasps the gospel of redemption, believing leads straight to loving (Gal. 5:6; 1 Thes. 1:3; 3:6; 1 Tim. 1:14). Nevertheless, God's demand is frighteningly exclusive. The divine lover will tolerate no rivals, whether human or material (Mt. 6:24; 10:37). He insists on his people's loving loyalty with a jealous ferocity (Ex. 20:4-5). This is not obsessional possessiveness, but the righteous fury of a devoted husband who finds his wife in bed with another man (Jas. 4:4-5, NIV mg.). And he himself provides the inner resources to enable his human partner to stay faithful (Dt. 30:6; Rom. 5:5).

Humankind's devotion is a response to God's prior love. But the story does not end there. Human, responsive love is merely a link in a chain reaction. The Father loves those who love him and his Son (Pr. 8:17; Jn. 16:27). They, in turn, will come to know God more intimately (Jn. 14:21; Eph. 3:17-19). And that itself is part of a 'benign circle' which brings inconceivable benefits (1 Cor. 2:9-10).

c. Love for people. The Bible's teaching on love for others displays the same creative tension between clear-cut command and grateful response.

The Father's love stimulates a loving reaction from his children (1 Jn. 4:11; cf. Lk. 7:47). The Son's self-giving spurs his brothers and sisters to live a life of love like his (Eph. 5:1-2). And the Holy Spirit, alive in the believer, produces such love as his fruit (Gal. 5:22).

Jesus was not the first to highlight the two 'great commandments' (Dt. 6:5; Lv. 19:18; Mt. 22:34-40; cf. Jas. 2:8). But the way he brought them into dynamic relationship was certainly distinctive. Love shown to God's people is love shown to him (Heb. 6:10; cf. Mt. 25:34-40; 1 Jn. 4:20); while the proof of genuine love for others is obedient love for their heavenly Father (1 Jn. 5:2).

In OT times, the neighbour to be loved was the fellow member of the covenant people. The resident alien must be loved too (Lv. 19:34), so it would be wrong to suggest that covenant ethics encouraged racism (see Race*), but the law* made a clear distinction between neighbours and foreigners when it came (for example) to granting financial concessions in hard times (Dt. 15:1-11; 23:19-20; Ex. 22:25).

Under the covenant law (which contrasts sharply with other Near-Eastern law codes at this point), the weakest members of the community were targeted for preferential, loving treatment. Love demanded that these vulnerable neighbours be treated with fairness on pay days and with special generosity at harvest time (Ex. 22:21-27; Lv. 19:9-10; Dt. 24:14-15). The physically handicapped must be shown special consideration, too (Lv. 19:14). The NT insists that love must be the distinguishing feature of church life. To love your brother or sister in Christ is both a mark of obedience to the Lord and an appropriate response to the way he already loves you (Jn. 15:12, 17; 1 Jn. 3:11; 4:11, 21). Love must be practical, not sentimental (1 Jn. 3:17-18); yet it must be deeply heartfelt and sincere as well (Rom. 12:9-10; 1 Pet. 1:22). It has evangelistic power, because when outsiders see such love at work they will recognize the Lord who enables its expression (Jn. 13:35).

In any Christian congregation, love is the principle which protects unity and encourages growth. It binds believers together in a common purpose as they progress in their knowledge of Christ (Phil. 2:1-2; Col. 2:2; cf. Jn. 17:22-23). The Christian body is built up, its work smoothly co-ordinated, as its members deepen their love for one another (1 Cor. 8:1; Eph. 4:16; see Fellowship*).

As far as individuals are concerned, love sometimes demands the surrender of personal rights and interests. Some activities which are blameless in themselves must be abandoned if they offend others (Rom. 14:13-23). Insults will not be returned (1 Pet. 3:8-9; Eph. 4:32; cf. 2 Cor. 2:5-11 and Mt. 18:21-22). Gentleness, patience and restraint are love's marks on a healthy Christian fellowship (Gal. 5:13; Eph. 4:2).

Most of the NT's teaching on love is directed at relationships in the church, but neighbour love (see Neighbour*), as Jesus taught it, has much broader dimensions. In his parable of the good Samaritan he knocked down the fences which limited the concept of 'neighbour' to someone within the covenant community (Lk. 10:29-37). The story's punch-line ('Go and do likewise') underlines the Christian's obligation to show practical, sacrificial love to anyone in need – whether insider or outsider.

Nowhere is this strand of Jesus' teaching more startling than in his insistence that love does not discriminate in favour of the deserving. Distinctive Christian loving means doing good to those who have no intention of returning your gesture, just as God lavishes his gifts on the deliberately ungrateful (Lk. 6:32-36; cf. 14:12-14).

And God went even further than that. Christ loved his enemies, and Christians must do the same (Rom. 5:8-11; Mt. 5:43-48). The right way to counter hostility, said Jesus, is to respond with aggressive love (Mt. 5:38-42). In such circumstances, willed love must substitute for (and sometimes anticipate) felt love. Here Jesus openly clashed with religious teachers (like those at Qumran) who told their followers to balance their love for those inside the community by hatred for those outside it. He also practised what he preached (Lk. 23:33-34).

2. Ethical and pastoral discussion

Debate highlights four main issues: the meaning of the word 'love' itself; and the relationships between love and law, love and justice, and neighbour-love and self-love.

a. The meaning of 'love'. The Gk. word agape dominates the Bible's ethical understanding of 'love'. It is the headline over all other virtues* (Col. 3:14; cf. 1 Cor. 13:13). In the NT it is a theocentric word describing the Father's nature (1 Jn. 4:8), the Son's example (Jn. 15:12) and the Spirit's fruit (Gal. 5:22). And the response it demands covers every aspect of human experience – disposition (1 Cor. 13:4-7), thought life (Phil. 2:1-5) and behaviour (1 Jn. 3:18).

It is all the more remarkable that the meaning of the verb agapao and its derivatives is relatively colourless and obscure in pre-biblical literature. The noun agape itself is virtually unknown. So agape's rich significance in Christian ethics is not an import from pre-Christian philosophical sources, but an amalgam of biblical usage.

In the LXX, agapao usually translates the Heb. ahab, which is an umbrella term for physical attraction and delight in things like food and sleep (Gn. 29:18; 27:4; Pr. 20:13), as well as love in interpersonal and God-man relationships. In the NT, the revealed characteristics of God's love set agape's ethical parameters (although its exact meaning varies, depending on its subject and object in context).

The NT writers seem surprisingly reluctant to use other popular Gk. words for 'love'. Eros (acquisitive love) does not feature at all, while storge (family love) only appears rarely in compounds. The exception is the verb phileo and its derivatives (show friendly affection), which are relatively common.

Many commentators see a clear difference between agape and philia, especially when the two words appear in the same biblical context (e.g. Jn. 21:15-17). Philia is selective, emotional and dependent on the lovable qualities it sees in its object. Agape is universal; a love of the will which operates when it is neither attracted nor reciprocated. Other scholars prefer not to press the distinction, suggesting that the two words are either synonymous (especially in John) or complementary (the 'philic' note of warm affection resonating with Jesus' compassion and rescuing agape from sterile altruism*).

In Agape and Eros, Anders Nygren* argues that eros and agape are two distinct motifs in theological ethics. Basically, he maintains, they are two contradictory theories of love. Agape is theocentric, while eros is anthropocentric. Eros strives to climb the rungs of a ladder to God, while agape describes God's loving initiative in descending to man. Agape is sacrificial giving, while eros is the desire to get and possess. Eros is egocentric love (often of the highest kind), while agape is unselfish love. Agape creates value in its object, while eros responds to some value already there.

Nygren claims that the NT writers deliberately rejected the eros motif, which was dominant in Gk. philosophy, in favour of agape. But Augustine,* with his neo-Platonic background, confused matters by importing eros ideas into his exposition of Christian love (caritas). Until the Reformation (when Luther* reinstated agape in its unadulterated form), the Western church languished in ethical as well as theological heresy.

Nygren's thesis remains influential, but has been criticized on three grounds. 1. Some would say that he has overplayed the discontinuity between agape and eros. He appears to ignore the order of creation by locating 'legitimate' love wholly within the order of redemption. 2. Others point to the difficulty Nygren has in giving biblical content to the notion of human love for God. To talk about loving God is obviously inappropriate if agape creates value in its object. 3. Yet others fault him for attempting to build the Christian ethic on love alone.

b. Love and law. The relationship between a love ethic and law is a matter of sharp controversy. Paul Ramsey,* borrowing William Frankena's (1908-) terminology, labels the two ends of the spectrum act-agapism and rule-agapism. The former, holding that each fresh situation is unique, judges every act by the criterion of agape; rules have either no place at all in decision-making, or (at most) a merely advisory role. Rule-agapism maintains that moral cases are similar enough to categorize. Love-embodying rules can be formulated, and the decision-maker's business is to discern how to apply them.

Situation ethics* is an act-agapistic approach, though its best-known advocates – Joseph Fletcher* and J. A. T. Robinson (1919-83) both deny charges of antinomianism.*

Situationists believe that the ruling (and only) norm of Christian decision-making is love. Its decisions must be made situationally, not prescriptively. This approach, they argue, is superior to a rule ethic on two grounds. It sets helping people above obeying laws; and it yields higher moral standards by tearing down law's false ceilings of obligation.* A loving end also justifies the means necessary to achieve it.

Fletcher claims Augustine as an ally, citing his homily on 1 Jn. 4:8 (Dilige et quod vis fac – which Fletcher is careful to translate, 'Love with care and then what you will, do'). Augustine was not, however, a straightforward act-agapist. Although his ethical system was based on love, he recognized the force of other absolutes* (e.g. the duty to tell the truth).

Those who favour rule-agapism are among the strongest critics of situation ethics. A. M. Ramsay (1904-88) in Image Old and New (London, 1963) believes that love is simply the headline which highlights the law's true meaning. J. I. Packer (1926-) in Keep Yourself from Idols (London, 1963) claims situationists devalue all law-keeping under the label of legalism· and accuses them of naivety in suggesting that sinful people can find and follow the way of love unaided. Paul Ramsey adds that act-agapism is antisocial. We need laws to tell us what love requires of us as a social practice, even when this does not seem to square with love's leading in a particular situation. Careful casuistry* is the way to deal with exceptional cases, not disregard for law in the name of love.

The interpretation of Jesus' summary of the law (Mt. 22:37-40) is clearly crucial, as is the use Paul makes of it (Rom. 13:8-10; Gal. 5:14). The act-agapist sees the summary as a distillation (an extraction of law's value from its external dross). To the rule-agapist, the summary is more of a compendium (a conflation of many laws which still retain their normative thrust).

Certainly the Bible gives no indication that love and law are on a collision course. In the OT, tora lacks the cold, legalistic overtones 'law' often carries today. God's law was seen as both the expression of his love and the explanation of what loving relationships meant in practice. Love supplied both the context of the law's demands (cf. Ex. 20:2), and the chief motive for obeying it (Dt. 4:37-40; Lv. 19:33-34).

In the NT, as in the OT, obeying God's commandments is inseparably linked to the fostering of a good, loving relationship with him (1 Jn. 2:3; 3:24; cf Pss. 19:7-10; 119:33-36). And Jesus apparently saw no inconsistency in bracketing love and obedience (Jn. 14:15, 21, 23-24, 31).

c. Love and justice. Christian ethicists have described the relationship between love and justice (see Justice and Peace†) in a variety of ways. At one extreme, some divide between the two very sharply. Nygren, for example, banishes justice to his eros category, in contrast to true Christian love which is agape. And Tolstoy* sees conflict as inevitable. Justice, he asserts, concerns itself with groups, determines their rights, dispenses the rewards* and punishments* that are strictly due, and achieves its goals by force.* Love, as epitomized by Jesus, targets the individual 'neighbour', sets out to meet his or her personal needs, blesses the totally undeserving, and operates by gentle persuasion. At the other end of the spectrum, Fletcher maintains that 'love and justice are the same, for justice is love distributed, nothing else'. He hotly disputes the view that love's operations must be limited to personal relationships. To say that love is for individuals and justice for groups is to sentimentalize love and to dehumanize justice. Justice, in fact, is simply love under another name – 'love coping with situations where distribution is called for'. So far, then, from keeping the two separate (or, worse still, assigning one priority over the other), Fletcher understands justice's role as finding absolute love's relative course in different situations.

Mediating positions abound. Emil Brunner,* for instance, sees a clear distinction between love and justice, but insists that the two are both compatible and necessary. In his view, love supplements justice.

The sphere of love and the sphere of justice 'lie as far apart as heaven and hell', Brunner explains. But love 'always presupposes justice and fulfils the claims of justice before setting about its own business, which consists in transcending those claims'. The business of living in the world's nexus of systems and institutions makes the structures of justice indispensable. Yet giving a group of people their rights and dues is not the summit of Christian social ethics* (see also Community Ethics†). The Christian is called to supplement the fight for social justice with a love for undeserving individuals which matches the grace of God.

Other representatives of the tradition acknowledge a far closer relationship between love and justice, without going as far as Fletcher did in identifying them. So Paul Tillich (1886-1965) compares love without justice to 'a body without backbone'. Nevertheless, though justice is immanent in love, love transcends it (in his view) because it is always possible to achieve justice without creating a loving relationship.

Reinhold Niebuhr* struggled with this tension throughout his prolific writing ministry. His eventual conclusions are broadly in line with Tillich's. He labels all efforts to build God's kingdom* on earth by means of love as hopelessly naive. In this sin-soaked world only proximate ethical solutions are possible, and to achieve those the Christian must accept justice as love's best possible expression. But that is no mean compromise,* because in Christian ethics the love principle is an essential criterion both to inform justice's distributive decisions and to expose their limitations and failings.

d. Neighbour-love and self-love. Jesus' command, 'Love your neighbour as yourself', has been understood in many different ways. Fletcher (Situation Ethics) lists four possible interpretations of the word 'as' in this context: 1. 'just as much as'; 2. 'in addition to'; 3. 'in the way that you ought to'; or 4. 'instead of'. A strong body of Christian tradition has supported the first and fourth of those options.

Jesus meant, 'Love your neighbour as much as – by nature – you love yourself', says Nygren. He was simply drawing attention to an unfortunate fact of fallen human nature and teaching a lesson from it. 'The commandment', Karl Barth* concludes, 'is not a legitimation but a limitation of this reality.'

The continental Reformers (especially Luther and Calvin*) saw all attempts to rehabilitate self-love (see Self-esteem†) as directly antithetical to Jesus' teaching on self-denial* (Mk. 8:34-35; Jn. 15:13; Lk. 14:26-27; cf Phil. 2:5-8). Paul, they pointed out, contrasted 'self-lovers' with 'God-lovers' (1 Tim. 3:2, 4) and characterized Christian love as 'not self-seeking' (1 Cor. 13:5). So self-love is a 'vicious love' (vitiosus amor – Luther's expression).

The Thomist tradition (see Thomist Ethics*), with its more optimistic view of human nature, leads the way in affirming the ethical legitimacy of self-love. Joseph Butler* expresses this conviction more strongly than most. Humankind, though fallen, retains the dignity of being made in God's image.* It is illogical to think that we can best love our Maker by hating what he has made, and faithless to deny the value of the self which bears his likeness.

Christians, it is argued, should be especially open to the merit of loving themselves because they are overwhelmingly aware of being the objects of God's redeeming love. Failure to love self puts us in the false position of despising what God loves.

Both Christian and secular psychologists stress the value of self-love in promoting personal well-being and good relationships. Only the person who loves himself, Erich Fromm* maintains, can be truly self-forgetful, because only he can escape from the trap of self-preoccupation. And because concern for others is an integral part of a satisfying personal lifestyle, self-love is the only effective basis for neighbour-love.

This is why Jesus linked the two concepts in his second great commandment, suggests Norman Geisler (1932-) in The Christian Ethic of Love. How can a husband care for his wife if he has not first learned how to care for himself (cf Eph. 5:29-30)? Jack Dominian (1929-) expresses himself equally strongly: 'There is not the remotest hope of really succeeding in loving our neighbour in a sustained manner until we first have learned to know the meaning of loving ourselves' J. Dominian and A. R. Peacocke, From Cosmos to Love, London, 1976).

A third strand within the tradition approves self-love, but with qualifications. Augustine, for example, condemned fallen humankind's addiction to self-love. An act of God's grace is essential, he insisted, to redirect the sinner's love of self to the Christian's love of God and neighbour. But once this radical, redemptive refocusing has been achieved, a degree of self-love becomes legitimate.

Bernard of Clairvaux (1090-1153) suggested that moving from wrong to right expressions of self-love is like climbing a ladder. We begin by loving self for self's sake (wrong); move on to loving God for self's sake; climb another rung by learning how to love God for God's sake, and reach the top when we love self for God's sake (right).

Fletcher substitutes 'neighbour' for 'God' in Bernard's formula. He quotes Soren Kierkegaard* with approval: 'The command "Love thy neighbour as thyself" means "Thou shalt love thyself in the right way"'. So the pregnant woman best exhibits care for her child when she takes extra pains to safeguard her own health.

Paul Ramsey (Basic Christian Ethics) makes the same point by importing the concept of vocation.* God calls Christians to develop and use all the talents he has given them, Ramsey writes, in order to love their neighbours more effectively (cf- Eph. 4:28). He, too, quotes Kierkegaard – this time, an expanded version of Jesus' second great commandment: 'You shall love yourself as you love your neighbour when you love him as yourself'.

This third, mediating position highlights a vital difference in the way the expression 'self-love' is used. If it is taken to mean self-centredness, self-assertion or selfishness, few Christian ethicists would approve. But if it stands for self-respect, self-esteem or self-acceptance, few would dispute its value.

See especially: ACCEPTANCE; ATONEMENT; BENEVOLENCE; CARE, CARING; CHARACTER;† CHURCH; COMPASSION; COVENANT; EMOTION; EMPATHY; FAMILY; FELLOWSHIP; FRIENDSHIP; GIVING; GRACE; GROUP THERAPY; HANDICAPPED, CARE OF; HOLY SPIRIT; HOMOSEXUALITY; HOSPITALITY; HUMANITARIANISM; JESUS; KINGDOM OF GOD; LAW AND GOSPEL; LUST; MARRIAGE; MERCY; MOTIVE, MOTIVATION; NEIGHBOUR; NON-VIOLENCE; OBEDIENCE; PATRIOTISM; RACE; RECONCILIATION; RESPONSIBILITY; SELF-ESTEEM; SERMON ON THE MOUNT; SEXUALITY;† SICK, CARE OF; SITUATION ETHICS; SOCIETY; THIRD WORLD AID; VIRTUE, VIRTUES; WELFARE STATE.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD IV/2; E. Brunner, The Divine Imperative (ET, London and New York, 1937); J. Burnaby, Amor Dei (London, 1938); J. Fletcher, Situation Ethics (London and Philadelphia, 1966); N. L. Geisler, The Christian Ethic of Love (Grand Rapids, 1973); S. Kierkegaard, Works of Love (ET, New York, 1962); C. S. Lewis, The Four Loves (London and New York, 1960); J. Moffatt, Love in the New Testament (London, 1929); L. Morris, Testaments of Love (Grand Rapids, 1981); R. Niebuhr, An Interpretation of Christian Ethics (New York, 1935; London, 1936); A. Nygren, Agape and Eros (ET, London and Philadelphia, 1953); O. O'Donovan, Resurrection and Moral Order (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 1994); G. Outka, Agape: An Ethical Analysis (New Haven, CT, and London, 1972); P. Ramsey, Basic Christian Ethics (New York and London, 1950); N.H. G. Robinson, The Groundwork of Christian Ethics (London, 1971).

D.H.F.

THREE

Justice and Peace

It was practice among the Christian theologians of the West during the Middle Ages to think of justice as a personal virtue,* i.e. as one of those habits which are meritorious features of the character (see †) of a person. They typically classified justice as one of the four so-called ‘cardinal’ virtues, the others being prudence, fortitude and temperance; to these they added the three so-called ‘theological’ virtues of faith,* hope* and charity.

But justice is not only a meritorious character trait. Justice is also a meritorious dimension of social relationships. A social practice or arrangement, as well as some specific social interaction, may be just or unjust; justice may prevail in a certain regard within a certain group of people, or may fail to prevail.

Though the medieval theologians gave far more prominence to justice as a meritorious trait of character than they did to justice as a meritorious dimension of social relationships, the latter is the more fundamental concept. For the just person is the person whose habit it is to pursue justice in social relationships. The fundamental question to be considered thus is this: What constitutes justice in social relationships? What is it for a person or group of persons, or for a social institution of one sort or another, to be treated justly?

1. The concept of justice

Ever since classical antiquity, the answer has been that it is when a person receives what is due to him or her that the person is treated justly. The same holds for groups of persons and social institutions. It has also been traditional to distinguish between retributive (see Retribution*) and distributive justice. When something is due to a person on account of some wrongdoing on that person’s part, and the person receives what is thus due to him or her, then retributive justice is rendered that person (see Punishment*). By contrast, distributive justice is rendered a person when that which is rendered is not due to the person on account of wrongdoing on the person’s part. (Naturally the same distinction applies to justice rendered to social groups and institutions.) The word ‘distributive’ is a bit misleading, however. It suggests fairness in distributing some good – or some evil! – among the members of a group of persons. But non-retributive justice, or injustice, need not involve fair distribution of goods or evils among the members of a group. When the officials at a race refuse to award the first-place prize to the person who comes in first because that person is black rather than Caucasian, and when also they do not give the prize to anyone else, they are acting unjustly, even though no unfair distribution has taken place.

In the traditional formula of justice as receiving what is due to one, there is an ambiguity, at least as it pertains to distributive justice. The formula might mean ‘enjoying or undergoing what someone has an obligation to render to one’, or it might mean ‘enjoying or undergoing that to which one has a legitimate claim, be that claim grounded in morality, law, or practice’. In other words, someone else’s obligation, versus one’s own legitimate claim. If understood in the second sense, then (non-retributive) justice is the same phenomenon as enjoying one’s rights; since to have a right to something, in at least one important sense of the phrase ‘to have a right’, is to have a legitimate claim to that something.

Admittedly, not everyone who writes about justice is willing, in this way, to connect justice with rights (see Rights, Human*). Alasdair MacIntyre (1929-), for example, regards the concept of rights as a modern invention but regards the ancient Greeks as working with the concept of justice. His argument seems to be that before the modern era there was no language of rights, from which he infers that there was no concept of rights; and throughout his argument he seems to identify rights with that list of negative rights enshrined in modern liberal political theory. But rights – legitimate claims to some good or other – are vastly more extensive than such rights; the person who wins the Tour de France has a right to the first-place prize. And the fact that a writer lacks a distinctive language for rights does not establish that he or she lacks the concept. Ancient peoples had the concept of a legitimate claim to something; it did not take us moderns to bring that concept to birth.

It should also be mentioned that not everyone would concede that there is an ambiguity in Aristotle's* formulation. Some philosophers have held, for example, that the right to some good is always a right against someone for the granting of that good; a legitimate claim to some good is always a legitimate claim against someone. And then it is said that to have a right or legitimate claim against a person for some good is just for that other person to have the duty to grant one that good. Duties and rights are thus the mere converse of each other.

This position has proved attractive to a good many Christians. It is said to be incompatible with evangelical humility* to suppose that we have rights, if those are understood as anything other than the correlative of duties (see Duty*). Speaking of rights is a sign of, and a rationale for, the self-assertiveness which the gospel condemns; it encourages and expresses an individualistic way of thinking which is deeply alien to the Bible. The situation is rather that we are responsible to and for one another (see Responsibility*).

This is not the place to show in full detail that there are rights to which no duty corresponds; one example will have to suffice. Suppose I have the right to walk in the public gardens until 8 p.m.; the law book clearly says so. Suppose you are appointed keeper of the gardens. And suppose that, in your orientation sessions, you are falsely and deceptively told that it is your duty to keep people out after 6 p.m. I then appear one day at 7 p.m. and try to enter; and you prevent me from doing so. Your doing so is a violation of my rights. Yet you are morally innocent in preventing me; indeed, you would be morally culpable if you did not try to hinder me. You would be failing to do what you justifiably believed you ought to do. Here then is a right to which there is no corresponding duty. Rights do not alter in situations of ignorance in the way in which duties alter in situations of ignorance.

As to duties to which no rights correspond, charity provides us with a multitude of examples. There is a long line of Christian thought which holds that charity is not just notable and admirable but obligatory. Yet charity, though it often takes the form of rendering to someone some good to which that person has a legitimate right, also often takes the form of going beyond that; and sometimes it takes that form when it is obligatory to go beyond.

If these considerations are correct, then we must think of duties and rights as two distinct dimensions of our moral existence, both of fundamental importance. All of us are so situated before God and our fellow human beings as to have rights; and those of us capable of intentional action are also so situated before God and our fellow human beings as to have duties. One person's rights interact in complex ways with other persons' duties – and, indeed, with that person's duties. But the structure of rights is distinct and independent from the structure of duties; one is not merely the mirror image of the other. The other in my presence is someone to whom I have responsibilities; but the other in my presence also comes bearing claims. If my rights are not honoured, more is at stake than just that someone's moral character is besmirched for having failed to do his or her duty by me. I am injured, morally injured. The failure to do one's duty makes one guilty (see Guilt*); the failure to receive one's rights makes one injured. To the former, repentance* is appropriate; to the latter, lament, and perhaps outrage. Justice, distributive justice, is intrinsically connected with rights: justice is present among persons, groups and institutions when their rights, their legitimate claims, are honoured.

2. The biblical ground and contours of justice

More could be said about the concept of justice; but let us move on to the contours and the grounds of justice. It is here that most of our disagreements concerning justice are to be located – not so much over the concept of justice as over what is as a matter of fact due to persons (and groups and institutions) and why it is due to them. It is on these two points that both the OT and NT offer a distinct perspective.

a. The grounds of justice. Over and over the biblical writers say that God loves justice. 'I, the LORD, love justice' (Is. 61:8) and 'The LORD loves justice' (Ps. 37:28, RSV) are but two examples from a multitude.

Furthermore, God's love for justice is declared to be an active love: God does justice. For example, 'The LORD works righteousness and justice for all the oppressed' (Ps. 103:6); 'I know that the LORD secures justice for the poor and upholds the cause of the needy' (Ps. 140:12); and in Ps. 146 it is the Lord 'who executes justice for the oppressed; who gives food to the hungry. The LORD sets the prisoners free; the LORD opens the eyes of the blind. The LORD lifts up those who are bowed down; the LORD loves the righteous. The LORD watches over the sojourners, he upholds the widow and the fatherless; but the way of the wicked he brings to ruin' (Ps. 146:7-9, RSV).

An ancient, enduring, and prominent strand of Christian theology sees God's justice as exhibited in God's anger with those who disobey God's commands. God's justice is exhibited in God's practice of retributive justice. And the Bible does indeed speak of God's retributive justice. But the many passages which speak of God's love of justice are not pointing to God's delight over the suffering of those who are justly punished. God's love for justice is grounded in God's love (see †) for the victims of injustice – for those who are morally violated, morally injured.

This love leads God to enjoin us to do justice. 'Follow justice and justice alone,' says Moses in his farewell speech, 'so that you may live and possess the land the LORD your God is giving you' (Dt. 16:20). And in a passage which by now has entered deep into the consciousness of humanity, God says through Amos: 'Let justice roll on like a river, righteousness like a never-failing stream' (Am. 5:24).

Not only are we to see God's love for the injured and suffering behind God's injunction to us to do justice (cf. Mi. 6:8); we are also to see God's invitation to image God as lying behind it. As God is just, so are we to be just. We are to be icons of God, imaging God's justice in our justice. Again the farewell speech of Moses makes the point: God 'executes justice for the fatherless and the widows, and loves the sojourner, giving him food and clothing. Love the sojourner therefore; for you were sojourners in the land of Egypt' (Dt. 10:18-19, RSV). 'Do not deprive the alien or the fatherless of justice, or take the cloak of a widow as a pledge. Remember that you were slaves in Egypt and the LORD your God redeemed you from there. That is why I command you to do this' (Dt. 24:17-18). As God has heard our laments and satisfied our longings, so in imitation we are to hear the laments of the poor, the weak, and the oppressed.

Deep in the tradition of Christian reflection is the conviction that the requirement to do justice is rooted in the requirement to respect the image of God* in persons; honouring that image requires honouring the legitimate claims of that person. This theme is profoundly important; and is surely a legitimate extrapolation from Gn. 9: 'Whoever sheds the blood of a human, by a human shall that person's blood be shed; for in his own image God made humankind' (Gn. 9:6, NRSV). But more prominent in the Scriptures themselves than the theme of doing justice as a manifestation of our respect for the image of God in persons is the theme of doing justice as constituting (part of) our imaging of God.

b. The contours of justice. A clue to the prophetic understanding of the contours of justice is the fact that when justice is spoken of in the OT, over and over again it is widows, orphans, aliens, and the impoverished who are brought into view. Justice is intimately connected with the fate of these groups. The citations given above provide just a few examples. Reflection on the significance of these references leads one deep into the biblical understanding of the contours of justice. To become just, a society must bring into community all its weak and defenceless ones, its marginal ones, giving them voice and a fair share in the goods of the community. It is thus no accident that the holiness code in the Torah includes prescriptions concerning justice, since holiness requires wholeness, or integrity. By contrast, when Plato* in The Republic spoke of the just society, widows, orphans, aliens and the impoverished were nowhere in view. The fundamental contour of justice was identified by Plato with a certain kind of ‘law and order’: a society is just when authority is exercised by wise persons and is pervasively obeyed. So too John Locke (1632-1704), in his classic Second Treatise on Civil Government (1690) nowhere gives special attention to the marginal members of society. The liberal notion of the just society, in whose genesis Locke plays a pivotal role, is, roughly speaking, that a society is just when each person is free to pursue the good life as he or she sees fit, provided that a similar liberty is accorded to others.

It is often said that the OT concern for justice disappears in the NT. But if the OT picture of the just society has the contours suggested, that thesis is indefensible. For not only were the actions and parables of Jesus pervasively concerned with bringing the outsiders into community, these being the actions and stories which brought him constantly into conflict with the Pharisees who preached and practised the exclusiveness of the ‘holy community’; Jesus’ own self-identification as it occurred in the famous synagogue episode in Lk. 4 was an identification which consisted of saying that he was that harbinger of justice of which Isaiah and the other prophets spoke: ‘The Spirit of the Lord is on me, because he has anointed me to preach good news to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim freedom for the prisoners and recovery of sight for the blind, to release the oppressed, to proclaim the year of the Lord’s favour’, and ‘Today this scripture is fulfilled in your hearing’ (Lk. 4:18-19, 21). It is true, of course, that Jesus did not engage in politics* in the usual sense: he was not concerned with reforming and reinforcing the practices of his society by means of State law. But it should be clear from the foregoing that it is mistaken to think that justice is exclusively the concern of politics.

It may be added that it would never occur to anyone reading the NT in its original Gk. that it did not speak of justice; it is our Eng. translations that encourage this thought. The Gk. words dikaïos and dikaïosyne occur regularly in the NT, these being the words which, in classical Gk. anyway, are almost always translated as ‘just’ and ‘justice’ respectively. Yet seldom are they thus translated in our Eng. NTs. Customarily they are translated as ‘righteous’ and ‘righteousness’. It cannot be said that these are mistranslations – not, at least, if one allows to come into prominence the notion of going right rather than the connotations, from contemporary Eng., of self-righteousness and private morality. But when none of the occurrences of dikaïos and dikaïosyne are translated as ‘just’ and ‘justice’, when all are translated as ‘righteous’ and ‘righteousness’, then connections to the OT proclamations concerning justice are obliterated and a seriously false impression is given. One example will have to suffice here. In the Beatitudes* as recorded by Matthew, we read: ‘Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they will be filled’, and ‘Blessed are those who are persecuted because of righteousness, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven’ (Mt. 5:6, 10). In both verses the word translated as ‘righteousness’ is dikaïosyne. Jesus is speaking of justice; he blesses those who long and struggle for justice.

3. Types of rights

A distinction is sometimes made, by rights theorists, between negative or freedom rights, and positive or benefit rights: a negative right is the right to be allowed to do something; a positive right, the right to receive some benefit or other. And it is regularly argued, by those of libertarian tendencies, whether Christian or other, that there is something incoherent or unacceptable in the notion of benefit rights. For example, it is argued that acknowledging benefit rights unavoidably infringes freedom rights; if a society is to secure the subsistence of its members, it will sometimes have to take property from certain of its members against their will (e.g. in the form of taxation) and give it to the impoverished for their sustenance, thus infringing their freedom rights.

This libertarian claim is dearly in conflict with the biblical contour of justice outlined above, according to which the fate of the impoverished and the marginal is central to the justice or injustice of social arrangements. In fact very many of the great theologians of the church have explicitly affirmed the right of the involuntarily and unavoidably impoverished to fair access to means of sustenance: Basil of Caesarea (c. 329-379), John Chrysostom,* Ambrose,* Thomas Aquinas* and John Calvin* are examples. To cite just one of these, Basil said: ‘Will not one be called a thief who stole the garment of one already clothed, and is one deserving of any other title who will not clothe the naked if he is able to do so? That bread which you keep, belongs to the hungry; that coat which you preserve in your wardrobe, to the naked; those shoes which are rotting in your possession, to the shoeless; that gold which you have hidden in the ground, to the needy. Wherefore, as often as you were able to help others, and refused, so often did you do them wrong' (quoted in C. Avila, Ownership, p. 50).

Nothing has been said in our discussion up to this point about natural rights, or about human rights – deliberately so, since calling attention to such rights at the beginning tends to obscure from view the wide diversity of rights. None the less, natural human rights are obviously of fundamental importance.

The two concepts should not be identified. The idea of a natural right to something is the idea of a right grounded in the nature of things rather than in some social arrangement. Medieval political theorists sometimes thought of the right of certain persons to be monarchs as a natural right of theirs; John Locke regarded one's right to possess that with which one has mixed one's labour as a natural right; and probably most of us think of parents and children as having certain rights with respect to each other which are grounded in the very nature of their relationship. The idea of a human right, by contrast, is the idea of something to which one has a right merely by virtue of being a human being. The natural rights cited above are not human rights. Even if someone has a right to be monarch, he or she does not have that right merely by virtue of being human; and the rights a person has by virtue of being a parent go beyond those that person possesses merely as a human being.

It appears that no-one in classical antiquity defended, or even considered, the view that there are natural human rights. The view emerged in late antiquity. And it appears to have had two sources: the biblical idea, already mentioned, that all human beings are created in the image of God; and the Stoic* idea, that all human beings are alike in having the divine principle of Reason present within each. Emil Brunner's* summary of the evidence concerning the origin of the concept of natural human rights, in his Justice and the Social Order, is judicious: 'Let us admit that it was the Christian view of life blended with the Stoic which created the conception of the equal dignity of all human beings' (p. 35).

4. Justice and shalom

It has already been mentioned that justice is closely connected in the Bible with holiness. It is just as closely connected with peace* – or, better, with what the Heb. writers called shalom. Shalom, however, is perhaps better translated into contemporary Eng. as 'flourishing' than as 'peace'. To experience shalom is to flourish in all one's relationships – with God, with one's fellow human beings, with the non-human creation, with oneself. Such 'flourishing' naturally presupposes peace in the usual sense, absence of hostility. But shalom goes beyond the absence of hostility, to fulfilment and enjoyment. A nation may be at peace with all its neighbours and yet, because of its impoverishment, not experience shalom.

There can be no doubt that justice was seen by the biblical writers as an indispensable component of flourishing in one's social relationships. Again, only an indication of the connection can be given here. Isaiah says that only when 'justice will dwell in the desert and righteousness live in the fertile field' will it be true that 'the fruit of righteousness will be peace [shalom]; the effect of righteousness will be quietness and confidence for ever' (Is. 32:16-17). And the psalmist says that, in shalom, 'Love and faithfulness meet together; righteousness and peace kiss each other. Faithfulness springs forth from the earth, and righteousness looks down from heaven' (Ps. 85:10-11).

5. Justice and love

The relation of love to justice has been a persistent theme of reflection by the theologians and philosophers of the church, from antiquity down into the 20th century. As to the relation of love to justice in God's case, the Augustinian view has been more influential than any other in the Western church: the sins of human beings make punishment something due to them; God's punishing human beings for their sins is thus a matter of retributive justice. Indeed, the sins of humankind merit everlasting punishment. However, God, out of a love which goes far beyond justice, has 'elected' certain human beings for salvation. The two principal difficulties which this view must confront are the fact that arbitrary 'election' to salvation seems unfair, hence unjust; and that justice and love are presented as if they were two unconnected attributes of God. On this last matter, Karl Barth,* in his Church Dogmatics, devoted a great deal of time to arguing that God's love is basic, and that God's anger must be seen as anger against all that injures those whom God loves.

As to the relation between love and justice in human beings, the standard view has probably been that love is something other than justice; and that, if we compare their deeds, the deeds of charity can be seen to go beyond deeds satisfying the demands of justice. That is the basic position taken by Brunner in Justice and the Social Order. To show that love and justice are two different things, Brunner emphasizes the personal character of love and the impersonal character of justice. As to the relationship between deeds of love and deeds of justice, Brunner concedes that there are difficulties in the 'going beyond' view, which none the less he embraces, since the coerciveness which the doing of justice sometimes requires seems incompatible with love.

It has been especially characteristic of the Lutheran tradition to see love in tension with justice rather than merely going beyond it. The tension was most vividly emphasized in our century by Reinhold Niebuhr* in An Interpretation of Christian Ethics. Niebuhr argued that the best we can and should expect out of social arrangements is justice, that the ethic of love preached by Jesus is in conflict with justice, that that ethic is thus an 'impossible ideal', but that we are none the less called to embrace it and live in the tension. It was characteristic of Niebuhr in his later writings to emphasize that the insertion of love into political and economic affairs is typically destructive in its consequences.

We cannot probe these issues further here. But it is worth recalling a point made earlier: in the Bible, God is represented as loving justice. That love is grounded in God's love for the victims of injustice. Perhaps it should be no different for us human beings. Love is a trait of character, whereas justice is a feature of social arrangements and interactions; so love and justice are indeed different. But doesn't charity require as a minimum that we struggle for the honouring of the rights of our fellow human beings? And doesn't love require, accordingly, an understanding of justice, and its practice? Perhaps, then, love is not entirely incompatible with coercion, specifically with coercion (see Force*) of the doer of injustice.

See especially: APARTHEID; ARMAMENTS; CAPITAL PUNISHMENT; CHRISTIAN SOCIALISTS; CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE; CRIMINAL JUSTICE; DEFENCE, MILITARY AND CIVIL; DETERRENCE, NON-NUCLEAR; DETERRENCE, NUCLEAR; DISARMAMENT; ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT; ECONOMIC SANCTIONS; FORCE; GOVERNMENT; HUNGER, WORLD; INTEREST; INTERNATIONAL ORDER; JUDGMENT AND THE JUDGMENT; JUST-WAR THEORY; JUVENILE DELINQUENCY; KILLING; LAW, CIVIL AND CRIMINAL; LIBERATION THEOLOGY; MERCY; NON-VIOLENCE; PACIFISM; PEACE; POLICE; POLITICS; POWER; PRISON AND PRISON REFORM; PROFESSIONAL ETHICS; PROTEST; PUNISHMENT; REBELLION; RECONCILIATION; RETRIBUTION; REVENGE; RIGHTEOUSNESS; RIGHTS, HUMAN; SECURITY; SENTENCING, PRISON; SOCIAL CONTRACT; STATE; STRIKES; TERRORISM; TORTURE; TRADE UNIONS; VIOLENCE; WAR.

Bibliography

C. Avila, Ownership: Early Christian Teaching (Maryknoll, NY, 1983); K. Barth, CD II/I; E. Brunner, Justice and the Social Order (ET, New York and London, 1945); A. Macintyre, After Virtue (Notre Dame, IN, 1984; London, 1985); R. Niebuhr, An Interpretation of Christian Ethics (New York, 1935; London, 1936); N. Wolterstorff, Until Justice and Peace Embrace (Grand Rapids, 1983).

N.P.W.

FOUR

Humanity

For the purposes of this article, the term ‘humanity’ refers to the human race or humankind. Previously, writers have spoken of ‘the doctrine of man’, but recent awareness of difficulties associated with gender-specific language has rendered the term ‘man’ problematic when used in reference to male and female alike. For this reason, the term ‘humanity’ is preferred.

1. Method

Theological discussions of humanity (theological anthropology) have conventionally followed an analytical approach. The phenomenon of being human is broken into its constituent theological parts which, when added together, are reckoned to provide a theological description of the whole. To be human on this account is to be understood as the sum of individual aspects.

Traditional analyses have consequently tended to abstract particular concepts such as the image of God* (imago Dei), conscience,* reason* and so on, and proceeded to expound their theological and historical development as individual components. Whilst the advantage of this method lies in its analytical clarity, its disadvantage is that it is essentially atomistic in its view of human beings. Moreover, such a method, in presupposing that humanity consists in a series of separable aspects, is necessarily ahistorical. The result is that a theology of human identity is rooted not in the formation of individual or corporate persons through social interaction and historical development, but in the ways in which conceptual abstractions have been understood over time. An alternative approach (which will be followed here) is suggested by insights drawn from narrative theology. The question ‘What does it mean to be human?’ is accordingly answered by investigation of the human narrative supplied by biblically informed theology. Within this framework, it becomes possible to identify distinctive theological characteristics of humanity (such as the imago Dei) but to locate their significance within the unfolding theological story of the human race. They therefore cease to be logical abstractions and become instead narrative themes grounded in theological space and time.

2. Alternative human narratives

It is worth noting in passing that all worldviews rely upon human narratives to shape the meaning of experience for whole cultures and to provide the framework within which the ‘mundane’ stories of our individual lives can develop. Both liberal humanism* and Marxism (see Marx;* Marxist Ethics*) – the two most powerful philosophies of the modern westernized world – propose alternative narratives to that supplied by Christianity. In the case of humanism, the essential focus is the progressive rise of the autonomous, rational individual exemplified in Descartes’ (1596-1650) famous dictum ‘I think, therefore I am.’ In the case of Marxism, individuals are submerged in the development of the society from which they take their identities. Society, in turn, is divided into classes, the development of which is determined by the operation of the historical dialectic. In both humanism and Marxism, the words of Pierre Simon de Laplace (1749-1827) about God are assumed: ‘I have no need of this hypothesis.’

In contrast to these, the Christian narrative (in which history figures so prominently because Christianity is a historically revealed religion) takes its meaning not in the first instance from anthropology but from theology. Its primary reference point is God and only secondarily humanity. Human beings are not regarded as autonomous individuals but as social beings dependent upon the grace* of God. Autonomy and atomism are categorically ruled out. On a Christian account, therefore, the human narrative is derivative from, and contingent upon, the divine narrative, without which it would not exist.

3. The unfolding theological narrative

In theological terms, the narrative of the human race is structured by three decisive events: the original creation,* the incarnation (see Jesus*) and the consummation at the end of time. Such a narrative has its source in the creative determination of the persons of the Godhead to create humanity in their own image (Gn. 1:26). It must be noted, moreover, that human beings take their origin and destiny from the threefold God (see †) of trinitarian theology, not the singular god of the deists: 'Let us make man in our image.' The entire Godhead is involved in humanity's creation.

This trinitarian narrative takes specific Christological form in the first chapter of John's Gospel. Structurally, Jn. 1 echoes Gn. 1, but of particular significance is v. 3: 'Through him all things were made; without him nothing was made.' Thus the original narrative of human origins is filled out in terms of Christ and its trinitarian basis made plain.

Likewise, the Spirit is portrayed as central to the work of creation, not least of humankind: in Gn. 1:2 he hovers over the waters. In 2:7 he is breathed into the first human being so that only with the inbreathing of God's Spirit does Adam become a living being. The composite picture of humanity that emerges is one in which human beings individually and corporately are the creation of Father, Son and Spirit acting together. This has profound implications for the social nature of humanity.

Such a trinitarian understanding receives further support from the doctrine of the imago Dei. First, as we have noted (following Calvin*), the plural form of Gn. 1:26 suggests that the image is fundamentally trinitarian rather than unitarian, as is commonly supposed. Humans are not made in the image of God the creator but in the image of God the Holy Trinity. Secondly, Pauline references to the image emphasize that the original image was provisional rather than permanent: that it was only a prototype of that which was to come – namely the image of Christ who is viewed as the paradigm human being.

This is brought out in the 'two Adams' language of Paul. In contrast to the first Adam who was made in the divine image but who was not God (having been created from the dust), Christ as the second Adam is the beloved Son of the Father who, although equal with God, did not count equality a thing to be grasped but humbled himself and took the form of a man (Phil. 2:5-8). As such, he is 'the image of the invisible God' (Col. 1:15) who mirrors the glory of the Lord (2 Cor. 3:18). This means that through faith* in Christ, believers are renewed in the image of their creator (Col. 3:10) as they are transformed after the image of Christ the paradigm human being. 'Christ in his person fulfilled what God willed to make of man, an image of himself' (B. Rey, in J. Malatesta, ed., A Christian Anthology, Wheathampstead, 1974, p. 18). The centrality of the imago Dei as the defining characteristic of humanity is thus invested with a Christological and trinitarian significance.

In this way, biblical writers spell out the primacy of theology in constructing the human story. The narrative begins with the sovereign creative will of the Godhead and, as it unfolds, is given definitive shape by the incarnation. Jesus is prototypical humanity precisely because he is the God-Man. A doctrine of humanity based on the Genesis account of creation would thus be incomplete. The narrative centre of the human story is Christ and it is he who gives it theological continuity.

In what does the imago Dei and subsequently the imago Christi consist? Broadly speaking, theologians have divided into two schools on this issue: Substantialists such as Irenaeus (c. 130-c. 200), Clement of Alexandria (c. 150-c. 215), Athanasius (c. 297-373), Augustine* and Thomas Aquinas* identified the key component as rationality: 'in the rational creature alone do we find a likeness of image' (Aquinas). As a consequence of this emphasis on reason and the mind, there developed a pronounced dualism* in which the mind or spirit came to be viewed as superior to the body (though in fact Augustine vigorously contended against a body-soul dualism).

Similarly, the image has been associated with the operation of conscience understood as an inner faculty, informed by reason and revelation, which informs the will. On this account, the combination of reason and conscience marks out humans as distinctive bearers of the imago. According to the Scottish theologian James Orr (1844-1913): 'The image of God ... is a mental and moral image. It is to be sought for in the fact that man is a person – a spiritual, self-conscious being; and in the attributes of that personality – his rationality and capacity for moral life, including in the latter knowledge of moral law, self-determining freedom, and social affections ...' (God's Image in Man, pp. 56-57).

The second school of thinkers, following Luther* and Calvin and represented among modern theologians by Barth* and Brunner,* identifies the image not in substantialist but in relational terms. These relationalists thus hold that the original image consisted in a threefold 'being in communion' established by God between humanity and himself, between human beings one to another and between human beings and the created world. 'The image of God ... is to be understood as a relationship within which man sometimes stands, whenever like a mirror he obediently reflects God's will in his life and actions' (P. Ramsey, Basic Christian Ethics, New York and London, 1950, p. 255).

In the view of the present writer, the relational understanding is to be preferred for a number of reasons. First, it fits more adequately the trinitarian theology outlined above. If humanity is created in the image of the Trinity, it follows that the relational nature of the Godhead which is its central feature must be reflected in the structure of the imago. Secondly, to describe the image in terms of attributes is essentially to adopt a static conception of the Godhead. Yet the fundamental characteristic of the Trinity is its dynamic nature. Thirdly, it is questionable whether a substantialist view does justice to the notion of personhood, either divine or human. The substantialist view of God looks suspiciously like the god of the Greeks or the deists rather than the Three-Persons-in-One of Christianity. Finally, the relational view takes far more seriously the social, I-Thou, nature of the imago; the image is not to be understood primarily in individualistic but in corporate terms. The danger of the substantialist view is that it reduces the imago to a series of atomistic individual images of God located in individual human beings. On this interpretation, it becomes difficult to offer a coherent theology of the corporate imago.

An absolute opposition of substantialist and relational interpretations is not, however, strictly necessary. In principle, it is possible to synthesize the two provided that the language of attributes is cast within a relational framework. That characteristics such as reason, conscience and will* define the uniqueness of humanity can be agreed. Their role, none the less, should be understood as instrumental: they provide the structural aspects of human nature by which the distinctive threefold relationality of the Trinity can find expression. In this way, relational and substantialist interpretations of the imago can be brought together but only once the primacy of the former is accepted: the foremost defining characteristic of the image of God in humanity is its relationality.

How is the imago to be understood within a narrative framework? The Bible presents a story which begins with a wholly good original creation in which humanity in perfect fellowship with God is given responsibility over the created order. Human rebellion, however, brings the entry of sin and the unravelling of creation's original integrity. Yahweh's promise to Abraham and subsequently his salvation of Israel act as signs of his universal intention to save the whole of humanity. Israel itself is to be the vehicle of this salvation.

However, it is the incarnation which opens the second act of this narrative drama. The coming of Jesus* Christ demonstrates the universal love (see †) of God but at the same time paradoxically speaks of his judgment.* The cross witnesses to both sides of this paradox: it judges human sin but at the same time deals with it so that only through faith in the Christ of the cross can humanity find salvation. The incarnation, furthermore, anticipates the resurrection* of Jesus, which in turn establishes a new order of God's rule and vindicates his original creation. It is the firstfruit of a new order of creation.

The third act is prefigured in the second but does not unfold until the consummation of all things at the second coming of Christ. Then God will re-create a new heavens and a new earth (Rev. 21), which will include the resurrection of the dead to spiritual bodies after the pattern of Christ's resurrection body. Between the resurrection and the consummation, the church lives as the sign of this new creation. The Holy Spirit* in giving gifts and fruits to the people of God in Christ supplies a foretaste of God's re-creation. Christians thus experience something of the future kingdom* now but not wholly so. The period between the resurrection and consummation is an interim.

Within this entire narrative, the imago is to be understood relationally in terms of perfect fellowship* between humanity and God prior to the Fall,* followed by alienation* and distortion subsequently (though not obliteration, as Gn. 9:6 makes clear). The incarnation (including the death of Jesus) portrays an imago refashioned after the image of the Son of God by virtue of a restored relationship with God through the death of Christ. The resurrection symbolizes both the future consummation and the restoration of the threefold image through believers' relationship with Christ. It is not without significance that Paul envisages the consummation as encompassing the whole of creation (Rom. 8:18-22).

Whilst the image understood in trinitarian terms thus forms the theological centrepiece of humanity's constitution, three further aspects must nevertheless be noted: a. human somatic identity; b. social identity; c. sexual identity. All are closely interrelated within the human narrative.

a. Somatic identity. The human narrative is to be understood somatically (Gk. soma, body). As we have observed earlier, the creation narratives make it clear that human beings are neither wholly spirit nor wholly matter but rather a combination of both. It is significant that a dualistic view of body and spirit is supported by neither the Genesis creation narratives nor the Pauline discussion of eschatological re-creation. The creation of Adam and derivatively Eve as representative human beings points to an integrated view of human existence. Body, mind and spirit comprise an interrelated whole, not separable parts. Thus Adam is made from dust but does not become a living being until the Spirit of God breathes into him. Likewise, Eve is a fleshly creation from the pre-formed man. The beginning of the human narrative is thus firmly anti-dualist.

By the same token, the incarnation underscores the structural integration of body, mind and spirit and affirms the significance of the human body. Against the docetic heresy which portrayed Jesus as a spirit masquerading as a man, the NT writers and early Christian theologians urged the full humanity of Christ. Thus 1 Jn. 4 speaks of the test of true faith as the acknowledgment that Jesus has come in the flesh. Since he is the paradigm human being, moreover, it follows that any theology which degrades or relegates the human body to an inferior place is anti-incarnational.

If the Christian theological narrative places great emphasis on the body as central to human identity, Paul's writings are of especial significance in this respect. We have noted that creation, incarnation and consummation mark the critical points in a narrative theology of humanity. Within Paul, however, the eschatological aspect is brought to the fore. Two observations are relevant.

1. We should note Paul's doctrine of the resurrection. In 1 Cor. 15 he stresses that the resurrection will be a resurrection of the body. This will entail each person at the parousia (the second coming of Christ) receiving a new body which, while resembling the first body in important respects, is nevertheless identifiably different. The pattern for this is the resurrection of Jesus whose post-Easter appearances made clear that the resurrection body is neither wholly like the previous body nor wholly unlike it. The risen Christ, for example, ate normal food but could dematerialize and appear in closed rooms.

The exact nature of the resurrection body, therefore, must remain a mystery. What is important to recognize is that the NT knows nothing of immaterial souls or spirits persisting through eternity. Rather, the consummation will see a remaking of creation which will include the resurrection of human beings as unified somatic beings.

2. Paul's use of body language in 1 Cor. 12 and 14 suggests that the identity of human beings is to be found not in terms of individual development in isolation from others but rather in relationship to others. This clever play on the word 'body' thereby emphasizes once more the theological importance of viewing humanity corporately as well as individually and thus leads to the question of social identity.

b. Social identity. We have seen that on a trinitarian interpretation of the imago it follows that to conceive of humanity as a collection of individuals, all possessing their own separate image, is fundamentally misleading. The interrelationship of the Father, Son and Spirit as Three-Persons-in-One suggests that the image of God and therefore the nature of humanity is to be found in the constitution of human beings as social beings. As created imaging God, the human creature 'is at once and fully a relational being, a partnership, a co-existence'. The solitary, thinking individual posited by Descartes finds no place in Christian theological anthropology. To be human is to be-in-relation. In Heidegger's words, 'Being-in-the-world is a being-with.'

Once more, a narrative understanding of humanity illuminates this idea. The original creation established the social identity of humanity. The creation of woman is portrayed as the completion of humanity's creation. The solitary Adam is incomplete and inadequate to fulfil the purpose of God. Moreover, when the relationship between humanity and the rest of the created order is considered, it becomes clear that there is a qualitative difference between the kind of relationship that exists between human beings and, say, trees, and that which is established between humans one to another. Human beings stand in relation to the rest of the created order in terms of personal-impersonal; or as a number of writers put it (following Martin Buber, 1878-1935), 'I-It.' The creation of man in relation to woman, however, establishes an 'I-Thou' relationship in which human beings relate to one another in a different and greater way. In the words of Helmut Thielicke,* 'This means that the relationship of fellow-humanity, represented by the man-woman relationship, is emphasized and given privileged status over against all I-It relationships' (The Ethics of Sex, New York and London, 1964, pp. 4-5).

The social character of human identity is consequently far from accidental or merely a facet of anthropological development. From a theological perspective it is fundamental. As Barth contends: 'The man who, because he is without his fellow man, has not become human, has not discovered the relationship of I and Thou, and therefore himself has not become a real I. He may be engaged in the most forceful action both intensively and extensively and yet he lacks everything for true humanity if he lacks the one thing – that he is not in encounter and is not therefore human and has no real part in humanity' (CD II/2, p. 261).

The meaning of society* is thereby rooted in the social nature of the Trinity and the creative will of the Godhead. The 'existence-in-community' of which Brunner speaks is constitutive of both the divine and human communities alike.

When we turn to insights from the doctrines of incarnation and redemption, the corporate nature of humanity is once more given central place. Just as Adam represents the whole of humanity, so with Christ. In taking flesh, the Word does not simply become a representative individual human being – he becomes representative of the human race. The incarnation is thus much more than an individual event. It is a corporate identification of the Godhead with humanity.

By the same token, salvation (see Sin and Salvation†) is a corporate affair. The human narrative consists in the redemption not of isolated individuals but of the people of God. Both the OT and NT portray faith as a corporate encounter with God which includes, but cannot be reduced to, a collection of individualistic relationships with God.

This is nowhere more clear than in Paul's discussion of the church* as the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:12). Here, believers are described in terms of a metaphor which leaves no room for atomism. Each part of the body (i.e. each believer) has an integral part to play within the body as a whole: 'The eye cannot say to the hand, "I don't need you!" And the head cannot say to the feet, "I don't need you!"' (1 Cor. 12:21). The fact is that all parts are linked by a relationship of mutual interdependence, for 'the body is not made up of one part but of many' (12:14).

The social implications of this are threefold: 1. Human beings are inextricably interrelated within a conception of society based on mutuality. 2. This interrelationship implies equality of status between members – to extend Paul’s language, the eye is not superior to the hand. 3. There exists an irreducible responsibility between members of society to care for one another, notably the weak for the strong. The integrity of the whole body is such that what affects one affects all: ‘If one part suffers, every part suffers with it; if one part is honoured, every part rejoices with it’ (12:26).

The Christian church is therefore called to act as a model for renewed relationships within the redemptive purpose of God. Human society without God can only hope to imitate feebly the quality of relationships within the body of Christ indwelt by the Holy Spirit, but it nevertheless, through the imago, is not left without hope. The model offered by the Spirit-indwelt church cannot be copied but it can challenge and inspire. Only with the consummation, however, will society be renewed under the lordship of Christ.

c. Sexual identity. Increasingly since Freud,* Christian theology has come to recognize the centrality of sexuality (see †) to human self-understanding and to theological anthropology. Sexuality is now seen as constitutive of human identity (see Human Development*) and as a central component in the construction of individual and corporate narratives.

In terms of theological narrative, the origin of human sexual identity is to be found in creation. Adam and Eve are created as complementary sexual beings who together reflect the creative image of God. Humanity is therefore bi-polar in that it is created male and female. Moreover, since this bi-polarity is the outcome of divine creation, gender differentiation is not accidental, pragmatic or a matter of social convention. It must be seen as ontological, i.e. rooted in the very nature of human being. This point is reinforced by further consideration of the imago. In Gn. 1:27, the imago is pictured both in corporate terms and in terms of the male-female relation. This relation is expressed in the term ‘one flesh,’ which is not only a reference to the unitive character of sexual intercourse but also a powerful metaphor for the intrinsic complementarity of the sexes. As Ray Anderson (1925-) has put it, ‘Human being is a polarity of being expressed as complementarity.’ The sexual-relational nature of the imago is thus underlined. It is through the interrelationship of the sexes that humanity discovers its corporate identity.

When we turn to the incarnation, we find that although Christ was male, he represented in his person both male and female. His humanity, in other words, was inclusive. He saved humankind by virtue of identifying fully with humanity and in so doing brought us to God because he is God. Such a humanity, however, must logically be a common humanity shared by men and women alike as human beings, irrespective of gender. This is what it means to say that Christ’s humanity is inclusive.

The kingdom* of Christ, however, relativizes human sexuality. By inaugurating the kingdom, Jesus established the beginnings of a new order of things in which the male-female relationship was put on a new basis. 1. In his discussion of marriage* he established that marriage is a provisional form of human relationship which will not exist in heaven: ‘When the dead rise, they will neither marry nor be given in marriage; they will be like the angels in heaven’ (Mk. 12:25). The present form of human sexuality is therefore not ultimate but penultimate. 2. As Paul indicates in Gal. 3:28, in Christ ‘there is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female.’ In the kingdom of Christ, the old temporal order which governs the male-female role relation gives way to a new order of being-in-relation.

The key point here is that of temporality and provisionality. The period between Pentecost and the second coming of Christ represents an interim when the old is not yet dissolved and the new not yet fully in being. Thus marriage continues as part of God’s purpose for humanity but not eternally. The breaking down of male-female role relations is a foreshadowing of the kingdom to come.

4. Conclusion

The narrative method offers a coherent way of understanding the character of humanity and its development. By focusing on the critical theological points in the theological story, it is possible to discover the interweaving of both the human and divine narratives. In this the pivotal character is Jesus Christ, who is the hermeneutical key to understanding how the two narratives are intertwined. It is in him that true humanity is found.

See especially: ADOLESCENCE; AGEING; ALIENATION; CHILDREN; CHURCH; CONSCIENCE; CONVERSION; CREATION; CULTURE; DEATH AND DYING; DEHUMANIZATION; DISABILITY AND HANDICAP; DISCRIMINATION; DUALISM; EDUCATION; EMBRYOLOGY; EMOTION; EQUALITY; FAITH DEVELOPMENT; FALL; FAMILY; FELLOWSHIP; FEMINISM; FLESH; FREE WILL AND DETERMINISM; FRIENDSHIP; GENOCIDE; GOVERNMENT; HEALING; HEALTH AND HEALTH CARE; HOLY SPIRIT; HOMOSEXUALITY; HUMAN DEVELOPMENT; HUMAN EXPERIMENTATION; HUMANISM; HUMANITARIANISM; IMAGE OF GOD; JESUS; LEISURE; LONELINESS; MARRIAGE; MATURITY; MENTAL HEALTH; MID-LIFE; MORAL DEVELOPMENT; MOTIVE, MOTIVATION; NATURAL LAW; NEIGHBOUR; PARENTHOOD, PARENTING; PERSONALITY; POLITICS; POPULATION POLICY; POVERTY; PRAYER; QUALITY OF LIFE; RACE; REASON AND RATIONALISM; RECONCILIATION; RESPONSIBILITY; RESURRECTION; RETIREMENT; RIGHTS, HUMAN; SANCTIFICATION; SCIENCE; SELF; SELF-ESTEEM; SEXISM; SEXUALITY;† SLAVERY; SOCIETY; STATE; STEWARDSHIP; TEMPERAMENT; UNEMPLOYMENT; VOCATION; WIDOWHOOD, WIDOWERHOOD; WILL, HUMAN; WORK.

Bibliography

R. S. Anderson, On Being Human (ET, Grand Rapids, 1982); G. C. Berkouwer, Man: The Image of God (ET, Grand Rapids, 1962); E. Brunner, Man in Revolt (London and Philadelphia, 1939); D. Cairns, The Image of God in Man (London, 1953); G. Carey, I Believe in Man (London, 1977); D. J. Hall, Imaging God: Dominion as Stewardship (ET, Grand Rapids, 1986); H. D. McDonald, The Christian View of Man (Basingstoke and Westchester, IL, 1981); E. Malatesta, A Christian Anthropology (Wheathampstead, 1974); R. Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man, 2 vols. (London and New York, 1941, 1943); J. Orr, God's Image in Man (London, 1905); J. A. Ziesler, Pauline Christianity (Oxford, 1983).

F.W.B.

FIVE

Sin and Salvation

Throughout Scripture and the Christian tradition, a constant theme recurs: there are two states, or ways of being, open to human beings. One is a state of inauthentic existence (to borrow a term from the existentialist philosopher Martin Heidegger, 1889-1976), in which humans are alienated from their true being and destiny; the other is a state of authentic existence, in which humans are enabled to achieve their full potential through fellowship with the living God. The first such antithetical state corresponds to the Christian idea of sin, and the second to that of salvation. For Christian theology, the full human potential can be understood (as being brought to completion in God through the consummation of all things in Jesus Christ) only in the light of the doctrines of creation and redemption, and achieved only through faith in Jesus* Christ.

Scripture uses a range of terms to refer to sin, embracing such meanings as ‘falling short of a goal’, ‘breaking a relationship’ and ‘rebellion’. The common feature uniting these terms is the notion of a falling short of what God intends, a turning away from God to something lesser. Thus for Irenaeus of Lyons (c. 130-c. 200), sin may be thought of as the loss of our God-given identity in Adam, a process reversed (or ‘recapitulated’, to use Irenaeus’ characteristic term) through Christ. The doctrine of original sin* gives formal expression to the biblical teaching that all human beings are born into a state of sin. This view, vigorously opposed by Pelagius (fl. c. 383-424) on account of its quietist* overtones, soon became the common currency of the Western church. Pelagius argued that sin arose through consciously* deciding to imitate Adam, rather than sharing in his corporate primordial disobedience. In refuting this view, Augustine* pointed out that if Christ was the potential saviour of all human beings, it followed that all human beings require to be saved. For Augustine, the universality of the gospel promise of salvation implied the universality of sin – in all human beings, including infants. The natural human state is that of alienation* from God, in which love of self takes the place of love of God. Martin Luther* spoke of human nature as being ‘curved in on itself’ (incurvatus in se), as he stressed the egocentricity of sin. John Calvin* emphasized that sin was a ‘hereditary corruption of our nature’. The implications of sin will be considered later in this article.

The Christian gospel centres upon the proclamation that, through the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, believers are enabled to break free from this state of sin. Although the NT suggests that salvation is inaugurated, but not completed, in this life, it is clear that a decisive transition is envisaged. Through faith,* the believer begins to break the power of sin. The story is told of a little girl who asked a bishop whether he was saved. ‘I have been saved from the penalty of sin, I am being saved from the power of sin, and one day I shall be saved from the presence of sin,’ he replied. Christians are ‘those who are being saved’ (2 Cor. 2:15; cf. Acts 2:47; 1 Cor. 1:18).

Salvation and sin are both complex notions. The NT tends to understand salvation as the total package of benefits gained for and bestowed upon believers through God’s actions in Jesus Christ. The ethical and pastoral implications of the Christian doctrine of sin and salvation are best (and most conveniently) explored by considering four of the primary images of salvation found in the NT, which have become major components of the classical Christian teaching on the matter. Each of these four foundational approaches to the concepts of sin and salvation has significant ethical and pastoral consequences, which will be considered below.

1. Salvation as wholeness

The Gk. verb sozein, ‘to save’, is notoriously difficult to translate, reflecting the broad range of ideas associated with it. It can refer to any situation in which a person is delivered from a threat, such as from illness (Mk.

5:28) or from mortal danger (Mt. 8:25). Especially in the Synoptic Gospels, the verb sozein is used to refer to both physical and spiritual healing* (Mk. 5:28; Lk. 7:50; 9:24). To be saved is to be made whole – that is, for individuals to be in a right relationship with God, with themselves, with their fellow humans, and with their environment. There is a fundamental link between ‘health’, ‘wholeness’ and ‘salvation’, which the Eng. language obscures through the post-Norman Conquest use of a Lat. term (salvation) in place of the Old Eng. term hoel. (This vital link is maintained in many modern European languages, such as Ger., Fr., and W. However, in Tyndale’s NT translation, Lk. 19:9 is translated as ‘Today health has come to this house’.)

Thus understood, salvation is about the achievement of wholeness, with sin understood as its absence. To be sinful is to exist within an incomplete or distorted set of relationships with God, with oneself, with others and with the environment.* Salvation centres upon the restoration of the whole person (rather than some fragmented portion of that person, such as the ‘soul’) to a proper network of relationships, embracing forgiveness* (restoration to fellowship with God and neighbours), healing (restoration of personal physical and psychological integrity) and a proper attitude to the world. On account of its broad scope, salvation can never be permitted to degenerate into purely individualist concerns. To be ‘saved from sin’ is not a private matter, but embraces the development of a series of right relationships.

Pastorally, this approach to salvation involves the recognition of the importance of a holistic approach to the person. The theologically informed pastor will recognize the need to minister to the spiritual, social and physical well-being and needs of the individual. Salvation is not, and cannot be, regarded simply as an initial act of commitment to Christ; it explicitly includes the process of working towards achievement of personal wholeness in the key areas just noted, for which pastoral support will be needed. Preaching, the ministry of healing, and a heightened awareness of the Christian’s ethical and personal responsibilities towards others and towards the environment will be essential components of such an approach to sin and salvation.

2. Salvation as liberation

A cluster of biblical images for salvation centres upon the idea of liberation. Christians are those who are ‘ransomed’ (see Mk. 10:45; 1 Tim. 2:6) by Jesus Christ. The Gk. verb traditionally translated as ‘redeem’ (exagorazein) literally means ‘remove from the market place’ – in other words, purchase the freedom of a slave. For Paul, sin is to be understood as human bondage – e.g. enslavement to sin (Rom. 7:14) or to earthly powers (Gal. 4:3) – salvation as our deliverance from this slavery through appropriation of the action of God in Jesus Christ. Thus Paul is able to speak of the ‘glorious freedom of the children of God’ (Rom. 8:21).

Theologically, this idea has found particular expression in the great patristic motif of Christus Victor – the approach to the death and resurrection of Christ which lays especial stress upon a victory being gained over sin, death* and Satan.* Although especially associated with the early church, this theme has been reworked with great skill by writers such as Luther and, more recently, Gustaf Aulen (1879-1977). The basic theme is that Christ’s death and resurrection are able to liberate us from the tyranny of hidden and unseen spiritual forces, which would otherwise exercise a baleful influence over us.

Pastorally, this concept of salvation is of considerable importance. Many Christians retain a sense of oppression by forces (psychological, social, economic and spiritual) which threaten to disrupt or destroy their faith. One such example is a fear of death. In his celebrated work The Denial of Death (New York, 1973), Ernest Becker pointed out how a fear of death threatened to tyrannize human existence. The coping mechanism devised by many people, he pointed out, was a simple denial of death: death is something that happens to someone else. The NT proclaims that the tyranny of this force has been broken. Through his death, Christ is able to ‘free those who all their lives were held in slavery by their fear of death’ (Heb. 2:15). Through faith, we are liberated from enslavement to this force. The Pauline stress upon the ‘givenness’ of Christ’s victory over death (1 Cor. 15:56-57) echoes this point.

The pastor or counsellor will be aware of a network of forces which pose a threat to the fullness of the Christian life. Some individuals will find themselves coming under the influence of the occult* or Satanism, and will require to be delivered (see Deliverance Ministry*). Others will find themselves enslaved to debilitating habits, and require counselling and support if they are to break free from them. Martin Luther spoke of Christians being 'at one and the same time righteous and sinners', thus pointing to the potential continuing influence of sin in the Christian life, with patterns of bondage resulting. The pastor's task here is to enable individuals to identify areas of their lives in which such patterns of bondage remain, in order that the process of salvation may be continued by liberating them from this continuing spiritual oppression.

It must, however, be pointed out that there are oppressive forces confronting believers which are of a more or less directly social, political or economic nature. Latin American liberation theologians (see Liberation Theology*) helpfully refer to this as 'structural sin', thereby making the point that sin is expressed and embodied in the social structures created and erected, whether by intent or default, by human beings. Many individuals languish under appalling social conditions. Others are oppressed politically, through irresponsible and autocratic government. And others find themselves hopelessly entangled in economic difficulties. This serves to remind us that salvation has a strongly political and social dimension, especially in the OT prophetic writings. To be concerned for salvation is to be politically and socially aware, and committed to attempts to liberate people from such oppressive conditions. Once more, salvation is seen to extend far beyond individualist concerns, and to embrace a much wider range of issues (see Politics;* Social Ethics*).

3. Salvation as forgiveness

A central biblical theme concerns sin as guilt,* and salvation as forgiveness (Eph. 4:32; Col. 2:13; Jas. 2:10). This notion of 'guilt' has been criticized by those committed to secular theories of legitimation and personal fulfilment – such as behaviourists, Freudians and Marxists – as perpetuating unhelpful patterns of submission* and introspection. It is thus important to stress that in this context 'forgiveness' is primarily a theological, rather than a moral, concept. While there is often an implied forensic or legal context to these concepts, their primary reference is not to moral behaviour, but to a broken and unfulfilled relationship.

The full implications of this approach to sin and salvation were developed by Anselm of Canterbury,* in his Cur Deus Homo (Why God became Man), written at some point during the 1090s. In this work, Anselm stresses the moral dilemma facing God in relation to human redemption. God cannot simply forgive sin by declaring it to be cancelled; he is obliged to take its moral guilt seriously, by acting in certain quite definite ways. The reality of human moral guilt is such that God cannot simply deny, cancel or overlook it. He must engage with it, and ensure that it is justly forgiven. Anselm argues that this involves a 'satisfaction'. Scriptural anticipations of this technical term, meaning 'a price paid as compensation for an offence', may be seen in the Heb. word koper (Nu. 35:31). A satisfaction for sin is required, if God is to be able to forgive human sin with integrity.

Anselm argues that, although sinful humanity ought to make satisfaction to God for the guilt of its own sins, God, in his mercy, has allowed Christ to make it in our place. It is we who owe the satisfaction; it is, however, only God who has the ability to make it. Therefore, in the incarnation of the Son of God, a God-man results who possesses both the obligation (as man) and the ability (as God) to make the necessary satisfaction, and thus gain full forgiveness for the guilt of human sin.

The central theme of Anselm's argument is the need for sin to be justly forgiven. This was developed by a number of later writers, such as Philip Melancthon (1497-1560) and Calvin, who stressed the justice of God in dealing with sin through the cross. Christ's obedience was such as to merit, purchase or gain the forgiveness of human sins. Such approaches to the death of Christ are often collectively designated 'legal theories of the atonement'.

The death of Christ and the believer. A question which demanded further consideration was the manner in which the 'benefits of Christ' (Melancthon) affected the believer. How is the believer implicated in the positive consequences of the death of Christ? Three main schemes have been proposed, each resting securely upon scriptural foundations.

a. Christ as our Representative. According to this approach, Christ is seen as a covenantal representative of his people. A covenant* exists, established through the graciousness of God, by which Christ's benefits are shared by those whom he represents. To become a Christian is to enter within the sphere of this covenant, and to share in the benefits which Christ gained for his people. For Paul, the condition of entry to the sphere of this covenant is not 'works of the [Jewish] law', but faith (Rom. 3 – 4). It is not nationality, but faith, which establishes individuals as belonging to the people of God, and hence sharing in the benefits gained for that people by Christ as their representative.

b. Participation in Christ. One of the most significant phrases to recur within Paul's letter is 'in Christ' (e.g. Rom. 6:23; 8:1; 2 Cor. 5:17). This is a strongly participational idea, suggesting that the believer has been 'incorporated into Christ' (Calvin). Through faith, the believer's existence is caught up with that of the risen Christ. The believer participates in the life of Christ; he or she is 'in Christ'. As a result, he or she shares in all that Christ is, including the benefits he gained by his obedience upon the cross. Faith unites the believer with Christ, and all his benefits. To become a Christian is to share and participate in the life of the risen Christ through faith, and thus to have full access to his grace and righteousness.

c. Christ as our Substitute. A number of biblical passages suggest that it is appropriate to think of Christ taking our place (e.g. 2 Cor. 5:21). According to this way of thinking, our moral guilt was such that we ought to have been crucified upon the cross;* in his mercy, God allowed Christ to take our place. Important anticipations of this idea of 'vicarious suffering' are found in Is. 53:11-12, and echoed in 1 Pet. 2:24.

The moral and personal aspects of forgiveness. Each of the three approaches above aims to demonstrate the connection between Christ's act of obedient suffering upon the cross, and the life of the individual. But what of the pastoral and moral consequences of this forgiveness?

a. The moral aspects. In his highly influential work Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone (1793), the German philosopher Immanuel Kant* pointed out that the guilt of past moral sin posed a serious threat to the moral regeneration of individuals. The striving for moral perfection (a central theme of Kant's ethics) can be paralysed through a sense of the intrusion of the moral inadequacies of the past. It is therefore necessary, Kant concluded, for an individual to be assured that past moral guilt has been cancelled and wiped out, in order that the process of moral renewal might begin. Although Kant's work has a strongly rational and moral flavour, he scores an important point: moral renewal is impossible without the assurance of forgiveness.

b. The personal aspects. The significance of forgiveness for personal relationships is well established. The biblical injunctions to forgive others, as God has forgiven us, both stress the theological importance of forgiveness and give expression to the profoundly destructive psychological effects of unresolved tensions within personal relationships. Forgiveness is not about pretending that hurt has not been inflicted and offence not given: it is about acknowledging the reality of the hurt and offence, and allowing them to be handed over to and cancelled by God.

Two persistent themes may be detected within both the Synoptic Gospels and the Pauline letters: the disproportion between human and divine forgiveness, and the pressure which the latter brings to bear upon the former. It is far more costly for God to forgive us than for us to forgive our fellow human beings (Mt. 18:23-35). And the reality of that divine forgiveness places us under an obligation to forgive others (Mt. 6:14-15; Lk. 6:37). The demand that we forgive others 'not seven times, but seventy times seven' (Mt. 18:21-22, NIV mg.) is fundamentally a demand to be of a forgiving nature.

This point can be developed theologically, either through an application of the 'analogy of being' (Thomas Aquinas*) or the 'analogy of faith' (Karl Barth*). According to the former, the difficulties which we experience in genuinely forgiving others should bring home to us how difficult it is for God to forgive us. This reinforces the biblical stress upon both the costliness and the reality of God's forgiveness. According to the latter, the reality and cost of God's forgiveness of us (brought home by reflection upon the passion and death of Christ) provide a model for the patterns of forgiveness which should characterize Christian existence and behaviour.

4. Salvation as personal affirmation

One of the more tender insights into the Christian doctrine of salvation concerns the love (see †) of God. The death of Jesus Christ makes plain the fullness of the overwhelming love of God for sinners (Jn. 3:16; Rom. 5:7-8; Gal. 2:20). An essential aspect of the Christian doctrine of salvation is that God acts in order to affirm his love for us, and to evoke a loving response from us. In the period of the Enlightenment,* this insight was seriously abused. It was suggested by writers such as Hastings Rashdall (1858-1924) that the death of Christ did nothing other than demonstrate the love of God. This purely exemplarist approach to the cross (which Rashdall erroneously alleged to characterize the writings of the 11th-century theologian Peter Abelard*) treated human sin as little more than ignorance or confusion concerning the benevolence of God, which could be remedied by educational means. Nevertheless, this deficient account of this aspect of salvation must not be allowed to obscure the fact that it is an essential component of the total biblical portrayal of salvation.

The pastoral importance of this approach lies in its affirmation of individual believers. We are confronted with the paradox that God criticizes us in order to affirm us. The cross of Christ simultaneously exposes and judges us as sinners, and affirms the astonishing extent of the love of God for us. Richard Crashaw (1612-49) captures this insight in his poem The Deare Bargain: 'Lord, what is man? why should he cost thee / So deare? what has his ruine lost thee? / Lord, what is man, that thou hast over-bought / So much a thing of nought?' The cross affirms that God loves us, while we are still sinners. This insight brings dignity and meaning to believers. In the midst of a dark, lonely and frightening world, God has affirmed them as individuals. The death of Christ is a striking and moving demonstration of the personal worth of believers. If God was prepared to go to such lengths to redeem them, they may assume that they are of value to him.

5. Categories of sin

Especially within Roman Catholic moral theology,* it has become increasingly common to distinguish between different types of sin. The four categories most commonly encountered are the following:

a. Material sin. An action which is in itself contrary to the will of God, but which arises through ignorance or through coercion.

b. Formal sin. An action which is in itself contrary to the will of God, and which is committed in the full knowledge that it is so.

c. Venial sin. On the basis of 1 Jn. 5:16, Roman Catholic moral theology* recognized a distinction between sins which were 'deadly' or 'mortal', and those which were of lesser importance. These latter, referred to as venial sins, are not regarded as destroying the believer's relationship to God.

d. Mortal sin. A radical turning away from God to his creation, the extent of which threatens the believer's relationship to God. The traditional 'seven deadly sins', each of which represents a rejection of God in favour of some aspect of his creation, are pride,* covetousness,* envy,* lust,* gluttony, anger* and sloth. According to traditional Catholic moral theology, mortal sins can be expunged only by full confession* and contrition.

6. The ethical dimension of sin

Human beings are sinners. There is a flaw in human nature. We are fallen creatures in a fallen creation (see Fall*). The radical realism of the Christian view of sin has devastating consequences for our understanding of human beings as moral agents. Robert Browning (1812-89) expressed some such insights in Gold Hair: "Tis the faith that launched point-blank her dart / At the head of a lie – taught Original Sin,/ The corruption of Man's Heart."

Luther and Calvin were among many writers to address the ethical implications of a radical doctrine of original sin. Luther pointed out that Christian ethical reasoning had to be based upon an attempt to minimize the sinfulness of human actions, rather than the utopian ideal that one can somehow act in such a way as to avoid sin altogether. Calvin stressed the need for appropriate social and political structures, capable of placing restraint upon human sinful actions, if the destructive effects of sin were to be minimized. The recognition of the reality of sin does not abolish human responsibility* for our actions; rather, it forces us to acknowledge that natural human instincts and attitudes cannot in themselves be regarded as right. As Calvin stressed, the gospel exposes sin for what it is, obliging us to concede that the law of nature (see Natural Law*) is not necessarily the law of God.

The bland assumption of the natural goodness of human nature, so characteristic of much modern Western liberal thought, is called into question by this doctrine. The myth of human perfectability and inevitable progress has been shown up for what it is by the savagery and cruelty of the 20th century. As the American ethical writer and theologian Reinhold Niebuhr* stressed, the doctrine of original sin tells us that morality concerns weak, self-centred and exploitative human beings – real humans, not the perfectionist angels of wishful liberal thinking. Power,* capital (see Capitalism*) and force* – all can be, and will be, abused and exploited for personal ends, unless the political and moral will exists to control them. Niebuhr's 'Christian realism', which has had such a powerful impact upon 20th-century American social thought, laid emphasis upon the need to deal with human nature as it really is, rather than an abstract, idealized and utopian liberal concept of human nature.

The ethical implications of the doctrine of original sin,* touched upon by Calvin, have been further explored by Charles Curran (1934-), with particular reference to the concept of 'natural law'. Curran is especially critical of the natural-law doctrine to be found in recent papal encyclicals, such as Humanae Vitae (1968; see Papal Encyclicals*). For Curran, the 'disrupting influence of sin' affects both human reason, and the so-called 'nature' upon which natural law is grounded. Natural law has been used too often, in his opinion, in thoroughly sinful ways to deny human dignity, and thus it cannot be allowed to pass unchallenged. For such reasons, Curran rejects the optimistic and uncritical appeal to natural law which he regards as characteristic of many of his fellow Roman Catholics.

Curran also highlights the ethical implications of sin by his stress upon the ethical importance of compromise.* In sin-filled situations, it is often necessary to adopt a line of action which would be quite improper if sin were not present. There are circumstances in which the reality of human sin forces an ethical decision which is in itself sinful. As Helmut Thielicke* argues, Christians must frequently expect to encounter situations in which the outcome is not between a sin-free and sinful decision, but between decisions of varying degrees of sinfulness. In such situations, Thielicke argues, the only appropriate course of action is to adopt the least sinful option, and, recognizing that it is sinful, ask God for forgiveness. It is this insight which underlies Luther's often misunderstood remark, 'Sin boldly, but believe more boldly still.'

The pastoral and ethical implications of the Christian doctrines of sin and salvation will thus be seen to be considerable. Christian ethics and pastoral theory and practice must be firmly grounded in doctrine, if they are to retain their distinctively Christian character, and not collapse into religious equivalents of secular ideas and practices.

See especially: ABUSE; ALIENATION; ATONEMENT; CAPITAL PUNISHMENT; CHURCH; COMPROMISE; CONFESSION; CONSCIENCE; CONVERSION; COVETOUSNESS; CREATION; CRIME; CROSS; CRUELTY; DEADLY SINS; DEATH; DEHUMANIZATION; DELIVERANCE MINISTRY; DEMONIC; DISCRIMINATION; EVIL; EXPLOITATION; FALL; FAITH; FORGIVENESS; FRAUD; FREEDOM; FREE WILL AND DETERMINISM; GENOCIDE; GOSPEL AND ETHICS; GRACE; GUILT; HATRED; HEALING; HEAVEN AND HELL; HOLY SPIRIT; HOPE; HYPOCRISY; INNER HEALING; JESUS; JUDGMENT AND THE JUDGMENT; JUSTIFICATION, DOCTRINE OF; JUVENILE DELINQUENCY; KINGDOM OF GOD; LAW AND GOSPEL; LIBERATION THEOLOGY; MANIPULATION; MATERIALISM; MATURITY; MERCY; MORTIFICATION; MOTIVE, MOTIVATION; NATURAL LAW; OCCULT; ORIGINAL SIN; PEACE; PORNOGRAPHY; POVERTY; PRIDE; PUNISHMENT; RACE; RAPE; RECONCILIATION; REPENTANCE; RESPONSIBILITY; RESUR-RECTION; RIGHTEOUSNESS; SANCTIFICATION; SACRAMENTAL HEALING; SATAN; SEXISM; SHAME; TEMPTATION; TERRORISM; THEFT; TORTURE; VICE; VIOLENCE; WAR; WASTE.

Bibliography

G. Aulen, Christus Victor (ET, London, 1931); J. P. Baker, Salvation and Wholeness (London, 1973); G. C. Berkouwer, Sin (ET, Grand Rapids, 1971); C. E. Curran, Themes in Fundamental Moral Theology (Notre Dame, IN, 1977); F. W. Dillistone, The Christian Understanding of Atonement (London and Philadelphia, 1968); E. M. B. Green, The Meaning of Salvation (London, 1965); A. E. McGrath, Iustitia Dei: A History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification, 2 vols. (Cambridge, 1986); J. R. W. Stott, The Cross of Christ (Leicester, 1986; Downers Grove, IL, 1987); H. Thielicke, TE; D. F. Wells, The Search for Salvation (Leicester and Downers Grove, IL, 1978).

A.E.McG.

History of Christian Ethics

The history of Christian ethics will be considered in this article as a history of engagement with philosophical ethics. Philosophical ethics starts in the Western world with the ancient Greeks.

1. Greek ethics

For the ancient Greeks, the primary authority in ethical questions was the Homeric poems, written down in the mid-8th century BC after a long oral tradition. These narratives of the Trojan War and the Return of Odysseus give a picture of heroic society and the virtues it praised, and of the proper (and improper) relations between humans and gods. The authority of Homer came under increasing challenge, however, in the succeeding centuries. In particular Socrates (470-399 BC) had difficulties with many of the Homeric stories about the gods, and with the traditional account of the virtues of piety, courage, moderation, justice and wisdom. He was condemned to death on the charges of corrupting the youth and not believing in the city's gods. In his defence, he urged that the real charge was that he had conducted his life asking uncomfortable questions about the nature of the good life and the virtues, asking people who were supposed to know the answers but did not. Socrates did not claim to know anything himself except that he knew nothing; he accused the Athenians of wanting to kill him in order to get rid of the irritation of having to think hard about these questions themselves. He did, however, have settled convictions, such as that it is always wrong to harm a man, even if he has harmed you first, and that it is worse to do wrong than to suffer it. He left no written work, but Plato,* his disciple, wrote up into dialogues the conversations he had heard.

Plato departed progressively, in the middle and later dialogues, from what Socrates had actually said. For example, he developed a theory of Forms out of Socrates' quest for definitions. According to this theory, we perceive in this world things which are, e.g., red or beautiful or good; but these things have these properties by participating (though defectively) in the Forms, redness-itself or beauty-itself or goodness-itself, which exist in their own immutable world. We see the Forms directly only when our immortal souls are separate from the body; when joined with the body (in this life) we learn by being prompted to recollect the Forms by the right kinds of questions or experience. We can participate in the Form of justice if the highest part of the soul (and the highest class in the State, the rulers) recollects the Forms, and the other parts of the soul (and hence the other classes in the State) obey it.

Aristotle* was Plato's student. He said, unlike Plato, that the Forms are in particular things, directing their development towards mature exemplification of the species, which are (like the world itself) eternal. In ethics this immanence can be seen especially in his emphasis on the ends given to human beings by their biology and their culture. Human souls have the (plant-like) functions of growth and reproduction, and the (animal) functions of perception and movement, as well as the functions of feeling and thinking. The 'ethical' virtues* are the excellences of that part of the soul that listens to reason,* although it does not reason itself, and must be trained by habituation; the 'intellectual' virtues are the excellences of the reasoning part. Practical wisdom (an intellectual virtue) requires the perception of particulars as having or not having value, and links this to the agent's vision of the good, resulting in action. Aristotle's detailed discussion of the ethical virtues gives a somewhat nostalgic ideal of the Athenian gentleman. There is no attempt to revise or criticize this ideal. But he ends (surprisingly) with the claim that the chief good for human beings is a life of contemplation or study. This is the life closest to the divine, since Aristotle's God is 'thought thinking itself'. Aristotle does not seem to have a place for personal immortality.

After Aristotle, there were several schools of Gk. philosophy, of which the most influential was the Stoic.* For the Stoics, the highest instance of reason is God, who governs all events including human activities by an all-pervading 'law' or order (see Natural Law*). The human task is then to submit to that law.

2. The New Testament

The OT and the NT differ from the Gk. tradition in three major themes: 1. human beings are in the hands of a personal God (see †), the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, who chooses to save first his people (the Jews) and then those he will graft on to this vine by his own sovereign grace;* 2. this grace is a response to the Fall,* in which the first humans chose to disobey God's will and passed on this tendency towards disobedience to their descendants; and 3. this Fall was a departure from the order of creation,* in which God created all things, including human beings, good. These three themes (Redemption, Fall, Creation), are distinctively different from the Gk. tradition, and the rest of the story in this article is the history of the relations of these two traditions. Not all the story involves Christianity, however. In the Middle Ages, especially, we will see an important role played by Judaism and Islam. Within Christianity God's redemption of the world is by restoring creation through the death and resurrection of his Son Jesus* Christ, and eventually by the creation of a new heaven and a new earth.

The ethics of Jesus (see New Testament Ethics†), as portrayed in the NT, centres around the notions of love (agape) and the kingdom* in which this love (see †) is lived. The first commandment, says Jesus, is to 'Love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind'; the second is to 'Love your neighbour as yourself' (Mt. 22:37-39). This love will require (as it did for Jesus) self-sacrifice. The kingdom* which he announces is one which brings peace* and righteousness, lifting the burdens especially of the poor and the oppressed. The early church responded to this teaching with a lifestyle of radical generosity, pacifism,* sexual abstinence and evangelical fervour.

3. The early Fathers

The early Fathers of the church were faced with the task of making Christianity accessible to the Graeco-Roman world. They did this in part by using the tools provided for them by Gk. philosophy. In the Western Roman Empire, the most influential figure in the carrying out of this task was Augustine,* who used especially the tools provided by the version of Platonism which he encountered. For Augustine, the Forms are in the mind of God, and God uses them in his creation of the world. Human beings were created for union with God, but they have the freedom* to turn towards themselves instead of God. If they turn to God, they can receive divine illumination, through a personal intuition of the eternal standards (the Forms). If they turn towards themselves, they will lose the sense of the order of creation, which the order of their own loves should reflect. Especially towards the end of his life, Augustine emphasized the tension between the world we are in as resident aliens, 'groaning with inexpressible groaning in our distant wandering', and our citizenship in the heavenly Jerusalem. Primacy is given by Augustine to the virtue of loving what ought to be loved, especially God. 'Love, and do what you will' expresses his view that humans who truly love God will also act in accord with the other precepts of divine (see Law*) and moral law; though love not merely fulfils the cardinal virtues, but transforms them.

The influence of Augustine in the subsequent history of ethics results from the fact that it is his synthesis of Christianity (the official religion of the Roman Empire after 325) and Gk. philosophy that survived the destruction of the Western Roman Empire. In the eight centuries that followed him in the West, there are several significant figures, such as Boethius (c. 480-524), Eriugena (810-c. 877), Anselm* and especially Abelard;* but for the history of ethics the more important developments are in the East. The Eastern Roman Empire survived Constantinople until it was finally taken by the Muslims in the 15th century. Knowledge of the ancient philosophers, especially Aristotle, disappeared in the West, but re-entered by a circuitous route.

Aristotle was translated into Syr. and Arab., and was studied by Muslim scholars, most notably Avicenna (980-1037), after the Muslim conquests which eventually extended over N. Africa as far as Spain. In Spain, Maimonides (1135-1204), who eventually moved back to Cairo as chief rabbi, distinguished between the natural moral law, which can be known to people who have not received divine revelation, and the divine law, which is given in revelation, and which Maimonides analysed exhaustively. In Spain, Aristotle was translated from Arab. into Lat. and re-entered Christian Europe in the 12th century, accompanied by translations of the great Arab. commentaries. This new learning gave rise to a crisis, because it threatened to undermine the harmony established from the time of Augustine between the authority of reason, as represented by Gk. philosophy, and the authority of faith, as represented by the doctrines of the Christian church. There were especially three 'errors of Aristotle' which seemed threatening: his teaching that the world was eternal, his denial of personal immortality, and his account of God as 'thought thinking itself', which seemed to deny an active providence. These three issues (the world, the soul, God) continued to be the focus of philosophical thought for the next 600 years.

4. The late Middle Ages

Thomas Aquinas* denied that there was an irresolvable conflict. He set himself to show that Aristotle, properly understood, was consistent with the teaching of the church, and he used both Muslim and Jewish philosophical traditions in this task. We can think, then, of the differences between Plato and Aristotle as recapitulated at least roughly in the differences between Augustine and Aquinas. Aquinas, like Aristotle, emphasized the ends (vegetative, animal and typically human) given to humans in the natural order. He emphasized the virtues (theological as well as cardinal), but he also talked of principles or rules. The rules governing how we ought to live are known, some of them by revelation, some of them by ordinary natural experience and rational reflection. But these rules are consistent in the determination of our good: 'God is not offended by us except by what we do against our own good.' God's will is not exercised by arbitrary fiat; but what is good for some human being is what may be understood as fitting for this kind of agent, in relation to the purpose this agent intends to accomplish, in the real environment of the action, including other persons individually and collectively. The rules of natural moral law are the universal judgments made by right reasoning about the kinds of actions which are morally appropriate and inappropriate for human agents. Aquinas was not initially successful in persuading the church to embrace Aristotle. In 1277 the Bishop of Paris condemned 219 propositions (not all Thomist), including the thesis that a person virtuous in Aristotle's terms 'is sufficiently disposed for eternal happiness'. But in the long run, the synthesis which Aquinas achieved became authoritative in Roman Catholic education.

Aquinas was a Dominican. Bonaventure (1221-74), his contemporary, was a Franciscan. One difference is that Bonaventure emphasized the unity and simplicity of the human soul (refusing to make radical distinctions between powers such as intellect and will), but held nevertheless that volitional activity and affective experience is more distinctive of humanity than is any cognitive activity. Another Franciscan, John Duns Scotus (1265/6-1308), held that the human will is free and rational by nature and superior to the human intellect, though it is the intellect by which practical principles are known and by which judgments are made about the conformity of concrete actions to those principles. A third Franciscan, William of Ockham (1284/85-1349), denied the reality of universals, asserting that the only realities are individuals, material or immaterial. He said that the will of God is the ultimate source of morality. 'Every right will is in conformity with right reason,' but reason is right because God has willed it to be so.

5. Reformation and Counter-Reformation

The two main figures of the Protestant Reformation are Martin Luther* and John Calvin.* Luther was an Augustinian friar, and it was his excommunication in 1521 that marked the formal break with Rome. He disputed the authority accorded to Aristotle ('that stinking philosopher') by Aquinas. Faith* alone, he said, is the instrument of salvation, and Scripture alone is the source for our knowledge of the faith. Luther was probably influenced (though the extent is controversial) by the followers of Ockham. He drew a radical distinction between the two realms of human existence (earthly and heavenly): reason rules properly in the first, but is constantly tempted to claim improper authority in the second. Calvin's emphasis is slightly different. He said that there is 'written, even engraved, upon the hearts of all' an inward law that asserts what the ten commandments assert. It is true that the knowledge of this inner law is corrupted by sin; our knowledge of God and his will is now so incomplete and distorted that nothing can be built upon it. But Calvin held that the main purpose of the law is not, as for Luther, 'to bring us to our knees', but to guide our grateful response to God's grace. A larger place is accordingly given to the possibility (through grace) of the Christian renewal of human social institutions. The source to which Calvin and Luther return, in their emphasis on the primacy of grace in human life, is the work of Augustine.

The Reformation was succeeded by the Counter-Reformation in Roman Catholic Europe. This had an influence on ethics through the attempt to formulate explicit rules for spiritual direction,* and through the encouragement this gave to casuistry* (the application of ethical rules to particular kinds of concrete cases). Thomism has a notable representative at this period in Francisco de Suarez.* Suarez claimed that the precepts of the natural law can be distinguished into those (like 'do good and avoid evil') which are known immediately and intuitively by all normal human beings, those (like 'do no injury to anyone') which require experience and thought to know them, but which are then self-evident, and those (like 'lying is always immoral') which are not self-evident but can be derived from the more basic precepts. A contemporary Protestant theorist of natural law was Hugo Grotius.* He distinguished natural law both from human law and from 'voluntary divine right' which is revealed by God. Natural law is 'the dictate of right reason, showing the moral turpitude or moral necessity of any act from its agreement or disagreement with a rational nature' (The Rights of War and Peace, I.1.10, in B. Rand, tr., Classical Moralists, Oxford, 1897, pp. 208-209).

6. Rationalism and empiricism

The next two centuries in Europe can be described in terms of two lines of development, both of which resulted in the growth of an autonomous or secular ethics.

a. The history of rationalism on the continent of Europe, from Descartes to Leibniz. Rene Descartes (1596-1650), often described as the first modern philosopher, was not primarily interested in ethics. He accepted that traditional Aristotelian science had been undermined by Copernicus (1473-1543), Johann Kepler (1571-1630) and Galileo (1564-1642), and he proposed to re-establish knowledge on the foundation of rational principles that could not be doubted. The most important rationalist in ethics is Benedict de Spinoza (1632-77). He was a Jew, but was not regarded by his contemporaries as orthodox. Like Descartes, he attempted to duplicate the methods of geometry in philosophy. Substance, according to Spinoza, exists in itself and is conceived through itself; it is consequently one, infinite, and identical with God. There is no such thing as natural law, since all events in nature ('God or Nature') are equally natural. Everything in the universe is necessary, and there is no free will (see Free Will and Determinism*) except in as far as Spinoza is in favour of calling someone free who is led by reason. Each human mind is a limited aspect of the divine intellect. The human task is to move towards the greatest possible rational control of human life. Gottfried von Leibniz (1646-1716) was, like Descartes, not primarily an ethicist. He said, however, that the true good is 'whatever serves the perfection of intelligent substances', and the nearer creatures approach to this, the nearer they approach to perfect happiness.* The rationalists were not denying the centrality of God in human moral life, but their emphasis was on the access we have through the light of reason rather than through sacred text or ecclesiastical authority.

b. The development of empiricism* in Britain, from Hobbes to Hume. Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679) was impressed (like the rationalists) with the model of geometry, and also wanted to establish knowledge on firm foundations. But he wanted to do this, so to speak, from the bottom, from experience (especially the experience of the senses), rather than from the top (from indubitable principles of reason). All reality, he said, is bodily, and all events are motions in space. Willing, then, is a motion, and is merely the last act of desire or aversion in any process of deliberation. His view is that it is natural, and so reasonable, for each individual to aim solely at his own preservation or pleasure. In the state of nature, humans are selfish, and their lives are 'solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short', a war of all against all. The first precept of the law of nature is then for every man (or woman) pursuing his (or her) own interest, 'to endeavour peace, as far as he has hope of obtaining it; and when he cannot obtain it, that he may seek, and use, all helps, and advantages of war' (Leviathan, 1651; ed. A. R. Waller, Cambridge, 1935, p. 87). The second precept, given that every person has a right to everything, is that he (or she) should be willing to lay down this right to the extent that others are also willing. Twelve more precepts follow, including, 'Do not that to another, which thou wouldst not have done to thyself'. Right reason, which is the law, is thus made right by our approbation of it and voluntary subjection to it, but it is the same as what has been revealed as God's will.

The deists, especially William Wollaston (1659-1724) and Bernard Mandeville (1670-1733), believed that humans can reason from their experience of nature to the existence and some of the attributes of God, that revelation* and the mysteries of the faith may be unnecessary, and that the good life for humans finds adequate guidance in philosophical ethics. An example of such guidance is provided by Bishop Joseph Butler,* who argued that while both self-love and benevolence* are to be found in human nature, there is a superior faculty, reflection, which adjudicates between them. Francis Hutcheson (1694-1746) distinguished between objects which are naturally good, which excite personal or selfish pleasure, and those which are morally good, which are advantageous to other persons. He thought that God has given us a moral sense so that when intending the good of others, we undesignedly promote our own greatest private good. He concluded that 'that Action is best, which procures the greatest Happiness for the greatest Numbers'.

The most important figure in British 18th-century ethics is David Hume.* One basic principle of Hume's is that reason cannot command or move the human will. Since morals have an influence on the actions and affections, 'it follows that they cannot be derived from reason; and that because reason alone, as we have already proved, can never have any such influence' (Treatise of Human Nature, III.1, ed. L. A. Selby-Rigge, Oxford, 1951, p. 563). For Hume an action, or sentiment, or character, is virtuous or vicious 'because its view causes a pleasure or uneasiness of a particular kind'. The idea of morality implies that there is some sentiment of sympathy or (he later says) humanity, which is common to all human beings, and which 'recommends the same object to general approbation'. We should be careful, however, not to derive any proposition connected with an ought or an ought not from premises containing only is and is not (see Naturalistic Fallacy*). There is, that is to say, a gap between fact and value, and we must be suspicious of any ethical theory (e.g. any natural-law theory) that does not recognize one.

Finally, Thomas Reid (1710-96), the proponent of 'common sense', objected to what he held to be Hume's scepticism. He held that in morals, as in other parts of experience, there are universally accepted principles which need no philosophical proof; conscience* is the faculty which, on the basis of these common principles, dictates our duty.*

7. Kant and German idealism

Immanuel Kant* was brought up in a pietist Lutheran family and his system retains many features of Lutheranism. He belongs in the rationalist tradition from Descartes to Leibniz, but he was also, as he says, 'awoken from his dogmatic slumbers' by reading Hume. Kant's project was to 'deny knowledge in order to make room for faith'. He meant that our knowledge is restricted to the concepts of the understanding, whose domain he thought, following Hume, was confined to what could be experienced by the senses (namely, things as they appear to us, not things as they are in themselves). On the other hand, Reason and what Kant called its 'ideas' are not so confined. 'God', 'the soul' (and its freedom and immortality) and 'the world' are ideas of Reason. Believing in God (as a rewarder of virtue) is required, he thought, if we are to lead a moral life. Starting from the fact of our experience, that we are bound unconditionally by our moral duty, Kant concluded that the authority of duty cannot derive from our desires or from the results of our actions. He reached several formulations of what the 'categorical imperative'* of duty must be. The most important are the first, 'Act only according to that maxim through which you can at the same time will that it should become a universal law,' and the third, 'Act in such a way that you always treat humanity, whether in your own person or in the person of any other, never simply as a means, but always at the same time as an end.' Kant wanted to translate, as far as he could, the tradition given us by revelation into a set of beliefs within the limits of reason alone, and he treated in this way the doctrines of creation, fall and redemption.

Kant's system was reinterpreted in different ways by his successors. Johann Gottlieb Fichte (1762-1814) presented an account of three 'moments'; the 'thesis', when the ego or self first posits itself and thereby exists; the 'antithesis', when the ego sets up the non-ego in opposition to itself; and the 'synthesis', when the ego without limitation (the Absolute) becomes aware that it must posit a certain limitation (or finitude) in both ego and non-ego. G. W. F. Hegel (1770-1831) also had a system with these three moments, but they are repeated again and again in a narrative or dialectic of development, which is the concrete evolution of mind or spirit as the realization of the Idea (God). The ethical life is, for Hegel, the idea of rational freedom; but it is realized in a set of customs and institutions, especially the family and the State. There is thus an absolute obligation to the State, as the embodiment of the Idea, and therefore of God. F. D. E. Schleiermacher* also emphasized the necessary sociality of thought, but he held that feeling is a form of self-consciousness not derived from other people, and that religion is the most highly developed mode of feeling, the feeling of absolute dependence. Arthur Schopenhauer (1788-1860) claimed that the fundamental energy which evolves in all things and produces all events is will: as individuals, humans are part of the world of appearances, but as things in themselves, they are united in the eternal will. In Britain Hegelianism was developed by T. H. Green (1836-82) and F. H. Bradley (1846-1924).

8. The nineteenth century

Soren Kierkegaard* saw himself as making a specifically Christian response to Hegelianism. He distinguished a number of 'stages on life's way', especially the aesthetic, ethical and religious stages. An individual becomes an individual by despairing of meaningfulness within his (or her) finiteness (within the aesthetic stage); if he then chooses that despair, he can find in this choice a self beyond the finite which has eternal validity, and he can then re-enter the finite by choosing it (this is the ethical stage). Kierkegaard is different from Kant in thinking that the ethical stage must itself be transcended ('the teleological suspension of the ethical'). It cannot itself be lived without self-deception, because of the irresolvable tension between the universal and the particular, what one ought to be and what one is. If a person will take Christ as a pattern (the perfectly divine and perfectly human), that person will see that by this standard he or she is always in the wrong (this is the 'leap' to the religious stage).

In England, Jeremy Bentham* adopted Hutcheson's principle that one ought to aim at the greatest happiness of the greatest number. The name 'utilitarianism' is given to the various kinds of theory which organize ethics under this principle (see Consequentialism*). Bentham held that we could determine what action this principle required by determining what pleasures and pains would result from that action for all the parties affected, counting each person as one and no person as more than one, and then measuring these pleasures and pains by their intensity, duration, certainty and propinquity. John Stuart Mill* carried the doctrine further by distinguishing qualities as well as quantities of pleasure; the ranking of quality was to be done by persons who had experienced all the types to be ranked. Mill saw himself as finding a way to apply the theory of Kant, rather than as providing a replacement, though many ethics textbooks deny that this is what he was doing. Henry Sidgwick (1838-1900) held that utilitarianism and egoism* would sometimes conflict, and that since both are reasonable, the only way to achieve a coherent system of our practical beliefs is to assert the existence of a moral power that will repay self-sacrifice and punish transgression. Unfortunately, he saw no evidence for the existence of such a power, and he therefore concluded (though he later questioned the need for 'evidence' in any standard sense) that the effort to frame 'a perfect ideal of rational conduct' is 'foredoomed to inevitable failure'. Sidgwick also objected to Mill's attempt to found utilitarianism on empirical principles of motivational psychology; no such attempt to derive an 'ought' from an 'is', he thought, had yet been successful.

Up to the middle of the 18th century there was a consensus, with various degrees of qualification, that there is an order of nature, which corresponds to an order within God's reason or will, and which it is the duty of humans to realize in their actions. In the 19th century this consensus was threatened by three intellectual developments outside philosophy, but within 'science' (though relying on premises not themselves in any narrow sense 'scientific'). Karl Marx,* following Hegel at some distance, claimed that ethical and religious systems are the by-product of political and economic relations. Charles Darwin* saw nature itself as developing over time, along with its species, thus making it difficult to hold to the fixity of natural law as traditionally conceived. Sigmund Freud* opposed traditional religion and ethics (e.g. the Kantian ethic that makes acute the tension between duty and desire) as repressive dictates from the super-ego. Much of 20th-century ethics bears traces of the influence of dialectical materialism, the theory of evolution (see *Evolutionary Ethics), and psychoanalysis. Certainly, the antecedent consensus position became more exposed in this environment.

9. The twentieth century

There has been, nevertheless, a tension between those who welcome the progress of science and its model of clarity and rigour for ethics and for philosophy in general, and those who do not welcome it. This tension can be found within both major schools of Western 20th-century philosophy, the 'analytic' and the 'continental'. The difference between these two can be expressed geographically (like the earlier split between empiricism and rationalism) between on the one hand British philosophers and those in Scandinavia, Australia and certain schools of N. America, and on the other hand the rest of Western Europe and the Americas. Sometimes the divergence is said to be between those who do not and those who do read Hegel. Protestantism has tended to the first, and Catholicism to the second.

On the continent, ethics has been shaped significantly in response to the attack on tradition by Friedrich Nietzsche* 'that God is dead'. Nietzsche wanted to get beyond the morality of the Jews, who exalted the values of slaves and the poor, beyond the 'old ladies' morality' of the Christians, in fact 'beyond good and evil' altogether. But it is a mistake to think of him as therefore a nihilist* about values, though his positive doctrine is hard to articulate. He preferred 'good and bad' to 'good and evil', admiring the values of Homer's heroes. The 'overman' is the human being who has organized the chaos of his passions, given style to his character, and become creative. Martin Heidegger (1889-1976) undertook as his quest to find what Being is; but before he could determine this, he had to ask about the nature of the being who alone among beings engages in this quest. Like Kierkegaard in his treatment of the ethical stage, Heidegger found the route to authentic human being leads through despair or dread (Angst), when a person's life as a whole loses meaning, but that loss is then chosen or appropriated as 'being-to-death'. This brings human being to its proper freedom, to make the decision that it cannot get beyond the norms into which it has been thrown by the contingencies of its birth. Jean-Paul Sartre* distinguished between being-in-itself and being-for-itself (again language from Kierkegaard), which is human consciousness, where the self (as in Fichte) generates its own nothingness by self-detachment. There is, for Sartre, no human nature or human essence to limit the openness of being-for-itself. The great virtue is authenticity, the acceptance of this freedom; the worst vice is bad faith, which is the individual's negation of this freedom (see Existentialist Ethics). Though he does not belong in this tradition, John Dewey (1859-1952) also thought that there were no fixed final ends; and that we should therefore look for 'ends in view', proximate goals all of which may become means for further 'ends in view'. He emphasized education in school as the place where this reconstruction of experience can be imbued with creativity and intelligence.

To turn now to analytic ethics, G. E. Moore (1873-1958) objected to what he called 'the naturalistic fallacy', which is to identify 'good' with any natural property. He held that 'good' itself is a simple, indefinable quality, like 'yellow'; but unlike 'yellow' it is non-natural, and is known directly in itself by an 'intuition'. If we now ask, 'What are the pre-eminent goods attainable by human beings?', Moore's answer is, 'It is obvious that personal affection and aesthetic enjoyments include by far the greatest goods with which we are acquainted.' Analytic ethics, like analytic philosophy in general, was much impressed with the theory of meaning that confined meaningfulness to tautologies and assertions that could be in principle verifiable or falsifiable by sense experience. This theory put the meaningfulness of ethical judgments in question. One possibility, embraced by C. L. Stevenson (1908-78), was to analyse ethical language as having 'emotive meaning', which is dynamic rather than descriptive, having the function, e.g. of inciting people to action (as in oratory). This account had the disadvantage, pointed out by R. M. Hare,* of making it unclear how there could be ethical argument. Hare has proposed that there are three defining conditions of a moral judgment: 1. it must be universalizable (a condition which derives from Kant's first statement of the categorical imperative); 2. it must be prescriptive (if we assent to the claim that we should do something in some situation, and then we do not do it, we must logically be assenting insincerely); and 3. it must be (when considered reflectively) overriding, which is to say that we treat it as overriding all other prescriptions, including non-universalizable ones. Hare's view is that moral thinking, defined in this way, will be a kind of utilitarianism. There is, however, much analytic ethics that is not utilitarian. One prominent example is John Rawls (1921-), who has proposed a theory of justice which is also Kantian in inspiration. He asks us to imagine making judgments about what should be done as though we were behind a 'veil of ignorance', not knowing which roles in the situation we would play. He thinks that behind this veil we would agree on certain principles for the adjudication of disputes, and he thinks that these principles, unlike utilitarianism, have the merit of respecting the difference between persons.

Within Roman Catholicism Henri Bergson (1859-1941), though not primarily an ethicist, derived prescriptions about religion and morality from his theory of the elan vital (vital impetus) which underlies evolution. He distinguished societies that are closed, where morality and religion are an obstacle to human evolution, from those that are open. A follower of Bergson, Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (1881-1955), thought of evolution towards 'a point which we might call Omega', the integration of all personal consciousness. Jacques Maritain (1882-1973) was a student of Bergson, and developed a form of Thomism which retains the natural law, but regards ethical judgment as not purely cognitive but guided by preconceptual affective inclinations. Gabriel Marcel (1889-1973), like Heidegger, was concerned with the nature of being as it appears to human being, but he allowed more room for encounter with God. One recent movement has been liberation theology,* of which a leading spokesman from Latin America is Gustavo Gutiérrez (1928-). There are related movements in black theology and feminist theology. What these movements have in common is a commitment to relieving the condition of the oppressed; some of them believe a Marxist revolution is the only means to achieve this. Roman Catholic ethics has retained the tradition of casuistry, the detailed practical consideration of reasons for actions (e.g. the consideration of war,* and abortion*).

Within Protestantism, Karl Barth* reacted against the subjective 'religion of experience' of the tradition from Schleiermacher, and set himself to reassert the transcendence of God, the absolute lordship of Christ and the objective 'givenness' of revelation. He rejected all human ethics, and especially natural law theory, as merely 'the prolongation of the Fall'. This is not by itself to reject ethics, since 'the doctrine of God is at every point ethics'. Barth rejected also the Lutheran doctrine of the two realms, and put the State in the order of reconciliation, under the control of Christ. Paul Tillich (1886-1965) presented God as a practical answer to the anxieties of death,* meaninglessness and guilt.* He did not, however, think of God as personal, but rather as an ultimate reality, 'being-itself'. He defined faith as 'ultimate concern', which has being-itself as its object; but every human being has such ultimate concern, and it may be focused on different concrete objects which serve as more or as less adequate symbols of the Ultimate itself. Reinhold Niebuhr* distinguished sharply between love (agape), which is by its nature sacrificial and seeks nothing in return, and justice which requires reciprocity and acknowledges the claims of self-interest. This tension gives rise to a 'Christian Realism' which simultaneously calls for a 'frank dualism' of ethics and politics, and holds the politician 'under the influence of the foolishness of the moral seer'. Paul Ramsey,* a student of Reinhold Niebuhr's brother H. Richard Niebuhr,* continued the tradition in his application of Christian ethics to warfare in the nuclear age (see Deterrence, Nuclear*) and to the new technologies of medicine (see Ethics of Medical Care†).

See especially: AMBROSE; ANABAPTISTS; ANGLICAN MORAL THEOLOGY; ANSELM; ARISTOTLE; AUGUSTINE; AYER, A.J.; BARTH, KARL; BAXTER, RICHARD; BENTHAM, JEREMY; BONHOEFFER, DIETRICH; BRUNNER, EMIL; BUCER, MARTIN; BULTMANN, RUDOLF; BUTLER, JOSEPH; CALVIN-ISTIC ETHICS; CAROLINE DIVINES; CASUISTRY; CATHOLIC MORAL TRADITION; CHRISTIAN SOCIALISTS; CHRYSOSTOM, JOHN; CHURCH; CLAPHAM SECT; CRUSADES; DEVLIN-HART DEBATE; DISPENSATIONALISM; DOOYEVEERD, HERMANN; ECUMENICAL ETHICS; EDWARDS, JONATHAN; ELLUL, JACQUES; ENLIGHTENMENT; FLETCHER, JOSEPH; HARE, RICHARD M.; HIPPOCRATIC OATH; HOLY SPIRIT; HUME, DAVID; JESUITS; JESUS; KANT, IMMANUEL; KIERKEGAARD, SOREN; KING, MARTIN LUTHER; KIRK, KENNETH E.; KUYPER, ABRAHAM; LEWIS, C. S.; LUTHERAN ETHICS; MALTHUS, THOMAS ROBERT; MARXIST ETHICS; MAURICE, F. D.; MENNONITE ETHICS; MENNO SIMONS; MILL, JOHN STEWART; MORAL REARMAMENT; NIEBUHR, REINHOLD; NIEBUHR, H. RICHARD; NYGREN, ANDERS; ORTHODOX ETHICS; PAPAL ENCYCLICALS; PATRISTIC ETHICS; PHILOSOPHICAL ETHICS; PLATO; POLITICS; PROSELYTISM; PURITAN ETHICS; QUAKER ETHICS; RAMSEY, PAUL; RIGHTS, HUMAN; ROMAN CATHOLIC MORAL THEOLOGY; SCHAEFFER, FRANCIS; SCHLEIERMACHER, F. D. E.; SCIENCE; SECULARIZATION; SITUATION ETHICS; STATE; STOICISM; TAWNEY, R. H.; TAYLOR, JEREMY; TEMPLE, WILLIAM; TERTULLIAN; THIELICKE, HELMUT; THOMAS AQUINAS; THOMIST ETHICS; TOLSTOY, LEO; VIRTUE, VIRTUES; WILBERFORCE, WILLIAM; WITTGENSTEIN, LUDWIG.

Bibliography

V. J. Bourke, History of Ethics (Garden City, NY, 1968); R. J. Cavalier (ed.), Ethics in the History of Western Philosophy (New York and London, 1989); W. D. Hudson (ed.), New Studies in Ethics: vol. 1, Classical Theories, vol. 2, Modern Theories (New York, 1974); A. Macintyre, A Short History of Ethics (London and New York, 1967); H. Sidgwick, Outline of the History of Ethics for English Readers (London, ⁶1931); M. Warnock, Ethics since 1900 (Oxford, ³1978).

J.E.H.

Practical and Pastoral Theology

‘Pastoral theology’ is a wide term admitting of many different definitions, whereas ‘practical theology’ has traditionally been used in a more restricted sense, especially in Scottish theological education, of the relating of theology to the practice of ministry.

1. Practical theology

The view that practical theology applies to the work of ministry owes much to F. D. E. Schleiermacher,* who analysed the tasks of theology into philosophical theology (the root), historical theology (the body) and practical theology (the crown). Practical theology studies the means by which the community of faith preserves and protects its identity. Within practical theology, the term ‘pastoral theology’ was used to discuss that aspect of the church’s practice which was particularly concerned with the cure of souls, including a theology of ministry. In Schleiermacher, it focused largely on the functions of preaching and administration of the sacraments.

Although there are those who still use the term ‘practical theology’ in this way, there has been a considerable revolution in the concept in recent decades, and a more fundamental interpretation of practical theology advanced which sees it not as the practice of theology but as the theology of practice. Given a particular direction through the work of Anton Boisen,* who exercised considerable influence on the development of Clinical Pastoral Education in the USA in the middle of this century, and whose approach had a large effect on such post-war teachers of pastoral theology as Seward Hiltner,* Wayne E. Oates (1917-) and Carroll Wise, the focus of interest in practical theology shifted from the application of doctrine in pastoral settings, to a critical dialogue between theology and praxis.* This new-style practical theology is concerned with the way in which the faith of the church works out in practice in the world and raises questions about what it sees, addressing them back to theology. One of the leading contemporary exponents is Don Browning (1934-) of the Chicago University Divinity School, who has drawn heavily on the recent recovery of the tradition of ‘practical wisdom’ in philosophy, to argue that all theological thinking, including systematic and historical theology, is essentially practical. The social and intellectual context in which theology is put into practice is brought into conversation with the vision implicit in pastoral practice itself, and with the normative interpretations of the faith handed down in the traditions of the church. Theology thus arises from practice, moves into theory, and is then put into practice again.

2. Pastoral theology

Pastoral theology (what Browning calls ‘strategic practical theology’) primarily concerns the church disciplines of religious education,* pastoral care, preaching, liturgy, mission, evangelism* and social ministries. There is still a wide spread of meanings in the term ‘pastoral theology’, however.

Eduard Thurneysen* uses the term to describe a theology of pastoral care which is part of the task of proclamation of the Word of God. Thomas Oden (1931-), perhaps too broadly, speaks of the task of pastoral theology being ‘to reflect upon the self-disclosure of God witnessed by the Scriptures, mediated through tradition, reflected on by critical reasoning, and embodied in personal and social experience’ (Pastoral Theology, p. 311). David Deeks gives a much less focused approach. For him, pastoral theology is concerned with the conversations that people have which betray their search for meaning in life. The pastoral theologian is to enter into those conversations, at first as if there were no God, but fully convinced that there must be more to life than meets the eye. From this starting-point, the pastor is like an artist who uses a wide range of sources to encourage reflection – including the Bible – in order to help people discover the meaning and sense of their experience, and to connect it with the Christian tradition. Probably Seward Hiltner's approach in Preface to Pastoral Theology has been as influential as any. The traditional concerns of discipline, edification and comfort were replaced in Hiltner by a case-study approach to healing, sustaining, guiding, communicating and organizing. He defines pastoral theology as 'that branch or field of theological knowledge and inquiry that brings the shepherding perspective to bear upon all operations and functions of the church and minister, and then draws conclusions of a theological order from reflection on these observations' (p. 20). Hiltner and others have been criticized for focusing too much on the rural metaphor of 'shepherd', and for the loss of an adequate historical and moral dimension to pastoral theology, which was increasingly becoming identified with Rogerian (see Rogers, Carl*) approaches to non-directive counselling.

Three major concerns have been expressed about this period of 'psychological captivity'. 1. Browning and others noted that the moral basis for much pastoral theology was inadequate. Non-directive counselling often lacked any ethical input. 2. Alistair Campbell (1938-) and others voiced the concern that the social and political dimensions had been neglected at the expense of the purely individual and personal dimension. 3. As Thomas Oden has recently written in his major work, Pastoral Theology, pastoral theology has lost touch with its classical theological roots and may be in danger of rejecting its heritage.

Perhaps James Lapsley's (1930-) definition of pastoral theology is the clearest: 'the study of all aspects of the care of persons in the church, in a context of theological inquiry, including implications for other branches of theology' ('Pastoral Theology Past and Present' in W. B. Oglesby, Jr., ed., The New Shape of Pastoral Theology, Nashville, TN, 1969, p. 43).

Biblical and historical roots. The history of pastoral care in the Christian church is illustrated elsewhere (see Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy†). It is important to remind ourselves, though, that much of this history is rooted in the view that the biblical documents themselves are in many cases written as pastoral documents.

The Old Testament is a rich mine of pastoral theology and repays careful excavation. Some of its pastoral deposits are obvious. The book of Job not only grapples with the problem of suffering* but demonstrates, through the role given to Job's friends, how easy it is to engage in careless pastoral theology and mistaken pastoral approaches to suffering people. The Psalms frequently give voice to human experience and bring that experience into the light of knowledge about God. Ecclesiastes gives vent to the existential Angst felt by many in the face of life's apparent meaninglessness. It hints at answers which lead to a different perspective on life, but treads cautiously so as not to trespass on the depth of the anguish felt.

Other parts of the OT have pastoral deposits which require deeper excavation. The story of the people of Israel is not recorded for barren historical purposes but so that future generations may know both their own identity and the identity of the God of the covenant* (Dt. 6:1-25). The prophetic writings often address the complex pastoral dilemmas of God's people. Habakkuk confronts the question of the holiness of God in the light of the injustice experienced by his people. Hosea speaks in rich pastoral tones concerning the unquenchable love of God for his people in spite of their waywardness. Isaiah 40 – 66 speaks to the people troubled by their experience of exile and of the seeming defeat of the dynasty of David. Isaiah's answer is to lead the people to a more splendid understanding of God – whom they thought to have hidden himself from them – than anywhere else in the OT. Haggai addresses a people struggling to discover the glory of God as they settle back in the land God gave them and battle with all the disappointments which that entailed. He points them not only to the requirements of practical action but to hope for the future. These examples demonstrate that the pastoral dimension is a major aspect of the intention of these documents.

The Gospels have traditionally been seen as historical, theological or evangelistic documents, but contemporary approaches have shown a much greater awareness of their pastoral dimensions. This awareness owes much to redaction criticism and the consideration of the audiences to which they might have been addressed.

Matthew's Gospel addresses the problems thrown up by a rapidly expanding church, composed of a mixture of Jews and Gentiles, some of whom would have argued for a strict adherence to Jewish inheritance and law,* and others of whom would have sat loose to traditions and the law. This raised issues of the meaning of discipleship and called forth a pastoral strategy which emphasizes the teaching of Jesus. The law's demands remain in force (Mt. 5:17-20) and must be obeyed. But its demands are intensified and internalized (e.g. Mt. 5:21-48). At the same time, and standing in tension with such high demands, there is to be a rejection of legalism* and a concern for the little and vulnerable ones. Jesus, the one who fulfils OT prophecies, is shown to have commanding authority, and his disciples are cast in the role of learners. The true test of their learning was their obedience (Mt. 21:28-32).

Mark's strategy is to portray the actions of Jesus, particularly in regard to the theme of suffering. Throughout he displays a realism about the cost of discipleship and points to an identity between disciples who experience conflict as a result of their faith in the 'Son of Man'. Such an approach would have provided those being persecuted as Christians in Rome, or elsewhere, with strength to endure until their final vindication and reward (Mk. 10:29-31; 13:16-27).

Luke's pastoral agenda finds its focus in Theophilus, who appears to be full of doubts and uncertainties about the faith. Among the items which can be identified are questions concerning the place of the church in the plan of God and the sweep of history; uncertainty caused by the delay in the return of Christ; disappointment caused by failures in the church and by its lack of progress and questions about the nature of its socially mixed composition. Luke responds to the questions by telling stories, which recount the ministry of Jesus and the life of the early church, letting them speak for themselves.

John 20:31 defines the purpose of John's Gospel as to encourage belief. The belief may not refer, as has often been assumed, to initial belief so much as to continuing belief – the tense of the verb, although disputed, indicating this. With the passing of the original eyewitnesses to Jesus Christ, hostility shown to the early Christians by those in the synagogues, and differences emerging over the nature of Jesus Christ, this Gospel speaks to those pastoral situations by deep reflection on the life of Jesus Christ by one who claims to have been an eyewitness.

The Gospels, then, may be read as pastoral documents which use a variety of pastoral techniques to address the real-life pastoral situations of their recipients.

The letters are more explicitly pastoral documents, usually addressed to destinations and situations which are apparent. Thus, for example, 1 Thessalonians is addressed to a young congregation facing bewilderment in its early days because the apostle had been torn away from them (1 Thes. 2:17). Galatians is written to those whose freedom in Christ is under threat by those who would impose the cultural and legal requirements of the Jewish law on them (Gal. 5:1-6). Most of them contain instruction as to how to live in situations where they are surrounded by unbelievers.

Paul's pastoral approach is a didactic one which always relates the experience of his readers to the doctrines of the faith. So, to take but one issue, seeking to address the question of division in the otherwise happy fellowship of Philippi (Phil. 2:2-4; 4:2-3), Paul relates their behaviour to the incarnation of Christ (2:5-11). In Ephesians the same issue is dealt with in relation to the unity of the Godhead (Eph. 4:1-6). Wherever possible Paul's teaching is set in the context of warm encouragement (e.g. Col. 1:3-14; 1 Thes. 1:2-10). But he is equally capable of open rebuke when the occasion demands (e.g. 1 Cor. 11:17; Gal. 1:6).

In addition to dealing plainly with pastoral issues the letters of Paul reveal something of the deep structures of pastoral relationships. Throughout his writings Paul refers to his aim of producing mature believers (Eph. 4:13; Col. 1:28) and of 'building up' the communities of believers (Rom. 15:2; 1 Cor. 4:12; Eph. 2:22; 4:29). Any authority he has is only for use towards these constructive ends (2 Cor. 10:8; 13:10). It is contradictory for the servants of Jesus to claim inherent rights. In all their dealings with others pastors must be aware that they, like them, are accountable to their master (1 Cor. 3:10-15; 9:24-27; 2 Cor. 5:9-15). Pastoral progress, then, depends on the quality of the relationship and on mutual trust, openness and love (2 Cor. 7:2-4, 10-13).

The other 'general' letters are equally pastoral in their intent but more varied in their approach. Hebrews engages in a careful exposition of the superiority of the new covenant to the old for those who are tempted to give in to the pressures of believing and revert to worship in the Jewish synagogue. James, with its direct and blunt approach, may be described as pastoral first-aid for believers who suffer, among other things, from economic oppression. 1 Peter excels as a pastoral letter in both its content and its style, and gives much encouragement to those starting out on the journey as Christians, and suffering for it, by a closely woven texture of doctrine and practice. John's letters are marked by a thoroughness of teaching style, gentle sympathy, strong warnings and Christ-centredness. 2 Peter and Jude adopt the more unusual approach of apocalyptic, which can equally be effective in providing a strong dose of pastoral medicine.

3. Theology of ministry

A substantial component of pastoral theology concerns a theology of ministry.* Any consideration of ministry must be much broader than the official and ordained ministry of the church. Ministry is simply service (diakonia), and takes place when the gifts of God's grace (charismata) are employed in the service of others, and when the functions of ministry are fulfilled (1 Cor. 12:1-11). The NT stresses that Christians should mutually minister to one another (Gal. 5:13; 6:2; Eph. 4:2, 32; Col. 3:16; 1 Thes. 3:12; 4:9, 18; 1 Pet. 4:9; 5:5; 1 Jn. 3:23). This may happen in formal or informal settings and involve those who are ordained or lay.

Yet the church also has regular ministers who are set apart to serve the church as their primary occupation, and it is the privilege and duty of the church to support them (1 Cor. 9:7-14; Gal. 6:6).

a. The task. A succinct statement of the pastoral task is first outlined in Ezk. 34:16, which, though originally directed to the political leaders of Israel, none the less can be applied to the work of pastors. The shepherd engages in searching, guiding, healing, nurturing and governing. Contemporary pastoral theology often defines the task of the pastor in similar terms as that of healing, sustaining, guiding, reconciling and nurturing.

In the NT, the goal of pastoring is to facilitate maturity[†] in the believer (Col. 1:28-29; Eph. 4:15). Maturity is to live fully as a person released from 'the dominion of darkness' and under the kingship of Christ (Col. 2:12-13). It is to live freely as a son of God (Gal. 3:26 – 4:7; 5:1), and faithfully in step with the Holy Spirit (Gal. 5:16 – 6:5; Eph. 5:1-21). It is to work increasingly through the implications of the gospel. The constant call is for believers progressively to realize their position in Christ and to live in a manner which is congruent with it (Eph. 4:1ff.).

In seeking to 'build up' the Christians (2 Cor. 10:8; Col. 2:6-7), Paul constantly relates their experience of life, the world and the church to the revealed doctrines of God (see †), Christ, the Holy Spirit,* creation,* salvation, etc. It is a correct understanding of truth that will lead them not only to live in an ethically correct way but also to experience true wholeness (shalom). Earle Ellis (1926-) has recently questioned whether the traditional picture of the minister as a minister of the Word and sacrament is quite accurate in biblical terms, since the NT does not indicate the sacraments to be a significant part of ministry. There is, however, greater emphasis on the teaching role of the pastor.

b. Dimensions of ministry. A fuller understanding of the nature of ministry can be acquired by an examination of the various titles applied to those who minister.

Among the many which highlight one aspect of the ministry or another are: Paul sees himself as the servant, even slave, of Christ (Rom. 1:1; Gal. 1:10; 2 Cor. 11:23), of God (2 Cor. 6:4) and of the gospel (Eph. 3:7; Col. 1:23), for the sake of the church. The word diakonos also comes to be used in the more defined sense of leaders within the church who have practical responsibilities in their care for the fellowship (Phil. 1:1 and 1 Tim. 3:8-13). The title steward (1 Cor. 4:1; Tit. 1:7) stresses that the minister's responsibility is to manage the resources and fulfil the commission of his master rather than to create any basis for ministry in himself or herself. A related development of this word group emphasizes that the stewardship* is a stewardship of the gospel (Eph. 3:8-9).

A number of titles highlight ministry from the perspective of government. The pastor is an overseer (episkopos or presbyteros, Acts 14:23; 20:17, 28; 1 Tim. 3:1-7; 5:17-20; 1 Pet. 5:1-4), pilot, or leader (1 Cor. 12:28), or president (Rom. 12:8). The work of the ministry from this perspective is to give direction to the community of Christ's people and to individuals within it. Whilst evidently referring to a recognized position within the church, the greater stress of NT teaching lies not on the authority of their role but on the spiritual responsibility which falls to them in their role (1 Cor. 9:27; Heb. 13:17; 1 Pet. 5:1-4).

Three particular names draw attention to the specific functions of the ministry. Priest draws attention to the liturgical dimension of pastoring. But it is surprisingly little used, Rom. 15:16 being the only time Paul uses it to refer to a leadership role. Even there, what makes it 'priestly' is the 'duty of proclaiming the gospel of God'. Priesthood, in the new covenant, is devolved on all the people of God (1 Pet. 2:9; Rev. 1:6; 5:10). The leadership of worship is not explicitly referred to as the task of the priest or president (1 Cor. 14:26; Col. 3:16; 1 Tim. 2:1). Teacher and its cognates is a much more frequent concept (Rom. 12:7; 1 Cor. 12:28; Eph. 4:11, 20-21; Col. 1:28) and receives special emphasis in the pastoral letters (1 Tim. 2:7; 3:2; 4:11; 6:1-2; 2 Tim. 1:11; 4:3; Tit. 2:1, 15). It involves the learning of right doctrine (2 Tim. 1:13). Teaching is undertaken both by verbal instruction and the imparting of example (1 Tim. 4:11-14), and is dependent for its effectiveness on the ministry of the Holy Spirit.

There is no exact equivalent in the NT to the contemporary term 'counsellor', the accepting listener who enters into the problems of another and gives encouragement and possibly direction. The task of the counsellor is, however, related to the work of the Holy Spirit (parakletos, Jn. 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7), is an extension of the ministry of exhortation (paraklesis, Rom. 12:8; 1 Cor. 14:31), and can be seen as a frequent aspect of Paul's own ministry (Rom. 12:1; 2 Cor. 10:1; Phil. 2:1, etc.). The contemporary emphasis on individual counselling may owe more to an absence of corporate teaching and a lack of agreed doctrinal consensus in our churches than to an exact role model within the NT (note 1 Cor. 12:28). Others would refer to 'confronting' or 'setting right' (nouthesia, Eph. 6:4; Col. 1:28; Tit. 3:10) as a neglected aspect of biblical counselling, but Col. 1:28 and 3:16 both clearly link admonition to teaching. The doctrinal understanding and theological orientation of the counsellor has a marked effect on the method and style of counselling adopted.

c. The method of ministry. No systematic statement of the method of ministry is given, but some methodological consequences arise from the terms reviewed and a number of other key principles are evident. The quality of relationship, implicit in the shepherding motif, is vital in determining the success of pastoring. The long-running and variable relationship between Paul and the Corinthian church is an illustration of this. In all his relationships he tries to compliment, remind believers of what they know, build on what is good and encourage, but he is not afraid to offer blunt criticism and correction when they are needed.

The approach to individuals is never stereotyped but always sensitively takes account of their needs, situations and personalities (1 Thes. 5:14). Sometimes Paul instructs the ignorant, sometimes he encourages the weak and fearful, and sometimes he warns the wayward and stubborn.

All this is done in the context of Paul modelling the gospel in his own life and setting an example which serves both as an incentive and standard for others (1 Cor. 4:16-17; Phil. 3:17; 1 Thes. 1:6; 2:14; 1 Tim. 1:16).

4. The church as a therapeutic community

Human beings were made in the image of God* and for relationships with each other, but sin has marred, distorted and damaged both (see Fall*). Good relationships, however, of all kinds, may be therapeutic and cause a person to know healing or facilitate progress towards wholeness.

The church* should be the best therapeutic community in the world. Unlike any therapeutic community built around a psychological counsellor for his clients, it is not an artificial community. It emphasizes acceptance (Rom. 15:7), forgiveness (Eph. 4:32), compassion (Phil. 2:1; Col. 3:12) and grace – an unconditional and divine love (Jn. 13:34-35; Rom. 12:9-10; 1 Cor. 13; Gal. 5:13). These qualities arise because all have received acceptance,* forgiveness,* compassion* and grace* from Christ themselves. A true fellowship* (koinonia) is therefore created. Fellowship is not the sharing of a common interest but a participation in the receipt of grace. This makes for an equality of love. Fellowships which are formed on the basis of a common interest in race, colour, sex, class, status, age or even moral background are illegitimate (Col. 3:11). True fellowship should provide security and be an ideal soil in which hurts can be healed and maturity reached. Furthermore, relationships within the fellowship are not hierarchical but brother to brother and sister to sister. They differ therefore from the doctor / patient or therapist / client relationship. All members, pastor no less than others, stand in a common need of grace and should stand in common submission under God's Word. Many contemporary structures within the church have failed to model this adequately, as hierarchical, patriarchal, and other structures of respectability have come to dominate. In so far as these exist, the church needs to repent and discover afresh the true basis for its community.

Some tension inevitably arises because the church is a purposeful community. Christ not only accepted the sinner unconditionally but commanded him or her to 'Go, and sin no more' (Jn. 8:11, AV). Grace does not render law obsolete but rather releases a person from his or her own failures and problems to begin to be liberated by keeping the law (Mt. 5:17-20; Gal. 5:13-15; Jas. 2:8). The accepting community of the church therefore must help its members to be released from the scars left by the sins of the past (either their own sins or sins done to them) and to grow towards maturity and wholeness (see Inner Healing*). Mutual encouragement, rebuke and discipline* are therefore permissible and even necessary if we are to overcome sin in our lives (1 Cor. 5:1-5; 2 Cor. 7:1; Heb. 10:25; 12:1-3, 14-17; 1 Jn. 1:9 – 2:11).

Maturity has many different dimensions to it but will include having a settled relationship with God, an ethical obedience* to his commands, a freedom* from self-preoccupation in order to live an other-directed life, an understanding of right belief, an endurance of faith* in spite of obstacles, and a real experience of God's presence through the Holy Spirit. Ephesians 4:15 sets maturity before us as the goal for the Christian, and the surrounding context (4:1 – 6:20) may be seen as an exposition of the meaning of maturity.

Healing and progress take place within the church in the normal course of the whole range of relationships as well as through worship, the administration of the sacraments, pastoral counselling and the preaching of the Bible. These are all 'means of grace'.

See especially: ACCEPTANCE; ACCIDIE; ACCOUNTABILITY; ADOLESCENCE; ANXIETY; AUGUSTINE; BAXTER, RICHARD; BEHAVIOURISM; BEREAVEMENT; BOISEN, ANTON; BURIAL AND CREMATION; CALVIN, JOHN; CASUISTRY; CHARITIES; CHURCH; CLINICAL THEOLOGY; COMPASSION; CONFESSION; CONFIDENTIALITY; CONVERSION; CULTURE; DEATH AND DYING; DEBT; DELIVERANCE MINISTRY; DISCIPLINE; DIVORCE; DRUGS; EDUCATION; EMPATHY; FAITH; FASTING; FELLOWSHIP; FORGIVENESS; GIVING; HANDICAPPED, CARE OF; HEALING; HILTNER, SEWARD; HOLY SPIRIT; HOPE; HOSPICE; HOSPITALITY; HUNGER, WORLD; INNER HEALING; JESUS; KINGDOM OF GOD; LEADERSHIP; LIBERATION THEOLOGY; LUTHER, MARTIN; MARRIAGE AND FAMILY COUNSELLING; MATURITY; MENTAL HEALTH; MINISTRY; MISSION, MORALITY OF; MONASTICISM; MORAL BEHAVIOUR; MORTIFICATION; NEIGHBOUR; NON-VIOLENCE; ORPHAN; PARENTHOOD, PARENTING; PIETISM; POVERTY; POWER; PRAYER; PRISON AND PRISON REFORM; PROSELYTISM; PROTEST; PSYCHOLOGY OF RELIGION; RECONCILIATION; RELIGIOUS EDUCATION; REPENTANCE; RETIREMENT; SANCTIFICATION; SCHLEIERMACHER, F. D. E.; SICK, CARE OF; SINGLE PARENTS; SOCIOLOGY OF RELIGION; SPIRITUALITY; STEWARDSHIP; STRESS; SUFFERING; THOMAS AQUINAS; UNEMPLOYMENT; VIOLENCE; VOCATION; WIDOWHOOD, WIDOWERHOOD; WORLD; WORLDLINESS.

Bibliography

E. Best, Paul and his Converts (Edinburgh, 1988); D. S. Browning, The Moral Context of Pastoral Care (Philadelphia, 1976); idem, A Fundamental Practical Theology (Philadelphia, 1991); A. V. Campbell, 'The Politics of Pastoral Care', Con 62, 1979, pp. 2-14; idem, Rediscovering Pastoral Care (Philadelphia, 1981; London, 1986); W. Carr, The Pastor as Theologian (London, 1989); D. Deeks, Pastoral Theology: An Inquiry (London, 1987); E. E. Ellis, Pauline Theology: Ministry and Society (Grand Rapids and Exeter, 1989); S. Hiltner, Preface to Pastoral Theology (Nashville, TN, 1958); C. Kruse, New Testament Foundations of Ministry (London, 1983); J. T. McNeill, A History of the Cure of Souls (New York, 1951; London, 1952); H. R. Niebuhr and D. D. Williams (eds.), The Ministry in Historical Perspective (New York, 1983); T. C. Oden, Care of Souls in the Classic Tradition (Philadelphia, 1984); idem, Pastoral Theology (San Francisco, 1983); S. Pattison, A Critique of Pastoral Care (London, 1988); E. E. Shelp and R. Sutherland (eds.), A Biblical Basis for Ministry (Philadelphia, 1981); E. Thurneysen, A Theology of Pastoral Care (ET, Richmond, VA, 1962); D. Tidball, Skilful Shepherds: An Introduction to Pastoral Theology (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 1986); J. A. Whyte, 'New Directions in Practical Theology', Th 76, 1973, pp. 228-238; F. Wright, The Pastoral Nature of Ministry (London, 1980).

D.J.T.

EIGHT

Old Testament Ethics

Biblical faith is theistic. It assumes the existence of one living personal God and sets the whole of human life in response to him. OT ethics, therefore, is primarily response to God (see †), who he is and what he has done. That response is set first in the context of God as creator (see Creation*), and thus has a universal force. Secondly, OT ethics is set in the context of the God of covenant* purpose, whose commitment to bless the human race leads him to initiate a special relationship with Israel within which her ethical response is a central feature. Thirdly, we find that Israel's ethical response was shaped by the God of redemptive action (see Sin and Salvation†), who delivers his people and then gives them land to live in and law to live by.

1. Responding to the God of created order

Ethical simplicity. The assumption of monotheism in the opening chapters of the Bible is so obvious that we easily miss its ethically revolutionary character. The creation narratives exclude polytheism and dualism,* and the pervasive ethico-cultural edifices that go with them. Only one God created the heavens and the earth. Human beings are answerable only to that one God. This immediately introduces a fundamental simplicity into biblical ethics. Commitment to love (see †) and obey the one living God rescues us from the fear of offending one god by trying to please another with resulting conflict of moral requirements (cf. Dt. 6:4-5).

For Israel, the fear of Yahweh (EVV, the LORD) was the first principle not only of wisdom,* but of ethics. In Ps. 33 the thought moves directly from the sole creative word of Yahweh to the universal challenge to all human beings to fear him (33:6-8), since he is the moral adjudicator of all human behaviour (33:13-15; cf. also Ps. 96:4-5, 10-13).

To say that ethics in the OT was simple is not to say that obedience* was easy or that ethical decision-making faced no dilemmas. It is to say that the task of living in this world is not complicated by divided allegiances to competing gods, or by obscure philosophies which demand religious or 'expert' elites to interpret them. This essential simplicity was an incentive to act in accordance with God's will (Dt. 30:11-14; Mi. 6:8).

Moral order. Genesis 1 presents creation as a place of order, system and structure. We live in a cosmos, not a chaos (cf. Is. 45:18ff.). This provides an objective basis and authority for the exercise of moral freedom and sets limits to moral relativism. Whatever the culture* or historical context, we all have to live in God's created world as his human creatures. There is a basic shape to that world which we did not invent, and therefore a corresponding shape to the moral response required of us if we are to live within it with the kind of freedom which, by God's so ordering, it authorizes. Morality, in biblical terms, therefore, is preconditioned by the given shape of creation, which underlies the relativity of cultural responses to it within history.

The established order of creation also generates confidence in the reliability and predictability of life in this world. This does not, of course, rule out the unexpected apparent misfortunes of life (cf Ecclesiastes). Nor is it fatalism. It is simply to note that the Heb. Bible does move from the observation of regularity, consistency and permanence in creation itself (e.g. in Je. 31:35ff.), to affirmations of the same characteristics in God, and thence to the assumption that certain consequences will always follow from certain actions. There are causes and effects in the moral realm, as in the physical, and it is part of wise living in this world to take note of them and behave accordingly.

Such ethical consequentialism* is found in the Wisdom literature, which tends to be grounded in a creation rather than a redemption theology. Much of the advice and guidance given in Proverbs is prudential:

‘Think what will happen if ...’. Behavioural cause and effect are repeatedly linked. The Wisdom tradition’s sexual ethic illustrates this. Whereas the law simply prohibits adultery,* on penalty of death, Wisdom warns against it by describing the appalling consequences the adulterer exposes himself to, personally and socially. Moral rules and moral consequences actually reinforce one another in this way of thinking (e.g. Pr. 5; 6:24-35; 7). Wisdom’s consequentialism, however, is thoroughly personal and theistic. Behind all the prudential advice of the sages stands their own foundational axiom: ‘the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom’. Whatever result follows from our actions is not mechanical cause and effect, but the outworking of God’s own order in his world. The consequentialism of Wisdom is thus based on what we would theologically call God’s sovereign providence and justice (see Justice and Peace†).

The image of God. Perhaps the most familiar of all the implications of the creation material for biblical ethics is the affirmation that God made human beings in his own image.* This has two primary ethical effects.

a. The sanctity of human life. As early as the texts of the Noah covenant (Gn. 9:8-17) the principle was stated that human life was to be treated as inviolable on the grounds of the image of God. Even animals would be held to account by God for the killing of humans. The influence of this principle can be seen in Israel’s law. Laws about domestic animals that injure or kill humans are common in ancient Near Eastern legal corpora. All of them prescribe various degrees of compensation and punishment of the owner. Only the Heb. law prescribes also that the ‘guilty’ ox was to be stoned to death (Ex. 21:28-32). It seems most likely that this was because the law was influenced by the religious principle of the sanctity* of human life, as crystallized in Gn. 9:5 (cf C. J. H. Wright, God’s People in God’s Land, pp. 156-160). Empirically, this high value shows itself in the narratives in several places where there is an abhorrence for the shedding of innocent blood (e.g. 1 Sa. 19:4-6; 25:26; 2 Sa. 2:22; 3:28, 37).

b. The equality of human beings. The OT did not eliminate all social distinctions, e.g. the subordinate social and economic status of the slave. It did, however, go a long way in mitigating the worst effects, by a theology of essential human equality* based on our common createdness in God’s image. In its law, the OT knows nothing of the graded penalties for crimes against different ranks of victim, as is common in ancient Near Eastern law. There was equality before the law for the native and alien (Lv. 24:22). The slave was given human and legal rights unheard of in contemporary societies (Ex. 21:20-21, 26-27). This is reflected in Job’s great ethical self-defence in which he bases his claim to have treated his slaves with justice, in any case which they brought against him, upon an unambiguous statement of created human equality between master and slave: ‘Did not he who made me in the womb also make them?’ (Jb. 31:15). Once again it is in the Wisdom literature that we find the broadest outworking of this creation theology in the social ethos of Israel. There are several texts in Proverbs which affirm the equality before God of rich and poor (22:2; 29:13), and others which so identify God with every human being, regardless of status, that what we do to them we do to God himself (14:31; 17:5; 19:17). This is not the only place where we can hear distinct echoes of the Wisdom tradition in the ethical teaching of Jesus.

2. Responding to the God of covenant purpose

The God who created our world and then watched us spoil it chose to destroy neither it nor us, but instead to commit himself under covenant to a project of ultimate redemption and re-creation that would involve the whole of the rest of time and space. This is the scope of what God initiated through his dealings with Abraham, beginning in Gn. 12. It is the covenant of grace,* which stands behind all subsequent acts of God in history, for it represents God’s commitment to the ultimate good of humanity. ‘In you all the families of the earth shall be blessed’ (Gn. 12:3, NASB). The universal scope of this promise echoes throughout the patriarchal narratives (Gn. 18:18; 22:18; 26:4-5; 28:14) and then on through the rest of the Heb. Bible. This commitment to a covenant purpose of redemption on God’s part injects an element of hope and purpose into biblical ethics. Otherwise the uncertainties of history could reduce us to cynicism about the value of moral choices, as Ecclesiastes observed. But with the ultimate perspective of redemption and new creation, ethics has a firm foundation and is not just short-term expediency.

The people of God. A significant dimension of the covenant with Abraham for biblical ethics was the promise of a people. God's answer to a world of nations scattered in arrogance and strife (as portrayed in Gn. 11) was to create a new community. It would be a people descended from Abraham and blessed as he was, but who would ultimately be the vehicle for blessing to the whole world of nations. And it would be a people whose contribution to that purpose would be by their ethical distinctiveness. Simply being Israel meant having an ethical agenda and mission in the midst of the world. To be an Israelite was to be called to respond to God's covenant purpose for the nations by living as the people of God in their midst.

The clearest expression of this is Gn. 18:19: 'I have chosen [Abraham], so that he will direct his children and his household after him to keep the way of the LORD by doing what is right and just, so that the LORD will bring about for Abraham what he has promised him.'

The context of this verse is God's imminent judgment upon Sodom and Gomorrah. Sodom's evil is causing an outcry that can be heard in heaven itself (see Gn. 18:20-21; seaga, twice, is the technical term for the crying out of those suffering from oppression and cruelty). In the midst of a world characterized by Sodom, God wants a community characterized by his own values and priorities, i.e. righteousness* (sedaqa, Gn. 18:19; one wonders if the word play between these two Heb. words is intentional here, as it certainly is in Is. 5:7) and justice (mispat, Gn. 18:19). The presence of these two phrases, 'the way of the LORD' (i.e. Yahweh) and 'doing what is right and just' (i.e. 'doing righteousness and justice', Gn. 18:19, NASB) here in the patriarchal narratives shows that Israel's identity as a distinct ethical community comes well before the Sinai covenant and Mosaic law. It was something written into Israel's genetic code, so to speak, while she was as yet in the loins of Abraham. In fact, such ethical distinctiveness is put forward here by God himself as his motivating purpose for the election of Abraham: 'I have chosen him, so that ...'. The sense of purpose is very strong in Gn. 18:19. Abraham was chosen, not because of his righteousness, but in order to be the fountainhead of a righteous community. Election means election to an ethical agenda in the midst of a corrupt world of Sodoms.

But that ethical agenda is itself only part of a still wider purpose. The goal of the verse moves on into a third purpose clause: '... so that the LORD will bring about for Abraham what he has promised him.' That is a clear reference, in the light of the preceding verse, to God's ultimate intention to bring blessing to all nations through the descendants of Abraham. That is God's mission, God's universal agenda. That too was the reason for the election of Abraham. What is therefore highly significant in the structure of this verse, syntactically as well as theologically, is the way ethics stands as the middle term between election and mission. The distinctive quality of life of the people of God, committed to his way of righteousness and justice, stands as the purpose of election on the one hand and the means to mission on the other. It is the fulcrum of the verse.

Ethics and eschatology. Israel, then, was called to specific forms of ethical life in order to facilitate God's purpose of bringing the blessing promised to Abraham to the nations. OT ethics is thus set in a universal and eschatological framework, linked to the mission of being the nation for other nations. This universal context for ethical response is apparent in several significant places.

a. Davidic kingship. One of several links between the Davidic and the Abrahamic covenants is the awareness of the universal scope of what God was doing (cf. 2 Sa. 7:25-26; 1 Ki. 8:41-43). God's ethical demands on the house of David were written into the covenant from the start in the sonship response of obedience (2 Sa. 7:14-15). They had in any case been spelt out in the law of the king in Dt. 17:14-20, which unmistakably put the king under the covenant law of Sinai, with its demands for justice and protection of the weak. This was precisely what so many kings failed to do. Towards the end of the monarchy, Jeremiah stood at the gate of the royal palace itself to declare the ethical requirement on the incumbents of David's throne – a declaration which clearly subordinated Zion to Sinai (Je. 22:1-3).

The clearest link between the universal scope of the Davidic ideal and the ethical demand is found in Ps.

72. In the form of a prayer for the king, it concentrates strongly on the various forms of moral government that should flow from him, emphasizing yet again the socio-ethical combination of 'righteousness and justice' which he, as the embodiment of Israel, should manifest par excellence. And in 72:17b it looks beyond Israel to the rest of the world, with a clear echo of the Abrahamic covenant of blessing to the nations. 'All nations will be blessed through him [i.e. in this context, the royal son of David, ruling in justice] and they will call him blessed.'

The main thrust of this psalm is that if the king leads the nation in line with God's moral requirements then, first of all, the nation itself will enjoy peace* and prosperity. But beyond that, by linking the king's rule to the Abrahamic covenant, the psalmist makes the point that God's purpose of blessing for the nations is inseparable from the ethical quality of life among his own people.

b. Jeremiah 4:1-2. Jeremiah first urges the people to renounce idolatry and to conduct their worship and general social life 'in truth, in justice, and in righteousness' (Je. 4:2, NASB). Then he goes on to spell out the results that would flow from such radically ethical repentance. He takes for granted that God's judgment on Israel itself would be averted, and skips forward to a more universal vision, and another clear allusion to the Abrahamic covenant: 'then the nations will be blessed by him and in him they will glory' (Je. 4:2b). Clearly Jeremiah believed that the quality of Israel's ethical life was not just an end in itself, but was supposed to have far-reaching consequences for the nations as well. Much more was at stake in the matter of Israel's moral and spiritual repentance than just saving Israel's own skin from judgment.

c. Isaiah 48:1, 17-19. The generation in exile hears the almost wistful voice of God ruefully pondering on what might have been the case if they had only obeyed his law. In Is. 48:1, the prophet Isaiah, like Jeremiah above, accuses the people of a nominal faith which was contradicted in their practical life by the absence of truth and righteousness. Then, in 48:17ff., in a kind of 'unrealized eschatology', God effectively says that if only Israel had been the community of obedience and righteousness that he desired and planned for her, then the promise to Abraham could have been fulfilled! The point is rhetorical and hypothetical, of course, and not to be pushed literally. But it does very strongly bind together again the link between God's redemptive purpose for humanity, as signalled in the Abrahamic covenant, and his ethical demand on Israel as the people of God. OT ethics had a missionary purpose.

3. Responding to the God of redemptive action

The God who declared his covenant purpose to Abraham went on to act in accordance with it in the historic deliverance of Israel from Egypt. The Exodus is explicitly said to be motivated by God's faithfulness to his covenant with Abraham. And within three months of the event, God introduced Israel to the ethical implications of what had happened to them.

Priestly and holy (Ex. 19:4-6). This is a crucial text. It is a hinge between the redemptive history of the Exodus and the law* and the covenant texts that follow. In these verses God gives to Israel an identity and a mission, which are the basis for the ethical demands of the law. And behind both stands the redemptive action of God himself. So by way of preface to all the detailed legislation to follow, the fundamental ethical principle is that God's requirements depend a. on what God himself has done, and b. on who Israel is.

a. God's initiative and universal interest. 'You have seen what I did ...' (Ex. 19:4). Just as he would later do when introducing the Ten Commandments (see Decalogue*), so here God begins with a historical reminder of his own action. Israel was now a free people because of God's initiative of redemptive grace and promise-keeping. Whatever moral demands she now faced could never be more than a response to what God had already done for her. The priority of grace over law was not a NT discovery or revolution, but was built into* the nature of divine-human encounter from the beginning. It was an explicit part of the covenant with Israel and remains a fundamental principle of biblical ethics as a whole.

Although at this point in the canonical story the focus is primarily on Israel and the unique redemptive and covenant relationship between her and God (as his ‘treasured possession’), the universal scope of the Abrahamic covenant has not been lost sight of. God’s vision is still as broad as ‘all the nations’ and ‘the whole earth’. Even in Egypt he had demonstrated that to Pharaoh (Ex. 9:14, 16, 29). Whatever ethical demands follow must be set not only in the light of the immediate historical act of redemption, but also in the context of God’s universal goal.

b. Israel’s identity and moral obligation. Having laid this dual foundation, God goes on to spell out the role and mission of Israel in two phrases which are echoed elsewhere in the OT and are also applied to the church in 1 Pet. 2:9: ‘You will be for me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation’ (Ex. 19:66).

1. Priestly. A priest in OT Israel was someone who stood in between God and the rest of the people. He was a mediator in both directions. On the one hand he represented God to the people, both in his life and example, but especially through his responsibility for teaching the law (Lv. 10:9-11; Dt. 33:8-10; Je. 18:18; Ho. 4:6; Mal. 2:1-9). Through the priest, then, the people could know God. On the other hand, he represented the people before God, since it was his task to bring the sacrifices and to make atonement* for the people at the altar. Through the priest, then, the people could come to God.

So it is with this double significance that God says to Israel as a whole community, ‘you are to be my priesthood in the midst of the nations of the earth’. On the one hand, Israel would represent the true God to the nations revealing his will, his moral demands, his saving purpose, etc. Through Israel, other nations would know Yahweh. But also, it would be through Israel that God would eventually bring the other nations to himself in redemptive, atoning, covenant relationship. Through Israel, other nations would come to Yahweh. Later prophets pick up both ideas: the law of God going out from Israel to the nations, and other nations coming up to God to or through Israel (or Jerusalem; see Is. 2:3-4). The priesthood identity of Israel thus gives to OT ethics yet another dimension of ‘missionary’ relevance. Right at the start of Israel’s historical journey, God sets her ethical agenda in the context of her mission in the midst of the nations (the same thrust is found in Peter’s application of the priestliness of the people of God, 1 Pet. 2:9-12).

2. Holy. The word has the sense of distinctiveness and difference. Israel would be a nation as other nations, but she was to be holy – different from the rest of the nations (Lv. 18:3). This is the practical implication of the priestly doctrine of Israel’s election from among the nations (Lv. 20:26). Even the foreigner Balaam recognized this conscious sense of distinctiveness about Israel (Nu. 23:9).

The outworking of this characteristic affected every dimension of Israel’s national life, including her religion, but it also permeated her social, economic, political and personal affairs. This is most clearly seen in Lv. 19, a chapter full of very practical laws for daily life, all under the theme ‘Be holy because I, the LORD your God, am holy’ (Lv. 19:2). Holiness affected more than the ritual area of life. Holiness dictated generosity with agricultural produce (Lv. 19:9-10; cf. Dt. 24:19); fair treatment and payment of employees (19:13; cf. Dt. 24:14); practical compassion for the disabled and respect for the elderly (19:14, 32; cf. Dt. 27:18); the integrity of the judicial process (19:15; cf. Dt. 16:18-20); safety precautions (19:16b; cf. Dt. 22:8); ecological sensitivity (19:23ff.; cf. Dt. 20:19-20); equality before the law for ethnic minorities (19:33-34; cf. Dt. 24:17); honesty in trade and business (19:35-36; cf. Dt. 25:13ff.). In short, to love your neighbour (and even the stranger) as yourself (19:18, 34), is not a revolutionary love ethic initiated by Jesus but the fundamental ethical demand of OT holiness (cf. J. G. Cammie, Holiness in Israel, pp. 33f.).

It is important to bear in mind this positive nature of holiness in Israel, since so often the concept of Israel’s separateness from the nations has been construed as embryonic racism, especially when coupled with an overemphasis on the wars of the OT (see Holy War* and Race*). Even in the OT period itself, Israel yielded to the temptation of feelings of national superiority and exclusiveness – though emphatically warned against it (cf. Dt. 7:7-8; 9:4-6) – and could find God’s mercy towards the nations an embarrassment (Jon. 4). But careful study of the texts that refer to the nations shows a balance of, on the one hand, awareness of their rebellion, idolatry and wickedness, for which they stood under the judgment of God both historically and eschatologi-cally, and on the other hand, amazing openness to their ultimate inclusion in the people of God. And alongside the fact of the intended driving out of the Canaanites (an event interpreted quite clearly within the category of moral judgment – Gn. 15:16; Lv. 18:24-28), we must place the special concern that the Torah displays for the rights and protection of aliens in the midst of the Israelite community once they had settled in the land.

Obeying the law. The first response, then, to God's redemptive action was for Israel to recognize her own identity and mission in the world, as God's priesthood, called to be holy – distinctive in every area of life. That having been grasped, it was then given detailed and specific content in the law itself.

Settling the OT law in this perspective, of God's redemptive action and human response to it, is helpful in softening the otherwise starkly deontological* flavour of the law – i.e. the predominance of divine command as the basis for behaviour. The covenant relationship between Israel and God entailed obedience to 'laws, statutes and ordinances'. Ethics certainly involved rules,* not just results. But the important thing is that the OT's deontology was as theistic as its consequentialism. The authority of the law was not that of abstract ethical absolutes but the authority of the personal God whom Israel knew as creator and redeemer. Obedience to the law was thus not just conformity to the rules per se but personal loyalty to the God who gave them.

For that reason the law itself contains a large number of 'motive clauses', giving reasons why particular laws should be obeyed. These fall into several categories (cf. C.J. H. Wright, Living as the People of God, pp. 21-32).

a. Gratitude. The Decalogue itself begins with the statement of redemption, to underline the point that obedience to the following laws is a matter of grateful response (Ex. 20:2). The sermon form of Dt. 4 – 11 reinforces it. The God who loved Israel's forefathers enough to rescue their descendants from slavery is a God to be loved in return, with a covenant love expressed in obedience. Significantly, the area of law where this motive of gratitude for historical deliverance is most pressed is that which concerned the poor, the stranger, the debtor, the slave – the very conditions from which God had rescued Israel (e.g. Ex. 22:21; 23:9; Lv. 19:33-36; 25:38, 42-43, 54-55; Dt. 15:15). There are narrative examples of the same principles at work (e.g. 1 Sa. 11:12-13; 30:22-25).

b. Imitation of Yahweh. God's action for Israel was not just the motive for obedience, but also the model for it. Obedience was 'walking in the way of the Lord'. In Dt. 10:12-19 this motive of imitation (10:17b-19) is added to the motive of gratitude (10:15). In the narratives, cf. David's imitation of the 'kindness' of Yahweh (2 Sa. 9:3). In the psalms, imitation of God's ethical characteristics was inculcated through regularly celebrating them, and occasionally by direct comparison of the ethical qualities of Yahweh with those of the righteous person (cf. in the parallel Pss. 111 and 112; note vv. 3, 4, 5 and 9 in each).

c. Our own good. Obedience to the law is not an inexplicable duty, but is constantly buttressed by the 'utilitarian' consideration that it will produce the greatest happiness of the greatest number. This is the thrust of the exhortations in Deuteronomy (e.g. 4:40; 5:33; 6:24-25; 30:15-20, etc.). The king's social justice will bring blessing and prosperity to the whole nation (Ps. 72). Conversely, endemic social evil will produce economic, ecological and political disaster (Ho. 4 and prophets passim). The psalms which praise the law are far removed from legalistic rule-book morality. Rather they rejoice in obedience as the means of maintaining and enjoying that righteous relationship with God which leads to the greatest personal freedom and social health (Pss. 1; 19; 119). Wisdom breathes the same spirit.

The values of the law. Set in this context, we can see the Ten Commandments, not as a code to be obeyed for the purpose of achieving righteousness, but as the heartbeat of a response to a righteousness already established by God's redemptive action. The liberties won for Israel in the Exodus were not to be squandered, but to be protected by social responsibility based on exclusive loyalty to Yahweh.

Within the Decalogue we can see a scale of priorities in the order of the commandments. God comes first (commandments 1 to 3). The sabbath commandment is for the good of the whole of society (commandment 4). Then comes the authority and integrity of the family (commandment 5), followed by individual life (6), sex and the integrity of marriage (7), property* (8 and 10), and judicial integrity (9).

The centrality of the family* in the list reflects the importance it had elsewhere in Israel's social and moral system. The 'father's house', which was an extended family of up to three generations, was the basic unit of Israel's land tenure system and also had significant religious, judicial and military responsibilities. Its economic viability was protected by laws of inalienability and inheritance of land, its authority protected by laws upholding parental respect, and its sexual integrity protected by strict laws relating to marriage, adultery and unlawful sexual relations. (See Wright, God's People in God's Land.)

The OT's strict sexual ethic must be seen in the context of this primary concern for preserving the stability of the larger family structure, since that in turn was an essential part of Israel's understanding and experience of the covenant relationship between the nation and Yahweh. It must also be set within the context of the way OT faith 'desacralized' sex (see Sexuality†). That is, it kept sex firmly within the created order, not as in any sense linked to the divine order or imbued with sacred power. Sex played no part in the process of the creation of the world, but is simply one feature internal to creation. Human sexuality is part of the image of God, but not in itself part of God. It is a gift within creation, to be enjoyed with God's blessing, but not a means of manipulating either God or nature, as it is within the fertility cults that usually exist symbiotically with polytheism. The laws that carefully regulated sexual relations should not therefore be seen as arising from a view of sex as something sinful and dirty in itself. The unrestrained freedom of the Song of Songs' exaltation of the joy of sex under God's blessing counters any such view. Nor should Israel's sex laws be regarded as mere ritual taboos, or a devaluation of women. In Leviticus, sexual activity and emissions from the sexual organs render a person (male and female – not just the woman) temporarily unclean (Lv. 15). Uncleaness, it is important to remember, was not the same as sinfulness. It was a ritual state that temporarily prevented participation in worship at the sanctuary, normally only for the day or week that it lasted. Sexual activity could therefore never be a legitimate part of the worship of Yahweh, thereby excluding all the typical features of fertility cults, such as ritual prostitution.

As well as this emphasis on the integrity of the family, the rest of the laws show some definite priorities in their scale of values. Life matters more than property. So no offence involving property (theft, fraud, etc.) was punishable by death in normal Israelite judicial procedure. Nor could a murdered life be 'cashed' by a fine on the murderer (Nu. 35:31-34). Persons matter more than punishments. Contrary to popular belief, the lex talionis ('an eye for any eye', etc.) was designed to limit vengeance and protect the criminal from excessive punishment.* It was probably a principle stated in stark terms that was not meant to be literally applied. Physical punishment (beating) was strictly controlled to preserve the dignity of the offender (Dt. 25:1-3). Imprisonment was not prescribed for any offence. Physical mutilation is almost entirely absent (Dt. 25:11 being the single, remote exception). Needs matter more than rights and claims. There is an ethos in Israelite law, clearest in Deuteronomy, that even in a matter where one has a legal right or claim, one must act with consideration for the needs and feelings of the other party. Sometimes this ran counter to the whole custom of the ancient world, as in the granting of asylum to runaway slaves (Dt. 23:15-16). Sometimes it protected the dignity of the weakest and most vulnerable, such as debtors (Dt. 24:10-13) or female captives (Dt. 21:10-14). It put human physical need above strict property rights (Dt. 23:24-25; 24:19-22). It was even extended to animals (Dt. 22:1-4, 6-7; 25:4). There is, in short, within the overall social and economic system of Israel, a strong ethical thrust towards upholding the rights and needs of the weaker sections of society, not just by exhortations to charity, but also by structural mechanisms, such as sabbatical release of debt and slaves and the jubilee* year (cf. C. J. H. Wright, 'The Ethical Relevance of Israel as a Society').

A community ethic. There is evidence that apart from the periods of rampant paganism and moral decadence (such as the reign of Manasseh), average Israelites shared a common ethos which was substantially informed by the major distinctiveness of the Mosaic law. Part of the evidence for this view is found in the great prophets. There can be no doubt that the prophets sharpened and deepened Israel's ethical awareness, but scholars no longer take the view (as they once did) that the great ethical insights of the OT were innovated by the prophets. They were not innovators but reformers. That is, they were calling people back to acknowledge and live by the ethical standards that were already present in the 'constitution' and ethos of Israel. Even those scholars who would be uncertain whether the specific legal texts of the completed Torah as we now have it were circulating as early as the ministry of the 8th-century prophets still recognize a strong legal and ethical foundation underlying the prophetic charge and challenge. Indeed, in the 9th century, the way Elijah challenged Ahab over his behaviour towards Naboth (1 Ki. 21) shows that he had flouted known standards of Israelite economic and legal justice. Amos attacks the injustice of the wealthy and the corruption of the courts in a way that presupposes the awareness that Israel's relationship to Yahweh demanded very different behaviour. Hosea bemoans the absence of the knowledge of God in the land – not because it had never been given, but because the priests were failing in their duty to teach the law to the people. The land was therefore full of social, economic and moral abuses which echo the Ten Commandments (Ho. 4). Isaiah's ringing woes (Is. 5:8ff.; 10:1-4) condemn economic greed, social debauchery, moral perversity, judicial corruption and legalized oppression. In the 7th century, Jeremiah condemned the behaviour of people who came enthusiastically to worship in the temple and to trust in its alleged security while all the time their social life trampled on the Decalogue (Je. 7:1-11). This last is just one example of a number of very powerful texts in which the prophets condemned Israel's worship when it was carried on in the context of social abuses. Ethics took priority over ritual. God cares more about justice than religion (e.g. Is. 1:10-17; 58:1-14; Ho. 6:6; 8:11-14; Am. 5:21-24; Mi. 6:6-8).

Further evidence of a broad consensus on ethical requirements is to be found in the ethical 'typologies' that are found here and there (i.e. portraits of typically righteous or unrighteous behaviour). These are very revealing precisely because they are not in a legal context, but reflect the extent to which the values of the law penetrated the commonly accepted values of society. Examples of such lists are found in the narratives (e.g. 1 Sa. 12:1-5), in the Psalms (Pss. 15; 24), in the Wisdom tradition (e.g. Jb. 31), and in the prophets (e.g. Ezk. 18). (See Wright, Living as the People of God, ch. 9.) The most notable feature of all these lists is the extent to which they combine what we would call private and public morality – everything from inward thoughts to civic duty.

See especially: ATONEMENT; BLESSING AND CURSING; CORPORATE PERSONALITY; COVENANT; CREATION; DECALOGUE; FALL; FAMILY; HOLINESS; HOLINESS CODE; HOLY WAR; HOSPITALITY; IMAGE OF GOD; JEWISH ETHICS; JUBILEE; LAND AND LAND REFORM; LAW; LAW AND GOSPEL; MARRIAGE; NEIGHBOUR; ORIGINAL SIN; POLYGAMY; PRAYER; PRO-CREATION; PROPHECY, OLD TESTAMENT; RESTITUTION; RETRIBUTION; RIGHTEOUSNESS; SABBATH; SLAVERY; STATE; THEOCRACY; WAR; WISDOM.

Bibliography

J. Barton, 'Understanding Old Testament Ethics', JSOT 9, 1978, pp. 44-64; W. Brueggemann, The Land (Philadelphia, 1977; London, 1978); V. Fletcher, 'The Shape of Old Testament Ethics', SJT 24, 1971, pp. 47-73; J. G. Gammie, Holiness in Israel (Minneapolis, MN, 1989); B. Gemser, 'The Importance of the Motive Clause in Old Testament Law', VT Supp 1, 1953, pp. 50-66; J. Goldingay, Approaches to Old Testament Interpretation (Leicester and Downers Grove, IL, 1990), esp. ch. 2; W. C. Kaiser Jr., Toward Old Testament Ethics (Grand Rapids, 1983); D. Patrick, Old Testament Law (Atlanta, 1985, and London, 1986); W. M. Swartley, Slavery, Sabbath, War and Women (Scottsdale, PA, 1983); G. J. Wenham, 'Law and the Legal System in the Old Testament', in B. N. Kaye and G. J. Wenham (eds.), Law, Morality and the Bible (Leicester and Downers Grove, IL, 1978); C. J. H. Wright, 'The Ethical Authority of the Old Testament: A Survey of Approaches', TynB 43.1, 1992, pp. 101-120, and 43.2, 1992, pp. 203-231; idem, 'The Ethical Relevance of Israel as a Society', Tr 1.4, 1984, pp. 11-21; idem, God's People in God's Land: Family, Land and Property in the Old Testament (Grand Rapids and Exeter, 1990); idem, Living as the People of God: The Relevance of Old Testament Ethics (Leicester, 1983) = An Eye for an Eye: The Place of Old Testament Ethics Today (Downers Grove, IL, 1983).

C.J.H.W.

New Testament Ethics

New Testament ethics belong to a tradition of moral reflection which began with the announcement that the God of Abraham and of Moses raised the crucified Jesus of Nazareth from the dead. That good news was celebrated as the vindication of Jesus and his message, as the disclosure of God's power and purpose, and as the guarantee of God's good future. The resurrection was a cause of great joy – and the basis of exhortations to live in memory and in hope, to see choices in the light of Jesus' story and in the promise of God's cosmic sovereignty, and to discern conduct and character and a common life 'worthy of the gospel of Christ' (Phil. 1:27).

1. Jesus and the ethics of the kingdom

The resurrection was the vindication of Jesus and his message. He came preaching that 'the kingdom of God is near' (Mk. 1:15). Against the background of the apocalyptic expectations of the 1st century, the kingdom of God* is neither an ideal social order whose coming is contingent upon human moral effort, nor simply God's sovereignty in the mysterious region of the soul. It is the future, unchallenged, cosmic sovereignty of God, and it is contingent finally only upon the world-shattering and world-renewing power of God. Jesus never made the kingdom contingent upon human morality, and he nowhere narrowed its scope to the mystical or pious or 'existential' surrender of an individual heart to God.

Jesus was not, however, like an apocalyptic seer, preoccupied with the discovery of epochs and the calculation of times; he rejected such speculation and calculation (Mk. 13:32; Lk. 17:20). He simply announced that the kingdom was 'near', made its power felt in his works and in his words, and called for repentance,* for a radical and joyful turning to God. Breaking through the pessimistic determinism of apocalypticism, his calls to 'watch' for the kingdom and to pray for it were joined to calls to 'repent', to welcome it as already present, and to form character and conduct in anticipation of God's good future and in response to the ways in which that future was already making its power felt in him.

Jesus also broke through the nationalistic* dreams of the seers for Israel's revenge against 'the nations'. In the great reversal of God's good future, the blessings of God would fall first not on Israel but on those in Israel conventionally thought to be least likely to receive them: the poor, women, children and 'sinners'. The announcement of such a future was captured in axioms like 'Many who are first will be last, and the last first' (Mk. 10:31; Mt. 19:30; Lk. 13:30; cf. 20:8). The call to welcome such a future, to repent before such a kingdom, was captured in commands like 'If anyone wants to be first, he must be the very last, and the servant of all' (Mk. 9:35; cf. 10:44).

Such was the eschatological shape of Jesus' ethic. To welcome here and now a future where the last will be first, a future already signalled by Jesus' presence among them 'as one who serves' (Lk. 22:27; cf. Mt. 20:28; Mk. 10:45; Jn. 13:2-17) was to be ready then and there humbly to serve (e.g. Mk. 10:44). To delight already in a coming kingdom in which the poor are blessed was even now to be carefree about wealth (Mt. 6:25, 31, 34; Lk. 12:22) and to give generously to help the poor (Mk. 10:21; Lk. 12:33). To repent before a kingdom which belongs to children (Mk. 10:14), which is already signalled by Jesus' open conversation with women (e.g. Mk. 7:24-30; Jn. 4:1-26), and which makes its power felt in Jesus' fellowship with sinners (e.g. Mk. 2:5; Lk. 7:48), was immediately to turn from conventional protocols of power* and to care for children, to treat women as agents, and to forgive 'sinners'.

Such, too, was the eschatological urgency of Jesus' ethic, for while human decisions remained decisions about this or that concrete possibility, in the light of Jesus' proclamation and in response to his commands human decisions were then and there also eschatologically charged decisions about whether to submit to God's coming sovereignty or to the standards and powers of the present age: whether, for example, to love God or 'Mammon' (see Mt. 6:24, RSV mg.).

a. Jesus and the law. Jesus spoke 'as one who had authority,* not as the teachers of the law' (Mk. 1:22). Here was not simply a pious interpreter of the law* but one who announced God's coming sovereignty and made known God's sovereign will. Jesus spoke of and from God's good future, and he set his own eschatological authority over against the authority of the past, even including the past of Sinai's revelation. Even so, Jesus did not destroy the law but brought it to its own eschatological fulfilment, for in God's good future God's work and word as creator and covenantor would be fulfilled.

God's future demanded here and now a response of the whole person, not merely external observance of the law. Jesus condemned a legal casuistry* which left attitudes and dispositions unchanged (Mt. 15:17-20; 23:25-28; Lk. 11:39-41). He placed a claim on the whole person, not just some limits on their external behaviour. The legal casuistry about oaths,* for example (Mt. 5:33-37; 23:16-22; Mk. 7:9-13), might limit deceit, but it could also simply hide it and indeed be used in self-serving ways by the deceiver who knew the law. Jesus announced the coming sovereignty of God, an end to the power of the one who is 'the father of lies' (Jn. 8:44), and he called for truthfulness: 'Simply let your "Yes" be "Yes", and your "No", "No"' (Mt. 5:37; cf. Jas. 5:12). External observance of sabbath* legislation was set aside to welcome God's good future, the triumph of God's mercy and goodness and rest for those who are sick or oppressed or weary (e.g. Mk. 2:23 - 3:6; Jn. 5:1-18). Casuistry about ritual cleanliness was set aside to welcome the rule of God who desires inward purity (Mt. 15:1-20; Mk. 7:1-23). Casuistry about divorce* was a mark of a hardness of heart; to welcome God's good future is to honour God's initial intention with marriage, to be ready not to divorce even when the law would permit it (Mk. 10:2-11). The coming kingdom is welcomed not just by limiting anger by the legal prohibition of murder but by a readiness to 'be reconciled' (Mt. 5:21-26), not just by limiting revenge* by the lex talionis but by a disposition to forgive (Mt. 5:38-42), not just by limiting lust* by the prohibition of adultery but by not viewing women as sexual objects (Mt. 5:27-30). In none of this did Jesus legislate or provide the basis for a new and more rigorous casuistry; he announced the kingdom and invited people already to celebrate it, to welcome it, and to be formed and re-formed by it.

To be a disciple of this Jesus was not simply, like a pupil of a great rabbi, to study Torah and its interpretation; it was to study Jesus, to be apprentice to his works, to hear Jesus' words, spoken with authority, and to do them (Lk. 6:47; cf. Mk. 8:34-38). In his works and deeds disciples caught a glimpse of the coming kingdom, and they struggled to welcome it.

b. The love commandment. The love commandment (Mk. 12:28-34) summarized the fitting response to God's coming sovereignty and so also summarizes and fulfils the law. Love (see †) is, of course, no mere sentiment; it is the active celebration of God and of the neighbour, the disposition to delight in God and in the neighbour, and so, the willingness to honour God and to help the neighbour. The ethic of Jesus was hardly an ethic of obedience to law, however, even the law of love. The love command was not used as a basic principle from which subsidiary rules might be deduced. Jesus' ethic was rather an ethic of response to the coming rule of God – and perhaps the clearest example of this is what Jesus did with Lv. 19:18.

The commandment to love one's neighbour had not always been judged within legal casuistry to be relevant to enemies, but Jesus said, 'Love your enemies' (Mt. 5:44; Lk. 6:27, 35). The justification was that God 'is kind to the ungrateful and wicked' (Lk. 6:35; cf. Mt. 5:45), and the implicit assumption, of course, was that God's rule is 'near' and making its power felt. The conventional pattern of this age is reciprocity, loving 'those who love you' (Mt. 5:46; Lk. 6:32) while seeking the limit of lawful revenge against an enemy (Mt. 5:39-40; Lk. 6:29-30). But the power of that pattern is broken by trust in the coming rule of God, and in response to that good future the neighbour, even the enemy, may be and must be loved (Mt. 5:36-48; Lk. 6:27-36).

c. The politics of Jesus. Jesus was no Zealot. He rejected the vengeful nationalism of some apocalyptic seers and the violence which it nurtured. The enemy was to be loved, not destroyed. He entered Jerusalem riding no war horse but a donkey, and the self-conscious fulfilment of Zc. 9:9-10 pointed to no nationalistic 'holy war' but to 'peace to the nations'.

But he was no Sadducean collaborator either. The temple-cleansing (Mk. 11:15-18; Jn. 2:13-17) was surely – even if not merely – a political act in protest against those who used their authority in the temple to make themselves rich at the expense of pious pilgrims and the poor. The proclamation of God's coming cosmic sovereignty hardly left collaborators with Roman colonialism with an easy conscience.

There was no political programme in Jesus' announcement of the kingdom, but there was a political posture, a posture ready to condemn the pride of power of those who 'lord it over' their subjects (Mk. 10:42-44), a posture that seeks peace and turns against the Zealot's desire for revenge, a posture that seeks justice (see Justice and Peace†) and turns against Sadducean collaboration in exploitation* and extortion, a posture that is here and now blessing to the poor and powerless.

2. The Gospels

The Gospels tell the story of this vindicated Jesus – each in its own way, each creatively and faithfully bringing the memory of Jesus to bear upon the concrete problems faced by a particular community, each with its own distinctive focus of moral exhortation.

a. Mark. Mark was probably the first Gospel to be written. After Peter's death by Nero's command, the Gospel was written to preserve his preaching and to encourage the Gentile Christian community at Rome. It was a call to heroic discipleship.

Mark's account of the ministry of Jesus opened with the call to discipleship (Mk. 1:16-20), and by the central section of the Gospel, with its three passion predictions, it is clear how heroic and dangerous an adventure discipleship is: 'If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross and follow me' (8:34). Mark told the story of a Christ who was rejected, betrayed, denied, deserted, condemned, handed over, crucified and mocked – but also chosen and vindicated by God. The meaning is clear: to be his disciple is to be ready to suffer with him and even to die with him. (There are clear allusions to martyrdom in 8:35 and 10:38-39.)

This heroic discipleship was enabled and required by the call to watchfulness with which it was joined (13:33-37). A readiness to suffer for the sake of God's cause in the world, still hidden in mystery and proclamation, could be and had to be sustained – in spite of Nero's apparent power – by the expectation of the final triumph of God and of God's Christ.

Mark's ethic of watchful discipleship was applied to topics besides suffering,* and it illumined even the most mundane of them with the same heroism. Discipleship was not a matter of obedience to any law or code; it was a matter of freedom and integrity. Fasting* (2:18-22), sabbath observance (2:23 3:6), the distinction between 'clean' and 'unclean' (7:1-23), all belonged to the past, not to a community oriented to the coming of the Son of Man. The final norm was no longer the precepts of Moses but the Lord and his words (8:38). And, in a stunning collection of pronouncement stories (10:1-45), issues of marriage,* children,* possessions and power are dealt with, not on the basis of law or conventional righteousness but on the basis of God's intention at creation* (10:6), the coming kingdom of God (10:14-15), the cost of discipleship (10:21), and the integrity of one's identification with Christ (10:39, 43-45).

Mark's eschatological ethic provided no code, but it did nurture a moral posture at once less rigid and more demanding than any code. It called for an ethos distinctively different from the ethos of either Jewish scribes or Roman rulers.

b. Matthew. Most of Mark's Gospel was repeated in Matthew, but by subtle changes and significant additions the focus of exhortation shifted to a call for a surpassing righteousness.

Matthew insisted for his largely Jewish Christian audience that the law of Moses remained normative. Jesus came not to 'abolish' the law, but to 'fulfil' it (Mt. 5:17). The least commandment ought still to be taught and still to be done (5:18-19; 23:23). Matthew specifically warned against the spiritually gifted 'false prophets' who dismissed the law and nurtured lawlessness (7:22-23; 24:11-12). To Mark's controversies about sabbath observance Matthew added legal arguments to prove that Jesus did only what was 'lawful' (12:1-14; cf Mk. 2:23 - 3:6). From Mark's controversy about ritual cleanliness Matthew omitted the interpretation that Jesus 'declared all foods "clean"' (Mk. 7:19; cf Mt. 15:17); even the kosher regulations were still normative. The issue of these controversies was no longer whether the law still held but who was its best interpreter (see also Mt. 9:9-13; 19:3-12; 22:34-40).

The law held for Matthew's ethic of a surpassing righteousness,* but it was not sufficient. The teachers of the law, with their pettifogging legalism, were 'blind guides' (23:16, 17, 19, 24, 26); they were blind to the real will of God in the law, and their quibbling interpretations hid it. Jesus, however, made it known – especially in the Sermon on the Mount.* There the call to a righteousness that 'surpasses that of the Pharisees and teachers of the law' was made explicit (5:17-20). The Beatitudes* (5:3-10) described the character traits that belong to such a righteousness. The 'antitheses' (5:21-47) contrasted such a righteousness to the concern of the teachers of the law with external observances of laws while the dispositions of anger, lust, deceit, revenge and selfishness (see Self*) were left unchanged. This surpassing righteousness is next described in contrast to the preening piety of the Pharisees (6:1-19) and finally as a righteousness nonpareil, as a confident and expectant longing for God's 'kingdom and his righteousness' (6:33).

Matthew's community played an important role in the continuing task of interpreting the law; they were vested with the authority to 'bind' and to 'loose' (18:18), to make legal rulings and judgments. These responsibilities for mutual admonition and communal discernment were set in the context of concern for the 'little ones' (18:1-14) and forgiveness* (18:21-35) and were to be undertaken prayerfully (18:19). But in this way Jesus continued to be present among them (18:20), still calling for a surpassing righteousness.

The ethic of Matthew was no calculating 'works-righteousness'. It was rather a selfforgetful response to Jesus' announcement of the kingdom (4:12-25). The law held – but not as a basis for making claims on God's mercy. God's mercy was shown – but not to be presumed upon. Matthew remembered Jesus and his message of the kingdom and called for a surpassing righteousness, a righteousness which might not be reduced to 'scribal' righteousness or distorted into 'Christian' lawlessness.

c. Luke-Acts. The memory of Jesus nurtured Luke's concern for the poor and oppressed, and that concern shaped the story of Jesus that Luke told, modifying and adding to Mark. At the beginning of that story Mary's song celebrated God's action on behalf of the humiliated and hungry and poor (Lk. 1:46-55). The infant Jesus was visited by shepherds in a manger (Lk. 2:8-16), not by magi in a house (cf Mt. 2:11-12). John the Baptist's preaching of repentance* included an admonition to share with the poor (Lk. 3:10-14). Jesus' ministry began in a synagogue at Nazareth when he read from Isaiah, "The Spirit of the Lord is on me, because he has anointed me to preach good news to the poor" (Lk. 4:18; cf Is. 61:1). And Jesus, the 'anointed' one, did exactly that throughout his ministry (see Lk. 7:22). In the Beatitudes (Lk. 6:20-26), for example, and in numerous parables (e.g. 12:13-21; 14:12-24; 16:19-31) Luke's Jesus proclaimed good news to the poor and announced judgment upon the anxious and ungenerous rich. Luke did not legislate in any of this; he gave no social programme; but he made it clear that to acknowledge this Jesus as the Christ was to care for the poor and powerless (see Poverty*). The story of Zacchaeus (19:1-10) made it clear that to welcome Jesus 'gladly' was to do justice and to practice kindness. The story of the early church, that 'they shared everything they had' so that 'there were no needy persons among them' (Acts 4:32-35; cf. 2:44-45), made it clear that to acknowledge this 'anointed' one as Lord formed community and character into something fitting 'good news to the poor'.

The poor and oppressed included women, and the Gospel of Luke was good news for women, too. By a wide variety of additional stories and sayings (e.g. Lk. 1:28-30; 2:36-38; 4:25-27; 7:11-17; 10:38-42; 11:27-28; 13:10-17; 15:8-10; 18:1-8), Luke represented Jesus as remarkably free from the chauvinism of patriarchal culture. He rejected the reduction of women to their reproductive and domestic roles and welcomed women who, like Mary of Bethany, would learn from him as equals in the circle of his followers (10:38-42; 11:27-28). Luke's story of Jesus formed a community and a character whose attitude towards women was not determined by the patriarchalism around them but by Jesus' unconventional behaviour, a community and a character ready to recognize the new place Jesus gave to women and ready to insist that 'it will not be taken away from her' (10:42).

d. John. John's Gospel differs from the Synoptic Gospels in a number of ways, and not least in its distinctive ethic. The law 'given through Moses' (Jn. 1:17) was presumably still a guide to conduct for the Jewish Christians to whom John wrote (9:22; 12:42; 16:12). The focus for John, however, was not the law but 'life in his name' (20:31; cf. 10:10; 12:50; etc.).

Life in Christ's name was inalienably a life formed and informed by love. Christ is the great revelation of God's love for the world (3:16). The Father loves the Son (3:35; 5:20; etc.); the Son 'abides' in the Father's love and does his commandments (15:10); Jesus loves his own (13:1) and instructs them to abide in his love (15:9) and to keep his commandments; and his 'command is this: Love each other as I have loved you' (15:12; cf. 15:17). This 'new commandment' (13:34) was hardly novel, of course, but it rested on a new reality: the love of God in Christ and the love of Christ in his own.

That reality was secured at the cross,* uniquely and stunningly described by John as Christ's glorification. The Son of Man was 'lifted up' – on a cross (3:14; 12:32-34). Jesus was exalted not after, but precisely in, the self-giving love of the cross. Moreover, that glory of humble service and love was the glory Jesus shared with his disciples as gift and demand (17:22). They, too, were lifted up to be servants, exalted in self-giving love.

The love that constituted life in Christ's name was a mutual love. The commandment was always to love 'each other' (e.g. 15:17), never to love the 'neighbour' or the 'enemy'. The emphasis was undeniably on relations within the community, but an emphasis was not a restriction. The new reality established in Christ was enacted in the mutual love of those who abode in him. The focus was on the Christian community, but the horizon was the whole world (see Community Ethics†). 'God so loved the world' (3:16) that he sent his Son – and Jesus sent his followers – 'into the world' (17:18; cf. 20:21). The mission of the Father's love seeks a response, an answering love; it seeks mutual love, and where it finds it, there is 'life in Christ's name'.

3. Paul and his interpreters

Before the Gospels put the memories of Jesus into writing, Paul was addressing pastoral letters to his churches. He always wrote as an apostle (e.g. Rom. 1:1; 1 Cor. 1:1; etc.), never as a philosopher or a code-maker. And he always wrote to particular communities facing specific problems. In the letters, as in person, Paul was always proclaiming the gospel of the crucified and risen Christ.

Paul's proclamation of the gospel was sometimes in the indicative mood and sometimes in the imperative mood. Both were appropriate, and both were required, to announce the 'righteousness from God' (Rom. 1:17) made known in Christ. In the crucified and risen Christ, God has acted to end the reign of sin (see Sin and Salvation†) and death,* and to begin the coming age of God's unchallenged sovereignty. Paul's indicative mood described the power of God to provide the eschatological salvation of which the Spirit was the 'first-fruits' (Rom. 8:23) and 'a deposit, guaranteeing what is to come' (2 Cor. 5:5). But the present evil age continued; the powers of sin and death still asserted their doomed reign, and the susceptibility of whole persons to these powers was 'the flesh'. Paul's imperative mood acknowledged that Christians were still threatened by these powers and implored them to hold fast to the salvation, the righteousness, already given them in Christ. So, 'since we live by the Spirit, let us keep in step with the Spirit' (Gal. 5:25).

Reflection about morality was to be radically qualified by the gospel. Paul called upon the Christians in Rome, for example, to exercise a new discernment,* not conformed to this age but 'transformed by the renewing of your mind' (Rom. 12:1-2). There is no Pauline recipe for this new discernment, no checklist or wooden scheme, but some features of it are clear. The new discernment involved a new self-understanding of the moral agent; they were identified with Christ (Rom. 6:11; Gal. 2:20). It involved a new perspective on the moral situation, an eschatological perspective, attentive both to the ways in which the power of God was already effective in the world and to the continuing assertiveness of the doomed powers of sin and death. Paul's discernment also invoked some fundamental values, most notably, freedom* (e.g. 2 Cor. 3:17; Gal. 5:1) and love (e.g. 1 Cor. 13; Phil. 1:9), which were intimately associated with the work of the Holy Spirit.*

The new discernment was not simply a spontaneous intuition granted by the Spirit, nor did it create rules and guidelines ex nihilo. Existing moral traditions were utilized by Paul and his communities in discernment, but the moral traditions of Judaism and Hellenism and even of the church were never normative for discernment in the way that the gospel was. They might be good and useful for discernment, but they had to be tested and assimilated and criticized and qualified by the gospel. The law of Moses was 'good' (Rom. 7:16), but it was a secondary and provisional word, and as such it could not be allowed either the first or last word in Christian discernment. The moral traditions of Hellenistic philosophical schools provided certain elements of style (e.g. the diatribe) and certain concepts (e.g. 'conscience'* and 'contentment'; note the list of Hellenistic terms in Phil. 4:8), but both style and concepts were put into the service of Paul's mission and message as an apostle – and modified by that mission and message. The churches' tradition of Jesus' sayings was accepted as morally authoritative (e.g. 1 Cor. 7:10–11), but not as the basis for a new Christian code. Existing traditions were used but were also always qualified by the moral identity, the eschatological perspective, and the fundamental values formed by the gospel. By means of such a discernment the gospel was brought to bear on the wide range of concrete problems faced by the Pauline churches.

One problem was the relations of Jewish and Gentile Christians. Paul did not require Jewish Christians to act like Gentiles, or Gentile Christians to keep the law of Moses, but he did require them both to 'accept one another' (Rom. 15:7), not to repudiate or condemn each other. Indeed, the unity and equality of Jew and Gentile in Christ and in the church were closely related for Paul to 'the truth of the gospel' (Gal. 2:4, 14), to 'the obedience that comes from faith' (Rom. 1:5), and to 'the mystery of Christ' (Eph. 3:4–6). The power of God made of Jew and Gentile one new humanity, 'thus making peace' (Eph. 2:14–18).

A new discernment was also called for in the relationships of free and slave and of men and women. Paul did not lead a slave revolt or proclaim a women's year, but he did not simply accept without qualifications existing social roles and relationships either. He could not create ex nihilo new social traditions or new role assignments, but he did not accept existing traditions as the last word either. Paul qualified existing traditions in the light of a new identity in Christ, in whom 'there is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female' (Gal. 3:28). This new identity was an eschatological reality, to be sure, but its firstfruits were harvested when Onesimus was received 'no longer as a slave, but ... as a dear brother' (Phm. 16), and when Priscilla and other women were 'fellow-workers' (e.g. Rom. 16:3; 1 Cor. 16:9; Rom. 16:1; Phil. 4:2). This mutuality and equality in Christ qualified and limited the acceptance of existing traditions even where they did not immediately destroy them (e.g. 1 Cor. 11:3–16; and notably the Haustafeln [see Household Codes*], e.g. Eph. 5:21 – 6:9).

There were still other problems calling for a new discernment: the question of the relationship of rich and poor in the churches (1 Cor. 11:22; 2 Cor. 8:8–14); the question of the appropriate attitude towards sexual intercourse (see Sexuality†) when the claim of some that they were already fully 'spiritual' had led to libertine behaviour (e.g. 1 Cor. 6:12–20) or to asceticism* (e.g. 1 Cor. 7:1–7; cf 1 Tim. 4:1–5); the question of political responsibility (Rom. 13:1–7, where Paul put the political wisdom of Hellenistic Judaism in the context of the duty to love the neighbour in a world not yet fully submissive to God's unchallenged sovereignty); the question of eating meat sacrificed to idols (1 Cor. 8–10); and others.

In none of this did Paul provide a timeless moral code and simply demand obedience to it. Rather, he brought the gospel to bear upon the particular question of specific congregations and upon the moral traditions and resources they had for dealing with them. He addressed the communities as capable of the discernment he called for, as ‘full of goodness, complete in knowledge and competent to instruct one another’ (Rom. 15:14).

The ethic of the Pastoral Epistles is in the Pauline tradition but rather less radical, aiming at ‘peaceful and quiet lives in all godliness and holiness’ (1 Tim. 2:2). The eschatological situation was never quite forgotten (1 Tim. 4:7-8; Tit. 1:1-2; 2:12-13), but the ethic was less concerned with a new discernment than with establishing godly lives of moderation and sober good sense, avoiding the enthusiastic foolishness of others who claimed the Pauline tradition, whether ascetic or libertine.

The ‘Pauline’ epistle to the Hebrews described itself as ‘a word of exhortation’ (Heb. 13:22), and so it was. The subtle theological arguments did not exist for their own sake, but for the sake of the exhortations to acknowledge the truth and to act on it (2:1-4; 3:7 – 4:16; 5:11 – 6:12; 10:19-39; 12:1 – 13:19). The theological basis for this ‘word of exhortation’ was the ‘new’ and ‘better’ covenant (8:8, 13; 9:15; 12:24; 7:22; 8:6). The response fitting to covenant* was to ‘be thankful, and so worship God acceptably with reverence and awe’ (12:28). Cultic observances, priestly duties, temple service were all, however, things of the past; the new worship involved ‘sacrifice’, to be sure, and ‘continually’, but ‘with such sacrifices God is pleased’: ‘to do good and to share with others’ (13:16). Such general exhortations were made somewhat more concrete by the exhortations in chapter 13 to brotherly love (13:1), hospitality* to strangers (13:2), sympathetic identification with the imprisoned and oppressed (13:3; cf. 10:32-34), respect for marriage (13:4), and freedom from ‘the love of money’ (13:5). Hebrews 13 is a traditional Christian parenesis, i.e. a didactic collection of miscellaneous moral instructions.

4. The Catholic Epistles

The letter of James is really a parenesis. James’s interest was not a theological one; the author was a moral teacher, not a theologian, but he surely wrote as a Christian, as ‘a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ’ (Jas. 1:1), even as he gathers an eclectic assortment of moral instructions.

James contains, of course, the famous polemic against a ‘faith without deeds’ (Jas. 2:14-26). There can be little doubt that James had in mind a (perverted) Paulinism, but James was hardly interested in defending a different theology of justification. – Indeed, he acknowledged the important priority of God’s grace* (1:17-18). It was not authentic Pauline theology that he opposed as much as the use of Pauline letters and slogans to rationalize indifference to one’s moral obligations (2:14-17; see also 2 Pet. 3:14-17). James, like Paul, called for a faith* that acts (2:22). For Paul a faith that was not actively ‘expressing itself through love’ (Gal. 5:6) was inconceivable, but the behaviour of certain Paulinists had made it conceivable, and James’s response was to insist that a faith that did not issue in deeds was reprehensible.

The ‘law’ was important to James (1:25; 2:8-12; 4:11), but it can be neither identified with the commandments of Torah nor reduced to the single command of love. It was simply the moral law as it was known through Scripture and ‘wisdom’ and borne by the traditional moral instructions which James gathered and handed on.

There is no single theme in James, but there is an unmistakable sympathy with the poor (1:9-11; 2:1-7, 15-16; 4:13 – 5:6) and a consistent concern about the use of that recalcitrant little bit of flesh, the tongue (1:19, 26; 3:1-12; 4:11; 5:9, 12).

The ethic of 1 Peter was fundamentally a call for integrity with the identity one had owned in baptism. The ‘new birth into a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead’ (1:3; cf. 1:23) was a cause for great joy (1:6, 8), but it was also reason to ‘prepare your minds for action’ (1:13). Between the resurrection of Jesus and the revelation of Jesus, descriptions of the new identity Christians have in Christ are always subtly imperatives as well. For example, ‘Now that you have purified yourselves by obeying the truth so that you have sincere love for your brothers, love one another deeply, from the heart’ (1:22; cf. 2:9-10).

1 Peter made extensive use of early Christian moral traditions: to ‘abstain’ (1 Pet. 2:11; cf. Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25; 1 Thes. 4:3; 5:22), not to retaliate with evil for evil (1 Pet. 3:8-12; cf. Rom. 12:3-20; 1 Thes. 5:12-22), and to ‘submit’ to civic, domestic and ecclesiastical authorities (1 Pet. 2:13, 18; 3:1, 5; 5:5; cf Rom. 13:1; Eph. 5:21-24; Col. 3:18; 1 Tim. 2:11; Tit. 2:5, 9; 3:1).

The mundane duties of this world in which Christians are 'aliens and strangers' (1 Pet. 2:11) were not disowned, but they were subtly and constantly reformed by being brought into association with the Christian's new moral identity and perspective. It was in terms of one's baptism, finally, one's dying with Christ and living in hope, that 1 Peter understood the moral life, emphasizing a new moral identity, an eschatological perspective, the duties of moral love and patient endurance of unjust suffering, and encompassing civic, domestic, and ecclesiastical relationships.

2 Peter and Jude defended sound doctrine and morality against heretics who 'promise them freedom' (2 Pet. 2:19) but 'change the grace of our God into a licence for immorality' (Jude 4). The abandonment of orthodoxy and sound morality reduced the heretics to 'creatures of instinct' (2 Pet. 2:12; Jude 10) and rendered them liable to God's judgment (as OT examples made clear). 2 Peter added to Jude a carefully-wrought catalogue of virtues, beginning with faith and ending with love and including a number of traditional Hellenistic virtues (2 Pet. 1:5-8). It also added the unique note that 'holy and godly lives' not only were appropriate to the expectation of God's final triumph but might 'speed its coming' (3:11-12), and a warning against distorting Paul's letters into an excuse for lawlessness (3:15-17).

Like the Pastoral Epistles and 2 Peter and Jude, the Epistles of John defended sound doctrine and morality – but these epistles made their defence in ways clearly oriented to the Johannine perspective and, so, to the duty of love within the Christian community (e.g. 1 Jn. 2:9-11; 3:11, 14-18, 23; 4:7-12, 16-21; 2 Jn. 5-6).

Orthodoxy and morality were as indivisible here as in the pastorals and Jude, but here the connection was not only presumed but disclosed. To believe in Jesus – in the embodied, crucified Jesus! – was to stand under the obligation to love. Jesus' death on the cross was the way that 'we know what love is' (1 Jn. 3:16).

5. Revelation

The context for most apocalyptic literature – and for Revelation – was a group's experience of alienation* and oppression. Revelation was addressed (in the format of a letter, 1:4-5) to churches of Asia Minor which suffered the vicious injustice and the petty persecution of the emperor. It encouraged them and exhorted them by constructing a symbolic universe which made intelligible both their faith that Jesus is Lord and their daily experience of injustice and suffering.

The rock on which that universe was built was the resurrection. 'The Lamb, who was slain' (5:12) was raised from the dead and enthroned. He will come again and will rule. Now there are sovereignties in conflict; on the one side are God, his Christ, and those who worship them; on the other side are Satan,* his regents, the beasts and 'the kings of earth', and those who obey them. The victory has been won, but the eschatological struggle goes on. That, very briefly, was the background of intelligibility for their suffering and for their obligation of 'patient endurance' (1:9; 2:2-3, 10, 13, 19; 3:10; 13:10; 14:12).

The conflict of sovereignties is not a cosmic drama that one may watch as if it were some spectator sport; it is an eschatological battle for which one must enlist. And Revelation's account of the conflict called for courage,* not calculation; for watchfulness, not computation.

The churches were already participating in the hymnic acclaim given to the Lamb in its worship. They were already heralds of the Lamb's reign and a token of its realization. They were in Domitian's empire a counterempire. They were then the voice of all creation, until 'those who destroy the earth' (11:18) would be destroyed, until the sovereign Christ would make 'everything new' (21:5). The 'beasts' used political power (13:5-7) and economic power (13:16-17) to persecute and to oppress; but the defeat of the beasts was announced as good news to the whole world.

'Patient endurance' is not passivity. To be sure, Christians in this resistance movement, this counterempire, did not take arms to achieve power. They did not plot a coup to seize economic power and political control. But even in their style of resistance they gave testimony to the victory of the Lamb who was slain. They were to defend the Lord's claim to the whole earth – and to its politics and economics. They were to live courageously and faithfully, resisting the pollution of the cult of the emperor, including its murder, fornication, sorcery, idolatry, and especially its lie that Caesar is Lord (cf. the vice lists in 21:8; 22:15; also 9:20-21). They were to live their life under the sovereignty and to the praise of the one true Lord.

6. Conclusion

The moral tradition which the NT received, and of which it is the normative expression, was diverse and pluralistic, not simple and monolithic. To force this variety into one systematic whole is impossible and impoverishing. Nevertheless, these many and various voices do converge in the proclamation that Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified under Pontius Pilate, was raised from the dead, and they converge in the exhortation to form conduct and character and community into something 'worthy of the gospel of Christ' (Phil. 1:27).

See especially: ATONEMENT; BEATITUDES; CHURCH; COMPASSION; CONSCIENCE; COVETOUSNESS; CROSS; DEMONIC; EQUALITY; ESCHATOLOGY AND ETHICS; EVIL; FAITH; FAMILY; FASTING; FELLOWSHIP; FORGIVENESS; FREEDOM; FRIENDSHIP; GIVING; GODLINESS; GOODNESS; GOSPEL AND ETHICS; GRACE; HEALING; HEAVEN AND HELL; HOLINESS; HOLY SPIRIT; HOPE; HOSPITALITY; HOUSEHOLD CODES; HUMILITY; HYPOCRISY; JESUS; JUDGMENT AND THE JUDGMENT; JUSTIFICATION, DOCTRINE OF; KINGDOM OF GOD; LAW; LAW AND GOSPEL; LOVE;† MARRIAGE; MATURITY; MERCY; MONEY; MOTIVE, MOTIVATION; NEIGHBOUR; PARENTHOOD, PARENTING; PEACE; POVERTY; POWER; PRAYER; PRIDE; PROPERTY; RECONCILIATION; REPENTANCE; RESURRECTION; REVELATION; REWARD; RIGHTEOUSNESS; SANCTIFICATION; SATAN; SERMON ON THE MOUNT; SLAVERY; SPEECH AND THE TONGUE; STATE; STEWARDSHIP; SUFFERING; SUNDAY; TEMPERANCE; TEMPTATION; TRUTH; VIOLENCE; VIRGINITY; WAGE; WIDOWHOOD, WIDOWERHOOD; WORK; WORLD; WORLDLINESS; ZEAL.

Bibliography

B. Chilton (ed.), The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus (Philadelphia and London, 1984); V. P. Furnish, Theology and Ethics in Paul (Nashville, TN, 1968); idem, The Love Command in the New Testament (Nashville, TN, 1972); J. L. Houlden, Ethics and the New Testament (Harmondsworth, 1973); R. N. Longenecker, New Testament Social Ethics for Today (Grand Rapids, 1984); W. A. Meeks, The Moral World of the First Christians (Philadelphia, 1986); S. C. Matt, Biblical Ethics and Social Change (New York and Oxford, 1982); idem, Jesus and Social Ethics (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1984); T. W. Ogletree, The Use of the Bible in Christian Ethics (Philadelphia, 1983; Oxford, 1984); J. T. Sanders, Ethics in the New Testament (Philadelphia and London, 1975); R. Schnackenburg, The Moral Teaching of the New Testament (ET, New York, 1967; London, 1975); W. Schrage, The Ethics of the New Testament (ET, Philadelphia and Edinburgh, 1988); A. Verhey, The Great Reversal: Ethics and the New Testament (Grand Rapids, 1984); R. E. O. White, Biblical Ethics (Exeter and Atlanta, 1979); J. H. Yoder, The Politics of Jesus (Grand Rapids, 1972).

A.D.V.

Character

Our word ‘character’ comes from the Gk. charassein, which means to scratch or engrave. Thus we still call the letters of the alphabet ‘characters’.

1. Character and integrity

When we say something ‘has character’, we imply definite, striking and perhaps excellent features. The word often suggests age and permanence; an old village or human face may have character, but new ones do not, and even the best children do not have moral character. A person has character if he or she is ‘characterized’ by such traits as truthfulness, courage,* justice and compassion,* especially if that person is able to maintain virtuous action, emotion and thought despite pressures to slacken his or her measure. An associated word in our moral vocabulary is ‘integrity’, which comes from the Lat. integer, meaning whole or entire. A person is said to have integrity if he or she is a complete and definite self* and has powers to resist ‘disintegration’ in the face of temptation,* suffering,* peer pressure, and other adverse moral influences. To have moral integrity is to be, and to be able to remain, a moral entirety – that is, a person in the fullest and deepest sense.

2. Ideals of character and moral traditions

What it is to be a person in the fullest and deepest sense is a matter of controversy between different moral traditions. The Stoic (see Stoicism*) will say that the complete person is one whose mind is conformed to the inevitable processes of nature and thus possesses the virtue of ‘apathy’ or imperturbability. Such a one is detached from (i.e. unconcerned about) all things and persons, in so far as their natural destiny could be emotionally upsetting to that person were he or she attached to them. The ideal of personhood is invulnerability to frustration. To such a Stoic, Paul’s grieving over fellow Jews who refuse the gospel (Rom. 9:1-3) is weakness and a failure of true humanity, while in the Christian view Paul’s grief betokens the virtue of brotherly love.

To an egoist of Ayn Rand’s (1905-82) stripe, a person of character is industrious, shrewd and proud, who considers, ultimately, only his (or her) self-interest. He looks out for others in so far as their prosperity serves his own, but has no sympathy for those who cannot survive the competition; such compassion is a form of weakness and bad character. Thus what is strength to the egoist is vice to the Christian, whose Lord models concern for the weak and wayward (Mk. 8:2-3).

To the hedonist a pleasant life is the human end; to the extent that hedonism* has a notion of what it is to be a person of proper character, it is to be a person whose traits tend to promote pleasure in himself and his fellow human beings.

The Christian believes that the goal of human life (the kingdom of God*) is glorious, the most properly pleasant state that persons can be in. However, it is not the pleasantness of the kingdom that is the goal, but the kingdom itself, its very character as the kingdom of God. Were some state of affairs other than the kingdom to be more pleasant (say, being on an eternal cocaine high), the kingdom would still be the only right choice. In the Christian picture the human being is not essentially a pleasure-seeker, but most fundamentally a child of God, a member of the kingdom. From this fact derive all the Christian virtues, which thus have a distinctly social or communal character. They can be summed up as love (see †) of God and neighbour* (Lk. 10:25-28).

3. What is a virtue?

A virtue* is a learned personal trait, of one or another psychological type, which in some moral traditions is regarded as a form of human perfection.

In some psychological literature, 'trait' denotes supposedly genetically fixed personal tendencies such as introversion or extraversion. But virtues, as discussed in ethics, are learned traits resulting from moral and religious upbringing, from interaction with God and fellow humans, and from individual choices and self-discipline.

Since particular virtues such as patience or humility* are always embedded in some moral tradition, we should not speak simply of the virtue of hope, or courage, or self-control; instead we should index virtue-ascriptions to some tradition or other. Some things that are true of Christian hope* may not be true of Marxist hope; what is true of Christian peace* may not be true of Stoic equanimity; what is true of Christian courage may not be true of Aristotelian courage. The way a mature Christian handles his fear* (namely, his courage) will essentially involve his belief that God is personally present and trustworthy; thus it will depend on the practice of prayer* and the experience of the Holy Spirit.* Since the Aristotelian neither practises prayer, nor believes that God is present, nor has any experience of the Holy Spirit, his courage is not the same trait as the Christian's. The mature Christian and the mature Stoic both have a peace of mind, a lack of anxiety about the things that make most people anxious, e.g. money,* death,* reputation. But they do not have the same virtue. The Stoic's peace is won through calculating self-management, in response to an observation about the nature of frustration. The Christian's peace is a response to a message declaring a war to have ended (Eph. 2:11-22). Stoic peace results from learning not to care about anything – except, perhaps, one's own project of self-detachment and the wonderful order of nature; while the Christian's peace is based on hungering and thirsting for righteousness and finding it satisfied in a personal relationship with Christ.

The recent return of ethicists and theologians to an interest in character has caused us to rethink some divisions that once went unquestioned. In the thought of the classical virtue ethicists (Plato,* Aristotle,* the Stoics, the Church Fathers) there was no very clear distinction between moral goodness and mental health, between doing good and faring well, between living righteously and flourishing, between being moral and being happy. In this tradition a virtue is a realization or actualization of some aspect of human nature. It is proper and healthy for a hare to develop large and sensitive ears. It is in the nature of a hare to develop this way, and if an individual hare fails to develop this trait, it is to that extent defective as a hare. Similarly, it is in the nature of a human being to develop wisdom,* humility, self-control, gentleness and faith.* These traits and others are simply what it takes to be an excellent, flourishing, healthy and fully functioning specimen of humanity. Of course the biological analogy has limits: First, there is controversy about what human nature is, and thus about what the human virtues are, but none about whether it is natural for hares to have large, sensitive ears; secondly, merely biological developments occur without the organism's practising the trait or making any choices, while someone who develops a virtue must practise it and make the relevant choices; and thirdly, virtues require culture and tradition, but biological actualizations do not.

For Christians, another division that breaks down when we make character central to ethics is that between ethics and spirituality.* The spiritual disciplines of meditation, prayer, fasting,* almsgiving (see Giving*) and the rest, are just essential ways of developing and practising the Christian virtues. In the Christian tradition, ethics and spirituality are two angles on the same thing: the Christian life.

4. Psychotherapies

Character's connection with health also raises a question about the various psychotherapies (see Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy†) and the forms of pastoral counselling based on them and particularly their value in the development of (Christian) character. For many Christians, therapeutic techniques and concepts have come to play a significant role in their personal formation. How do these fit with the practices of Christian nurture? Most psychotherapies go far beyond being merely medical technologies for helping heal bona fide diseases, and are full philosophies of life offering ideologically-based ways of dealing with human ‘problems’ and general guidance in the conduct of life. In the present age psychotherapists have taken over the role formerly played by philosophers of supplying frameworks that supplement, clarify, and sometimes distort church teaching and nurture. Like Christianity, the therapies have their views of human nature, character ideals, ways of diagnosing failures of human functioning, and strategies for changing people in the direction of the ideal.

Assertiveness training, a therapy in the cognitive-behavioural mode (see Cognitive Behaviour Therapy*), regards assertiveness as a key to being a properly adaptive person (thus a cardinal virtue). Seeing that our lives go better if we are neither wimps nor bullies, this therapy trains clients in something like an Aristotelian mean between the extremes of passivity and aggressiveness. The training mostly takes the form of getting the client to ‘practise’ assertive behaviours in a variety of settings.

According to the rational-emotive therapy (RET) of Albert Ellis,* a human being is a calculating, satisfaction-maximizing individual, but for some reason we are beset by what he calls ‘nutty ideas’. We tell ourselves we can’t stand some of the circumstances we’re in, we ‘demand’ that they be otherwise, we infer from our failure in this or that that we are a failure in general – and predictably we get depressed and anxious, and hate ourselves. Therapy consists of correcting our nutty ideas and thus our emotions. The RET virtues are rationality, equanimity, self-acceptance and mutuality (this last is a sort of policy of ‘I’ll scratch your back if you scratch mine, but I won’t be anybody’s martyr-servant’).

The client-centred therapy of Carl Rogers* holds up as the ideal of character a kind of congruence of self-concept and actual self. Rogers thinks that neurotic people are basically fakes, trying to be somebody they really aren’t, trying to satisfy the ‘conditions of worth’ imposed on them by their parents, lovers, teachers, customers, employers and society in general. Therapy consists in getting clients to talk (and thus to think) honestly about themselves, to let down their masks and get in touch with their real feelings. The therapist accomplishes this through warm empathy and a non-judgmental attitude called ‘unconditional positive regard’.

The analytical psychotherapy of Carl Jung* also majors in self-insight and its transformative powers, but now the self in question is an unconscious psyche highly structured by universal forms of images called ‘archetypes’. Consciousness is only a small part of the human being, and true health, balance and virtue are to be found in listening to the unconscious. The unconscious psyche (which he calls ‘the self’ and sometimes identifies with God – for it is quite different from the ego) is wise about life and understands much better than the ego, or conscious self, what the individual needs. Psychotherapy thus aims to put the patient in touch with his unconscious, a goal typically pursued by having the patient report his dreams,* which are taken to be communication from the unconscious. The central virtue in the Jungian system is self-insight, and from it flow such other virtues as a detached and equilibrated sense of the terror and sweetness of life, wisdom, a sense of belonging to the eternal ages, equanimity about death, and willingness to let nature take her course.

The family therapies,* unlike any of the therapies previously described, tend to see us as ‘members one of another’, as constituted in significant part by our relations with other important people, especially our families. The family-therapy virtues are trustworthiness, justice, generosity, loyalty, gratitude and mutuality (not Ellis’ policy of ‘you scratch my back and I’ll scratch yours’, but a sense that you and I belong ontologically to one another, that our destinies are inseparable). That the fundamental concepts of relational health are ethical is made especially explicit in the approach of Ivan Boszormenyi-Nagy (1920-) (called ‘contextual therapy’). In their deeply communal conception of human nature, the family therapies are more congruent than other therapies with the Christian vision of persons, though some of them push our communal nature so far that they tend to lose sight of the individual.

All the above therapies and many others have been used by Christians. But they are not ideologically neutral (as one might think that psychotherapy, as a branch of medicine, ought to be). Instead they are, like Christianity, virtues-systems in their own right. Many of these are just as different from Christianity as stoicism or the egoism,* of Ayn Rand. A completely successful therapist (if there ever were one) would turn out people, not with Christian character, but with RET character, or Rogerian or Jungian character. In the interest of Christian character, secular therapies must be structurally understood as virtues-systems and their techniques and diagnostic models carefully detached from any ideological commitments incompatible with Christian thought and practice. This is a difficult and important task, requiring theological and philosophical skill as well as a knowledge of the psychotherapies.

5. Psychological types

Virtues come in different psychological types, playing different roles in the economy of character and serving different purposes in the pursuit of the moral life. Some virtues are mainly dispositions to behave in one way or another: thus gentleness, hospitality, generosity and truthfulness are evidenced chiefly in behaviour. Others seem to be in large part emotion-dispositions, e.g. gratitude,* hope and peace. Such virtues as self-control, courage, patience, forbearance and perseverance* are in large part self-management skills that enable us to think and act properly despite adverse emotions and desires. Others, like discernment and wisdom, are powers of thought and perception. Still other virtues seem to be primarily attitudes or ways of regarding ourselves and others: Christian humility is regarding ourselves and others as equal before God; Christian confidence consists in regarding all situations as 'manageable' because we are in God's fellowship; and Christian mercy* regards the offender in the light of universal sin (see Sin and Salvation†) and the atonement* of Christ.

Once we have observed these differences, we must also see the similarities and connections along the virtues. Compassion is an emotion-disposition, but it very clearly issues in compassionate behaviour: a person does not have Christian compassion if he only 'feels sorry' for sufferers. It is expected that gratitude for salvation and hope for the kingdom will issue in work for the kingdom. Self-control and perseverance will not be Christian virtues unless they are exercised in Christian hope and out of Christian gratitude, and aimed at the justice and peace of the kingdom of God; and none of the virtues can be exercised without a modicum of discernment and wisdom.

Like the features of a face – eyes, nose, mouth, forehead and cheeks – which by their juxtaposition give a face its general character, so the virtues form an interconnected configuration making up the recognizably Christian personality. But also like the individual face, which is distinctive in virtue of the particular shape of the eyes and other features, and the particular distances between them, so the virtues of the individual and the specifics of their interrelationships constitute this individual's particular Christian character. She (or he) may have her own style of compassion, in which gentleness is minimized; a protruding sense of justice, though her courage is a bit recessive; her self-control may be more oriented upon the desires of the body than upon her anger; she may be insightful into personalities but fairly blind to the intricacies of 'political' situations; her humility may take the form of a special sense of humour about herself.

6. Vice and sin

If our ethical thinking is oriented upon the virtues, we will think of sin not just as sinful actions, but more basically as vices* forms of failure to be the creatures God created us to be. For each of the virtues there will be one or more traits of corruption: corresponding to truthfulness is deceitfulness; to peaceableness, hostility and belligerence; to gratitude, ingratitude to God; to gentleness, roughness and violence; to hope, despair; to peace, anxiety;* and so forth. Just as virtues are forms, not only of moral goodness, but also of well-being, vices are not just moral evils, but at the same time modes of failure to flourish – forms of 'death' (Eph. 2:1).

In the Christian framework this 'death' which we have in Adam (Rom. 5:12) is fundamentally relational, because our life is basically communal – a life of fellowship with God and neighbour (see Humanity†). To be in Adam or to live according to his flesh (Rom. 8:5) is to be blind to God's goodness and deaf to his voice, unappreciative of his grace* and in disregard of the commandments which reflect his gracious will for us. It is to be blind also to the neighbour's nature as a beloved child of God and one for whom Christ died, and deaf to the call voiced by the neighbour's needs. In being out of 'communion' (in modern parlance we might say 'out of touch') with God and neighbour in these ways, we are also at odds with ourselves (since we are defined by these communal relations). We fail to be the human image* (Gn. 1:26) that God projects of himself (for he is 'love', 1 Jn. 4:8), as his intention in creation. All vice, Christianly interpreted as sin, is the failure to image God's nature as he projects it for us. For example, deceitfulness as a trait of character (a vice) is a failure to see, in the ones we are prone to deceive, the dear and respectable brothers and sisters of the kingdom that they are. It is a failure to see with the heart realities that can only be perceived with the heart, because the heart is corrupt. As such it is to be out of conformity with our own true selves as images of God, and thus to be in this sense 'sick' or 'dead'.

In this life, we are always spoiled in some degree. Though it is not impossible to display some compassion, some gentleness and patience and truthfulness and generosity, our virtue is always compromised by vice. This is why another central Christian virtue is contrition, the heartfelt perception of our own shortcoming enlightened by God's unspeakable mercy; and another is hope, by which we look beyond our present corruption to a time when, by that mercy, our character will be complete. The struggle for virtue is uphill and characterized almost always by suffering – by the inward suffering of frustration and disgust as we behold the contraventions of God's will in ourselves and our communities; by the outward suffering occasioned by our circumstances, which is almost always needed to impel us into serious efforts to take the path of sanctification;* and by the suffering occasioned by our Christian witness, which deepens us by casting us back on the resources of grace in the gospel, in the Christian community, and in ourselves (Rom. 5:3-5).

7. Christian virtues and the gospel

The Christian virtues, like those in other classical traditions, are aspects of the actualization of what is taken to be human nature. However, Christianity differs from other traditions in holding that what humans are has been revealed by God in the story of his dealings with humankind first as Israel, and then as the body of Christ. We are defined, as human beings, in terms of how God has dealt with us as a community. A theory of human nature can be formulated for Christianity, but if this is done it must be remembered that the theory was distilled from a story, and that the virtues are formed and maintained in us not by an inculcation of the distilled theory, but by remembering the original story. How is Christian character determined and formed by this story? In two ways: a. as a response to grace; and b. as imitation of God.

a. A number of the Christian virtues – notably the emotion-virtues of hope, gratitude, peace, contrition and joy* – are quite directly a response to the message that in Christ (i.e. through his incarnation, life, death and resurrection) we are forgiven, reconciled and given access to God, and invited to the banquet of his eternal kingdom. We respond in hope because of the future good that is in store for us; with gratitude because God is our gracious benefactor and we are eternally indebted to him; with peace because this story is about the end of the war; with contrition because the story tells us of the unimagined magnitude of our transgressions. Joy does not, perhaps, designate a separate emotion, but is a summary term for all these emotions (except for contrition) in that they are happy emotions. Obviously one does not respond with these emotions simply upon hearing the gospel, even if one 'believes' it; one's heart must be prepared by a yearning to which the gospel can speak, a 'hungering and thirsting after righteousness' (Mt. 5:6), a 'seeking' of the kingdom of God (Lk. 12:31). When one becomes deeply and habitually disposed to respond with such emotions as these to the gospel and to the presence of God construed as the one who is active in this story, then one has these virtues. The emotion-virtues occupy an especially central and basic place in the Christian system of virtues, since they are so directly a response to the Christian message. Virtues of will-power – such as self-control, patience and perseverance – are less directly responses to the gospel; but calling to mind aspects of the gospel is what gives Christian distinctiveness to the Christian versions of these virtues. For example, to control anger* at his (or her) neighbour, the Christian reminds himself who he and his neighbour are, in gospel terms.

Significantly, though, the NT does not call the Christian virtues fruit of the gospel, but instead fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22). This suggests that in the Christian view even the story of God's actions is not the ultimate or most important target of the Christian's joy, gratitude, peace and so forth. Essential as the story is, it is finally a vehicle for the activity of God himself, with whom the Christian virtues are forms of interaction. The word is not just about God and his kingdom; it is a word of God himself. Joy is joy in the Lord, gratitude is gratitude to God, peace is peace with God, contrition is contrition before God, hope is hope in God. If these central Christian virtues are dispositions to direct communion with God, it is not surprising that prayer is a central activity of the life of virtue. Christian character is not just shaped by a theory of human nature, or even stories about a paradigm individual, or promises of a kingdom to come; it is a responsiveness to a living word of the living and present God. In this respect Christian character differs formally from Stoic character, Aristotelian character, and all the therapeutic characters we have reviewed. Indeed, if the Fall* is fundamentally a falling away from fellowship with God (and the neighbour specifically as a creature of God), all these virtues-systems can be regarded as in part products of the Fall.

b. The Christian story also determines character by enabling Christians to imitate God. We imitate God perhaps most notably in our mercy (forgiveness); but also in our compassion, kindness, generosity, gentleness, humility, hospitality, peaceableness, truthfulness* and forbearance we show ourselves to be children of our Father, adopted sisters and brothers of Jesus Christ. These are largely virtues by which we relate properly to our neighbours or, within the church, to our brothers and sisters. They are various dimensions of siblinghood or – if we may Christianize the word – of friendship to humanity. Only by violating their grammar as Christian virtues can the virtues of friendship* be possessed in abstraction from the virtues that are directly a response to God's grace. The reason is that to have the attitudes required for the virtues of friendship it is necessary to take a certain attitude towards the other members of the 'family', so to speak – towards oneself and God. And the proper attitude is established in such virtues as gratitude, peace and hope.

The reader may wonder why we have said so little about two of the major virtues in the Christian tradition, faith and love. If we take faith to be assent to the essential Christian teachings, then faith is presupposed by all the Christian virtues; for they are shaped by the story from which those teachings derive. But faith may also mean, more richly, the Christian's entire, trusting relation to God, thus his or her joy, peace, confidence, gratitude, hope. That is, 'faith' may not denote a separate virtue; it may be a summary term for those virtues that are directly responsive to the gospel. Love seems likewise to be a summary term for a broad range of virtues. In so far as love is directed to God, it encompasses the virtues we have just mentioned as summarized by 'faith'; in so far as it is directed to brother, sister and neighbour, it summarizes what we have called the virtues of friendship: compassion, kindness, gentleness, hospitality, generosity, peaceableness, mercy and forbearance. 'Holiness' seems to be another such summary term.

8. The formation of Christian character

How does one acquire the Christian virtues? The short answer is: by practising the Christian life. If that life is communion with God, then a significant part of practice in the virtues will be prayer, for that is our central means of communicating with God. We have argued that the most fundamental Christian virtues are the emotion-virtues of gratitude, hope, joy, peace and so forth, because these are the most direct response to the gospel which shapes the entire life of Christian virtue. But if so, then meditation, or attentive thinking about the gospel and God's goodness and one's own place in the kingdom – i.e. setting one's mind on the things of the Spirit (Rom. 8:5) – would seem fundamental to deepening one's Christian character. Meditation is apropos of attitudinal virtues such as humility and mercy, as well. A number of the virtues – compassion, truthfulness, hospitality, gentleness – are behavioural, and here the obvious strategy is to perform actions exemplifying these virtues. *Fasting and similar spiritual disciplines of self-deprivation seem to function primarily as aids to meditation and prayer, as they remind us of our dependency on the Lord; but in themselves they, like other actions done explicitly for God, also bind us to him in friendship. Fasting also may be training in self-control. The self-management virtues (patience, forbearance, self-control, perseverance) are often put into practice in Christian actions, while prayer and meditative attention are strategies by which they are pursued. Just as Christian character is an intricate web of the different types of virtues, so training in the Christian life involves an interconnected variety of disciplines.

See especially: ANGER; BENEVOLENCE; BLESSEDNESS; CHASTITY; COMPASSION; COURAGE; COVETOUSNESS; CRUELTY; DISCIPLINE; EVIL; FAITH; FAITH DEVELOPMENT; FEAR; FORGIVENESS; FREE WILL AND DETERMINISM; GODLINESS; GOODNESS; GRACE; GRATITUDE; HAPPINESS; HATRED; HOLINESS; HOLY SPIRIT; HONESTY; HOSPITALITY; HUMILITY; HYPOCRISY; INNOCENCE; JESUS; LUST; MATERIALISM; MATURITY; MERCY; OBEDIENCE; PATRIOTISM; PEACE; PERSONALITY; PESSIMISM; PRIDE; REPENTANCE; RESPONSIBILITY; REVENGE; RIGHTEOUSNESS; SANCTIFICATION; SELF; SELF-ESTEEM; SHAME; SPIRITUALITY; SUFFERING; TEMPERAMENT; TRUST; VICE; VIOLENCE; VIRTUE, VIRTUES; WISDOM; WORLDLINESS.

Bibliography

Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics (ET, Indianapolis, IN, 1985); S. Hauerwas, A Community of Character (Notre Dame, IN, 1981); A. Macintyre, After Virtue (Notre Dame, IN, ²1984; London, ²1985); R. C. Roberts, The Strengths of a Christian (Philadelphia, 1984); idem, Taking the Word to Heart (Grand Rapids, 1993); idem, 'Therapies and the Grammar of a Virtue', in R. H. Bell (ed.), The Grammar of the Heart (San Francisco, 1988), pp. 149-170; Thomas Aquinas, STh 1a2ae 55-67, 2a2ae 1-170.

R.C.R.

Sexuality

God created man in his own image ... male and female he created them' (Gn. 1:27). In man and woman God creates not two different kinds of beings but one: humankind, created as sexually differentiated. Because this differentiation constitutes our human nature, we cannot come fully to know the significance of being human without reference to it. And although Jesus says that 'at the resurrection people will neither marry nor be given in marriage' (Mt. 22:30), we have no warrant to suppose that the bodily resurrection* will be anything other than a resurrection of those who continue to exist within the differentiation of male and female.

If humankind is to praise God with one voice, our creation as male and female sets before us a task: realization of the community within which and for which we are created. Only as men and women together, in harmony and oneness, do we become fully human and realize the divine image. This happens – in part and paradigmatically – in the marriage of a man and a woman. But the task extends beyond the marital union; it belongs to men and women who together are to form one body that shall be the bride of Christ.

Human beings are created from the dust of the ground, but, unlike the other animals, they also have within them that God-breathed spirit that orients them towards God and causes them to transcend earthly life. They are both finite and free – located in the natural world of time and space, but freely transcending it as historical beings who shape their own existence. Nowhere is this union of nature and history in human beings more apparent or more puzzling than in the realm of sexuality.

The sexual differentiation is, initially and fundamentally, biological. In order that the image* of God may come to its fruition in a community of those who are united yet different, we must be male or female (Karl Barth,* CD, III/4, p. 118). The biological foundations for such differentiation can sometimes be disturbed, but ordinarily our sexual identity is grounded from the outset in the chromosomal configurations that distinguish female from male (XX or XY). Out of that initial distinction others develop: differences in dominant hormones, in gonads (ovaries or testes), and in external genitalia.

In human beings, however, nature is never untouched by history, and the sexual differentiation is more than biological. It extends also to gender identity, where the distinction of masculine and feminine may be far more difficult to describe. For Christian theology, which thinks of human beings not simply as free spirits but as embodied creatures, gender identity must be grounded in biological sexuality without being reduced to it. Rigid role distinctions between men and women would reduce gender to sex, construing human nature as all finitude and no freedom. A denial that any gender distinctions may have an innate basis in our sexuality would lose the grounding of culture* in biology, construing human nature as all freedom* and no finitude. The importance of human 'embodiedness' for Christian theological reflection 'militates against any "new dualism" in which physical forms and differences have no correspondence with cognitive or affective characteristics. Arguments that the sexes must in principle be identical in all characteristics and capacities seem to presuppose that sexual differentiation is merely accidental in relation to some human essence abstracted from the physical forms in which it invariably must be realized' (L. S. Cahill, Between the Sexes, p. 84). In short, for men and women to be equal they need not be identical.

Granted this, it remains difficult to specify gender differences with anything like the precision that can be used in stating sexual differences. Certain differences may be innate – e.g. verbal ability in females and mathematical ability in males; aggression in males and nurturing behaviour in females (Cahill, p. 90). Some have argued that males and females have characteristically different modes of moral reasoning – with females tending more towards a morality of ‘caring’ that emphasizes webs of attachment, and males tending more towards an abstract morality of individualized ‘justice’ (C. Gilligan, In A Different Voice).

Certainly we inherit a set of culturally learned roles and expectations. These may be inculcated by those with authority to socialize us – parents and, perhaps, teachers. They may also be learned by imitation, as we turn quite naturally to those who share our biological sex. Biological differences alone cannot account for gender, and gender identity does not grow inevitably out of one’s biological sex, but there may be predispositions connecting the two. The fit is not tight enough, for example, to prescribe rigid role distinctions within a marriage; yet, the difference between the reproductive roles of men and women suggests that we need to respect gender distinctions tied to those roles. In their freedom a husband and wife must take up the task of building a union in which they remain distinct but united, equal but not identical.

1. Marriage*

‘It belongs to every human being to be male or female. It also belongs to every human being to be male in this or that near or distant relationship to the female, and female in a similar relationship to the male.... But it certainly does not belong to every [human being] to enter into the married state ...’ (Barth, CD, III /4, p. 140). Nevertheless, it remains true that within human history the community of man and woman is ordered towards the marital bond, which is the most intimate form of this community. Marriage is the lifelong union of a man and a woman, entered by their mutual and public consent.* As such it is the gift of God, who sees that ‘it is not good for the man to be alone’ (Gn. 2:18) and who wills that the human species should be sustained through offspring. Hence, marriage is a divine institution, though one that is worldly rather than ecclesiastical in its essential nature. It is established not by the declaration of priest or pastor, but by the consent of the partners.

For the Judaism from which Christianity first took root, marriage was a mitzvah, a religious duty, the means by which God preserved and sustained his elect people. Despite the high praise accorded marriage by Christians, especially when they were faced by gnostic systems of thought that disparaged the created world, it never became for them a duty. In the earliest centuries of the Christian era there were, side by side with affirmations of marriage, strong ascetic* currents of thought that refused to place the body in service of society (by bearing children) and sought even within history to live the unmarried life of the eschatological age (P. Brown, The Body and Society). This viewpoint is grounded in the desire for a life without division, oriented wholly towards God, a desire expressed already by Paul (1 Cor. 7:32-35). It gradually took shape in the view that, although marriage was a God-given and praiseworthy estate, the celibate life was a higher form of Christian faithfulness. Protestant thought in particular broke with that view, exalting marriage and refusing to distinguish higher from lower forms of Christian life. But even then marriage was not proclaimed to be a Christian duty, and the unmarried believer belongs equally to the eschatological family of God realized even now in the worshipping church. At any rate, the Christian norm has been that the deepest mysteries of one’s self,* which involve being male or female, are to be reserved for expression within marriage or, for those who understand celibacy (see Singleness*) as their calling, for dedication to God.

Many features of marriage – e.g. the way that intention to marry is determined, and the roles of husband and wife – may vary from one society to another. Nevertheless, Christian thought over centuries of development has tended to discern three purposes in marriage, which we may term procreative, relational and healing. These purposes are ultimately God’s, who uses us to care for others in the marital bond and uses that bond to shape and form our character in accord with his will.

a. The procreative purpose of marriage. Having created humankind as male and female, ‘God blessed them and said to them, “Be fruitful and increase in number ...”’ (Gn. 1:28), a blessing* repeated to Noah and his sons after the great Flood (Gn. 9:1). This is a blessing, not precisely a command; yet, it stipulates for humankind a task. God intends to preserve humankind towards the end he has appointed, and to that end children* are the natural fruit of marriage. To take up this task is to align oneself with God's creative work, with the blessing embedded in the created order. In marriage a man and a woman step out of their separateness into community; they turn towards each other. But the union they form is also, by God's blessing, to turn outwards in the child.

This norm does not come to fruition in the life of every married couple, some of whom may be without children because one or both of the spouses is infertile (see Childlessness*). Their marital bond is not therefore incomplete, since procreation* is not the only purpose of marriage. Understandably, however, they may be saddened by their infertility. Because they have no child to manifest their oneness, they will need to use their historical freedom to seek some other common work in which their shared life can turn outwards and be fruitful.

The family* formed when a marriage gives rise to children is itself both a biological and a historical community. Through the family we are embedded in the world of nature, are marked by lines of kinship and descent, and are from birth individuals within a communal bond. Hence, our sense of self is deeply involved in the biological bond. Parents are not simply reproducing themselves. When from their oneness they beget a new human being, equal to them in dignity, that act testifies to the truth that by God's blessing such mutual love can be creative of community. With the biological bond come obligations. Parents have the responsibility to serve before their children as God's representatives. Children are to honour and esteem those who gave them life.

The family is also a community upon which is laid a cultural, historical task: transmission of a way of life. Parents are to 'tell the next generation the praiseworthy deeds of the LORD' (Ps. 78:4). Similarly, the apostle Paul writes that fathers should not exasperate their children, but should 'bring them up in the training [paideia] and instruction of the Lord' (Eph. 6:4). That task of paideia, of nurture and inculcation of a way of life, is the calling of parents.

b. The relational purpose of marriage. According to the story told in Genesis, when the beasts of the field and birds of the air have been created and the man has ordered the creation by naming them, he finds no-one who answers to his own need for companionship. God therefore provides the woman as one who will stand over against him, in relation to whom he will come to know himself. She is brought to him and, in their sexual differentiation, they become 'one flesh' (Gn. 2:24). This bond and the companionship it provides – a bond used in Scripture as an image of the relation between God and his people – is of great value even if a marriage is not blessed with children (1 Sa. 1:8). Christian thought has generally emphasized faithful companionship as one of the purposes of marriage. Only in modern times, however, have the tenderness and passion of romantic (erotic) love (see †) been emphasized as integral to marriage.

Although our natural sexual appetites may lead us to this relation, they alone cannot create or sustain it. The satisfaction of biologically-given appetite alone need not involve a personal bond. At the level of appetite sexual partners might be nearly interchangeable, for it is their functions and capacities – not their person – that is desired. Erotic love, however, is personal love, desire not simply for a man or a woman but for a particular person. Eros desires not simply the pleasure* the other person can give, but union with that person. Hence, our sexual appetites are humanized and personalized only when taken into a personal bond of love (C. S. Lewis, The Four Loves, New York and London, 1960, pp. 134-135).

Christian thought has, therefore, opposed 'casual' sexual encounters in which partners become essentially interchangeable. In such an encounter no true relation of persons is established. Such an encounter is dehumanizing because it treats the giving of the body as if the person were not thereby involved, as if persons entirely transcended their bodies and were free to use the body simply as a pleasure-giving mechanism. By contrast, the Christian concept of the 'one flesh' union has reaffirmed the natural insight that personal significance must be discerned in our giving of the body-self.

Erotic love makes sexual appetite human; yet, eros itself must also be transformed if the relational purpose of marriage is to be fully achieved. Love must be joined with commitment of the will to fidelity. Thus, neither appetite nor erotic love has been sufficient to form what Christians call the institution of marriage. It requires permanent commitment. Such permanence – though its goodness may not always be obvious and though it may be difficult to achieve – is grounded in the will of the creator (Mt. 19:3-10). But for Christians it is also grounded in the gospel, which assures us that we may commit ourselves to the spouse as Christ has committed himself to his bride, the church (Eph. 5:25-32). As eros personalizes appetite, so agape – a God-given and Christlike love – commits one to keeping eros faithful.

Among the difficulties attending our understanding of the relational purpose of marriage is the relative importance of consent and consummation in formation of the marital bond. Paul does write (1 Cor. 6:16) that one who has intercourse with a prostitute (see Prostitution*) becomes ‘one with her in body,’ and he cites the ‘one flesh’ language of Gn 2. This seems, however, to be less a theory of what constitutes marriage and more an exhortation against unholiness, an argument that there are bodily actions incompatible with membership in Christ’s body. In the development of Roman Catholic thought in the high Middle Ages, theologians tended to emphasize the centrality of consent in the making of a marriage. By contrast, canon lawyers (who needed to be able to specify circumstances under which a marriage might be annulled) tended to emphasize the necessity of consummation (E. Schillebeeckx, Marriage, p. 287). The issue retains contemporary significance in those rare cases when two people wish to marry but will be unable to consummate their union. Can the relational purpose be realized under such circumstances and a marriage undertaken? It is probably best to emphasize consent of the partners, to hold that they consent to all that is involved in marriage (including sexual intercourse), but that the relation itself involves a sharing of the whole of life and is possible even in rare cases in which the union will exist without intercourse.

Christians have generally presumed that the marital bond should be monogamous, despite the polygamy* of some of the OT patriarchs. The Bible neither prohibits polygamy nor precisely enjoins monogamy. The apostle Paul does write that ‘since there is so much immorality, each man should have his own wife, and each woman her own husband’ (1 Cor. 7:2). Spiritual leaders (variously termed episkopoi, diakonoi, and presbyteroi) are required to be the husband of only one wife (1 Tim. 3:2, 12; Tit. 1:6). Other factors may have been more important, however, in the general requirement of monogamy. The relational purpose of marriage may be difficult to realize fully and the ‘one flesh’ union almost impossible of realization unless the marital bond is monogamous. Moreover, the fact that marital imagery is used in Scripture to picture both the relation of Yahweh and Israel and the bond between Christ and the church reinforces tendencies towards a monogamous union.

The procreative and relational purposes are held together within marriage. The relation of mutual love is not incomplete if a marriage is childless, nor is the marriage of those past childbearing years or the sexual intercourse of those who are infertile improper. Such couples still take up the task of forging a lifelong bond between those who need the companionship of one who is ‘other’ in sex and gender, and they must still seek ways for their union – as a union – to turn outwards. They conform, therefore, to the Christian understanding of marriage.

More questionable, however, have been instances in which the procreative and relational purposes are deliberately severed – not by the (divinely governed) accidents of nature, but by the decision and will of the partners. One of the reasons fornication* and adultery* have been condemned in Christian thought is that the partners in such unions cannot will that their intercourse be fruitful. But the procreative and relational purposes can also be deliberately severed in other ways. Spouses can aim at enjoying sexual relations while deliberately avoiding conception (contraception), and they may aim at producing children apart from their physical union in sexual intercourse (artificial reproduction). The former possibility has given rise to a long history of Christian discussion (see Birth Control*); the latter is, for the most part, a recent concern (see Reproductive Technologies*).

c. The healing purpose of marriage. Christians have often had to struggle against their own tendency to regard the sexual act as peculiarly sinful (see Concupiscence*). But even while struggling against such tendencies they have also needed to say that sexual appetite, like all appetites of sinners, needs discipline* and control.

Appetite, uncontrolled by mutual love, constantly threatens to disrupt and damage human lives. Erotic love, pursued even at the cost of broken promises and unfaithfulness, becomes an idol. Marriage functions to provide needed restraint and discipline as the God-given place of healing for our sexual nature. Although in the modern era this has received far less emphasis than the relational and procreative purposes of marriage, healing also is one of the ends towards which God works through the marital bond. This is essentially what Paul means by writing that ‘it is better to marry than to burn with passion’ (1 Cor. 7:9), and it is what theologians mean by the ‘quieting of concupiscence’. In learning the meaning of faithful love to one other person, a spouse, we gradually become more able to devote ourselves to the good of others. Our self-serving impulses begin to be healed. And in being loved in this way by a spouse, we find that some of our deepest anxieties – our fear of loneliness* and desertion* – are quieted.

Understanding marriage as a place of healing, we can see why Christians have characterized the marital bond not as a contract but as a covenant. The commitment is made by free human choice but is not to be terminated in the same way. For the institution cannot sustain and discipline us, cannot heal our sinful passions, if it rests on our feelings alone. Hence, for Christian thought there can be no such thing as a trial marriage (see Cohabitation*). Continued commitment to the bond is not to depend on what our desires may be at any given moment. Instead, the institution of marriage itself is to discipline, shape and transform those desires. In short, marriage serves to heal us when it begins to form our own love in the shape of God’s steadfast faithfulness.

2. Divorce*

The marital vow is a commitment, not a prediction. If it were the latter, no honest person could make it when considering the statistics about marital failure. As a commitment, however, it announces an intention to attempt a permanent union. We may sometimes fail to carry out our intentions, but that should not happen because we understood ourselves merely to be making a prediction (which has now been falsified); it should happen only with the realization that we have failed in a commitment. The difference between these two attitudes will have an enormous impact on the way we approach the threat of failure in marriage.

That divorce must be a serious matter for Christians is evident from the three purposes of marriage. Through procreation a child is born as the embodiment of the union of a man and woman. The child’s very identity and person are involved in their union. A divorce that ruptures the union must have profound consequences for the child’s sense of self. Likewise, marriage as a relation in mutual love answers to very deep human needs: to be able to give ourselves completely to another; to trust that we will not be abandoned whatever the future may bring; to know that we are not interchangeable with anyone else. Hence, marriage gives rise to a set of expectations that ought not be disappointed. Finally, marriage cannot function as a place of healing if we refuse its constraints and reject its disciplines. It begins to heal us only as we give ourselves to the bond and let it shape our character.

It is evident, therefore, that Christians could not regard divorce as good. But could it be permitted? And could remarriage follow? The church has always found it difficult to hold up God’s steadfast love as the norm for marital commitment and simultaneously to speak that same word of steadfast love and acceptance to all penitent sinners (including those who have dissolved their marriages and may wish to remarry).

Biblical texts have not been decisive here. The sayings of Jesus reported in the Synoptic Gospels lead in several directions. Neither Lk. 16:18 nor Mk. 10:2-12 allows any ground for divorce. But Mt. 5:31-32 and 19:2-9 allow divorce on the ground of porneia (a term whose translation is disputed; rendered ‘marital unfaithfulness’ in the NIV). Paul, while permitting a Christian to acquiesce in an unbelieving spouse's desire for divorce and, presumably, thereafter to remarry a fellow believer (the so-called 'Pauline privilege' in 1 Cor. 7:12-15), appears to establish (though on his own authority and not on the basis of a dominical saying) a stricter rule for believers. In 1 Cor. 7:10-11 he seems to deny the permissibility of divorce and remarriage* for a Christian couple. Although this passage has been interpreted to permit divorce in cases of desertion by one partner, that is not its probable meaning. Paul seems to permit a separation from 'board and bed,' but since he makes clear that no remarriage is permitted, he can hardly have in mind an actual dissolution of the marriage.

Is no more than a separation from bed and board permitted? Or, if this marriage has in effect ended, might not remarriage be permitted? Christian opinion (at the churchly level) remains divided on this question. For Roman Catholic moral theology* the actual bond of marriage cannot be dissolved, and, hence, no remarriage is possible for Christians. For others who hold that, although the bond ought not to be broken, it can sometimes break down, the answer will seem less obvious. The grounds for sanctioning remarriage, if there is to be remarriage, must obviously be the three purposes towards which marriage is ordered: the good of children, the companionship of mutual love, and the healing of sexual appetites and passions.

3. Homosexuality*

It is generally held that many people have a measure of flexibility in the direction of their sexual drive and that 2% to 5% of the population is predominantly homosexual in orientation. Modern science and medicine have reached no consensus about the causes of homosexual orientation. Among the factors proposed as possible causes are genetic determination, pre-natal hormone levels, disturbances in family relationships (e.g. a distant father), and culturally transmitted learning. It may well be that more than one factor is involved.

Biblical texts demonstrate an awareness of homosexual activity but pay relatively little attention to the topic. Most important is probably Rom. 1:26-27, where Paul uses as his example of God's wrath upon idolaters the fact that God has given the Gentiles up to 'shameful lusts' – both women and men exchanging 'natural relations for unnatural ones'. It is clear that Paul does not here make the modern distinction between an invert (for whom a homosexual orientation seems natural) and a pervert (who knows himself or herself to be constitutionally heterosexual but, none the less, engages in genital sexual activity with others of the same sex). But he does seem clearly to regard homosexual behaviour as contrary to the will of God; for he regards such behaviour not simply as contrary to the constitution of particular individuals engaging in perversion but as contrary to the nature shared by humankind.

Because there is relatively little direct attention paid in the Bible to homosexuality, some have argued that the general tradition of Christian thought condemning homosexual behaviour should be rethought (J. Nelson, Embodiment). We should, it is argued, judge homosexual behaviour by the criterion appropriate for evaluating heterosexual behaviour: namely, whether it is characterized by mutual love. Not the bodily structure of the act but its inner spirit is what should count morally. (One might also carry the analogy with evaluation of heterosexual behaviour further and say that such mutual love should be enacted within a monogamous union dedicated to permanence.)

Despite such arguments, and despite the little attention given to homosexuality in the Bible, there is a large biblical context of thought about sexuality which clearly regards heterosexuality as the ideal and norm for human behaviour. The relation of Yahweh and his elect people Israel, and the relation of Christ and the church, are both characterized with marital imagery. Still more, the creation of humankind as male and female is the fundamental form of human community and is closely related to humankind's creation in the image of God. To men and women the sexual differentiation is given not simply as a blessing but as a task: to forge a harmonious community that unites them without obliterating their differences. As the central and typical expression of male-female community, marriage calls one to that task. The first and second purposes of marriage discussed above provide the larger context that explains why heterosexuality has been the Christian norm. The homosexual relation is non-procreative, not by accident but in its very constitution. It cannot therefore be a sign that mutual love is, by God's blessing, creative and fruitful. And the homosexual relation resembles too closely the love of self that is forbidden. It does not seek to create community between those who encounter the beloved as 'other' even and especially in his or her body. From the perspective of this larger understanding of sexuality within Christian theology, any justification of homosexual behaviour – even in a stable, loving union – will have to recognize that it falls short of the Christian norm. Such justification might, however, still attempt to claim for its support the third purpose of marriage: healing and the 'quieting of concupiscence' (H. Thielicke, The Ethics of Sex, pp. 277-287).

4. Sexual variations

Unless one adopts the view that even within marriage all genital sexual activity must be open to the transmission of life, there is little reason to forbid husband and wife considerable scope for experimentation and play in their sexual relationship. The general rule will be that whatever nurtures and fosters the relational purpose of mutual love and companionship should be permitted, and whatever hinders or harms the growth of mutual love should be prohibited. Such a rule would, for example, prohibit a sado-masochistic relation in which one's pleasure depended on the infliction of pain. Sado-masochism is a subtle – but all the more dangerous therefore – perversion of the genuine giving and receiving that should characterize mutual love. Even consent of a spouse cannot justify the intent to harm. Such intent is, in any case, inappropriate within a relation that ought to enhance the equal dignity of a man and woman who together are to realize the image of God in which they have been created. Consent is also insufficient to justify paedophilia,* since no truly mutual love is possible when one of the partners is a child who cannot give and receive as an equal. Bestiality, in which one seeks gratification from an animal, must also be forbidden; for such behaviour is a flight from, rather than a search for, true human community between those who can make claims upon each other.

Christian thought has often condemned masturbation,* and the fundamental theological ground is clear. In its very nature masturbation separates sexual satisfaction from the giving and receiving that ought to characterize the mutual love of spouses. We know, however, that the sexual development of adolescents is often characterized at certain points by masturbation as a temporary form of sexual experimentation. The nature of the act is different in such contexts. It is not a rejection of the sexual partner who is other than the self but a step on the way towards that partner. To go farther, however, and argue that for an adult the practice of masturbation may usefully provide knowledge that one's 'wholeness need not depend absolutely upon a relationship with another person' (Nelson, Embodiment, p. 172) is to lose sight of the fact that Christians believe our sexual nature to be oriented toward male-female community.

Incestuous* sexual activity is that which takes place between persons who are relatives either by blood (consanguinity) or by marriage (affinity). Obviously, only those fairly closely related are prohibited from marrying, though the precise degrees of kinship are ordinarily specified in law. Prohibited degrees in ancient Israel are specified in Lv. 18:6-18 and 20:11-12, 14, 17-21. Today we know that children born from incestuous relationships may face increased risk of genetically recessive disorders or congenital malformations, but, of course, such knowledge does not lie behind the prohibitions in ancient Israel. In part, these prohibitions – and certainly those dealing with relationships of affinity – seem to aim at 'the avoidance of domestic discord by precluding the possibility of wedlock between persons likely to be members of the same household' (D. S. Bailey, Sexual Relation in Christian Thought, p. 144). This alone, however, will not explain the depth of feeling associated with incest between, for example, a parent and child. The taboo* captures something central to human identity. A daughter, who embodies the union of her mother and father, is not sufficiently 'other' to be her father's object of sexual love. In Summa Contra Gentiles (III.125), Thomas Aquinas* builds upon such an insight with a suggestion which, though certainly not the reason for the original biblical prohibitions, explores their deeper theological rationale: 'In human society it is most necessary that there be friendship among many people. But friendship is increased among men when unrelated persons are bound together by matrimony. Therefore, it was proper for it to be prescribed by laws that matrimony should be contracted with persons outside one's family and not with relatives.'

See especially: AIDS; ASCETICISM; BIRTH CONTROL; CHASTITY; CHILDREN; CREATION; DISCRIMINATION; DIVORCE; EQUALITY; FAMILY; FEMINISM; FRIENDSHIP; HEADSHIP; HOMOSEXUALITY; INCEST; LOVE;† LUST; MARRIAGE; MARRIAGE AND FAMILY COUNSELLING; NUDITY; NULLITY; PARENTHOOD, PARENTING; POLYGAMY; PORNOGRAPHY; PROCREATION; PROSTITUTION; RAPE; REMARRIAGE ; REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES; SEXISM; SEXUAL COUNSELLING AND THERAPY; SEXUAL DEVIATION; SEXUAL HARASSMENT; SINGLENESS; SINGLE PARENTS; STERILIZATION; SUBMISSION; TRANSSEXUALISM; TRANSVESTISM; VIRGINITY.

Bibliography

D. S. Bailey, Sexual Relation in Christian Thought (New York, 1959); K. Barth, CD, III/4; E. Batchelor, Jr. (ed.), Homosexuality and Ethics (New York, 1980); P. Brown, The Body and Society (New York, 1988; London, 1989); L. S. Cahill, Between the Sexes (Philadelphia and New York, 1985); C. Gilligan, In a Different Voice (Cambridge, MA, and London, 1982); P. K. Jewett, Man as Male and Female (Grand Rapids, 1975); C. S. Lewis, The Four Loves (New York and London, 1960); W. E. May, Marriage and Chastity (Chicago, 1981); J. B. Nelson, Embodiment (Minneapolis, MN, 1978); J. T. Noonan, Jr., Contraception (Cambridge, MA, and London, 1986); O. O'Donovan, Begotten or Made? (Oxford, 1984); P. Ramsey, Fabricated Man (New Haven, CT, and London, 1970); E. Schillebeeckx, Marriage (ET, New York and London, 1965); S. Terrien, Till the Heart Sings (Philadelphia, 1985); H. Thielicke, The Ethics of Sex (ET, New York and London, 1964); P. Turner (ed.), Men and Women (Cambridge, MA, 1989).

G.C.M.

Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy

It is important to see the 20th-century phenomena of counselling and psychotherapy in the context of the origins and history of pastoral care.

1. Pastoral care

Pastoral care is the practical outworking of the church's* concern for the everyday and ultimate needs of its members and the wider community. That concern has its mainspring in the love (see †) that God (see †) has for his people and for his world. There have been many attempts to place pastoral care in the overall calling of God to and through his people. For example, Jacob Firet's analysis of pastoring comprises kerygma, didache and paraklesis, terms derived from the Gk. NT and emphasizing the activities of preaching, teaching and practical application respectively. It is in the paracletic ministry (where the term paraklesis includes encouragement, exhortation and consolation) that we see the focus of pastoral care; this in turn may be subdivided into elements of the prophetic, pastoral (or shepherding component), priestly and physicianly. It is important to remember that under each of these perspectives, Christian caring will always have a missionary thrust: e.g. under the 'prophetic', see Jn. 4:15-42; in 'shepherding', see Lk. 15:4-7 and Jn. 10:16; in the 'priestly', see 2 Cor. 5:18-21; and in the 'physicianly', see Mk. 2:1-12. Each of these elements has both individual and corporate aspects.

a. Prophetic care. The twin call of the prophet was to warn of personal, communal and national judgment as well as to give promise of restoration and renewal. Jeremiah, for instance, anticipated captivity and exile for Judah in the near future and, in generations to come, the return to the Promised Land (Je. 13:19; 23:7-8; 30:3). Moses heard tell of a prophet who would come with godly authority (Dt. 18:18-19), and this promise was fulfilled in the life and teaching of Jesus (Lk. 7:16; 24:19; Acts 7:37). We can see this prophetic role in Christ's encounters in the elements of declaring, exhorting, challenging, confronting and calling to repentance. This function also pervades the early church and is picked up, for example, in the Pauline use of the word noutheteo ('to admonish, warn, advise or instruct'), in the context of Christian fellowship (Rom. 15:14; Col. 3:16; 1 Thes. 5:12).

b. Shepherdly care. One of the cardinal pictures of God in the OT is that of shepherd (Gn. 48:15; Pss. 23:1; 80:1; Is. 40:11) and this imagery of practical caring is carried over into his call to military and political leaders to act as 'under-shepherds' (2 Sa. 7:7; Je. 23:1-4). In the context of the faithlessness of the latter there is promise of a Messiah-shepherd in Ezk. 34:23-24; 37:24; Zc. 11:7-11 and 13:7. The fulfilment of this expectation is clear in the portrayal of Christ as the one who gathers the 'lost sheep of Israel' (Mt. 9:36; 10:6; 15:24) and who is the good shepherd (Jn. 10:11-18), anticipated in Ezk. 34:11-16. In Jn. 10 the shepherding metaphor carries a picture of a leader whose relationship with his followers is intimate, trustworthy, self-sacrificing, guiding, protecting and nurturing. The pastoral concern couched within this description is picked up at a number of points in the NT (see, e.g., Jn. 21:15-17; Heb. 13:20; 1 Pet. 2:25; 5:1-4).

Further, we see something of this pastoral commitment carried over into the consoling, comforting and encouraging actions of the early Christians, implied in certain uses of parakaleo (2 Cor. 1:3-7; 7:4-7; 2 Thes. 2:16-17; Heb. 6:18), in the guidance offered in the Pastoral Epistles and in the tender remonstra-tions of the Johannine letters. Again, it is important to see here the mutuality of the call to encourage, care for and shoulder burdens amongst the people of God (see, e.g., Gal. 6:2; Heb. 10:24-25).

c. Priestly care. The priestly strand in overall pastoral care has its precursor in the ancient company of the Levites, whose go-between function has been superseded by the highpriestly work of Christ, 'in the order of Melchizedek' (Heb. 7:1-28). Here, Jesus stands as the representative of the people before God, displaying, as fully human, his solidarity with the needy and, as Son of God, his divine calling. This aspect of his caring for humanity is seen in his identifying, mediating, forgiving and reconciling ministry. Without undermining the uniqueness and efficacy of Christ's death and resurrection, God's people are also required to live lives of sacrifice and service as the 'priesthood of all believers' (Ex. 19:6; Is. 61:6; Rom. 15:16; 1 Pet. 2:9; Rev. 1:6; 5:10). In this perspective, the faithful, motivated by the love of Christ, are committed to reconciliation* within the new community (2 Cor. 5:17-21; Eph. 5:1-2; 1 Pet. 1:18-23; 1 Jn. 4:13-19). The church has handled the consequent issue of individual and corporate sin (see Sin and Salvation†) in a variety of ways, including an emphasis on the accessibility of forgiveness* directly through prayer; the public acknowledgment of sin within the body of Christ; and the place of private confession,* absolution* and penance in the more Catholic and sacramentalist traditions (Mt. 16:19; 18:15-20; Jn. 20:23; 1 Cor. 5:1-13; 2 Cor. 2:5-11).

d. Physicianly care. The Lord God is shown to be the supreme healer (Ex. 15:26; Dt. 32:39; Jb. 5:18; Ho. 6:1) and his concern for the sufferings of humanity is lived out in the compassionate acts of mercy of Jesus Christ. The comprehensiveness of the Son's ministry to the needy is manifest in the Messianic declaration of Lk. 4:18-19 (see also Is. 61:1-2). Here we find a level of care* which is relieving, liberating and restoring, and which seeks to bring wholeness, often through miracles of healing (cf. Mt. 11:5), to every aspect of personal and corporate life. As with other strands of pastoral care, God's physicianly activity is mirrored in the healing* work of his followers (1 Ki. 17:17-24; 2 Ki. 20:1-11; Acts 5:12-16; 14:8-10; Rom. 15:18-19; 1 Cor. 12:9). This work has been experienced in a host of ways within the church, including co-operation with medical practice, the use of means such as the laying on of hands and anointing with oil, the setting apart of individual healers, and the release of God's power to heal through his gathered people.

2. The history of pastoral care

The prophetic, pastoral, priestly and physicianly functions of pastoral care are demonstrated in the exhorting, sustaining, reconciling and healing activities of the people of God down through the centuries. Within that history, it is a truism that the church, in its ministry of care, is affected by the mind-sets of contemporary cultures, including the perspectives of current psychologies. Christian response may yield to, resist or enter into debate with the pervasive views of the day, and that response will colour pastoral emphasis. Further, pastoral outreach is always influenced by pastoral theology (see Practical and Pastoral Theology†) so that examples of the church's care for the troubled are expressed from and through the range of Christian traditions.

In the pre-Constantinian period mention can be made of the Shepherd of Hennas, written in the mid-2nd century and addressing the problem of post-baptismal sin, and the letters of Cyprian (c. 200-58), Bishop of Carthage, penned to discipline and encourage the faithful during the Decian persecution. After Constantine,* the medical knowledge and hospitalfounding of Basil the Great (c. 329-79), the preaching and letter-writing of John Chrysostom* and the influence of Gregory the Great's (see Gregory I*) Pastoral Rule were outstanding examples of pastoral care.

Although within the Middle Ages pastoral care was tied to a superstitious sacramentalism, the practical spirituality* of Bernard of Clairvaux (1090-1153) and Hildegard of Bingen (1098-1179), and the commitment to the poor and outcast which characterized the mendicant orders of Dominic Guzman (c. 1170-1221) and Francis of Assisi* were godly beacons in a dark world. The Reformation, with its rediscovery of a biblically-based pastoral theology, saw a renewed emphasis on the various strands of pastoral care. For example, in the Fourteen Consolations of Martin Luther,* On the Cure of Souls by Martin Bucer* and the teaching of John Calvin,* we see the elements of reconciling, shepherding and church discipline respectively.

In the 17th century, key exemplars of pastoral care included Jeremy Taylor* and his practical manuals The Rule and Exercises of Holy Living (1650) and Holy Dying (1651); George Herbert (1593-1633), whose Country Parson (1652) stresses the importance of parish visiting; and, supremely in this context, Richard Baxter* and his Reformed Pastor (1656), with its aim to instruct and guide in order to 'acquaint men with that God that made them'.

During the Evangelical Revival, John Wesley,* influenced by Count von Zinzendorf (1700-60) and the Moravians, introduced class meetings, offering advice and comfort which, in turn, spilled over into relief for the poor, and 'bands', small groups of Christians who met to confess their sins and thus find forgiveness and renewal. If we include Wesley's best-seller on practical medicine, Primitive Physick (1747), we observe the full spectrum of pastoral care in his work: exhorting, sustaining, reconciling and healing.

Pastoral care during the Industrial Revolution, as well as stressing individual piety, turned a great deal of attention to relieving the disadvantaged, both directly and through social reform: the compassion and campaigning of William Wilberforce* and the Clapham Sect, amongst evangelicals, and the practical acts of mercy carried out by newly founded religious communities in the Catholic tradition, are examples of this emphasis within the 19th century. It was towards the end of this century that the 'pastoralia' of Baxter's day was further systematized into the emerging discipline of pastoral theology.

3. Counselling and psychotherapy: definitions

Before continuing the story of pastoral care into the 20th century we need to examine the rise of the secular psychologies, for it is the influence of these on the church that is the key to the current debate on counselling, psychotherapy and pastoral care. For our purposes, 'counselling' may be defined as that activity which seeks to help others towards constructive change in any or all aspects of life within a caring relationship that has agreed boundaries. It is important to see that there is overlap and continuity between counselling and psychotherapy. The term 'psychotherapy' is more readily used where the aim of 'constructive change' makes more deliberate and consistent use of psychological mechanisms and processes, and where the 'caring relationship' is put on a more professional basis (implying education, expertise, dedication, responsibility and membership of a relevant institution on the part of the therapist). Contemporary counselling is concerned with issues of training, supervision and accreditation,* and so the distinction between psychotherapy and counselling is becoming less sharply defined.

4. The rise of the secular psychologies

By the beginning of the 19th century, metaphysics was dividing into two strands: mental philosophy, concerned with the human functions of the 'mental faculties' – reason,* will,* memory and the emotions,* and the empirical sciences, which sought to examine the natural order by careful observation and controlled experiment. The rise of the secular psychologies behaviourism,* psychoanalysis,* personalism and transpersonalism* reflect four broad systems in which various attempts have been made to come to terms with how to view the inner and outer aspects of human nature.

a. Behaviourism. Behaviourism seeks to solve the mystery of humanness by majoring on the external and measurable. Its origins lie in an assumptive basis characterized by monism,* a belief that the natural world is made up of one impersonal reality; an extreme determinism (see Free Will and Determinism*) which sees all behaviour as rigidly tied to its cause; and materialism,* in the sense of regarding human beings as simply higher animals. Ivan Pavlov (1849-1936), John B. Watson (1878-1958) and B. F. Skinner,* important proponents of a purist form of behaviourism, have pioneered an understanding of learning theory through such concepts as the reflex arc, conditioning and the reinforcement of behaviour through rewards and punishment.

Other experimental psychologists, like Hans Eysenck (1916-) and Joseph Wolpe (1915-), have built on this earlier thinking useful theories for understanding and treating neurosis.* Much of this work has been turned to good use in behavioural therapy through relaxation techniques, the desensitizing of phobias, modelling so that feared tasks can be achieved, and training in assertiveness. More widely, a number of methodologies utilize cognitive as well as behavioural approaches, for example William Glasser's* reality therapy and Albert Ellis'* rational-emotive therapy. Attempts to change behaviour often lead to directive styles of counselling. As an overview, it is essential that the atheistic and reductionist* assumptions of behaviourism are not confused with research into behaviour and the use of behavioural methods in psychotherapy.

b. Psychoanalysis. In contrast to behaviourism, classical Freudianism investigates a person's inner life, assuming that the individual is the sum of his or her instincts. This time-consuming 'talking cure' seeks to be nondirective, although the analyst is undoubtedly a powerful and influential figure. Sigmund Freud,* the pioneer of psychoanalysis, stressed, in particular, that personality is based on biological drives that are mainly sexual in nature and that it develops through a series of inevitable stages during the first five years of life. Freud's views have been variously altered by subsequent analysts: his daughter, Anna Freud (1895-1982), amplified them, majoring on a greater importance for the ego and defence mechanisms;* Melanie Klein* and her followers modified them, developing object-relations theory and its emphasis on the first year of life; and, among those dissenting from them, Alfred Adler,* stressed aggression and the 'will to power', Carl Jung* openly acknowledged the supernatural in human psychology, and Otto Rank (1884-1939), argued that the trauma of birth is the origin of neurosis. Neo-Freudians, such as Karen Horney (1885-1952) and Erich Fromm,* see people as social beings and aim to help achieve inner strengths and improved relationships, adopting more 'here-and-now' and directive techniques. The late 20th century has seen the emergence of more eclectic approaches, combining Freudian, Jungian and Kleinian insights.

c. Personalism. Secular personalism can be broadly divided into humanistic* and existential psychology.* The first of these is prefigured in the 'understanding' psychology of the German philosopher Wilhelm Dilthey (1833-1911). Carl Rogers* and Abraham Maslow* are well-known advocates of a humanistic psychology which reflects Dilthey's emphasis on personal integration, besides insisting that people have all the inner resources needed for change. Rogers' non-directiveness and client-centredness, avowedly a reaction to behaviourism and Freudianism, have been hugely influential on the rise of the counselling movement in the 1940s and 1950s. Existential psychology has also been strongly influenced by European philosophy. For example, Søren Kierkegaard* has contributed to the thinking of Viktor Frankl,* whose logotherapy stresses meaning and the 'spiritual core' in human life, and Jean-Paul Sartre* has been a key mentor in the work of R. D. Laing (1927-89), with his anti-psychiatric stance and critique of schizophrenic behaviour.

As an overview, personalism emphasizes both the intrapersonal – the need for the client or patient to find self-esteem and a new autonomy – and the interpersonal – both in the counselling relationship and in a greater sense of responsibility toward others.

d. Transpersonalism. In recent decades, a number of humanistic and existential thinkers, seemingly discontent with human nature's inability to set its own house in order, have turned to transpersonalism. Here fulfilment is sought beyond the personal in the realms of the higher Self, Unity Consciousness, the Cosmos or God. This mystical search, aided by forms of meditation and deep-breathing exercises, ultimately encompasses a loss of a sense of self. Rogers, Maslow and Laing have all embraced transpersonalism; other exponents include George Gurdjieff (1874-1949), Peter Ouspensky (1878-1947) and Oscar Ichazo (1931-), each influenced by a range of religious traditions, including Yoga, Sufism, Buddhism and Christian monasticism;* and Roberto Assagioli (1888-1974), whose psychosynthesis, using techniques of imaginative journeying and music therapy, seeks ever-increasing peace and harmony at personal, interpersonal and transpersonal levels. Jung, although within the psychoanalytic tradition, is a transpersonalist of great significance to many Christian counsellors.

Although it is true to say that these four secular psychologies, in various admixtures, have contributed to the so-called 'newer' therapies (such as transactional analysis,* Gestalt therapy,* psycho-drama, primal therapy,* bioenergetics, cognitive therapy,* neuro-linguistic programming and co-counselling), the influence of transpersonalism, in particular, has been a powerful force throughout the later part of the 20th century, not only in counselling and psychotherapy but in the wider fields of complementary medicine and the alternative therapies.

5. Christian responses

Thomas C. Oden (1931-), the American theologian, has noted a failure of nerve on the part of pastoral care, from the end of the 19th century onwards, in the face of the rise of the secular psychologies. Broadly, Christian response to this rise has been one of assimilation, reaction or dialogue. More specifically, and depending on how the interplay between theology and psychology is seen, we can discern five positions in pastoral care and counselling: assimilative, eclectic, excluding, perspectivalist and integrational. There is, inevitably, some overlap between certain of these positions: for example, one who seeks integration will often exercise a circumspect eclecticism for pragmatic reasons.

a. Assimilative. In the early years of the 20th century, pastoral carers in the USA increasingly looked towards scientific psychology for fresh insights, while academic psychology, influenced by William James,* turned its attention to Christianity, thus spawning the discipline of the psychology of religion.* In the 1930s Anton Boisen,* who pioneered the training of ordinands in the setting of psychiatric hospitals, warned the emerging Clinical Pastoral Education (CPE) movement of the dangers of an uncritical assimilation of Freudianism. In the following decades pastoral counselling grew from a blending of mainly liberal theology and secular psychology. Seward Hiltner* has been an important figure in this new psychologically-based pastoral care, with his 'shepherding perspective' on healing, guiding and sustaining. The transatlantic influence of pastoral counselling, both through CPE and the work of key individuals, has been strong: the London-based Leslie Weatherhead (1893-1976), for instance, encouraged by his North American links, in turn backed William Kyle (1925-80), a Methodist minister who eventually founded the Westminster Pastoral Foundation in 1970.

b. Eclectic. Eclecticism involves a borrowing from a number of sources and is a widespread stance among counsellors and other members of the caring professions. For many, eclecticism is essentially pragmatic: methods that seem to work are readily employed, each approach being tailored to the client's particular needs. For others, the borrowing is a more circumspect affair where each methodology considered is carefully weighed from Christian perspectives. Examples of eclecticism include Paul Tournier,* who looked to Freudian, Jungian, Rogerian and existential insights, Howard Clinebell (1922-), influenced by cognitive, personalistic and transcendental views, and Frank Lake,* turning to a wide range of the 'newer' therapies.

c. Excluding. In contrast to the assimilative tendencies of the first two groupings, other Christians have adopted a theological position which rejects, ignores or plays down the value of psychological insight. There is an inclination so to emphasize God's special revelation in Christ that the wider concept of a God who reveals himself through the created order is neglected (cf. Gn. 1; Pss. 19; 29; 93; 104; Jn. 1:9; Acts 14:17; Rom. 1:20; 2:15; Rev. 4:11, as well as the Christological passages in Eph. 1 and Col. 1). There is a range of emphasis among those who have reacted to the rise of the secular psychologies, extending from one of general dismissal through to more particularizing views that point out the subversive aspects of alien methodologies. Examples within this spread include the Barthian Eduard Thurneysen,* who powerfully stressed the centrality of the Word of God in all pastoral conversation, and Jay Adams (1929-), whose nouthetic counselling (from the Gk. word noutheteo, 'to warn or advise') acknowledges debt to O. Hobart Mowrer,* the neobehaviourist, and Cornelius Van Til (1895-1987), the 'presuppositionalist' theologian.

d. Perspectivalist. Many Christian counsellors, psychotherapists and pastoral carers hold views that see theology and psychology as two valid disciplines which bring complementary understandings to human nature. Both are respected, but there is felt to be little or no overlap between them – either for pragmatic reasons, because life is inflexibly divided between the workaday world of psychology and the disconnected world of Christian belief, or for theoretical reasons, in that each stance is seen as mutually useful but disparate. There has been a great deal of productive thought given to this latter, ‘perspectivalist’ position as, for example, in the writings of Malcolm Jeeves (1926-) and Donald MacKay (1922-87), in the worlds of psychology and neuroscience respectively.

e. Integrational. Here there is a deliberate attempt to bring together psychological and theological insight into specifically Christian methodologies. The thinking behind this enterprise acknowledges that all statements of truth, whether moral, propositional or ontological truth, are descriptive of God-given reality. Further, it is argued that all disciplines, including theology and psychology, handle the raw material of that same reality and are therefore open to at least a degree of synthesis. In practice, the approach may be one of finding as much common ground as possible, or one that seeks to subsume psychology within the wider orbit of theological reflection. The quest is an ambitious one, and efforts to synthesize range through the complex theories of Lake’s primal integration, the more discursive observations of Toumier’s dialogue counselling, and the overtly biblical concepts of such as Gary R. Collins (1934-), John D. Carter and Bruce Narramore (1941-) in the USA. Oden, who later moved from liberalism to ‘postmodern Christian orthodoxy’, has been a particularly important bridge-builder between theology and psychology since the 1950s.

6. Christian approaches

In our survey of Christian responses to secular psychology we have suggested five broad categories. However, methodologies of Christian counselling are not merely the outcome of reaction to what is secular. As unthinking forms of assimilation and the more severely excluding views give way, one hopes, to dialogue and discernment, we can begin to see the pattern of distinctively Christian counselling more easily. There are a limited number of ways of viewing human nature, so it is not surprising to find Christian methodologies mirroring something of the emphases of behaviourism, psychoanalysis, personalism and transpersonalism. Although the atheistic and agnostic assumptions of these systems are plainly rejected, Christian thinking in the area of counselling can be looked at in terms of certain parallels. We can examine these trends under the headings of behavioural / cognitive, analytic, Christian personalist and Christian transpersonalist. In the wider context of pastoral care, we see the strands of exhortation, healing, sustenance and reconciliation coming to the fore in many of these methodologies.

a. Behavioural / cognitive. Among evangelical Christians there is a significant range of counselling approaches that attract the title ‘biblical’. Although, under this broad heading, there are key practitioners, such as Collins and Lawrence J. Crabb, Jr. (1944-), whose styles are more integrational, there are many, whose methodologies have been hammered out in relation to secularism and liberalism, who tend towards an ‘excluding’ position. Examples of this latter trend include the nouthetic counselling of Adams, the spiritual counselling of Martin Bobgan (1930-) and Deirdre Bobgan (1935-), and the biblical counselling of Scope Ministries, Oklahoma City. A number of these approaches have been gathered into membership of the International Association of Biblical Counsellors. By and large, these methods are behavioural and cognitive, stressing the replacement of wrong patterns of action and thinking with those based on scriptural principles. It is here that the exhortative and confrontational components of prophetic caring are most evident. To this end, many in this group use biblical texts prescriptively.

b. Analytic. A number of therapists have taken analytical theory and practice very seriously and have sought a measure of integration between these and Christian theology. Such practitioners include Fritz Kunkel (1889-1956), who attempted a synthesis of Freudian, Jungian and Adlerian thinking; Ronald Fairbairn (1890-1964) and Harry Guntrip (1901-75), who put forward less deterministic forms of Kleinian theory; and Ian Suttie (1889-1935), who pioneered a style of psychoanalysis which linked Christian love and forgiveness with healthy social interaction. More recently, it is the analyst's fascination with the 'journey back' that has stirred parallels among Christian counsellors. There is variety as the search for earlier and earlier traumata is made, ranging from the methods of prayer counselling,* healing of the memories and faith imagination, through Lake's primal integration, with its attention to birth and intra-uterine experiences, to Kenneth McAll's healing of the family tree.* It is in this subgroup of Christian approaches to caring and counselling that we find the greatest emphasis on certain gifts of the Spirit as an aid to discernment and direction. Although elements of exhortation, sustenance and reconciliation may be present, it is the pastoral perspective of healing – physical, 'inner' (see Inner Healing*) and through deliverance* – which predominates. These approaches are experiential and creative, rather than behavioural and cognitive. Besides Lake and McAll, proponents include Agnes Sanford (1897-1976), Anne White, Francis MacNutt (1925-) and Michael Scanlan (1931-).

c. Christian personalist. Although all Christian methodologies take note of human specialness in God's eyes, it is the personalists who help remind us most of our privilege as divine image-bearers. In making this crucial corrective there can be a tendency to be too optimistic about human nature, and thus a playing down of individual and corporate sin. Whereas 'excluding' approaches are inclined to neglect a theology of common grace, Christian personalism can be tempted to universalism. However, this development is by no means inevitable and is most readily avoided by a well-reasoned biblical theology. Christian personalism focuses on the relationship in counselling and, at its best, looks to scriptural models of encounter between one person and another. Further, this subgroup is the most representative of the paracletic tradition, where comfort, encouragement and sustenance are integral. In terms of method, the influence of the Bible is often formative rather than prescriptive: Oden, for example, has argued a parallelism between Christ's identification with fallen humanity and the counsellor's empathy;* and Donald Capps (1939-) has looked to the insights of form criticism for guidance in the shape and substance of the counselling process. Other well-known Christian adherents to personalism include Clinebell, and his growth counselling, and Tournier, one of the originators of Medecine de la Personne.

d. Christian transpersonalist. All Christian caring and counselling has its transpersonal dimension, but there is an important stream of methodologies which parallels the mystic quest of non-Christian proponents. Here the idea of an 'inner journey' towards union with God is fostered. As a guide on this pilgrimage towards maturity in Christ, the ancient Celtic practice of the 'soul friend' has been re-established in spiritual direction,* whereby a fellow Christian, lay or ordained, is available for regular advice and support. The priestly strand of pastoral care, with its bridge-building and reconciling work, is seen most clearly in this subgroup. The traditions of silence and contemplation, coupled with the reflective and imaginative use of Scripture, are crucial aids to devotion and spiritual growth. For the less discerning Christian transpersonalist, there are dangers of wandering towards Eastern monism* in one direction and occultic* contamination in another. As well as the writings of such Christian mystics as Julian of Norwich (c. 1342-1420) and John of the Cross (1542-91), the Spiritual Exercises (completed by 1535) by Ignatius of Loyola* and, most recently, the insights of Jung, are all important influences. Ignatian retreats and Myers-Briggs* workshops, based on Jungian personality types, are further tools for the inner journey. Among Christian transpersonalists who have sought a Christ-centred approach to Jung, Morton Kelsey (1917-) and Christopher Bryant (1905-85) are significant. The psychologist David Benner has contributed a valuable analysis of Christian transpersonalism from a broadly evangelical viewpoint.

7. Current trends in Christian caring and counselling

Whereas the 1960s and early 1970s were marked by a tendency to polarize concerning the links between counselling and Christian caring, and between psychology and theology, the late 1970s and 1980s have seen a much more rigorous critique emerge: assimilation and reaction have been giving way to dialogue. Four cardinal aspects are considered: professionalism, ethics, social concern and spirituality.

a. Professionalism. In 1963 the American Association of Pastoral Counsellors (AAPC) was founded with a firm commitment to professionalized ideals (see Professional Ethics*); pastoral counselling was to be the domain of the clergy and their training was to parallel that of other caring professionals. The concern expressed by Hiltner at that time re-emerged in the objections raised in 1971 by Robert Lambourne,* psychiatrist and theologian, who argued against the institutionalization of pastoral care in Britain. Lambourne's emphasis that Christian caring should be 'lay, corporate, adventurous, variegated and diffuse' was countered by Clinebell, who stressed the need also for professionally trained and accredited clergy as pastoral counsellors. Alastair Campbell (1938-), the pastoral theologian, has carried the debate into the 1980s, seeking to rescue pastoral care from 'professional captivity' and release it into the practical love expressed by the body of Christ. This discussion had earlier been influential on the founding of the Association for Pastoral Care and Counselling (APCC) in Britain in 1975, in that the APCC is an affiliation of individuals and organizations rather than a regulatory body. In contrast, the Association of Christian Counsellors was set up in 1992 to encourage accreditation and accountability.* The different views continue in the burgeoning number of training schemes within the churches and in parachurch counselling organizations. In this interchange, it is important that counselling is seen in the context of pastoral care, rather than that counselling is elevated as primary.

b. Ethics. Another aspect of the secularization of pastoral care has been the loss of an ethical cutting-edge: the pastoral and paracletic have been emphasized at the expense of the prophetic and nouthetic. In recent years, however, a better balance between consolation and confrontation has been achieved in a wide range of Christian methodologies. Here, the counselling encounter is more open to values, standards and meaning in encouraging responsibility and right choices. Ethical considerations for the pastoral counsellor include those of confidentiality,* the primacy of what is in the client's best interest (unless conflicting seriously with appropriate societal restraints), the avoidance of abusing a sense of power over the client and the discouragement of continuing dependency. Don Browning (1934-), in his commitment to dialogue between moral theology* and the social sciences, is perhaps foremost in recovering 'practical moral reasoning' in pastoral care.

c. Social concern. Individualism* has been a hallmark of many of the secular psychologies, and the neglect of social and political realities has also been widespread in pastoral caring and counselling. However, from the 1980s onwards many Christians have rediscovered the corporate and structural perspectives of biblical revelation, and a greater awareness of human context has entered the counselling relationship. Issues of justice (see Justice and Peace†) and mercy* in employment, living conditions, income, language and cultural background, and their impingement on the lives of those seeking counsel, have been more clearly seen. Questions of racism (see Race*), sexism,* classism and ageism have been exposed and challenged within the orbit of a pastoral care which aims to 'satisfy the needs of the oppressed' (Is. 58:10) in the name of Christ.

d. Spirituality. Paralleling, perhaps, trends in secular counselling where there has been a shift towards the transcendent, the later decades of the 20th century have witnessed a widespread revival of interest in Christian spirituality.* This phenomenon has many facets, including the charismatic and renewal movements, a fresh confidence in a biblical theology among evangelicals, and a reawakening of many in the Catholic and Orthodox traditions to the Word and the Spirit. This focus on spirituality has done a great deal for the quality of pastoral care and counselling in, for example, its stress on the call to Christian maturity, its opening up of a wide range of aids to devotion, and in a renewed emphasis on spiritual direction. Proponents as diverse in theological background as Kenneth Leech (1939-), Martin Israel (1927-), Gerard Hughes, Richard Lovelace (1930-) and Benner have all influenced this trend of exposing the theory and practice of care, counsel and therapy to the searching light of a Christ-centered spirituality.

See especially: ABUSE; ACCEPTANCE; AGEING; ANGER; ANALYTICAL PSYCHOLOGY; ANXIETY; BEHAVIOURISM, BEHAVIOUR THERAPY AND MODIFICATION; BEREAVEMENT; BIBLICAL COUNSELLING; BRAINWASHING; CHILDLESSNESS; CLINICAL THEOLOGY; COGNITIVE BEHAVIOUR THERAPY; CONFIDENTIALITY; CONTRACTS IN THERAPY; CROSS-CULTURAL COUN-

SELLING; DEFENCE MECHANISMS, PSYCHOLOGICAL; DELIVERANCE MINISTRY; DEMONIC; DEPENDENCE; DEPRESSION; DREAMS; DRUGS; EATING DISORDERS; EMOTION; EMPATHY; EXISTENTIALIST PSYCHOLOGIES; FAMILY THERAPY; FEAR; FORGIVENESS; FRANKL, VICTOR; FREUD, SIGMUND; GENETIC COUNSELLING; GESTALT THERAPY; GROUP THERAPY; GULLT; HABIT; HEALING; HOSPICE; HUMAN DEVELOPMENT; HUMANISTIC PSYCHOLOGY; HYPNOSIS; INDIVIDUAL PSYCHOLOGY; INHIBITION; INNER HEALING; INSTITUTIONALIZATION; JUNG, CARL; LAKE, FRANK; LEARNING DISABILITIES; LONELINESS; MANIPULATION; MARRIAGE AND FAMILY COUNSELLING; MENTAL HEALTH; MINISTRY; MORAL BEHAVIOUR, PSYCHOLOGY OF; NEUROSIS; PAIN; PSYCHIATRIC CARE, ETHICS OF; PSYCHOANALYSIS ; RAPE; RETIREMENT; ROGERS, CARL; SELF-ESTEEM; SEXUAL COUNSELLING AND THERAPY; SINGLE PARENTS; SUFFERING; SUICIDE; SUPERVISION; TOUCH; TRANSFERENCE; TRANSACTIONAL ANALYSIS; WELFARE STATE; WIDOWHOOD, WIDOWERHOOD.

Bibliography

R. Baxter, The Reformed Pastor (1656; Edinburgh, 1974); D. G. Benner, Psychotherapy and the Spiritual Quest (Grand Rapids, 1988; London, 1989); D. S. Browning, Religious Ethics and Pastoral Care (Philadelphia, 1983); A. V. Campbell, Paid to Care? (London, 1985); idem (ed.), DPC; D. Capps, Biblical Approaches to Pastoral Counselling (Philadelphia, 1981); D. E. Carlson, 'Jesus' Style of Relating: The Search for a Biblical View of Counselling', JPT 4, 1976, pp. 181-192; J. D. Carter and B. Narramore, The Integration of Psychology and Theology (Grand Rapids, 1979); W. A. Clebsch and C. R. Jaekle, Pastoral Care in Historical Perspective (New York, 1975); H. J. Clinebell, Basic Types of Pastoral Care and Counselling (London and Nashville, TN, 1984); G. R. Collins, The Rebuilding of Psychology: An Integration of Psychology and Christianity (Eastbourne and Wheaton, IL, 1977; Milton Keynes, 1987); R. A. Duffy, A Roman Catholic Theology of Pastoral Care (Philadelphia, 1983); J. Firet, Dynamics in Pastoring (ET, Grand Rapids, 1986); S. Hiltner, Preface to Pastoral Theology (Nashville, TN, 1958); R. J. Hunter (ed.), DPCC; R. F. Hurding, The Bible and Counselling (London, 1992); idem, Roots and Shoots: A Guide to Counselling and Psychotherapy (London, 1986) = The Tree of Healing Grand Rapids, 1988); M.A. Jeeves, Psychology and Christianity: The View Both Ways (Leicester, 1976); S. L. Jones and R. E. Butman, Modern Psychotherapies: A Comprehensive Christian Appraisal (Downers Grove, IL, 1991); F. Lake, Clinical Theology (London, 1966); R. A. Lambourne, 'Objections to a National Pastoral Organisation', Con 35, 1971, pp. 24-31; K. Leech, Spirituality and Pastoral Care (London, 1986); R. F. Lovelace, Dynamics of Spiritual Life (Exeter and Downers Grove, IL, 1979); J. T. McNeill, A History of the Cure of Souls (New York, 1951; London, 1952); H. R. Niebuhr, Christ and Culture (New York, 1951; London 1952); T. C. Oden, Kerygma and Counseling (New York, 1978); idem, 'Recovering Lost Identity', JPC 1, 1980, pp. 4-18; S. Pattison, A Critique of Pastoral Care (London, 1988); E. Thurneysen, A Theology of Pastoral Care (Richmond, VA, 1962); D. Tidball, Skilful Shepherds: An Introduction to Pastoral Theology (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 1986); H. A. Van Belle, Basic Intent and Therapeutic Approach of Carl R. Rogers (Toronto, 1980); P. C. Vitz, Psychology as Religion: The Cult of Self Worship (Grand Rapids, 1977; Tring, 1981).

R.F.H.

THIRTEEN

Life, Health and Death

The Nicene Creed speaks of the Holy Spirit ‘as the Lord, the giver of life’, underlining the Christian conviction that all life is a gift from God.

1. Life

God himself is described in both the OT and NT as ‘the living God’ (e.g. Dt. 5:26; Ps. 84:2; Heb. 10:31). As such, God gives life to his creatures. He himself gives to all people life and breath and everything else (Acts 17:25). When he takes away their breath, they die (Ps. 104:29). God is therefore the creative source of all life; all that lives receives its life from him.

The OT uses two Heb. words in particular (hayyim and nepes) which can both be translated ‘life’ in relation to human beings. They come together in Pr. 8:35-36, in which Wisdom says: ‘For whoever finds me finds life (hayyim) and receives favour from the LORD. But whoever fails to find me harms himself (nepes); all who hate me love death.’ Though sometimes synonymous, hayyim can be thought of mostly in terms of human existence – the life referred to in Ec. 5:18 (‘the few days of life God has given him’) whereas nepes, often translated ‘soul’, refers to humans as ‘living beings.’ When God breathed on his clay creature in the Garden ‘man became a living being’ (Gn. 2:7). (The Heb. nepes often corresponds with the Gk. psyche – the human self* or soul.)

In the NT, the Gk. word zoe corresponds with the Heb. hayyim. Alongside mere biological life (bios), zoe refers to life and vitality in the physical sense. Zoe can also refer to the supernatural life belonging to God which believers in Christ can receive and enjoy in some measure here and now, but in its fullness hereafter. The zoe aionios (‘eternal life’, 1 Jn. 5:20) is also the gift of God (1 Jn. 5:11-12). All life is thus God’s gift. So all human life has a sacredness and value.

The sacredness and value of life are also an implication of the biblical view that human beings, male and female (see Sexuality†) are made to reflect the image of God* himself. It was this conviction which lay behind the legal requirements in the OT story of Noah, in which God sets out the conditions for life: in a fallen, post-Flood world. That story illustrates the value to be placed on both animal and human life, but also the distinctions to be drawn concerning the degrees of protection appropriate to animals and to humans. The blood of animals is not to be needlessly shed; even when animals are used for food ‘you must not eat meat that has its lifeblood still in it’, for the life of the animal belongs to God. But innocent human life must not be taken at all. The reason given is that human beings are made in God’s image (Gn. 9:3-6).

From such passages and from the widespread prohibition against murder (see Ex. 20:13), the principle is established throughout the Scriptures that innocent human beings have an absolute right not to be deliberately killed. In the prophets we find reference to the heinous crime of shedding innocent blood (Is. 59:7; Je. 22:3; Ezk. 22:4, etc.) and the NT also appeals in strong terms against those whose feet are ‘swift to shed blood’ (Rom. 3:15 quoting Is. 59:7). Judas’ conviction was that he ‘betrayed innocent blood’ (Mt. 27:4). Human life is to be protected and respected because it is precious, and because ultimately it belongs to God. When Cain kills his brother as recorded in Gn. 4, Abel’s blood cries out to God from the ground, because it belongs to God.

The sanctity* of human life is clearly not an absolute principle in the Bible, because of the requirements of capital punishment* at certain stages of the history of the people of God, and the permissibility, indeed requirement, of war* in some instances. But what does seem to be an absolute* is the sanctity of innocent human life: that innocent human beings have an absolute right not to be deliberately killed.

It was this principle which underlay the doctrine of non-combatant immunity in the just war theory.* However hard it is to speak in categories of innocence* and guilt* in wartime, a distinction – certainly in the days before the possibilities of global technological warfare – could be made between combatants and non-combatants. The just war criterion of discrimination sought to give expression to this distinction. It was this to which Bishop G. K. A. Bell (1883-1958) appealed in the House of Lords in 1944 in his condemnation of the Allied saturation bombings of Hamburg and Berlin.

The right of innocent human beings not to be deliberately killed is also a key component in the difficult decisions concerning abortion.* Whatever other values need to be weighed in moral decisions concerning abortion, this has to be one of them. The human foetus (see Embryology*) from the beginnings of its life is indisputably human, and indisputably a distinct genetic being. Whatever personal status society chooses to accord to it, it is a living human being – and not only innocent, but voiceless. It seems therefore that it has a prima facie right to protection and to life. Any possibly acceptable decisions to terminate pregnancy* with the death of the foetus would in this light have to be understood within the category of justifiable homicide (see Killing*).

The respect to be accorded to human life also means that no individual may choose death, or seek to cause his or her own death or that of another. This is not to blame a suicidally* depressed* person who, in the darkness of one of the worst pains a human being can face, attempts to take or succeeds in taking his or her life. It is to say that the appropriate response to a suicidal mentality is not assistance in doing the deed (as some of the advocates of voluntary euthanasia* might propose), but the provision of medical and spiritual support to enable the person once again, for as long as God gives life, to choose life. To choose death,* whether one's own or another's, is not an option open to the Christian. It is a denial that the Lord of life is trustworthy in trusting us with life, and it is an assertion of human autonomy* which cannot be justified in the light of the biblical view that human life is dependent on God. Jesus' statements that he came that his followers might have life 'abundantly' (Jn. 10:10, RSV), and that it is not possible to 'live' by bread alone (Mt. 4:4) suggest a quality of life lived in relation to God which is God's gift, over and above natural physical life. This is the 'eternal life' of which the Fourth Gospel speaks. However, we need very great care in moving from this understanding of life's quality to the 'quality of life'* distinctions which are sometimes made in discussions about the beginning and ending of life. It is sometimes argued that because a person no longer has what is perceived to be a 'worthwhile quality of life', their life is no longer to be protected. However, such a person remains God's image-bearer, and in any case no one of us is in a position to judge the worthwhileness of another's life. As long as we are in the presence of a living human being, we are in the presence of someone whose life is precious and normally to be protected. That is not, of course, to deny the difficulties which sometimes surround the definition of death.

2. Health

Health,* according to Karl Barth,* is the strength for life. This definition needs, however, to be unpacked. Some people view health in contrast to 'disease', a pathological condition usually understood in physical terms. This leads to a minimal and physical understanding of health. Others contrast health with 'illness', a word used to describe a person's subjective perception of the disorder within themselves. Yet others define health in relation to 'sickness', which is defined socially in terms of a deviation from what society accepts as normal. This leads to a range of approaches to the definition of health, from the minimal physical aspects, to the maximal understanding of health as complete well-being at all levels of life, physical, mental, social, environmental and spiritual.

The maximal definition of health can be readily related to the biblical concept of 'shalom'. Often translated 'peace',* shalom means much more than the absence of conflict. Essentially a social rather than an individual term, shalom means wholeness, well-being, vigour and vitality in all the dimensions of human life. There are many places in the OT where shalom is linked to health. For example, Jeremiah writes: 'We hoped for peace [shalom] but no good has come, for a time of healing, but there was only terror' (Je. 8:15). The Suffering Servant of Isaiah suffers for the healing and atonement of the people: 'Upon him was the chastisement that made us whole [shalom], and with his stripes we are healed' (Is. 53:5). In the NT also the concepts of shalom and health are linked (Lk. 10:5-9; Heb. 12:13-14). In the Synoptic Gospels, the exorcisms and healings of Jesus demonstrate that he is the Messiah, the Prince of Peace, anointed to preach good news to the poor, to proclaim release to the captives, recovering of sight to the blind, and to set at liberty those who are oppressed (Lk. 4:18). Indeed, the NT word usually translated 'salvation' can also mean 'health'. Jesus is the bringer of shalom. Concern for an individual person's health and well-being needs to be set within this more social and corporate context.

The Bible points us to a holistic and dynamic concept of health which covers individual and social, physical and mental, temporal and spiritual life.

If this is coupled with a view that humanity (see †) is made to reflect the image of God, and that human beings are 'on the way' to true personal human life as they are in Christ, being renewed by his grace through the Holy Spirit, then Barth's definition of health as the strength for life – or, as Jürgen Moltmann (1926-) puts it, 'health is the strength to be human' – can be accepted.

If human life is God's gift, and health is the strength to be human, then a person's right to his or her health is a basic right (see Rights, Human†) which lays on each person for himself or herself and for others the duty of respecting and facilitating health. Just as God may withhold life, so he may withhold health – but we may not make such judgments on one another. Rather, there is laid on each of us an obligation to ensure as far as possible that we and others are able to live healthy lives.

This will need to be expounded in the light of our theology of the body as a temple of the Holy Spirit,* which lays upon us the responsibility for bodily care: nourishment, clothing, hygiene, housing, recreation, sports,* sleep and appropriate use of medication. It will take seriously a theology of community (see Community Ethics†), and the need to combat social structures which may impede health by fracturing community. The creation mandate of Gn. 1:28 leads to a theology of the environment and the significance of the natural order which requires us to take seriously the implications for health of environmental pollution, ecological devastation and climate change. There is need for popular understanding of the need for clean drinking water, the avoidance of toxic gases in the air, the enforcement of speed limits. All this needs to be set in the context of a theology of vocation, which may involve in some circumstances the risk to an aspect of health in the service of God. Concern for the health of the self has to be brought into line with a proper sense of self-denial, and a willingness to suffer and even forego health for some greater good.

The great costs of contemporary technological medicine require the involvement of government in the allocation of resources, and indicates the importance of government, local and national, as a limited and temporary provision of God for the furthering of justice in human society. The allocation of health care resources is at once a global question (see Global Ethics†), related to economic structures and international co-operation, a national question in the allocation of priorities in national budgets between health care and other social priorities, and a local question (which medical needs shall take priority?). Who may benefit when not all can benefit because resources are limited? Are resources to be allocated on the basis of quality of life judgments (see QALY*), or on the basis of medical indications, or random distribution, or first come, first served, or what? The role of the *family in health care is also important, especially in the Third World.

3. Disease, handicap and suffering

The biblical picture of shalom needs to be balanced by the biblical picture of a fallen world (see Fall*). Since the Garden of Eden, this world has displayed an ambiguity of beauty and brokenness. The harsh realities of struggle in this world are related in the biblical account to the alienation* between human beings and God which has led to alienation of human beings from each other, from their environment, and within themselves.

Sometimes ill health is related to specific sin (Miriam in Nu. 12; Uzziah in 2 Ch. 26:19). In other places we are warned not to assume that a person's suffering is necessarily related to his or her sin (Jn. 9:2; Lk. 13:2). Sometimes the sins of the fathers are visited on the children (Ex. 20:5). Disease, suffering* and death are part of the way things are in a sin-infected world. Our attitude to such distortions can itself be healthy or sick.

If health is the strength for human existence, even those who are seriously ill can will to be healthy without any optimism or illusions about their condition. They are, argues Barth, to will to exercise the power that remains to them in spite of every obstacle. Sickness is a forerunner and messenger of death. It serves to remind us, as Dr Robert Twycross (1941-) has put it, that 'a doctor practises medicine in the knowledge that eventually all his patients will die'. The same applies to the Christian ministry of healing.* Sickness is the 'inevitable encroachment of the realm of death upon the living space squandered and forfeited by man' (Barth). In other words, handicap (see Disability and Handicap*), disease and illness are painful and visible reminders that we live in a fallen world. Conversely, sickness can also be a messenger and forerunner of life beyond death. Christian faith takes the sting out of death, and opens up the hope of resurrection.* We need a view of suffering which acknowledges both its pain* and its goal. There can be a pain which heals, a suffering which is a sharing in the suffering of Christ. Part of the Christian understanding of growth to maturity* in Christ involves an acknowledgment that 'suffering produces perseverance; perseverance character; and character hope' (Rom. 5:3-4). Sometimes God's power is made known in our weakness (2 Cor. 12:9).

This reminds us that, though it is part of our human responsibility to live healthily, health cannot ever be thought of as an absolute. Nor is the absence of suffering life's most important goal. This side of the Fall and this side of heaven, the ambiguity of the human situation is such that handicap, pain and disease are part of the limitations of life. Responsibility in health care thus needs to find an appropriate balance between the encouragement, protection and preservation of life, and the relief of suffering. Natural physical life is not an absolute.

It is well to recall Bonhoeffer's* insistence that natural life is at one and the same time a means to an end and an end in itself. To absolutize life only as a means to an end (whether that be the common good, or the vision of God) leads to the 'mechanization' of life, in which the person's physical life is seen of value only as a means to some social or spiritual goal. Physical life then loses its significance. On the other hand, to absolutize life as an end in itself (which Bonhoeffer calls 'vitalism') separates life from the ultimate goals which give it meaning and significance. There is a tension and paradox to life both as means and as end; and our view of life, and of the medical practice appropriate to it, must avoid the extremes which make an absolute of one of the other.

Sometimes medical decisions are based on the belief that natural physical life is an absolute before which all else must be sacrificed. Because of increasingly sophisticated technology it is possible to extend life's length in a way which simply prolongs the processes of dying (see Death and Dying*), effectively mechanizing and so dehumanizing both life and death. It is not a doctor's duty to prolong life for as long as possible at whatever cost. A point of decision is reached when further treatment of a patient is no longer curative, and medical responsibility then shifts from sustaining life and making available the resources for living, to that of allowing a dying person to die, and making his or her dying as comfortable as possible. This is not a distinction between 'to treat' and 'not to treat', but rather a question as to what form of treatment is appropriate.

Christian concern for health care is seen also in a wide range of church-based ministries, from the provision of hospices* for terminal care to the exercise of charismatic or sacramental healing* ministries. All are ways of responding to the prayer of John 'that you may be in health' (3 Jn. 2, RSV).

4. Death

In one sense, death is the most natural, and in another sense the most unnatural, of events. We all have to face the moment when death brings us to the edge of our existence in this world. 'In the midst of life we are in death' says the Burial Service in the Book of Common Prayer. 'There is a time for everything ... a time to be born and a time to die' (Ec. 3:1-2). Death is a part of the way it is with living beings in this world (e.g. Jos. 23:14; 1 Ki. 2:2). In some parts of the OT, death is depicted simply as a natural part of human existence. Yet other strands in the Bible speak of death as a symbol of divine judgment.* There is something evil about death; it has a negative and unnatural component. When God said to the man in the Garden, 'When you eat of it you will surely die' (Gn. 2:17), the indication is that death is the divine judgment on human sin. For Adam death was not the end of physical life – it was a change of situation before God. The blessing, freedom and vitality of life in the Garden give way to curse, bondage, toil and alienation outside the Garden, with the way back barred by cherubim with a flaming sword. This biblical imagery foreshadows the way in which, in later writings, death puts on the clothing of a powerful ruler who holds sinful humankind in his thrall. Death becomes a power which can dominate the present life of an individual. Thus for Paul 'the wages of sin is death' (Rom. 6:23), and 'through Christ Jesus the law of the Spirit of life' sets believers 'free from the law of sin and death' (Rom. 8:2).

Death, then, functions as a sign of the judgment of God against all that is disordered and ungodly in life. Barth comments: 'The man who fears death, even though he contrives to put a somewhat better face on it, is at least nearer to the truth than the man who does not fear it, or rather pretends that there is no reason why he should do so. Since it is a sign of the divine judgment of human sin and guilt, it is very much to be feared.' However, in the ministry of Jesus we see him confronting sickness, disease and death. His snorting indignation at the grave of Lazarus indicates his sense that death is an alien intrusion into the goodness of God's world (Jn. 11:33). Yet, paradoxically, Jesus himself dies, and so in himself suffers death as the judgment of God. The NT faith affirms that those who by faith are 'in Christ' are freed from experiencing this judgment. For the Christian the 'sting' of death is drawn. He is no longer under threat of divine judgment. The last enemy is overcome. Death, in the death of Christ, is seen to be God's enemy, and God 'treats it as such by placing Himself at the side of man in the verdict there pronounced, and snatching man from its jaws by the death of Jesus for him' (Barth). Death remains for us as a sign of divine judgment. We no longer have to suffer the judgment itself.

Christian faith sees death, then, as ambiguous. There is a negative, evil and symbolic side to death, even when death's power is broken through the life of the Holy Spirit, but there is also a sense in which for the believer, death simply becomes 'falling asleep' in Jesus (1 Thes. 4:13).

Physical death is an enemy whose sting is drawn, though in physical experience we still all have to die.

This ambiguity is seen in the processes which are common in the experiences of those who know that they will soon die. Elisabeth Kübler-Ross's (1926-) studies of dying patients in Chicago illustrated the phases of emotional change from anger,* through bargaining and depression to acceptance, which are typical attitudes in terminally ill patients. The pastoral care of the dying and bereaved has recently been increasingly informed by such studies, recognizing the importance of the processes of grieving, both in the terminally ill as they contemplate their own death, and in the bereaved* as they come to terms with the loss of a loved one. The rituals associated with rites of passage can be powerful pastoral moments in the status transitions of life (baptism and marriage) and death (funerals).

The ambiguity associated with our understanding of death is also reflected in the perplexities surrounding the definition of death for the purposes of clinical practice. In the majority of cases, the cessation of respiration and the stoppage of the heart still remain valid criteria for determining death. But, particularly with the increasing sophistication of intensive care techniques, the possibilities of sustaining organ functioning through artificial means are now widespread in the developed world, and give rise to the need for careful criteria in the decisions whether and when to turn off machines.

Various criteria have been proposed. Joseph Fletcher* lists certain 'Indicators of Personhood', the minimum features which need to be present by which to affirm the presence of a living human person. Richard Mc-Cormick (1922-) offers the concept of 'relational potential', suggesting that life is to be preserved not for its own sake, but for the sake of other values such as personal relationship. When the potential for relationship is no longer present – such as in some severely handicapped people – the need to preserve physical life ceases. Other writers draw on the distinction between 'ordinary' and 'extraordinary' means (see Ethics of Medical Care†) as a way of deciding on appropriate medical treatment in the case of the seriously ill, and yet others, notably Paul Ramsey,* argue for a 'medical indications policy' which concentrates on a comparison between different forms of treatment available, and does not consider questions of a person's putative 'worthwhile quality of life'.

As we have said earlier, the choice of death, for oneself or for another, is not a choice that is open to Christian morality, with its belief that life is on trust from God, and that we are not merely autonomous agents. The pressure from the Voluntary Euthanasia Society in the UK, the Hemlock Society in the US, and similar groups elsewhere, however, coupled with the growing practice of terminating life in places like Holland, keep the question of the choice of death high on the social agenda (see Euthanasia*). As Twycross notes, the strength of the argument in favour of euthanasia seems to be based on two assumptions, both of which he challenges. The first is that terminal pain cannot be relieved – which is countered by the experience of the hospice movement. The second is that doctors must preserve life at all costs – a view we have already questioned. Both life and death are in the hands of God. 'I have come', said Jesus, 'that they may have life.' Christian moral judgments and Christian pastoral care need to be based on the fundamental assumptions that life is God's gift and therefore good, and normally to be protected, and that death is not open to human choice.

See especially: ABORTION; AGEING; AIDS; BIRTH CONTROL; BURIAL AND CREMATION; COMA; CONSENT; DEATH AND DYING; DEMENTIA; DEMONIC; DEPENDENCE; DEPRESSION; DISABILITY AND HANDICAP; DRUGS; EATING DISORDERS; HANDICAPPED, CARE OF; HEALING; HEALTH AND HEALTH CARE; HOSPICE; HUMAN DEVELOPMENT; INTENSIVE CARE; KILLING; LEARNING DISABILITIES; MATURITY; MENTAL HANDICAP; MENTAL HEALTH; NEGLIGENCE, PROFESSIONAL; PAIN; SELF-POISONING; SICK, CARE OF; SUFFERING; SUICIDE; TRIAGE; WELFARE STATE.

Bibliography

R. Anderson, Theology, Death and Dying (Oxford and New York, 1988); D. Atkinson, 'Care of the Family in Dying and Grieving: A Pastoral Approach', in R. Spilling (ed.), Terminal Care at Home (Oxford, 1986); K. Barth, CD III/2 and III/4; A. Fergusson (ed.), Health: The Strength to be Human (Leicester, 1993); E. Kübler-Ross, On Death and Dying (New York, 1969; London, 1970); H. Thielicke, Living with Death (ET, Grand Rapids, 1983); R. G. Twycross, 'Euthanasia', in DME.

D.J.A.

Ethics of Medical Care

Ethical reflection on the practice of medicine pre-dates Christianity. It can be traced back to the school of thought associated with Hippocrates (c. 460-c. 377 BC), who gave his name to the Hippocratic Oath.* In its original form the Oath involved swearing by pagan gods, but it has proved readily adaptable to other religious settings. Christians, along with Jews and Muslims, saw much to commend in this tradition, and the Hippocratic Oath has had an enduring effect upon Western medicine.

Despite the biblical reproach of King Asa, that ‘even in his illness he did not seek help from the LORD, but only from the physicians’ (2 Ch. 16:12), and notwithstanding the statement by a 2nd-century rabbi that ‘the best of doctors will go to hell’, Judaism has generally had a very positive appreciation of the art of medicine. It has seen medicine as an example of creative partnership between God and humanity. Some distinguished rabbis were themselves physicians.

Similarly, from its outset Christianity showed a keen interest in the practice of medicine. This is not surprising, given the prominence of healing* in the ministry of Jesus. Jesus presented his miraculous curing of the sick, exorcizing of the possessed and raising of the dead, along with the preaching of the good news to the poor, as signs of his Messianic authority and indication that the kingdom of God* had come (Lk. 7:18-23; 11:14-20). The concern shown by Jesus for the restoration of physical and mental health is consistent with the holistic view of humanity found in the OT, where God’s blessing usually includes a sense of earthly well-being and, not least, living to a good old age (see, e.g., Is. 65:13-23). Moreover, though the Bible preceded scientific medicine, it is not silent on the art of healing, and there are frequent allusions to the use of plants, oil, balm, wine, etc., for therapeutic purposes. Christians therefore readily recognized the worthiness of medicine’s goals, and from the 4th century AD onwards Christian medical institutions became widespread.

Attitude to the taking of life

The church soon found itself forced to reflect on aspects of medical ethics, particularly issues relating to the taking of life. Despite the Hippocratic Oath’s disapproval of the practice, abortion* was common in the Graeco-Roman world, as was infanticide* by exposure. The Church Fathers were united in condemning both. Despite this, they were not entirely agreed about the precise status of the foetus: we see in their writings the beginnings of two divergent views still reflected today. One strand of opinion insists on the full personal status of the unborn child from the time of conception, while the other strand makes a distinction roughly corresponding to that between embryo and foetus. Exodus 21:22-25, which refers to the hypothetical situation of a pregnant woman being accidentally hurt in a brawl between two men, with the result that a child ‘comes forth’, has played a significant part in this debate. It is not clear how this passage should be interpreted. If a premature birth is meant (see NIV), the implication is that the possible resulting death of the child is as serious as the death of the mother, both being covered under the penalty ‘life for life’. But if a miscarriage is meant (see RSV), the implication is that the life of the pregnant woman ranks more highly than that of the child, the loss of the latter warranting only a fine.

The LXX translators actually complicated interpretation of this passage further by introducing an extra detail: they made a distinction between the ‘formed’ and the ‘unformed’ foetus, only the death of the former deserving the ultimate punishment. This distinction fitted with Aristotelian views about the nature of the soul and the time of ‘ensoulment’, which were assimilated by important Christian theologians including

Thomas Aquinas.* He believed that the embryo was 'animated' successively by a vegetative, animal and finally a human soul. Nevertheless, those who took such a view did not thereby believe early abortions to be justified. They simply thought abortions which took place before animation of the human soul warranted less severe punishment than those which occurred after that stage. Until very recent times, there was basic agreement that life both at the embryonic and foetal stage was sacred and worthy of respect.

The impact of Christian ethical thought upon the history of medicine has very often been in terms of proscribing and opposing new developments. With regard to the advent of certain techniques like anaesthesia, narcotics in childbirth and vaccination, this has been misguided and unfortunate. But it has had a crucial and salutary role in affirming the conviction that the intentional killing* of innocent human beings is always wrong, and comprises no proper part of medical care. The word 'innocent' is important. Following exceptions to the sixth commandment implicitly made in the Bible, mainstream sectors of the Christian church have defended the taking of life in the circumstances of war, or as punishment for the most serious types of crime. The shedding of innocent blood, however, is consistently condemned in Scripture (see, e.g., Ex. 23:7; Pr. 6:17; Je. 7:6). Human beings are created by God, made in the image of God,* and redeemed by God: their lives should be held in precious regard by the rest of humanity (see Sanctity of Human Life*). While it is true that attempts to justify ending life within a medical context usually have the welfare of the patient in view, Christian ethicists have not traditionally regarded this beneficent motive as sufficient ground for overturning a deep-seated moral presumption.

Double effect

The fact remains that application of the principle that human life is sacred raises as many questions as it answers, especially in the modern context of fast-changing medical developments. Roman Catholic moral theology, which has provided the most systematic approach to medical ethics in the course of church history, has not been lacking in sophisticated concepts to deal with problematical situations. For instance, it has allowed the indirect killing of human beings through use of the principle of double effect.* In essence, this principle says that one is justified in permitting incidental evil effects from one's good actions if there is a proportionate reason for doing so.

A situation to which double effect is often applied is that involving a pregnant woman who has cancer of the uterus. Are doctors justified in removing her womb, knowing that such an action will result in the death of the foetus contained within it? The answer Catholic moralists have usually given is 'yes', because it meets the principle's fourfold conditions, viz.: 1. the action of removing the womb is not itself evil; it may be described as morally neutral; 2. the intention of the act, that of saving the life of the mother (the only life which can be saved in the circumstances), is a good one; 3. the good effect, relief to the mother, occurs at the same time as the evil effect, death of the foetus, so the latter is not being used as means to an end; 4. the life-or-death situation is grave enough to satisfy the criterion of proportion.

The principle of double effect has much to commend it. It attempts to steer a moral path which is neither unbendingly absolutist* nor thorough-goingly consequentialist.* It has the virtue in this instance of retaining an important rule (against the direct taking of innocent life) while allowing action which achieves the limited but significant good which can be achieved in a tragic situation. But it is difficult to avoid some impression of artificiality about double effect. What if the woman's medical condition is such that the only way to save her life is through a direct assault on the foetus (e.g. where the wall of her aorta is so weakened that it balloons out behind her uterus)? The mother's life exercises a moral claim which surely justifies such action, however regrettable it may be in terms of damage done to the foetus.

Another situation where double effect has been applied is in relation to the care of terminally ill patients (see Death and Dying*). Catholic moral theologians have defended the use of large doses of analgesic where the intention is to reduce pain, even though such drugs may have a suppressive side-effect on the respiratory system and possibly shorten the patient's life. Neither they nor other Christian thinkers who oppose the direct taking of life believe this commits one to the corollary that all possible steps to keep a patient alive as long as possible should always be taken. They recognize that there comes a time when the patient should be allowed to die, notably when the struggle to cure a fatal illness has been lost and imminent death seems certain.

Ordinary and extraordinary means

Another influential concept in the Catholic tradition has been the distinction between ordinary and extraordinary means. According to this a sick person is obliged, as are those who care for that person, to employ all the obvious available means of preserving life and restoring health. If a woman is diagnosed as having a malignant lump in her breast, it denotes an irresponsible attitude to her body not to have the lump removed. Ordinary means are all treatments which offer a reasonable hope of benefit and can be obtained and used without undue expense, pain or other inconvenience. But a patient need not feel bound to incur or impose on his or her family an impoverishing expense; nor feel bound to submit to treatment which would cause great expense and distress, and of which the benefits are uncertain. A man dying from acute leukaemia need not feel obliged to submit to chemotherapy if that holds out the possibility of extending life by no more than a year and there is a less than 50% chance of it doing that. He may accept such treatment if he wishes but others should not force him to do so.

The distinction between ordinary and extraordinary means is one which can be defended on theological grounds. It does seem to correspond in an approximate sort of way to a Christian attitude which consists of a readiness to accept both life and death (see Life, Health and Death†) in a positive spirit. Paul looked forward to life beyond the grave, but was determined to serve God as best he could all the days left to him on earth: 'For to me, to live is Christ and to die is gain' (Phil. 1:21). On the one hand, Christians regard life as a gift from God, a state of being which we should hold sacred and seek to preserve. Inspired by the example of Christ, they are able to see redemptive possibilities in suffering: God's strength can be made perfect in our weakness (2 Cor. 12:9), and his presence can lighten the darkest hour. The state of death is more ambiguous. Because it represents the 'wages of sin' (Rom. 6:23), death has negative and hostile connotations, yet these are 'swallowed up in victory' (1 Cor. 15:54) when a believer claims the resurrection promise of Christ. Where that is the case, death need not be viewed as an enemy to be averted at all costs; it too can be a gift from God, a merciful release to a life beyond suffering. A balanced view of this sort points to the appropriateness of a medical policy which seeks to save life whenever the prognosis gives cause for hope, but is ready to accept death when the prospects are dire.

However, the distinction between ordinary and extraordinary means also has its limitations. First, the issue is complicated by the fact that in some cases patients are incapable of communicating whether they wish extraordinary means to be used to prolong their lives. Decisions have to be made for the comatose (see *Coma) or mentally retarded. Secondly, the line between ordinary and extraordinary means is a sliding one which changes with the passage of time. At one time amputation of a limb was clearly an extraordinary medical procedure, but anaesthetics, disinfectants and artificial limbs have moved it from one category to the other. What would one say now about kidney and heart transplants? Thirdly, the distinction begs the question of whether the fact that death is diagnosed as imminent makes a difference. A course of antibiotics for pneumonia would generally be considered an ordinary means, yet for centuries the illness has been described as 'the old man's friend'.

Care of the dying and the handicapped new-born

A more helpful concept is arguably that provided by the American Protestant ethicist Paul Ramsey* in The Patient as Person. He commends a policy of only caring for the dying. 'Dying' means someone in an irreversibly dying condition. It is not enough simply to say that a patient has cancer. If detected in its early stages cancer can be arrested, and even where it persists may, with the aid of appropriate medical treatment, permit an individual several years of life. But when a patient is in the final stages of a terminal illness, and doctors know that they can now do nothing to arrest its progress, it is right that medical objectives switch from saving life to providing the best possible quality of care.* This will probably include the administration of drugs to relieve the pain caused by the illness; it may also entail not administering remedial treatment for a secondary illness which brings a certain death closer. The emphasis should be on care, on filling the final days of a patient with as much companionship and as little suffering as is practical (see Hospice*).

Another highly contentious issue is the treatment of severely handicapped new-born babies. Should their situation be seen as analagous to that of the dying, so that a policy of not intervening to supply corrective treatment is equally appropriate? Ramsey would say not necessarily. Certainly, where the extent of a baby's handicap is so severe that its death can be predicted as imminent, there is no point in carrying out futile operations. But the fact that a baby is handicapped should not be used as an excuse for neglecting routine operations and feeding procedures without which a child born with, e.g., Downs Syndrome or spina bifida will starve and die.

If an operation to remove a bowel obstruction is indicated to save the life of a normal infant, it should also be applied to a Downs infant. In an age when elimination of handicapped life is becoming an increasingly routine procedure at the foetal stage, Christians should be in the vanguard of those affirming the value of children born with severe handicap. But it has to be acknowledged that decisions about whether or not to treat are often extremely difficult because of the uncertainty of knowing how long a child might survive. At this and at the other end of life, it is perhaps more difficult than Ramsey concedes to identify when a patient is in a dying process. Nevertheless, his approach stands out as an attempt to apply rigorously medical criteria to decisions about treatment. He finds speculation about the future happiness of the children concerned invidious, in sharp contrast to another Protestant ethicist, Joseph Fletcher,* who takes an unashamedly utilitarian approach to such issues. Fletcher thinks that all Downs children would be better off dead and seems curiously blind to the fact that such children are renowned for their happy disposition, and often bring joy to their parents and others.

Commission and omission

In the work of Ramsey we see a Protestant engaging with a tradition of Christian writing on medical ethics which had been dominated by Roman Catholics, criticizing it, refining it but essentially emerging with some fairly cautious, conservative positions. Certainly he stands by the traditional view that, while allowing a patient to die may in some circumstances be right, active killing of the patient is wrong. However, this view has come under serious attack in recent years, mainly (but not entirely) from secular philosophers and medical practitioners. The criticism focuses on the moral distinction commonly thought to prevail between acts of commission and omission.

Critics of the traditional view argue that in taking a decision not to pursue a particular course of action (such as saving life) one can be as responsible for the consequence which follows (the death of an individual) as if one takes a decision actually to cause it. If a father who desired the death of his son discovered him drowning in the bath and omitted to rescue him, we adjudge his behaviour just as reprehensible as if he had pushed his son's head under the water. In a similar way (though now assuming the absence of any evil motives), a doctor should be prepared to accept responsibility for the fact that a decision to withdraw support or withhold treatment is likely to bring forward the timing of a patient's death. Moreover, it is arguable that a readiness to let die but not kill will lead in some cases (where pain cannot be controlled) to an increase in the patient's suffering. Arguments such as these have fuelled the demand for the right to voluntary euthanasia* over recent decades. In Holland, the traditional ethic no longer holds sway and the practice of deliberately inducing death by the use of barbiturates and other drugs is now widespread.

However, most Christian writers (and indeed the majority of senior figures in Western medical circles) stand by the distinction between acts of commission and acts of omission. A doctor who withholds treatment does carry some responsibility for whatever ensues, but it is unlikely that he actively seeks the death of the patient, and he does not usually know with any certitude that the patient will die imminently. His motive is not so much to hasten the time of death as it is to prolong life no longer. The nuance is a fine one, but the evidence is that it matters, psychologically, both to the medical profession themselves and to the public's perception of them. If the sphere of medical care comes to include the deliberate inducing of death, this involves a radical reshaping of the task of medicine. Fortunately, recent improvements in the quality of terminal care, especially the greater sophistication which hospices have developed in the use of pain-killing drugs, mean that few patients are now left to die in conditions of extreme suffering. One strong argument against legalizing euthanasia is that it might lead to a loss of impetus in the current movement towards better care for the dying.

Use of the Bible

The Roman Catholic contribution to the ethics of medical care is substantial. But it is open to criticism for being over-formal and too dependent on abstract principles derived from a rather narrow interpretation of natural law,* as evidenced by the way in which papal disapproval of artificial means of birth control has been maintained. A number of present-day Catholic writers on medical ethics, Bernard Haring (1912-), Charles Curran (1934-) and Richard McCormick (1922-), criticize their own tradition on this score. If Protestant and in particular evangelical Christians are to make a significant contribution to medical ethics (and thus far their record has been patchy), in what direction should they be moving? One hopes they will look to the Bible with confidence. But too much should not be expected from a straightforward appeal to biblical texts, partly because there is a scarcity of material dealing with the issues that are of most concern to us today, and partly because individual verses should not be wrenched out of context. The issue of abortion aptly illustrates the need to use the Bible carefully, imaginatively and sensitively.

Abortion was practised in biblical times, but the biblical writers do not explicitly address it. This is explained more satisfactorily by the likelihood that they regarded the practice as unthinkable than by any notion that they viewed it as tolerable. Jewish writers such as Josephus (c. 37-c. 100 AD) and Philo (c. 20 BC -c. AD 50) interpreted the thrust of OT law as forbidding abortion. There are certainly several passages in the Bible which indicate a high view of life in the womb. In Ps. 139:13-16, Jb. 10:8-12, Is. 49:1, Je. 1:5 and the nativity stories of Lk. 1, children in the womb are seen as objects of God's creative activity, loving care and special calling. Pre-natal experience is viewed as a crucial and continuous part of individuals' personal history. However, in view of the uncertainty surrounding the Ex. 21 passage (cited earlier) it cannot be said that the Bible unequivocally or directly states that the unborn child is of equal status to the child or adult. We are not told whether the early embryo has or is a human soul, or whether it awaits an eternal destiny. Claims made by some evangelical thinkers that the Bible demands an absolute anti-abortion stance go too far. Nevertheless, three factors taken together do suggest a strong biblical presumption against abortion, while allowing some room for flexibility in hard cases such as where the mother's life is at risk: the high view of life in the womb stated above, the strictures against the taking of innocent life, and God's concern for the weak, defenceless and those whom society considers of no account. But the latter factor is two-edged: it also directs concerns toward vulnerable women who may have been left unsupported in pregnancy by the heartlessness of others.

Principles in creative tension

It is in the development and careful application of theological themes present in the Bible that Christians can contribute most helpfully to the ethics of medical care. Often this will lead not to simple permissions or prohibitions but to recognition of a delicate balance of responsibilities, a weighing of respective duties. Take, for instance, the main themes of Gn. 1-3, that God is creator, men and women are made in the divine image, they are called to fill the earth and subdue it, but that there is a temptation to be eschewed which is to 'be like God' (Gn. 3:5). On the one hand, Genesis reminds us of our creatureliness and warns us against the assumption of God-like powers over life and death. This has definite relevance to current debates over artificial fertilization (see Reproductive Technologies*) and genetic engineering,* where the creation of an embryo in a glass dish can easily become a cause of human pride in technological* achievements, and where some would like to see the gametes of outstanding men and women brought together in order to improve the quality of the human race. On the other hand, the Bible makes clear that humans do share in God's creativity, and are called to act as responsible stewards in the world, harnessing its resources, improving its conditions and reducing human suffering. The development of a technique such as in vitro fertilization may well fall within the sphere of legitimate stewardship.* But it certainly poses some hard questions. How, for instance, should we feel about the malformed 'spare' embryos which are never inserted into a prospective mother's womb? Should they be taken as a sign that we are here meddling with matters we have no business to meddle with, or should we regard the death of such embryos as acceptable because it parallels the high wastage of embryos in natural reproduction? To possess a dual sense of humankind both as creature and as steward is helpful; it will not necessarily lead us to a cast-iron solution.

Consent and confidentiality

Another area where two worthy principles coexist in tension is that of consent.* On the one hand, doctors need to remember that someone who is sick usually still has the gift of intelligence, and deserves to have sickness and its possible cure explained. The principle of 'informed consent' expresses the conviction that patients should be informed about and consent to whatever medical treatment they receive. It is particularly important as a safeguard against their being used unknowingly in medical experiments, and finds theological justification in notions of human dignity and respect for human freedom (displayed, after all, by God). On the other hand, the urgent requirements of a person's body can render his or her status as a moral agent secondary. Concern about respecting the patient's wishes may sometimes fly in the face of what the doctor judges to be attending to the patient's needs. (A Jehovah's Witness refusing a life-saving blood transfusion provides a classic example of this.) It is to be hoped that the doctor has a certain professional competence, and so his or her medical judgments should be better than the patient's; and the doctor is bound by a certain professional ethos (see Professional Ethics*), and so is not free to do whatever the patient demands. There is thus a proper element of paternalism present in the relationship. This should be grounded in the biblical principle of love for neighbour, a love which stands by and continues to treat a despairing patient even when that patient cannot see that this is to his or her benefit.

Like consent, professional confidentiality* has become a revered axiom in modern medicine. It is certainly important. A mutual understanding that information divulged in the course of treatment will not be passed on helps to establish a relationship of trust between doctor and patient, and is crucial to the medical task of ascertaining all relevant information and making a correct diagnosis. A promise that has been made – either explicitly or implicitly – to keep information secret should be honoured, almost invariably. However, this prima facie duty could be overridden if its observance might seriously endanger others whom the patient has power to harm. Consider the cases of a mass murderer who confesses to a doctor but will not go to the police, or an AIDS patient who refuses to tell his sexual partner that he has contracted the disease. Exceptions to the general rule condemning dishonesty (failure to keep a promise being an extension of this) are permissible where human life is endangered: Ex. 1:15-21 gives an example of midwives who lied in order to save lives, yet received God's blessing.

Love and justice

In medical care, as in every other area of human life, the Christian should be guided by the primary principles of love (see †) and justice (see Justice and Peace†). The imperative to love constitutes a perennial challenge to improve standards and maintain commitment to patient welfare in our health services. Love implies both a warmth of relationship and a commitment to seek what is best for another, even when he or she makes that difficult. The imperative to be just, conversely, constitutes a demand to give others their 'due'. Of course, there are different models of justice: the egalitarian, the differential, the meritocratic, and the redistributive are perhaps the most common, and each are valid in the appropriate context. Which model of justice should be applied to the issue of the allocation of resources, where individuals and groups compete for services which are necessarily limited? This is a topical question with regard both to issues of micro-allocation, where, e.g., patients with renal failure compete for the same scarce resource (kidney dialysis), and to issues of macro-allocation, where different categories of patient (e.g. the mentally ill, those suffering from arthritic hips) compete for much larger but still finite resources.

With regard to the micro issue, most Christian writers who have written on this subject are agreed that considerations of wealth, status, occupation and family situation should not hold decisive sway in a medical context. Extremity of need is a valid criterion (though one that is not always easy to evaluate), but if that fails to decide the question, patients should be regarded as having an equal claim to treatment. It is then better to decide between them randomly rather than evaluatively, because that attests to their fundamental equality before God. Questions of macro-allocation are more complex: a random distribution of resources (see *Health and Health Care) between different types of sufferers is clearly inappropriate if these groups are of widely differing size. But the valid model of justice remains the same: one which prioritizes those in special need but has an egalitarian thrust in its concern that members of different groups throughout society receive adequate care. In particular, it is sensitive to the needs of minority groups who wield little social influence, e.g., the elderly, the seriously handicapped, the severely demented, and racial minorities suffering from illnesses distinctive to them.

A final example of the need for balanced theological emphases lies in the area of human possibilities and limitations. Human beings are sinful, and so naive optimism regarding medical progress and society's capacity to control dangerous developments is unwarranted. The 1967 British Abortion Act is a salutary example of a piece of legislation which was intended to be both progressive and restrictive, but is exploited in the direction of an all-too-casual disregard for unborn life. A clause which allows abortions to take place where continued pregnancy poses significant risk to a woman's physical or mental health was worded so loosely that anyone who finds her pregnancy undesirable and therefore stressful stands a fair chance of having it terminated – certainly in the private sector. In the USA, a 1973 Supreme Court decision (Roe v. Wade) has led to the widespread practice of an indiscriminate 'abortion on demand'. But alongside attitudes which regard human life as cheap, there are others which seem to defy the inevitability of death. In the words of Ecclesiastes, this is a 'chasing after the wind'. Nevertheless, the sober realism which ought to be the province of the Christian should be matched by joy in the many good things that medicine has delivered and is delivering. Where people are healed of apparently incurable illness and vaccinations are discovered to prevent diseases which once ruled in epidemic proportions, Christians can rejoice to see God's saving hand at work amidst human endeavour and ingenuity.

See especially: ABORTION; AIDS; COMA; CONFIDENTIALITY; CONSENT; COSMETIC SURGERY; DEATH AND DYING; DOUBLE EFFECT; DRUGS; EMBRYOLOGY; ENDS AND MEANS; EUTHANASIA; GENETIC ENGINEERING; HEALTH AND HEALTH CARE; HIPPOCRATIC OATH; HUMAN EXPERIMENTATION; IMAGE OF GOD; INSTITUTIONALIZATION; INTENSIVE CARE; KILLING; MEDICAL CODES OF PRACTICE; MEDICAL MALPRACTICE; PSYCHIATRIC CARE, ETHICS OF; QALY; QUALITY OF LIFE; REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES; SCIENCE; STERILIZATION; TECHNOLOGY; TRANSPLANT SURGERY; TRIAGE; WELFARE STATE.

Bibliography

A. V. Campbell, Moral Dilemmas in Medicine (Edinburgh, 1975); D. Cook, Patients' Choice: A Consumer Guide to Medical Practice (London, 1993); A. S. Duncan, G. R. Dunstan and R. B. Welbourn (eds.), DME; J. Fletcher, Humanhood: Essays in Biomedical Ethics (Buffalo, NY, 1979); B. Haring, Medical Ethics (Slough, ³1991); R. Higinson, Dilemmas: A Christian Approach to Moral Decision-Making (London and Louisville, KY, 1988); D. G. Jones, Manufacturing Humans: The Challenge of the New Reproductive Technologies (Leicester, 1987); S. E. Lammers and A. Verhey (eds.), On Moral Medicine: Theological Perspectives in Medical Ethics (Grand Rapids, 1987); R. A. McCormick, How Brave A New World? Dilemmas in Bioethics (Washington, DC, and London, 1981); O. O'Donovan, Begotten or Made? (Oxford, 1984); J. Rachels, The End of Life: Euthanasia and Morality (Oxford and New York, 1986); P. Ramsey, The Patient as Person (New Haven, CT, and London, 1970).

R.A.Hig.

Global Ethics

Global ethics defines moral responsibilities across political, social, economic and geographic boundaries to encompass the entire earth. The term assumes a transcendent commitment to care for human beings, nations and the environment throughout the world. Christians base a global ethic on God's creation* of the whole world and his declaration that it is very good (Gn. 1:31). All human beings are made in the image of God* and all of nature shows God's glory. The creation mandate to have dominion over the earth is God's command to steward (see Stewardship*) both the human and nonhuman creation.

Negatively, global ethics begins with the recognition that human sin has corrupted not only individuals in personal relationships, but communities, nations, the international order and nature itself. According to Paul, hope for redemption encompasses all creation because all creation is in bondage to decay (Rom. 8:19-23). Sin produces individual moral decay, social antagonisms, political conflict, economic injustice, international anarchy and environmental destruction. Global ethics seeks to understand the nature and causes of international moral problems and to find ways for individuals and communities to address them.

Global ethics and world evangelization

Some Christians argue that global ethics can safely be ignored because the only real responsibility of the church is to evangelize the world. Evangelization is understood to mean the proclamation of the gospel of repentance* and personal salvation (see Sin and Salvation†) through Jesus Christ. In contrast, other Christians suggest that global ethics is the gospel. God loves the whole world, and the coming reign of Christ is God's rule over all creation. Christians are to work now for the kingdom of God* all over the world, so that God's will is done on earth as it is in heaven. The work of God in history is understood as the progressive defeat of social sin all over the world leading to the triumph of justice and peace on earth.

These two views are extremes along a continuum. Global ethics includes both personal evangelism and social transformation. Personal evangelism should not ignore God's love for whole people in a global environment. Nor can those who work for social and environmental reform afford to ignore the personal need of individuals for forgiveness* and reconciliation* with God. The Bible knows no such dichotomy between personal and social ethics. Love (see †) knows no barrier between good news for the soul and good news for people who live in communities and the material world.

Global ethics is theologically grounded in the concepts of creation, covenant,* stewardship, redemption and hope* for the coming kingdom. It neither assumes nor denies the imminent destruction of the present world order. Hope is sustained by confidence in God's sovereign activity in the world. Work for global preservation, for justice and peace (see †), embodies the good news of salvation and reconciliation. It is obedience to the command of God to love our neighbour; it is respect for the earth that belongs to the Lord; it is a response to the love of God for us; it is an integral part of the proclamation of God's love for the world.

The causes of international conflict

Global moral problems have been variously attributed to the nature and activities of individual human beings, the nature and activities of modern nation-states, and the structure of the international political and economic order (cf. Kenneth N. Waltz, Man, the State and War). These three approaches each seek to define where international moral problems come from. In so far as they illumine the nature and source of the problems faced by global ethics, they provide a framework out of which moral responses can arise.

1. The problem rooted in individuals. Some see international conflict as rooted in the fundamental character of the human person. Whether the problem is defined as lack of knowledge (Plato*), instinct for aggression (Social Darwinists), lust for power (Bertrand Russell, 1872-1970; F. Meinecke, 1862-1954), greed (Erich Fromm*), or sin (cf. Jas. 4:1-4), global crisis is located in the individual decisions of human beings. Augustine* argued that war and injustice stemmed from human pride and lack of worship. He wrote: 'It is thus that pride in its perversity apes God. It abhors equality with other men under him; but instead of his rule it seeks to impose a rule of its own upon equals' (City of God, Bk. XIX.12). From the curse of male domination of women in Gn. 3:16 and the fratricide of the first brothers (Gn. 4:8), to the battle of Armageddon – where Babylon, 'drunk with the blood of the saints', is thrown down (Rev. 16:16; 17:6) – human beings have sought to dominate each other.

If individuals are the source of international exploitation and conflict, then it is individuals who must be changed or restrained to solve the problem. The world must be changed from the bottom up. Suggestions for how this may be accomplished cover a broad spectrum. Psychologists suggest conditioning and therapy (especially for world leaders), academics suggest education, and theologians suggest conversion. Some Christians see sin as an exclusively spiritual problem that can only be addressed spiritually.

Schemes for changing human nature range from Maoist attempts at massive indoctrination to capitalist hope in unfettered free trade. Erich Fromm indicates the scale of the problem when he suggests that the whole orientation of humanity (see †) which has existed for the last 6,000 years must be changed 'from having and hoarding to being and sharing' (The Anatomy of Human Destructiveness, San Francisco, 1973, p. 435). Only half in jest, someone has suggested that universal brain surgery is the only remedy for rooting out human aggression.

Pessimism over the possibility of changing human nature may lead to the rationalization of the status quo. But the luxury of accepting the current state of world affairs is possible only for those who benefit from the massive inequalities which characterize the world today. Reinhold Niebuhr* grappled with a pessimistic view of human nature and concluded that the only force which could counter an individual or group's selfishness was the self-interest of another individual or group. He saw the balance of power against power as the task of government. Thus, while the problems of global ethics were rooted in human nature, the solution lay in the restraint of selfishness by the State.

2. The problem rooted in nation-states. If solutions to global problems can be brought about only by national governments, then it is imperative to have the right kinds of governments. Indeed, many writers have attributed global conflict to flaws in the structure of individual states. It is undeniable that many international problems, from global warming, to a Palestinian homeland, to Third World infant mortality, can be addressed only by the concerted decisions of nation-states. Are there good States and bad States? If so, what kinds of States are good?

Operating from a faith in the all-powerful sovereignty of God, the Heb. prophets attributed the well-being of Israel and Judah to the level of justice practised in the States' social institutions. For example, Isaiah declared to Judah that her attempts to balance the power of Assyrian imperialism by alliance with Egypt were in vain because her own lack of social justice made her ripe for judgment (Is. 10:1-4). Not only security from enemies, but the well-being of the whole world was at stake. Isaiah also believed that social injustice affected all of nature (Is. 24:4-6).

In ancient times, writers as diverse as Plato and Confucius (551-479 BC; see Confucian Ethics*) identified the well-being of the people with the justice of their rulers. More recently the structure of government has been identified as the key to global peace and justice. Immanuel Kant* believed that the spread of democratic or republican States would lead to the agreement of all States to be governed by a common code of just laws. Many 19th-century social reformers believed that when working-class people got the vote, all politics would be changed because aristocrats and capitalists would be voted out of office. Karl Marx* affirmed that when all States were socialist, governments would wither away and conflict would disappear.

The spread of democracy was the key to peace according to Woodrow Wilson (1856-1924), and the First World War was the war to end all wars. But from the perspective of rising nationalism* in the Third World, it was Western imperialism that threatened the emerging nations. The Second World War embroiled the world in a conflict with the racist powers of Fascism. But with the defeat of Fascism and the unravelling of the Western colonial empires, communism* was seen as the new evil that threatened to engulf the earth. In 1953, Richard Nixon (1913-) said, 'If it were not for the communist threat, the free world could live at peace.'

With the break-up of the Soviet empire, many in the West express hope that the spread of free-market capitalism* will lead to justice and peace. But in many poor nations, capitalist development has increased the grinding poverty* of the many while enriching the few, and led to unprecedented environmental destruction. While capitalism seems to have won the Cold War in the East-West conflict, the majority of the world remains trapped in poverty.

It is the perceived exploitation of the poor by the rich nations of the world which adds fuel to the political crisis in the Middle East. The accident of oil divides the rich Arab nations from the poor and allies the rich with the West. In this context, many Muslims see 'Christian' or godless capitalism as the major opponent to justice and peace. It is the Northern powers who extract wealth from the South and greedily consume most of the world's resources.

The second half of the 20th century has seen a continuing decline in the earning power of the poorest countries of the world (the South), while the economies of the industrialized Northern countries have continued to grow. This is commonly referred to as the 'North-South Divide'. The Brandt Commission (see Brandt Report*) summarized the plight of the poor countries as follows: 'The developing countries today are, with few exceptions, in a desperate plight. With the prices of commodities – the main exports of many countries – at their lowest level for over thirty years, recession and protectionism affecting their exports of manufactures, a slowing up in the flow of commercial capital and aid, their balance of payments problems have reached intolerable proportions. Cutting back on growth is the order of the day – for those countries which have been growing. For numerous countries – especially in Sub-Saharan Africa, where there has been no growth in recent years – lack of capacity to import translates directly into increased hardship, even threatened starvation, for tens of millions of the most vulnerable people' (W. Brandt [chairperson], Common Crisis, North-South: Co-operation for World Recovery, London and New York, 1983, p. 18).

The war between Iraq and the USA and its allies provoked strong emotions in the Muslim world, because Saddam Hussein (1937-) is seen as the only Muslim strong enough to stand against the dominance of the decadent West. Many Muslims around the world perceive Israeli possession of Palestinian lands as of far greater significance than Iraq's annexation of Kuwait. While Saddam may be feared, he is also admired for his ability to challenge what is seen as an unjust status quo. Successive characterizations of American presidents as 'Satan' indicate that many Muslims see the West as an evil power arrayed against the godly forces of Islam.

In contrast, Western writers are more likely to see Saddam Hussein simply as a brutal dictator, whose aggression threatened all nations too small to defend themselves. Control of oil resources is important but secondary to the maintenance of a world order (see International Order*) in which States are sovereign and a free market regulates the flow of resources. Militant Islam is seen as an irrational (fanatical) opponent to peace and world order. The USA, even when acting under the authority of the UN, was perceived during the Gulf crisis as a global police officer, defending world order against the chaos of the law of the jungle.

The dispute over whether the world is evolving towards democratic capitalism or some form of socialism used to dominate the East-West conflict. Neither system has demonstrated an ability to overcome conflict, poverty or the environmental crisis (see Environment*). The resurgence of Islam, which began with the Iranian revolution in 1979, opposes both systems and suggests a theocratic alternative. But Islam holds little attraction outside of Muslim countries.

It is doubtful whether there is any one, 'good', political system that is appropriate for all countries. A Christian understanding of the universality of sin underlines the presence of evil* in even the best political systems. Similarly, the conviction that all human beings are made in the image of God should lead us to look for good in the most unlikely places. Nevertheless, the conviction that it is evil governments who make war, exploit the poor, and degrade the environment is not without basis. The totalitarian impulse toward self-deification has brought immeasurable suffering in the 20th century.

3. The problem rooted in the international system. Many political scientists believe that conflict in international relations is predominantly caused not by the characteristics of individual people or States, but by the international system. Three different theories account for global problems in the international system. These theories are referred to as political realism, complex interdependence and dependency theory.

a. Political realism. The dominant metaphor in political realism (see Realpolitik*) is the security dilemma. Political realism begins with the observation of Machiavelli (1469-1527) that politics is not dominated by the search for justice, but is the art of survival, by any means necessary.

Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679) suggested that the natural state of humanity is the law of the jungle, 'the war of every man against every man.' To escape that 'state of nature', human beings form a social contract* and create a 'leviathan', a government which rules by law with sufficient power* to enforce the contract on all members of society. Submission to a powerful government is the cost of escaping the state of nature, according to Hobbes. In international relations, however, there is no social contract, no powerful government and no enforceable law. International relations is still in the state of nature where nations face each other like gladiators and survival is the ultimate value. Raw power determines the division of resources.

Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712-78) suggested that conflict between nations is inevitable, even between good States with ideal forms of government. He argued that the will of a State,* which is the general will in relation to its subjects, is only a particular will in relation to other States. Rousseau's parable of the stag hunt illustrates his point. Five starving people band together to hunt a stag. When they have the stag surrounded, one of the men sees a hare. By catching the hare to ensure his own survival, he abandons the stag hunt and the stag escapes. The point is that where survival is at stake, rational self-interest takes precedence over the interests of the group.

According to political realism, international relations is a self-help, anarchic system. Hobbes argued that where there is no law, there is no morality, there is only survival. Without an enforceable law between States in the international system, nations exist in a 'state of nature' where each must survive by any means necessary. According to Hobbes, the state of nature is a condition of war. Rousseau advocated the formation of a world government to enforce a social contract between all nations, thus doing away with the state of nature. This idea has proved politically impossible because of the dangers it imposes and the lack of any global consensus on the form it should take. The UN is only a pale shadow of what it would take to eliminate the international state of nature.

Before the Treaty of Westphalia (1648), the Wars of Religion were fought to try to enforce a universal definition of Christianity which could unify the nations of Europe. Westphalia brought a new international order by recognizing the sovereignty of each State to rule without interference within its own boundaries. The idea of sovereignty as a basis for international order was a great step beyond the horror of absolute war between militant ideologies. But it did nothing to allay the perception of global politics as a state of nature. According to realism, the behaviour of sovereign nations is best explained by balance-of-power theory.

The dominant metaphors of political realism have been extensively criticized as overly abstract, pessimistic and simplistic. Moreover, its perspective on the world may be selffulfilling; if enough people think about the world from a 'realist' perspective, that is the way nation-states will behave. At least in the realm of politics, global ethics will have no meaning except as a language of rationalization for activities that are really ruled by self-interest. Social problems such as racism, sexism and over-population; economic problems such as poverty and injustice; political conflicts over religion, human rights (see Rights, Human*), control of resources and forms of government; and world-wide environmental problems are all subordinated to the individual self-interest of the nation-state. From the perspective of global ethics, important distinctions should be made between political realism as descriptive, as explanatory, and as prescriptive theory. Structural realism is not an accurate description of international politics. The actual behaviour of nations is far more complex than the model of realism. As explanatory theory, realism fares better. Some of the behaviour of nations can be explained in reference to the realist metaphors (e.g. the state of nature, the anarchic self-help realm, the security dilemma, raison d'état and Realpolitik; for a more detailed exposition and critique of structural realism, see B. T. Adeney, Just War, Political Realism and Faith). The Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in 1990 and the response of the Western powers may be seen as good examples of 'realist' behaviour. But realism claims that the structure of international relations is ultimately determinative. If States do not follow the dictates of self-help they will not survive in an anarchic system. At this point the theory becomes prescriptive. Global ethics assumes that there is a freedom to act against selfishness and even against self-interest on the basis of transcendent values.

But in realism, selfish behaviour is requisite. Balance-of-power theory attempts to explain not only why nations act the way they do, but why they must. If assertion of power against power is necessary and inevitable then there cannot be anything morally wrong with it. If national interests and necessity are always the ultimate or dominant determiners of international behaviour, values that contradict them are ultimately suicidal.

b. Complex interdependence. Two other structural theories have been proposed as alternatives to realism. The first takes 'complex interdependence' as its ruling metaphor (see R. Keohane and J. Nye, Power and Interdependence). In this model, the most significant factor determining how nations relate to each other is not military power, but interdependence. Multiple channels connect societies. Even the State is not a single coherent unit but a complex of organizations, each of which has its own agenda. Social, economic, religious and environmental relations often bypass government altogether and may eclipse political relations in importance.

It is not possible to infer a fixed hierarchy of issues. As Henry Kissinger (1923-) remarked, 'The problems of energy, resources, environment, population, the uses of space and sea now rank with questions of military security, ideology and territorial rivalry which have traditionally made up the diplomatic agenda' (quoted in Keohane and Nye, op. cit., p. 26). The revolution in communication technologies (see Information Technology*) and the global marketplace have created a new international order in which political and military power are often irrelevant for solving complex problems of interdependence. Interdependency theorists acknowledge that in times of war, national behaviour may descend into an Hobbesian state of nature. But even in the Middle East war of 1991, they would argue that military power was only one of the factors that determined its outcome. The historical, cultural, economic, political and moral perspectives of people all around the world also controlled the flow of events.

Complex interdependence as a structuring concept for global ethics is an improvement over realism. As descriptive theory it is like realism, an abstract selection of certain facets of international behaviour which are considered dominant. Nevertheless it accounts for more factors in present international realities and leaves more room for ethical input in facing them. Unlike realism, complex interdependence defines a world in which we need each other in order to survive and prosper.

As explanatory theory, interdependence is like realism in positing a morally neutral structure which determines international behaviour. Without discounting the importance of power, interdependence stresses the necessity of co-operation for survival. Self-interest is assumed to be the most significant factor in motivating interdependence. But interdependence theory masks the degree to which some nations are dependent and others are dominant. Interdependence is a misnomer where exploitation of the weak by the strong is the reality.

Global moral problems are sometimes exacerbated by interdependence. Environmental and economic destruction is often fuelled by the international market. International economic co-operation may lead to more efficient exploitation of the poor by those with power. The idea of interdependence suggests the need for mutually beneficial problem-solving rather than radical change. As morally prescriptive theory, interdependence supports the status quo as given, while advocating cooperation to make it better. Where relations between nations are fundamentally unjust, it has little to say.

c. Dependency theory. A more radical structural alternative to both realism and interdependence is dependency theory. Drawing from Marxist analysis, dependency theory suggests that the primary characteristics of the international structure are economic dominance and dependence. The 'core' States at the centre of the system, i.e., the rich capitalist States, dominate the poor countries at the periphery, who have little power to determine their own destiny.

Like realist and interdependency theory, dependency theory does not suggest that evil politicians or bad States have created this system. The villain is international capitalism. The 'laws' of the international marketplace reward those who have the power, capital and resources to determine the terms of trade. Capital tends to follow cheap labour and resources and moulds the local economy to the needs of the international market. Both the technology* introduced and the products produced may be inappropriate to the local community. Meanwhile, the price of commodities produced by the poor countries tends to sink, while the price of manufactured goods produced by the rich countries goes up. International institutions of this marketplace, such as the World Bank, reward those who participate in the system through specialization in the products needed by the international market. Many poor countries specializing in the products that are easiest to export have lost the ability to feed themselves. Dependent on trade but with little ability to influence the terms of trade, they are left economically and politically powerless. The result is a process of under-development whereby the rich get richer at the expense of the poor. Environmental degradation also follows as poor countries desperately strip their resources in an attempt to keep up with a declining balance of payments.

Dependency theory considers multinational corporations* (MNCs) especially culpable for this process of under-development. The budgets of MNCs often exceed the budgets of the nations in which they operate. Because they invest huge amounts of money, bring new technology and expertise, and provide significant employment, often at higher salaries than are available locally, poor countries are usually more than anxious for their business. Because of the power they wield, they are often able to dictate the terms of their investments. MNCs often enrich the ruling elites of poor countries and raise the gross national product through their development efforts. But dependency theorists argue that their net effect is loss of food self-sufficiency, dependency on an international economy, impoverishment of the poor, depletion of unrenewable natural resources and mounting national debt.

From the perspective of dependency theory, the Middle East conflict of 1990-91 was about oil and the preservation of an international order dominated by the 'core States'. The goodness or evil of Saddam Hussein or George Bush (1924-) is secondary to the rational determination of the rich countries to control Middle Eastern energy resources. Saddam's gamble with Kuwait was seen as a rational attempt to regionalize the control of oil under his leadership. To do so he had to overthrow puppet governments of the West such as Kuwait.

As prescription, dependency theory advocates regional and national control of resources in order to rescue them from an international market controlled by the rich. This does not mean that dependency theorists support the means of Saddam Hussein. Most advocate a New International Economic Order (NIEO), under the aegis of the UN, which would stabilize the terms of trade or tilt them in favour of the poor. Dependency theorists are opposed to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT; see International Trade*), which promotes the global economy by removing trade barriers. Fears are also expressed that GATT would promote a multinational rape of the environment. Other prescriptions include advocating food and energy sufficiency as far as possible for poor countries, and urging cooperation between poor countries in order to resist a global market that is geared for the rich. Regional and national economies should take precedence over the international market.

From the perspective of global ethics, dependency theory is attractive for its implicit commitment to the needs of the poor, the protection of local cultures and the preservation of the environment. The huge gap between rich and poor nations is convincing evidence of injustice in the world. The unequal distribution of resources in the world is not based on the virtue, hard work or even good fortune of the Northern countries alone. It is also a fruit of colonialist* and neo-colonialist exploitation of the poor by the rich. Western Christians need to listen to the convincing connections drawn by dependency theorists between the wealth of the North and the poverty of the South (see North-South Divide* and Economic Development*).

As with the other two theories, it is important to note that this is a model and not literal description. Like the state of nature and interdependence, the global market is an abstraction based on the selection of certain factors among many. Like the other two theories it is reductionist* and fails to account for many aspects of international relations. Dependency theorists ignore the many causes of poverty and conflict which cannot be attributed to international injustice. Inequality and poverty are caused by complex historical, cultural, gender, religious, demographic, political, social, economic, geographic and military factors. Liberation theologians* and social ethicists sometimes write as if dependency theory were literal description. Not only does that overrate the power of the international economy, it obscures the positive effect of the market on some poor countries.

Conclusions

We have seen that global ethics can be informed by analysis which locates the key to global problems and moral action at three different levels. Christians have always had sympathy for the view that much of the problem lies in individual human beings. The doctrine of the Fall* indicates that all human beings are sinful and that evil originates in the human heart. A Christian approach to global ethics begins with the view that individuals have great significance, both for good and evil. All human beings contribute to global problems, through pride, racism, mistreatment of women, over-consumption of limited resources, hatred,* envy (see Jealousy and Envy*), greed, violence,* carelessness and the like. Personal transformation of individuals can therefore make a difference.

Jesus' commands to love God and our neighbour and to seek first the kingdom of God* are also urgently relevant to the task of global ethics. There is a social and corporate dimension to the Fall. Not only personal transformation, but the efforts of individuals to resist evil and care for its victims are also relevant. Exposure of evil that is structured through the institutions of society is part of this task. Both personal transformation and individual resistance to evil occur in communities. The significance of individual change for global ethics is directly related to the degree in which it is nurtured and extended through the work of a community.

Recognition of the importance of individuals should not be understood as downgrading the critical role of institutions and nations, as both perpetrators and restrainers of evil. Global problems are so vast that many can be addressed only at a national level. Political institutions which protect the value of the individual, restrain the exploitation of the weak, conserve creation, resist the violent and promote justice are crucial to the tasks of justice and peace. In the Bible, God is portrayed as active in the history of nations, supporting the weak and pulling the mighty from their thrones (Lk. 1:52). God uses individuals, such as Moses, Deborah, Amos, Esther, Daniel and Cyrus, to change the history of nations.

Today it is recognized that structures of good and evil exist beyond the borders of nations in the international order. All three structural theories provide an important contribution to global ethics.

In so far as there is a state of nature in international politics, Christians must understand the role of power and work to reduce the anarchy of the international system. A realist understanding of power combined with a Christian perception of the reality of evil can prevent a simplistic idealism which ignores the pervasiveness of conflict. As Reinhold Niebuhr observed, the assertion that if only people would love one another, all the complex problems of the international order would disappear, ignores the most basic fact of history: that most people and groups do not love one another. Christian realism recognizes that costly action must sometimes be taken to resist the spread of totalitarianism and tyranny.

But political realism can also be a faulty guide to behaviour. The assumption of an anarchic international realm ruled by power can lead to the justification of war* as the only means of settling conflict. It can lead to a devaluing of many potent ways to address injustice that are short of war. All of the major problems that concern global ethics are exacerbated by war. Not only does war divert attention and funds from other pressing issues, it virulently increases poverty and violence, ignites hatred and racism, and plants seeds for future conflict. In war it is the poor and the weak who often bear the greatest suffering. War destroys the environment on a scale which dwarfs the normal concerns of the environmental movement. Christians who benefit from the insights of realism must nevertheless oppose war as a means of settling disputes.

In so far as there is interdependence, Christians need to strengthen forms of co-operation which benefit the common good. Complex interdependency theory emphasizes the importance of a community of nations. God did not create a state of nature in which individuals fight tooth and claw. As Amos understood long ago, the dominance of one nation by another is not natural but sinful (Am. 1 – 2). Interdependency theory has the merits and drawbacks of most reformism. It rejects the extremes of war and revolution by recognizing that we live in a flawed and sinful world in which there are no final solutions, only graded improvements. By seeking co-operative solutions it accepts realities that are necessarily disappointing. This can shade into an acceptance of injustice in so far as it does not upset the theorists' own interests or the international order.

In so far as poverty is perpetuated by an international economic order which benefits the rich, we need to resist participation in structures which enrich the West at the cost of perpetuating poverty in the Third World. Western Christians can decrease their consumption of non-renewable resources, simplify their lifestyles, support domestic and foreign policy decisions which respect local and regional economies, boycott* luxury items produced in countries which cannot feed their own people, and oppose their own government's support for Third World elites which repress their own people while growing rich on international trade.

The problems which plague our world are overwhelming. Passionate social concern is easily burned out unless it is sustained by deep faith in the love and presence of God in history. Five tasks await Christians who are concerned about global ethics.

1. Prayer. Prayer is a moral act in so far as it reflects a hunger and thirst for the righteousness of God to prevail in the real world. It is an act of dependence and trust. It recognizes that only the power and goodness of God can bring shalom (see Peace*) to sinful communities.

2. Knowledge. Individual global problems are enormously complex. Simplistic slogans, unfounded optimism and apathy are all symptoms of unwillingness to study carefully the evils which threaten our neighbours and our planet. No-one can know everything, but everyone can explore one area (such as recycling programmes in their community), and share their knowledge with others.

3. Modelling, or being an exemplar. Actions are always more powerful than words in ethics. Lifestyle choices range from riding a bicycle instead of driving a car, to living with the poor in Manila. The knowledge we gain about global issues is dangerous. If we refuse to allow it to change our lifestyle, it may harden our heart.

4. Action by groups and communities. Corporate action is more powerful than that done by individuals. The church should model the values of the kingdom of God. As we become individually concerned, e.g., about racism against Arabs in our community, the most effective response may be to invite Arabs to participate in our church programmes. Only as the church expresses the love of God for the world can it expect the world to listen to the gospel.

5. Politics. Christians too often ignore the political task. Community organizing, voting, writing, lobbying, demonstrating, contributing to political causes and running for local office are a few of the ways in which

Christians can address moral problems through political means. Political solutions to moral problems must be found at every level of the human community: in families, in corporations, in hospitals, schools and banks, as well as in national governments and the UN. Just as the Jewish prophets gave voice to God's anguish over political injustice, so Christians need to recognize that love of neighbour* must include opposition to oppressive structural evils wherever they are found. The task of global ethics is well summarized in the words of the Lord's Prayer, 'Thy Kingdom come; thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven.'

See especially: APARTHEID; ARMAMENTS; BRANDT REPORT; COLONIALISM; COMMUNISM; CREATION; CULTURE; DEBT; DEFENCE, MILITARY AND CIVIL; DEFORESTATION; DETERRENCE, NON-NUCLEAR; DETERRENCE, NUCLEAR; DISARMAMENT; DISCRIMINATION; ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT; ECONOMIC SANCTIONS; EMIGRATION; ENERGY; ENVIRONMENT; EQUALITY; ESPIONAGE; FORCE; FREEDOM; GENOCIDE; GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT; HUNGER, WORLD; IMMIGRATION; INTERNATIONAL ORDER; INTERNATIONAL TRADE; INVESTMENT; LAND AND LAND REFORM; LIBERATION THEOLOGY; MEDIA; MIGRANT LABOUR; MISSION, MORALITY OF; NATIONALISM; NATURAL LAW; NEIGHBOUR; NORTH-SOUTH DIVIDE; PATRIOTISM; POLITICS; POPULATION POLICY; POVERTY; POWER; RACE; REBELLION; RIGHTS, ANIMAL; RIGHTS, HUMAN; SCIENCE; SECURITY; SLAVERY; SPORT; STATE; TECHNOLOGY; TERRORISM; THIRD WORLD AID; TRADE; VIOLENCE; WAR; WASTE; WORLD.

Bibliography

B. T. Adeney, Just War, Political Realism and Faith (Metuchen, NJ, and London, 1988); L. R. Brown et al., State of the World 1990 (New York and London, 1990); W. Byron, The Causes of World Hunger (New York, 1982); W. Granberg-Michaelson, Tending the Garden: Essays on the Gospel and the Earth (Grand Rapids, 1987); R. Keohane and J. Nye, Power and Interdependence (New York, 1977); R. Niebuhr, Moral Man and Immoral Society (New York, 1932); L. Osborn, Guardians of Creation (Leicester, 1993); R.J. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger (Downers Grove, IL, 1977; London, 1990); K. Waltz, Man, the State and War (New York, 1954); M. Walzer, Just and Unjust Wars (New York, 1977; Harmondsworth, 1980).

B.T.A.

Community Ethics

The word ‘community’ usually refers to a group of people living together in one locality who inhabit a culture of shared values.* When its use is purely descriptive, it may be enough that people live in the same geographical area. However, the word is often used to imply more than mere description. In this sense it does not refer to a collection of people, but only to those who have an identity as a group. It is possible for people to live in proximity to one another but not in community with one another. In a society in which undue emphasis has been placed on the autonomy* of the individual leading to the dominance of individualism* as a social philosophy, the word ‘community’ has also become a normative expression for those wanting to stress interdependence. It can also be used to express nostalgia, as in ‘the quest for community’. This nostalgia, most recently articulated by some elements of the Green Movement, is itself a hallmark of the desire to change the fragmentation implicit in the modern world. It can also be used in a futuristic sense to point to a Utopia which might exist if certain conditions apply.

The fact that defining ‘community’ is more difficult than building a brick wall round a patch of fog is interesting, given that the allusion to community is so frequent in popular discourse. Whether we are noting its breakdown, as in the analysis of urban poverty, or warning of the environmental (see Environment*) threat to a quality of life summed up in allusions to ‘global community’ (see Global Ethics†), or whether we are talking of the norms to which Christians are corporately subject, ‘community’ is a word in transition from being merely descriptive to becoming normative. However, Christians, who are called to a realism,* based on the fact that they serve a God who works in history, must beware of the utopianism and nostalgia inherent in modern allusions to community. But if the church is to be ‘the city set on a hill’ (see Mt. 5:14), a normative place of refuge to which a fragmented world looks for hope, it must itself rediscover the concepts of justice (see Justice and Peace†), inclusion and interdependence which are at the heart of the biblical view of community.

1. Key contributory factors

In assessing the different influences on current expressions of community, several key factors have contributed over the modern period to a decrease in the quality of association between people which is at the heart of community life.

a. The pace of change. Where technological (see Technology*) knowledge is changing very rapidly, the received wisdom* of former generations can be seen as useless. In stable societies, the elderly may be treated as wise people whose advice is sought and heeded. In early Judaism, to be ‘full of years’ was to be wise. The elderly are isolated when it is the young who are relevant and the elderly who are out of touch. The rapid pace of change makes a primary division between generations. One could conclude from this that where such change is not felt there will be greater inclusiveness across the generations.

Sociologist Alvin Toffler (1928-) has talked of the way in which the rapid pace of change dislocates us in time. Raymond Aron (1905-83), the French sociologist, has commented that ‘no man is a contemporary of his own generation’. By this he means that all education depends on the received wisdom of a previous generation, but it cannot prepare us for that which is unknown and yet to come. In a world of constant change, the virtue which is prized above all is flexibility, and this is the primary quality required of labour in the postmodern world where change is endemic. Mining communities which are becoming victims of economic circumstances, and factory communities which have been dispersed because of the advent of robotics, all enjoyed stability as communities while their skills were in demand. Community is therefore very sensitive to the pace of change, and those social groups which are familiar with contemporary practices have an edge over those which are not.

b. The increase in mobility. Community is very sensitive to mobility.* Surveys of local communities show that the local neighbourhood is used most intensively by the elderly and by young parents (often women) with young children. Such people can be seen as those with restricted mobility who are most sensitive to the degree of provision and the quality of association in their local area. Other groups which have more access to transportation may not identify so closely with the local neighbourhood but travel widely throughout the urban space to find appropriate work,entertainment or sport. Churches are used to seeing themselves as drawing their support from the local community. This was certainly applicable in days where the parish system combined with restricted mobility to make the local area the important focus of social identity. In the modern world, the concept of the individual's right to choose, together with increased mobility, has meant that people are willing to travel across cities to support a church which more nearly conforms to their choice than the church in their locality. This frequently leads to a tension between large 'gathered' churches and community-based churches.

Mobility also puts great strain on family life. 'Rootedness' is at a premium in contemporary culture, and people may live at a distance from other members of their family. This can lead to pressure on the family* and ultimately to family breakdown. The anonymity of large cities can also lead to increased delinquency as people feel that they do not know others and are not known by them. This may in turn lead to a lack of accountability,* which fuels antisocial behaviour.

c. Materialism. Materialism* creates problems for human community because it emphasizes 'having' rather than 'being'. Relationships between people can flourish only where people treat each other as human subjects rather than as human objects. When materialism is mediated through a consumer (see Consumerism*) culture, it creates a series of masks which people can hide behind, rather than an emphasis on the uniqueness of each person. Advertising* and marketing create a series of images which are widely disseminated through the mass media. The ownership of such images can become regarded as a sign of success. But there is often no correspondence between success in terms of ownership and the inner psychological or spiritual state of the person.

It can then become difficult for those who live in wealthy communities to admit to the existence of major problems in personal or family life. Such an admission can be seen as a betrayal of the idea that increased wealth solves problems. Yet wealthy neighbourhoods often exhibit problems which are to do with the absence of community. Loneliness,* alcoholism,* tranquillizer addiction (see Dependence,* Drugs*) and high divorce rates can be as much a hallmark of wealthy communities as of poorer communities. This problem can be characterized as a confusion between a high standard of living and a high quality of life.

Materialism also increases the desire for privacy.* Money* gives people the power to control their own lives. One of the hallmarks of poor people is that they frequently have important decisions made for them by other people (e.g. officers of the Welfare State*) or have no choices available to them. The requirement that the poor (see Poverty*) and the unemployed (see Unemployment,) 'get on their bikes' to look for work may not be feasible if the waiting lists for council properties mean that mobility is restricted, if the council stock of housing is so run down that the prospects of moving are not appealing, or if there is a general shortage of affordable, privately owned, rented accommodation. This is an expression of powerlessness. In contrast, wealthy communities are characterized not only by the power to choose as well as the freedom, to choose (see Choice*), but also by the ability to choose with whom one will associate.

Architecture* reflects this difference. In terraced housing, one is forced to live closely with other people through no choice of one's own, but in wealthy communities there are large detached houses with space around them and gates which keep others out. Wealth increases privacy and homogeneity as people choose to associate with like-minded people who share their values. This can raise a question mark about the homogeneity of wealthy churches which then do not have to face trying to form relationships with those who are very different from themselves. Terraced accommodation, such as the 'back to backs', are often remembered in our society for being places where there was a strong emphasis on human community and where people 'looked out for one another'. It is still the case that communities of poor people are often characterized by greater interdependence and an emphasis on close relationships than are wealthier neighbourhoods.

d. The use of time. The rich and the poor are divided not only by monetary wealth but also by different attitudes to time. We live in different time zones. Some people spend money to save time while others spend time to save money. The concept of 'convenience', so important in contemporary life, assumes that people will be able to spend money to save time. The modern kitchen with its labour-saving devices is an important metaphor for a particular attitude to the values implicit in being a human community. Busy people regard 'busy-ness' as an important commodity to own, even though it generates stress.* To be busy or in demand is as important a sign of status in the community as monetary wealth.

Unemployed people have all the time in the world. They are not busy. They may have no work and little by way of social conversation when they meet others, because of the absence of work-generated conversation. Busy people, on the other hand, have little time for the space and commitment necessary for intimate relationships. But people who have 'all the time in the world' often feel so devalued by this that their relationships also break down. The new materialism is to do with our attitude to time. A full Filofax is as important as a full stomach in a culture where being too busy gives high status. Professionalism adds to this problem by demanding everything from talented people who find that they have little time for committed relationships of any sort. One of the most important issues which must be addressed within our communities is how we can change attitudes to time within the church so that everybody can enjoy a higher quality of life.

e. Physical space. Architecture can serve the community, dominate it or destroy it. At its best, architecture is meant to express ways of being human. If it is the quality of being human that we wish to focus on, then it is important that the architecture around us serves that end. Where architecture focuses on values derived from the possibilities given by technology or a view of aesthetics which is internal to the profession, it may well be that architecture moves away from the service of human community.

The most obvious example of this is the British tower blocks of the 1960s, which were built because of the need for cheap housing for large numbers of people at a time when the technology of pre-stressed concrete had made tall buildings possible at low cost. Many of these buildings are no longer functional and are being demolished. The dark corridors, lift spaces and general anonymity of such buildings led to abuse and violence rather than the enhancement of human community. People were living in confined boxes behind anonymous doors opening on to public spaces which were badly lit and which did not belong to them. This meant that, quite often, people did not venture out or get to know one another.

We are currently learning that human community is enhanced by how we design physical space. There is a great deal of difference between a community which is oppressed and de-humanized (see Dehumanization*) by its architecture and people who are enabled to express their sense of community through the architecture of the space where they live.

2. Theology and community

The idea of community is at the heart of biblical theology. Theological reflection on contemporary life is important if we are to regain a perspective on issues which have become distorted, either because they have fallen prey to false thinking or because our world has stressed historical processes which have led us off course. In recent times, theologians have used a simple fourfold scheme to summarize a biblical perspective on a particular issue. In some ways this is reductionist* and can only be an indication of the richness of the biblical perspective. Nevertheless, it remains helpful when looking at a theme such as community. The four perspectives used are creation,* Fall,* redemption (see Sin and Salvation†) and consummation (see Eschatology and Ethics*).

a. Creation. Our post-Enlightenment tradition emphasizes the concept of the individual, but this is only a recent development. Cartesian philosophy ('I think, therefore I am'), based on the thought of Rene Descartes (1596-1650), emphasizes the individual as the basic unit of society. The Enlightenment* also gave impetus to the philosophy of individualism, which has been reasserted in the remark by the then Mrs Thatcher (1925-) that there is no such thing as society. The modern idea of the autonomy of the individual does not express the biblical view of personhood.

The creation narrative asserts that the person made of dust was an incomplete expression of humanity (Gn. 2:18). Creation of woman is important not only in terms of mutuality, complementarity and equality expressed in gender terms, but also in terms of the biblical concept of personhood. In making humanity (see †) God states, 'Let us make man in our image ...' (Gn. 1:26). We are made in the image of a trinitarian God who is three persons in one Godhead. In being made in the image of God we reflect a God who is person in community. God is love (see †) because within the Trinity God is both the subject and the object of love.

We too are 'persons in community', and interdependence rather than individual autonomy is the basic starting-point for an understanding of human community. We find our human destiny in words which have an inescapable dimension of community. Words such as 'love', 'worship' and 'justice' – which describe humanity's highest personal and social ideals – are all words of relationship. The image of God* is not only something I reflect personally but something which is found in those relationships between people which are characterized by love, justice, mercy* or peace.* It is for this reason that Western society is beginning to react against an over-emphasis on individualism and is talking about community values again. State collectivism has also broken down in many countries because it had too low a view of the human person and frequently resorted to coercion to maintain the status quo. The creation perspective illustrates God's original intentions for the created world. It enables us to reject views of human community which are either excessively individualistic or excessively collectivist. 'Person in community' expresses the creation insight about people.

b. Fall. The introduction of evil into the world is portrayed in three instances in Scripture. Genesis 3 focuses on personal sin; Gn. 11, the Babel incident, introduces the idea of corporate evil; while in Rom. 1, Paul outlines his own picture of the universal Fall, focusing on the idea of social evil. All of these are a disruption of community. The personal fall disrupts the relationship of trust* between humanity and God. It also has the result of introducing power* into the equal partnership between men and women. Men now rule over women, though this was not the creator's original intention (Gn. 3:16b). The worlds of work and the environment both suffer from frustration and do not reward the arduous labour that goes into them (Gn. 3:17-19).

In the building of the Tower of Babel (Gn. 11:1-9), people conspire anonymously together to create an identity for themselves corporately which is independent of God but which ultimately invites the judgment of God. In this incident we see the difference between sin and evil.* In the former, people are personally responsible and accountable to God for what they have done. In the latter, it is the group which provides the dynamic towards evil in which people are implicated. Babel warns us that communities can be corporately guilty of evil, either because they conspire to do so, or because their lack of protest and resistance mounts to a guilty collusion. There is evil in the world which cannot be laid at the door of any one person.

Paul's description of an entire culture living under judgment* of God in Rom. 1:18-32 shows that when a society turns its back on God's norms, evil takes over. These people suppress what they know of God, investing their longing for God in other things which are unworthy of it, making these things falsely sacred as a result. The result is a culture where disobedience to parents competes with distorted sexuality (see †), slander and envy (see Jealousy and Envy*) in order to promote evil* as good and to glory in things which are shameful. This trinity of evil, in its personal, corporate and social dimensions, leads to a fragmentation of a community which can be maintained only as long as God is at the heart of its life.

c. Redemption. In early Israel, the economic dimension of community life was based not on self-interest or on an appeal to altruism* such as are present in modern ideological systems, but on the worship of the God of justice. If one takes the regulations covering debt* and loans, it becomes plain that no commercial motivation existed for wiping out debts in the sabbath year (see Jubilee*), only that of obedience to God. Worship and obedience* were the motivating drive for socio-economic life (see Old Testament Ethics†). In a secularized society such as ours, we do not have such a vertical dimension to maintain our life together, and we therefore resort to managing our community life either according to a principle of self-interest, which at least appeals to our fallenness, or according to altruism, which appeals to the ideals that we strive for but which frequently shows itself to be too weak to correct injustice in our communities. The Bible holds both together in tension at the heart of community life because it believes that, although people are fallen, they are also made in the image of God. Biblical realism therefore expects community life to be a mixture of sin and righteousness,* loyalty* and betrayal, hope* and despair.

At the heart of the vision of the OT community is a picture of justice which focuses on economic life. While modern concepts of justice are all on a spectrum from individualism to collectivism, the biblical picture focuses not on the autonomy of the individual, nor on the sufficiency of the State, but on relationships between people informed by the themes of sin and righteousness. God is a God of justice, and his justice defines the nature of human community. It is not that we decide what justice is and measure God up to our own criteria, but that God's character provides the framework for our life together.

The perspective of inclusiveness is pervasive throughout the OT. Economic life focuses on the needs of the poor rather than on the self-interest of the rich. The people of Israel are to remember their equality as slaves in Egypt and the fact that their freedom and nationhood exist only because of the grace* of God. This emphasis that rich and poor are to act on the memory of their common roots in slavery is in stark contrast to our society, where becoming wealthy is seen as an expression of difference from the poor rather than of solidarity with them. This common foundation is to provide the motivation for their attitude to the widow, the orphan and the minority ethnic group. The regulations governing economic life – e.g. gleaning, sabbath,* and lending at zero interest,* as well as the great theme of jubilee – all serve to maintain the position of those who do not have the means to preserve their place in community. When Israel becomes distracted from God by idolatry, she loses this distinctive economic perspective. This in turn leads both to exile and to denunciation by the 8th-century prophets for dividing the worship of God from the practice of justice.

Jesus in his teaching builds on this inclusiveness. He does not need to lay again the foundations built in the OT. He upholds the authority of the OT and declares that he has come to proclaim the year of jubilee ('the year of the Lord's favour', Lk. 4:19). The economic foundations for the kingdom (see Kingdom of God*) community have been laid; what is needed is the radical message which addresses social rather than economic justice.

The kingdom had been defined by the Pharisees to exclude certain categories of people who were powerless. Prostitutes, women and children, the lepers and the poor were all outside the boundaries of the kingdom. Jesus crossed boundaries maintained by religious bigotry and deliberately drew those outside them into the heart of the kingdom community. He thus reversed the values at the heart of religious life. The kingdom is an inclusive community because God has appeared again in Christ and has made his own character and mission the model for Christian justice. Human relationships within community are to be characterized by love, mercy, peace and justice, which draw in those who have been marginalized.

This perspective of inclusiveness is thus underwritten by both OT and NT. It results in the early church ordering its life around this breakdown of division between people. A summary of this ethic in the life of the Christian church is found in Gal. 3:28, which states, 'There is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus.* The Christian church* is the community which reflects the breaking down of barriers between people. It is a model of the extended family where belonging rather than having, and fellowship* rather than autonomy, are the norm. Church life is therefore meant to reflect this perspective of inclusiveness. Jesus says in Lk. 6:32-36 that mutuality and reciprocity are not the basis for the public display of the love of God: 'If you love those who love you, what credit is that to you? Even "sinners" love those who love them' (Lk. 6:32). It is when Christians reach out to those who are least like them that they need to draw on the character of a God who is inclusive in loving those who are enemies. We are thus called to participate in the stream of God's self-revelation as the God of Israel and God in Christ, reflecting justice in our relationships.

This kind of justice creates community where there was none. Those who were estranged are brought near, and those who were powerless are given the means to sustain their life. Secular concepts of justice do not normally deal with the state of individuals before some 'injustice' is done to them. A poor person may receive redress for some wrong but he or she is still poor even after justice has been done. Biblical justice sees such persistent poverty as a denial of the character of God. Through the creative powers of biblical justice, however, the individual's ability to contribute to the community is not merely preserved but actually created by justice.

Christopher Wright (1947-) has pointed out that not only is the biblical concept of justice inextricably tied up with the concept of community, but that the way the Bible thinks about community is very different from contemporary Christianity. He comments: 'We tend to begin at the personal level and work outwards. Our emphasis is to persuade people to live a certain kind of life according to this and that moral standard. If enough individuals live up to such-and-such morality, then, almost as a by-product, society itself will be improved or at least maintained as a healthy, happy, safe environment for individuals to pursue their personal goodness. This is the kind of person you must be; that kind of society is a bonus in the background. The Old Testament tends to place the emphasis the other way round; here is the kind of society God wants. His desire is for a holy people for his own possession, a redeemed community, a model society through whom he can display a prototype of the new humanity of his ultimate redemptive purpose. Now if that is the kind of society God wants, what kind of person must you be once you belong to it?' (Living as the People of God, pp. 197-198).

Although the church is meant to be a normative community which demonstrates how people from different backgrounds of race, class and nationality relate to one another, we can see that, to the extent that modern Christianity has capitulated to individualism, it has lost this distinctive approach both to community and to justice as inclusion within the community. The loss of this identity is particularly strange among those Christians who self-consciously look to Scripture for the principles on which they base their life together. So many of the descriptions of God's people throughout the Scriptures are corporate, whether it be the nation of Israel, the body of Christ, the city of God, or the fellowship of believers. It is because of this quality of life together as the people of God that discrimination such as racism (see Race*) or sexism* is so repugnant within the institutional church. God's community is to glory in unity-in-diversity, bringing together peoples, classes, ideologies and backgrounds that remain polarized in the world. Such a remarkable community can exist only because of the work of grace mediated through the Holy Spirit's* mission to the church.

d. Consummation. Throughout the Scriptures, the idea of hope* is often attached to the future of the human community and particularly of those who find their identity in God. The most potent expression of this is found in the book of Revelation, where a great multitude which no person can number is gathered before the throne of God, and it is explicitly stated that it is drawn from every nation and tribe (Rev. 7:9). This is the consummation of the ethic contained in Gal. 3:28 that the gospel is the foundation for a gathering which defies human boundaries, whether they be boundaries of gender, race, class or any other human condition. This eschatological perspective provides a motivation within history for us to work towards that end. The dynamic within Christianity to create community therefore comes not just from interpersonal love, nor just from the inclusivity of biblical justice, but also from the hope that the church as counter-community is a sign of the new community to come when the kingdom of God is consummated.

One of the reasons community has a normative quality in its modern usage is that people want in some way to live in a perfect community characterized by love and justice. Our own world is an indictment of such a dream, characterized as it is by war, famine and injustice. The longing for human community, so prevalent in contemporary life, is powerful because it encapsulates within it something of the eschatological hope which has faded from our world with the onset of secularization.* The idea of a new world coming, in which people will do by nature that which pleases God, is important for the church to hold up before the watching world. It is for this reason, among others, that there has recently been a resurgence of theologies based on the idea of hope.

3. The mission of the church

The theme of community, then, is present throughout Scripture, and if we are to maintain a biblical perspective rather than succumbing to the nostalgia of modernity (see Modernity and Postmodernity*) or to the distortions of individualism or collectivism, it must be viewed from these four perspectives which Scripture provides: namely creation, Fall, redemption and consummation. The role of the church is to be a 'new community' which witnesses to the coming of the kingdom of God in the midst of the world. Relationships between Christians are to be characterized by love, justice, mercy and peace as these reflect the image and character of God and also the coming community of the city of God. This counter-community is not just involved in the ethereal. It is a visible sign of the presence of the kingdom of God and a demonstration of the lordship of Jesus Christ over every aspect of human community. Christianity is therefore a challenge to all aspects of our life together, whether they be economic, political, cultural, social or personal. The pietism* of the early part of the 20th century left Christianity with very little to say about the theme of community because it had capitulated too far to a version of Christianity which owed too much to individualism and privatization of faith. At the end of the 20th century there has been a resurgence of interest in 'holistic mission' and in the concept of the Christian mind, with encouraging signs that the Christian church is beginning once more to recover its courage to challenge the powers which adversely affect community life.

Much of the new thinking about community has been set in theological reflection on life in the city and, more recently, in rural areas. The publication of the reports Faith in the City and Faith in the Countryside has re-emphasized the need to grapple with the way in which these contexts affect the lives of millions of people. In turn this has led to renewed interest in the church's role in the community, and thousands of projects have been started by local churches who have recovered a sense of responsibility for the plight of those who live around them. Many of these projects emphasize community service which 'meets the needs' of people in the local area. The emphasis on service is person-centred, and alleviates the symptoms of distress. Sometimes this leads on to community action in which biblical categories are used to scrutinize the causes of poverty and oppression. Some churches are involved in a further stage of community development in which the church empowers the people in the locality to equip themselves with the tools to tackle their own problems, expressed in their own way. All of this work is a very welcome demonstration that the mission of the church to the community must reflect both word and deed, proclamation and demonstration, as equal partners.

See especially: ADVERTISING; ALIENATION; ARCHITECTURE; AUTHORITY; BUREAUCRACY; CAPITALISM; CHRISTIAN SOCIALISTS; CITY; CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE; COMMON OWNERSHIP; COMMUNISM; COPYRIGHT; CRIME; CULTURE; DATA PROTECTION; DEBT; DEFENCE, MILITARY AND CIVIL; DEMOCRACY; DICTATORSHIP; DISCRIMINATION; EDUCATION; EMPLOYERS' CONFEDERATIONS; ENERGY; ENVIRONMENT; EQUALITY; EXPLOITATION; FAMILY; FORCE; FREEDOM; FRIENDSHIP; GOVERNMENT; HOMELESSNESS; HOSPITALITY; IMMIGRATION; INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS; INDUSTRIALIZATION; INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY; INVESTMENT; LAND AND LAND REFORM; LAW, CIVIL AND CRIMINAL; LEISURE; LIBERALISM, POLITICAL; MAGISTRATES, MAGISTRACY; MANAGEMENT; MEDIA; MOBILITY; MULTICULTURAL EDUCATION; NATIONALISM; NEIGHBOUR; PATRIOTISM; PLURALISM; POLICE; POLITICS; POP CULTURE; POPULATION POLICY; POVERTY; POWER; PRISON AND PRISON REFORM; PRIVACY; PROFESSIONAL ETHICS; PROPERTY; PROTEST; PUNISHMENT; RACE; RELIGIOUS EDUCATION; SECURITY; SENTENCING, PRISON; SLAVERY; SOCIAL CONTRACT; SOCIAL ETHICS; SOCIALISM; SOCIETY; SOCIOLOGY OF ETHICS; SPORT; STATE; STRIKES; TAXATION; TECHNOLOGY; TRADE UNIONS; UNEMPLOYMENT; URBANIZATION; VIOLENCE; WELFARE STATE; WORK.

Bibliography

Archbishop of Canterbury's Commission on Urban Priority Areas, Faith in the City (London, 1985); Archbishops' Commission on Rural Affairs, Faith in the Countryside (London, 1990); A. Hake, 'Theological Reflections on "Community"', in A. Harvey (ed.), Theology in the City: A Theological Response to 'Faith in the City' (London, 1989); R. McCloughry, The Eye of the Needle (Leicester, 1990); S. C. Mott, Biblical Ethics and Social Change (New York and Oxford, 1982); idem, Jesus and Social Ethics (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1984); N. Wolt-erstorff, 'Why Care About Justice?', ThW 10.11, 1987, pp. 22-25; C. J. H. Wright, Living as the People of God (Leicester, 1983) = An Eye for an Eye (Downers Grove, IL, 1983).

R.K.McC.

Economic Ethics

Natural ethics is the doctrine of conduct judged according to ultimate principles. Christian ethics, claimed Emil Brunner,* is distinguished from natural ethics by the fact that in it God's action is always regarded as the basis of human action' (The Divine Imperative, London and New York, 1937, p. 86). In the economic sphere, to ground human action in God's action is to recognize that humankind takes resources divinely provided, to use for purposes divinely ordained, and responds properly to the divine call only by consciously acting as steward.

God calls; we respond. 'Response-ible' stewardship,* or trusteeship, is our key and our theme. How might we (the trust is clearly collective) so order our economic activity as to make a proper response to God's gracious provision and purpose? We cannot begin to answer the question without careful reading of God's Word, and due deference to those who have read and formulated its teaching before us: our main shared resources are Scripture and (orthodox) theology.

Scripture and theology

Economic guidance in Scripture (D. A. Hay, Economics Today, chs. 1 and 2) is more evident in the OT than in the NT. Arguably, Christians in the modern era have paid inadequate attention to it, but the Jewish communities of the dispersion never ceased to search their sacred writings. Their conclusions have been summarized recently in M. Tamari's With All Your Possessions, and we shall draw on this portrayal of 'Jewish economic man', half-brother at least to the Christian counterpart.

Theologically-based social ethics were argued by William Temple* in Christianity and Social Order to yield the principles of freedom, fellowship and service. Naturalistic analyses, severing these principles from their theological foundations, have divided into two main branches, finding the inspiration of the market economy in Temple's first principle, and that of socialism* in his second and third.

The attractions of freedom* emerged first in modern thought in the guise of religious toleration, i.e. freedom from externally imposed beliefs. Since beliefs govern actions, the notion gained ground that real freedom consisted in the absence of any external constraint on individuals' activities, at least in such measure that freedom's exercise was consistent with equal liberty for all. This notion of freedom, adopted by liberal thought in the wake of John Locke (1632-1704), was made the basis of liberal economics by the classical writers of the following centuries.

From a Christian viewpoint, this type of economics is based on the false conception of human ethical autonomy (something which Locke himself discussed), and needs substantial modification to make it acceptable. Stewardly service of God is perfect freedom. Freedom from needs to be complemented by freedom for. The freedom conferred by salvation includes being set free from the obligation to seek one's own good, for the purpose of serving God and neighbour.

Love of neighbour fulfils the law of God (Rom. 13), and has been the motivating force behind most non-Marxist brands of socialism. The British Labour movement, it was famously said, owed more to Methodism than to Marxism. Temple himself developed a defence of the mixed economy and the Welfare State* which saw freedom as realizable in fellowship and service. He would of course have sympathized with the claim of V. A. Demant in Religion and the Decline of Capitalism that more is needed for human fulfilment, since man does not live by bread alone. However, he perhaps wrote too early to perceive the force of Evan Luard's argument (in Socialism without the State) that State action necessarily corrupted socialist ideals, rather than providing a channel for their realization.

However, neither the market capitalist* thesis, nor its state socialist antithesis, represent a valid response to the divine call in the economic sphere. Though both have elements of useful insight, the idea of Christian stewardship calls for a new synthesis, uniting these byways which have, in isolation, proved to be dead ends. We find the key to this synthesis in an important but neglected strand of Christian ethical thought which has explored the notion of 'persons-in-relationship' (see, e.g., I. Fairweather and J. McDonald, The Quest for Christian Ethics). Work emanating from the Jubilee Centre in Cambridge, UK, has coined the term 'relationalism' (contra capitalism, socialism) as an apt descriptive label for the biblical paradigm for society (see C. J. H. Wright, Living as the People of God).

The implications of this approach are symbiotic with those of E. F. Schumacher's Small is Beautiful. The ethical imperative to combat giantism surfaces ever and again, and it is heartening that modern technical changes are tending in a variety of ways to undermine the attractions, too easily accepted as inexorable, of scale economies in production.

So we join the necessary debate with modern secular thought where the action is, with focus on the free-market economy, whose virtues are widely regarded as prevailing over its vices. Christian stewardship cherishes freedom, but not as an absolute in the manner of liberal economics (especially but not exclusively the economics of the Austrian School). Rather, freedom is seen as a means towards wider objectives, notably good relationships in fellowship and service, ideals inherently communal (see Community Ethics†) rather than individual in orientation.

Freedom within limits

The implications of this perspective, of 'limits' to freedom enabling the quest for true freedom, are:

1. Owning and using. Property* in economic resources is perfectly legitimate by Christian criteria, but it is not strictly private, and it is not absolute. Near the heart of the OT story is the allocation of land,* the principal productive resource in an agrarian society, to (extended) family groups (Wright, op. cit.). These owners, or rather stewards, possessed circumscribed powers. They could not sell their land outright, but could lease it out until the next year of jubilee* (Lv. 25).

Moreover, the use of the land for productive purposes was subject to quite strict limitations. For one thing, during the sabbatical year of rest the land must be left fallow. For another, fields were not to be stripped during harvesting, but rather the poor were to be allowed to glean round the edges (Lv. 19) to satisfy their needs (see Old Testament Ethics†).

Starting from this basis, it is common ground in Christian and Jewish discussion that human stewardship of resources implies responsibilities as well as rights. The precise form taken by the former (self-discipline, communal arrangements) is in essence a secondary matter, though sound economic organization will both permit adaptable response to changing ideas and methods, and cause different forms of sanction to reinforce one another.

The concept of legitimate but limited property rights can properly be extended from the 'given' productive resource of land to 'produced' means of production such as tools, machinery, buildings; such physical capital, and financial claims thereto, will be considered below. It will be convenient at this point, however, to take account of immaterial knowledge and ideas. Even during OT times productive methods changed, and Judaism's search for wisdom* was based partly on the dissemination, in oral and / or written form, of rabbinic reflection on the law* (Torah). Questions thus arose concerning matters we now call patent* and copyright,* protecting the property rights of inventors and teachers. Jewish thought (Tamari, p. 109) has consistently recognized the legitimacy of legal protection of this kind, representing a balance between the goods of encouraging inventiveness on the one hand, and cheap spread of the fruits thereof on the other. However, in the modern era in which rapid technical changes tend to disrupt established economic relationships faster than adverse effects can be easily salved, the law probably should lean against too strong an encouragement of scientific and technological* change. Good fruits mature slowly, by and large.

2. Buying and selling. Trade* by merchants operating on their own account is morally legitimate. Qualifications must come, but it is necessary initially to be clear about this. Patristic and medieval Christian thought, influenced often by Gk. philosophy, tended to display suspicion of mercantile operations, viewing them with disfavour compared with production and transport of commodities. Jewish thought, based on the OT as interpreted by rabbinic authorities, held more firmly to what would now be widely accepted as a proper Christian endorsement of market activity.

Mainstream Judaeo-Christian doctrine, however, has never embraced an unqualified free-market ideology, or anything close to it. It has called for restraint on three counts:

a. Trading relationships should be properly governed by rules of morality and kindness, inculcated in the course of education based on community values, not by naked self-interest. Christian thought should not follow Hayek (The Fatal Conceit) in arguing the essential and beneficial amorality and anonymity of an 'extended order' of trade in modern large-scale societies.

b. Trade should in principle be subject to various kinds of communal action to protect the weak and ignorant, who often receive harsh treatment from free-market forces.

c. Legal regulation of trade should embrace not simply regulation and enforcement of contracts, but also control of prices and profits in some circumstances, notably when the supply of basic commodities is subject to interruption. Two types of modern development bear on such regulatory activity:

1. Occasions for special intervention in the community's interest to relieve shortages have diminished close to vanishing point in all save the poorest countries. This is because the geographical expansion of trading links, and development of intra-market rules and procedures, have greatly reduced the probability of serious local scarcities.

2. The second type of development works strongly in the opposite direction, in at least three ways. The expansion of wealth has facilitated vast trading in commodities that are not on any count 'basic' to true human needs. So, first, trade in 'bads' is not legitimate: there is no blessing on buying and selling pornographic literature, and there are large questions about trade in drugs, even of kinds generally accepted like alcohol.

Taking this point further we note, secondly, that many of the so-called 'goods' of modern life make at best marginal contribution to the true welfare of consumers, while their transport over great distances exacerbates adverse environmental effects. Quantification of these opposing influences, to establish mathematical judgment of what is on balance beneficial, is a delusion of utilitarian welfare economics, but decisions must be made. Free (international) trade is not a Christian slogan (A. B. Cramp, 'The Economic Systems').

Thirdly, community regulation of trade cannot avoid greater emphasis, in some measure, on the welfare of near neighbours than on that of distant ones. For example, destruction of local enterprises cannot without most serious consideration be excused by reference to presumed, but often nebulous, advantages to producers and consumers world-wide (Tamari, p. 103).

At this point there seems no escape from wrestling with the intractable problem of finding grounding for ethical attitudes towards 'the global economy' (see Global Ethics†). We could take note of the debate between two schools of thought which are in opposition both to each other and to narrow economic perceptions (N. Wolterstorff, Until Justice and Peace Embrace, ch. 2). Modernization theorists led by Talcott Parsons (1902-79) see the world as consisting of distinct societies, each at a certain point in the ubiquitous transition from traditional to rational modes of action, so that economic development* is both desirable and possible for all. World-system theorists led by Immanuel Wallerstein (1930-) see the world as consisting of one society (albeit a multiplicity of peoples). This society is rendered interdependent by the international division of labour, capitalistic in varying degrees, and its mechanics are such that the developed 'core' necessarily dominates the 'periphery', so that attaining tolerably equal levels of development (with equitable distribution of income and wealth) is an impossibility.

Evidence on which to judge between these two schools is still emerging, but in the interim the cries of the wretched of the earth support Wallerstein, and challenge the complacency of market economists, many of whom claim Christian affiliation. That complacency being rejected, urgent measures of amelioration are called for. Save in emergencies like famines, international political action faces near-insuperable obstacles, laid bare long ago by Reinhold Niebuhr* (Moral Man and Immoral Society). Fundamental restructuring of economic organization to strengthen more localized relationships at the expense of impersonal global ones faces 'only' the problem of achieving a clear vision and impetus. It is, in this writer's view, the main Christianly defensible way forward.

3. Growing and making. So we come to the sphere of production, with the awareness that it meshes closely with trade, that there is a testing balance to be struck between freedom and guiding restraint, and that the difficulties are compounded to the extent that economic activity is organized by agents lacking full commitment to the communities (local, regional, national) to which worker-consumers feel ready allegiance.

Discussion may be organized round the role of *profit (A. B. Cramp, 'Pleasures, Prices and Principles') in guiding economic activity. Chicago-style economic theory treats profit as the fruit of satisfying consumer needs. Especially when on the defensive, it is wont to extend its support for market freedom from constraint, by arguing that such freedom is in effect also for the purpose of improving the economic welfare of the poor, in absolute if not in relative terms. Christian stewardship, accepting some measure of validity in the argument, is again strong to contend for limitations of superficial freedom, to serve the goals of fostering fellowship and service in fulfilment of the divine purpose.

In the Christian conception, profit reflects divine blessing on the efforts of humankind. In the husbandry of OT times, it was God who gave the increase, through what early modern economists were to call 'the gifts of nature'. If in more capital-intensive agriculture, and in industry and commerce, the increase derives more clearly and proximately from entrepreneurial effort, none the less valid profit can be earned only in ways which respect God's will. Three seeming restrictions on market freedom are readily seen to follow:

a. Production should supply to consumers genuine goods (as already argued), made available on the basis of good work. Products resulting from paying workers insufficient to support dignified living, and from employing them in degrading working conditions, are therefore clearly excluded. So, however, more searchingly, is 'profitable' production flowing from boring, alienating jobs which do not contribute to (and may often derogate from) the use and development of workers' true gifts and powers. Admittedly, work post-Fall cannot be pure joy. Yet 'Who sweeps a room as for thy laws / Makes that and the action fine' (George Herbert). But the assembly-line workers of Charlie Chaplin's film Modern Times can hardly perform their tasks of mind-numbing monotony making 'drudgery divine', and they are not without counterparts today. Humble tasks can, and ought to, be done in an organizational context which gives them some transparent meaning.

b. Production guided by the norm of stewardship should seek to minimize adverse effects on the natural environment, and regard the preservation and restoration thereof as a proper charge before true profit is struck. Community action may be helpful in enforcing good stewardship and creating 'a level playing-field' for competition, but producers should encounter it in co-operative rather than adversarial spirit. Public bodies could perhaps properly act by selling 'licences to pollute', or similar market-mimic devices, but in that case their trading too will be governed by an ethical code, not by desire to maximize public revenues regardless of consequence.

c. Production based upon the criteria of stewardship should act to prevent the exploitation of monopoly positions. Thus natural monopolies (e.g. water supply) call for regulation in the interests of, if not indeed for ownership by, the community being served. Artificial monopolies* whether in the form of cartels* of producers, or of unions of workers, call for close examination. The greater the economic power of such combinations, the more heavily will legal regulation fall upon them. Usually this will involve more restriction of the operation of cartels rather than of trade unions* – though circumstances can arise, and have arisen, in which the implied bias favouring the poor and weak is neutralized by the growth of excessive union power.

4. Borrowing and lending. Concentrations of productive economic power, however, do not in general arise except in the context of capital market processes. Financial institutions provide services which are essential to production, which ought to be subsidiary and subordinate to it, but which in today's large-scale economy constantly threaten to abandon the role of useful servant in favour of the role of tyrannical master.

To recognize this is implicitly to accept the continuing relevance of the biblical prohibition of usury (e.g. Ex. 22; Lv. 25; Dt. 23). The term has often been interpreted, since the prohibition's relaxation in Calvin's* era, to refer to 'excessive' interest* or profit rates on loans. Further, a friendlier attitude has been adopted to loans to producers, the interest on which can be met from profits presumed to reflect success in socially useful work, than to consumer loans more prone to lead to unmanageable debt burdens. These ethical judgments have been maintained without adequate testing during an era in which the financial channels linking lenders to borrowers have been utterly transformed in scale and complexity. The local mutual building society or savings bank has given way to giant institutions – first national, then international, in scope. Small savings are fused into vast parcels of finance, allocated to borrowers by impersonal 'rational' criteria of profitability. Meanwhile, the principle of limited liability has facilitated the development of stock markets which permit the use of borrowed funds to finance takeover bids which all too frequently raise problems of the kind adumbrated above.

The time has come to re-examine the foundations of the prevailing ethical code, to discover just why and how the superficial freedom of capital needs to be limited in the interests of true freedom for fellowship and service. The biblical prohibition seems to have been directed towards preservation of social bonds in tribe and extended family. Any system which operates on the principle of wealth-owners drawing income from activities in which they have no vestige of personal involvement stands under threat of condemnation for actively discouraging the responsible stewardship to which biblical doctrine calls us.

Laws may need adaptation, e.g. to cement relationships by limiting speedy resale of financial assets once acquired, and by limiting takeover bids by strangers. More importantly, more locally-orientated institutions need to be developed (e.g. credit unions, regional savings banks) which may facilitate, if not the abolition of interest, at least its automatic limitation by virtue of the inherent mutuality of more nearly neighbourly, communal relationships. The Spanish model of the Mondragon group of worker co-operatives, whose capital is provided from the community's savings, may depend for its success less on coherence deriving from Basque nationalism, as has been alleged, than on coherence with biblical norms, reflected in the principles of solidarity and subsidiarity (A. McKee, Economics and the Christian Mind) and espoused by its Roman Catholic priest-initiator (R. Oakeshott, The Case for Workers' Co-ops). (See also C. Schumacher, To Live and Work.)

This example illustrates a vital point. Modern Roman Catholic social thought, epitomized and energized by papal encyclicals* from Rerum Novarum (1891) to Centesimus Annus (1991) constitutes, like the Jewish corpus already touched upon, a living and active tradition. Academic investigations, pursued in the cloister, can have practical fruits that affect the life of the world in a profound way – though not necessarily so. The Anglican-based Christian political economy of the early 19th century, re-explored recently by Anthony Wetherman (Revolution, Economics and Religion), was to be fatally weakened by capitulation to secular presuppositions, especially those bearing on the nature of 'scientific' method in reasoning about society. Recent efforts to resurrect the corpse of Protestant thought on social issues are heartening (an example from the Kuyper*-Dooyeweerd* Calvinist school is N. Wolterstorff, Until Justice and Peace Embrace); but progress depends on the emergence of more groups of thinkers willing explicitly to ground their writings in Christian fundamentals, come what may. A chaotic world is increasingly desperate for guidance, and willing to listen.

The success of Mondragon ought to inspire renewed experimentation with the idea that the way forward for property-owning democracy is ownership by people, not so much of houses and general financial claims, as of capital stakes in the enterprises to which their working lives are committed. Given the will, risk-spreading could be provided for.

5. Spending and giving. The OT promised prosperity as reward for collective obedience to God's laws (Dt. 28); Paul claimed for himself, and by implication advocated for his followers, individual contentment with much or little (Phil. 4). Confusion and tension can scarcely be avoided by modern Christians, subject to intense and manifold pressures from a secularized society inspired by the vision of unlimited expansion to satisfy (mainly individual) human desires.

While the desires fostered by society remain predominantly materialistic, the vision is illusory. 'Concordes and castles for everyone' is a goal impossible of realization – if only because of population growth and environmental constraints. Economic theory supposes the goal to be founded on the rock of individual insatiability, treated both as axiom and as proposition backed by powerful empirical support. The fact that sociological theory often sees the same behaviour as evidence of willingness to sacrifice for the good of family or community (Cramp, 'Pleasures, Prices and Principles') should induce caution. Contentions by some medical specialists that the quest for material plenty conceals an existential vacuum in the heart of modern man strengthen doubts.

Attempts to provide limited desires with rational foundation, typified by Gandhi's dictum that 'There is enough for everyone's need, but not for everyone's greed', founder on the impossibility of distinguishing clearly between 'needs' and 'wants' (M. Starkey, Born to Shop, ch. 2); and anyway they must contend with the claim, not totally lacking in justification, that greed in the market economy causes trickledown benefits even to the poorest. There seems no escape from the Pauline standard for Christian individuals, families and groups, accompanied by struggle to reassert for society's guidance the imperatives of divine law. Only good stewardship of God's gifts offers a road towards true and enduring prosperity, free from gross inequality and strife. Journey's end depends on God's gracious action, its beginning on human submission to providential guidance. Society's goal must shift from 'more' to 'enough'. The implications for the manner in which market activity mobilizes human effort are profound and far-reaching. They inspire hope, and they elide with some of the aspirations of the Green movement.

It is worth emphasizing that 'enough' as a goal may well in practice result in 'more', but the latter's composition, and the manner of its gathering and use, will change. Meanwhile, asset-holders must be retaught to have regard to obligations towards communal as well as individual needs. Social as well as legal influence must be mobilized to stimulate fulfilment of responsibilities in the provision of collective goods like affordable housing, schools and hospitals. The social obligations accompanying wealth-ownership, far from being a feudal relic, need to be reinterpreted for application in a society with far more wealth, more widely spread. The modern era espoused the alternative route of abolishing the obligations after payment of a compulsory tax tribute to the poor, but this has proved a blind alley. It eventually produced the mixed economy and the Welfare State, which appeared in Temple's era to be capable of fusing the goals of freedom, fellowship and service in a manner congenial to Christian conscience. However, these institutions today are, if not moribund, certainly struggling for survival. A new way forward is needed. Christians must seek it in picking up the old route, from which society wandered in pursuit of a mirage.

Conclusions

This recovery of reality founded on divine law calls for individual effort, embedded firmly in a group context; for it rests on trinitarian belief in a God who is one in three and three in one, who has called human beings into a church which is the body of Christ, with the eucharist both as nourishment and as model for relationships (C. Schumacher, To Live and Work). Much of the work must fall to groups of Christians (not to the institutional churches) banding together to research, to influence ideas and legislation, to establish pilot-plant institutions; much will involve co-operation with people and groups open to Christian guidance even though not claiming explicit Christian allegiance.

Profound humility is required, recognizing that Christians past and present have perceived blurred individualistic or socialistic visions. Yet the modern era in Western culture is but a few centuries old; that is to say, it is very young: semi-Christian thesis, confronted by semi-Christian antithesis, may yet result in less un-Christian synthesis. There is hope, and Christians with their anchorage in its true foundation, in God's objective moral guidance of God's world, should be at the forefront of its clarification and outworking. The kingdom of God* is coming. It is already among us.

See especially: BANKING; CAPITALISM; CARTELS; COMMON OWNERSHIP; CONSUMERISM; DEBT; ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT; ECONOMIC SANCTIONS; EMPLOYERS' CONFEDERATIONS; FRAUD; GIVING; GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT; INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS; INSIDER DEALING; INSURANCE; INTEREST; INVESTMENT; JUST PRICE; LAND AND LAND REFORM; MANAGEMENT; MARXIST ETHICS; MONETARISM; MONEY; MONOPOLIES; MORTGAGES; MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS; POVERTY; PROFIT; PROPERTY; REWARD; SOCIALISM; STEWARDSHIP; STOCK MARKET; TAXATION; TRADE; WAGE; WASTE; WELFARE STATE; WORK.

Bibliography

A. B. Cramp, 'The Economic Systems', in N. Wolterstorff (ed.), Justice in the International Economic Order (Grand Rapids, 1978); idem, 'Pleasures, Prices and Principles', in J. G. Meeks (ed.), Thoughtful Economic Man (Cambridge, 1991); V. A. Demant, Religion and the Decline of Capitalism (London, 1952); I. C. M. Fairweather and J. I. H. McDonald, The Quest for Christian Ethics (Edinburgh, 1984); D. A. Hay, Economics Today (Leicester, 1989); F. A. von Hayek, The Fatal Conceit: The Errors of Socialism (London and New York, 1989); E. Luard, Socialism without the State (London, 1979); A. McKee, Economics and the Christian Mind (New York, Atlanta, Los Angeles, Chicago, 1987); R. Niebuhr, Moral Man and Immoral Society (New York, 1932); R. Oakeshott, The Case for Workers' Co-ops (London, 1990); C. Schumacher, To Live and Work: A Theological Interpretation (Bromley, 1987); E. F. Schumacher, Small is Beautiful (London, 1973); M. Starkey, Born to Shop (Eastbourne, 1989); M. Tamari, 'With all Your Possessions': Jewish Ethics and Economic Life (London and New York, 1987); W. Temple, Christianity and Social Order (Harmondsworth, 1942; London, 1976); A. M. C. Waterman, Revolution, Economics and Religion: Christian Political Economy, 1798-1833 (Cambridge, 1991); N. Wolterstorff, Until Justice and Peace Embrace (Grand Rapids, 1983); C. J. H. Wright, Living as the People of God (Leicester, 1983) = An Eye for An Eye (Downers Grove, IL, 1983).

A.B.C.

Christian Moral Reasoning

Christian moral reasoning involves the exercise of two kinds of thought together: 1. reflection; and 2. deliberation. Reflection is thought about something; when we reflect, we ask ‘What is the truth?’ Deliberation is thought towards action; when we deliberate, we ask ‘What are we to do?’ The metaphors contained in the two words illustrate the difference: reflection is ‘turning back’ on something; deliberation is ‘weighing up’ alternative courses of action.

An alternative pair of terms, derived from Aristotle,* is often used to make a similar distinction: ‘theoretical reason’ and ‘practical reason’. But if we describe reflection as ‘theoretical’ as opposed to ‘practical’, we may obscure the point that moral reasoning, too, has a stake in reflection on reality. Practical reasoning,* or deliberation, depends upon a reflective grasp of some truth. We must, of course, distinguish moral reasoning from purely theoretical disciplines of thought which involve only thinking-about, and especially from theoretical disciplines which involve thought about human action: e.g. history, or the behavioural sciences. For it is possible to think about human action without projecting it. Not until what was, or is, or will be done becomes a factor in our thinking towards what is to be done, are we engaged in moral reasoning. Nevertheless, though reflection unharnessed to deliberation is not moral reasoning, deliberation cannot happen at all without reflection. Thinking-towards always supposes some thinking-about. We can, precipitately, act without thinking. But we cannot think towards acting without some propositional or ‘theoretical’ elements in our thought.

There is one important theological account of moral responsibility which apparently denies this linking of deliberation and reflection. Karl Barth* argued that moral knowledge is different from factual knowledge in that it is ‘unconditioned’, i.e. we are not at an observer’s distance from it but immediately challenged by it. Because we are touched by the good immediately, it is a ‘concrete individual command’ to us, not a general rule waiting to be filled with content. It tells us, ‘Do this and do not do that’ (Ethics, pp. 64-78). Barth suspected that the space allowed for discursive thought, reflection on the one hand and deliberation on the other, was a way of trying to ‘master’ ethical knowledge, to make it a ‘conditioned’ truth over which we might have a scientist’s distance. His primary concern, an entirely fitting one, was to guard against the idea that the exercise of the will* in choosing between alternatives is its own justification. Decision can be moral only as it answers to the reality that confronts us, and supremely to the unconditioned reality of God’s command. That point is safeguarded by insisting that deliberation cannot stand on its own, as though the acting subject were unconditioned. It must follow from reflection on reality that does not lie within the subject’s control.

But what is that reality? Solely the commanding God (see †) who meets us, argued Barth; while our account intends to allow created reality, provided it is real and not the distorted construction of sinful imagination, to command our reflection and direct our deliberation. Here there is a difference of theological emphasis, centring on the question of creation.* Nevertheless, the command of God, for Barth, is one and the same with God’s promise. It does not only tell us what to do and not to do, but it tells us about ourselves, that we are created as mankind, reconciled in Christ and redeemed. It gives us knowledge of ourselves which is part and parcel with our knowledge of what we must do. In judging what to do we must, said Barth, ‘guard against caprice ... by seeking to grasp and structure the concept of man in terms of the Word of God directed to man’ (Ethics, p. 119).

There is, then, a created reality, the structure of human existence, which determines our knowledge of what God, creator, revealer and commander, requires of us here and now. If that is not saying precisely the same as has been said by speaking of moral reflection and deliberation, it is saying something parallel to it.

1. Reflection

Reflection, if it is to provide a ground for deliberation, must describe the elements of teleological order which make deliberation intelligible and necessary. ‘Teleology’* means the rational account of purpose. But purpose is a notion with two poles, a subjective and an objective. On the one hand there are the purposes of the agent’s mind which, in its aspects as ‘will’, directs our action; on the other, there are the purposes implicit in the world which is so ordered as to make our active purposing intelligible. Teleology traces the correspondence between the purposes we form and the purposedness of reality.

But not every feature of reality evokes intelligible purposes. Most of the information in a scientific textbook, for example, engages us only at the level of disciplined curiosity; and, indeed, science* as an intellectual endeavour abstracts systematically from teleology. Yet we need to see the teleological order in the world if it is to appear to us a place that we can act into. That is why moral deliberation cannot begin immediately from the findings of the human sciences. Those findings, to be a useful part of moral reasoning, must first be integrated into an understanding of reality which can ground deliberative freedom; and that requires the teleological insight of philosophy or theology.

But how can claims to discern objective purposes in the world be tested? Such claims may often reflect cultural prejudices and are usually contentious. Why should we not agree, to take the famous comic example, that if we had not been meant to eat each other, we would not have been made of meat? From a formal point of view there is nothing to choose between that and the claim that we have brains for understanding and hands for manipulation. A powerful philosophical tradition has sought to rule out all such teleological judgments on formal grounds, but this is a mistake. There are true and false ones; and those that are false fail simply because what they discern falls short of what is there to be discerned. Christian believers maintain that the purposes of God, disclosed by revelation,* are the only final measure against which to prove our claims to find purposive order in the world. It is not that God’s purposes sweep our human discernments aside, replacing them with simple bare commands to be obeyed. From our point of view they may sometimes seem to do that, because they challenge our prejudices and perceptions, so that there are times when we must simply hear God’s word and obey, without fully understanding why. But if that were all there was to it, God’s purposes would simply be imposed upon the world; and in that case he would not be the God who created the world and then redeemed what he had created. God’s purposes interpret the teleological structures of the world, for they uphold it and affirm it, though they also judge it. Moral reflection attends to what is shown us of God’s purposes in creation and redemption (see Sin and Salvation†), on the one hand, and to the order of the world, in the light of God’s purposes, on the other.

In the first place, we reflect upon the history of God’s dealings with the world: in creation, in the coming of Christ and in the promised fulfilment. Each area of moral interest must be viewed in the light of the whole of this history. For example, marriage* is not only a gift of creation; it is taken up into the reconciling fellowship of Christ, and is superseded in the eschatological kingdom (see Kingdom of God*). Telling the truth* is a task entrusted to Adam, in the Genesis story, as he names the animals; it is also a responsibility of redeemed mankind, who has been told the truth about itself in Jesus Christ and is summoned to confess it; and the full disclosure of the truth is promised in God’s final act of judgment. Work* is a gift of creation; it is ennobled into mutual service in the fellowship of Christ; it gives place to the Sabbath* rest of the kingdom. And so on. But this understanding of God’s purposes in salvation* history can be won only through reading the story of Christ and its interpretation by prophets and apostles. Scriptural authority is foundational for Christian ethics, as for all Christian thought, because it is the means through which Christ is made known to us.

In the second place, we reflect upon the immanent purposedness of the world itself, as it is shown in the light of revelation: the significance of fellow humanity (see †), the ‘neighbour’ with whom we are destined to various forms of community (see Community Ethics†); the significance of non-human nature, placed under our protection and serving our benefit but with its own dignity before God; the significance of the human body as the mode of personal presence to others, and of the conscience* as the place where we become aware of ourselves before God. The knowledge that we gain of the purposes implicit in these structures is theological knowledge and cannot simply be taken as self-evident; yet it may coincide with the fragmentary, but not negligible, moral perceptions which all human beings share (see Natural Law*). Christian reflection can appreciate these perceptions positively and can learn from them, but without supposing them to be autonomous or self-sufficient. They reflect to us the light that God has shed upon the world through his disclosure of himself, like the moon which reflects the light of the sun.

2. Deliberation

To say that deliberation is thought towards action is not the same as saying that it is always towards decision. A number of writers in recent years (e.g. James McClendon, 1924- , and Stanley Hauerwas, 1940-) have protested against the idea – christened ‘decisionism’ or ‘quandary ethics’ – that moral reasoning is solely a discipline of decision-making, as though nobody had any use for it until some quandary arose that had to be solved. Deliberation is not a form of thinking to which we have only occasional resort when we find ourselves, by accident, caught out with a divided mind and something needing to be done. Thought towards action is not restricted to thought towards some particular act, but includes, more embracingly, the whole of our active existence. Our deliberative agenda is not exhausted by the question, ‘What shall we do next?’ We also ask, ‘How shall we live our lives?’ and ‘What attitudes shall we take to specific areas of practical concern?’

The question ‘How shall we live our lives?’ invites an answer in a kind of moral language quite different from the language we use in reporting our decisions, ‘I ought’ or ‘I ought not’. This is the language of the virtues* and dispositions, much used in the NT and especially the epistles to sketch a general outline of the quality of Christian life. What is the relation of these two kinds of language? Is a virtue merely a disposition to repeat acts of a certain kind, so that when Paul says, ‘Be kind to one another ...’ (Eph. 4:32), it is shorthand for the advice that we should first perform one kindly action, then a second, then a third and so on? But that would mean that we could never deliberate about the shape of life as a whole, but only about the next particular thing we have to do. Yet we do, at least, reflect about our own and others’ conduct as a whole, finding general terms for the ways in which we behave ourselves: love, joy, peace, patience ..., or contrariwise impurity, superstition, hostility ... and so on (cf. Gal. 5:19ff.). But if such reflection is supposed to lead to any practical result, there must be a corresponding form of deliberation, so that we think how to shape the way we live, not only how to shape the next thing we do. We can frame policies for the conduct of our lives, and that is what the writers of the epistles are teaching us how to do well.

But besides framing policies for our conduct as a whole, we deliberate on our attitudes to specific areas of practical concern. What attitude, for example, should we adopt towards nuclear weapons (see Deterrence, Nuclear*)? That question demands an answer quite apart from any particular decision we may have to make. Comparatively few people, indeed, deal closely enough with nuclear weapons for particular decisions to arise; yet a thoughtful attitude to them is necessary if we are to chart a course responsibly through life in the late 20th century. To form that attitude rightly is part of the obedience we each owe God. And as with nuclear weapons, so with every other area: we must form a policy about the right and wrong of sexual self-disposal, for example, quite apart from any particular occasion of sexual opportunity (see Sexuality†); we must have attitudes to the possession and use of wealth before we inherit an estate. We need to approach concrete decisions with moral policies already formed.

These policies include not only our handling of the matter directly, should occasion arise, but our dealings with those who do handle it. Deliberative questions about specific moral topics arise in more than one form: there are pastoral and political questions as well as questions of personal self-determination. 'How should I act?' is followed by 'How shall I advise others to act?' and 'How shall I use such public authority as I have to constrain the community to act?' The answers we give to these different questions may be interestingly contrasted. On the matter of abortion,* for example, one person might reply: 'I shall never have an abortion; I shall try to discourage those who see abortion as their only way out; I shall support policies of greater legal restriction.' That is one possible combination of consistent answers, not the only one and not necessarily the best. But not every combination of answers would be consistent. Their coherence must depend upon their all being compatible with the same set of reflective judgments on the meaning of abortion, the reasons for which it is performed, its effect on society, and so on.

Moral rules.* In formulating these policies we depend upon generic moral rules. Lying behind the question 'What shall I do?' there is the more basic question 'What shall we do?' in which the subject is undifferentiated. If what I propose for myself does not correspond to what we human beings, faced with such questions, ought to propose, then I have proposed wrongly.

A terminology I have adopted and defended elsewhere (see Resurrection and Moral Order) uses 'generic' as the opposite of 'particular', meaning 'to do with a kind'. 'General', on the other hand, is the opposite of 'specific', and means 'imprecise'. A judgment may be more or less general: more general than some other judgment and more specific than a third. But between 'generic' and 'particular' there is no more or less. Either one makes a judgment about a particular case, as if pointing to it: 'This war is criminal.' Or one makes a judgment about a kind of thing: 'War is criminal' – to which one may or may not add specifications: 'aggressive war is criminal', 'aggressive nuclear war is criminal', etc. English-speaking moral philosophers sometimes use 'universal' in place of 'generic'; while Germanspeaking writers often use 'universal' very widely, to cover what is meant both by 'generic' and 'general'. But the term 'universal' has another important sense – referring to the universe, or whole of things – and it is more convenient to avoid it altogether in this context.

a. When we deliberate about our moral rules, we aim to make them less general and more specific, i.e. to give them the clarity and precision that they need in relation to distinct kinds of circumstance. This sometimes, but not always, means noting 'exceptions'. If we say 'Murder is wrong, but killing in just war is not murder' – or, alternatively, 'Killing is wrong except in just war' – we are positing an exception to a general rule (see Just-War Theory;* Killing*).

Two difficulties, from opposite points of view, are commonly raised to the idea that valid general rules may have exceptions: 1. that if we recognize any moral laws as authoritative and God-given, then introducing exceptions to them is simply illegitimate; 2. that finding exceptions disproves the general rule, and so makes it invalid.

1. To the first difficulty, we reply that if we are to obey any rule, we must understand the scope and meaning of its terms; and that applies no less to God-given rules such as those in the Decalogue.* Does 'honouring' one's father and mother include acquiescing in unreasonable senile whims, even when one is an adult? And does 'father and mother' extend to grandfathers and aunts? Such questions can be given sensible answers, of course; the point is, they may need to be. If we do not see that such questions may arise, then we are underestimating what the command may require of us.

2. To the second difficulty it can be said that the exception proves the rule, since the question whether this or that exception is appropriate cannot be put unless there is a rule to make an exception to. Who would ever wonder about indulging tyrannous parental whims unless it were understood that parents have prerogatives? The command determines the shape our moral questioning shall take, what cases we shall find problematic, and so on. A moral rule is interestingly and helpfully general. It marks the terms of the moral discussion, and so assists us to chart a course through unfamiliar circumstances.

Exceptions to rules are not 'made' so much as 'found'. It is not a matter of arbitrary preference that moralists permit killing in just war while the Decalogue forbids murder; it is an implication of the requirement to do justice and defend the innocent. Furthermore, the specification of general rules does not always consist in finding exceptions and, as it were, whittling the rule away, as a third-rate casuistry* may sometimes make it seem. It also consists in finding unexpected moral suggestiveness in rules, as when Jesus found implications for the conduct of desire within the law forbidding adultery.* The purpose of deliberating on moral rules is to discern their real application to distinct circumstances. 'Exceptions' are no more than cases to which the rule, properly understood, does not apply. Some rules are sometimes said to be 'exceptionless'. If this is taken to mean that there are rules demanding or forbidding specific types of action about which it is impossible to ask in any case whether they apply or not, it is obviously a mistake. But in another sense that term may be appropriately applied to those basic moral rules which identify claims that must always be respected somehow, even when the respect required is paradoxical. Nobody may kill in a just war, for example, who is not defending innocent lives and who does not regard the lives of the guilty, too, as precious. Thus the command 'Thou shalt not murder' shapes the principles of just-war conduct. No moral rule is complete in itself; it is a kind of chapter-heading for moral deliberation, an organizing principle on which our reasoning must proceed.

b. Particular moral judgments, or 'decisions', involve bringing the particular instance under a generic moral principle or rule that has been grasped independently. If killing this person is wrong, it is because it would be a case of murder; and murder can be seen to be wrong irrespective of this case. The wrongness of the instance derives from the wrongness of the class. The logic of saying otherwise was explored to its irrationalist conclusions by the short-lived fashion called 'situation ethics',* represented by Joseph Fletcher.* Situation ethics is best understood as a proposal to construct moral deliberation solely in terms of particular decisions and one very general all-embracing moral virtue, with nothing in between. Its tenor was punctiliar and individualist, an expression of that unqualified attention to the 'concrete' which was a fruit of late idealism* and existentialism.

What is required for a particular judgment, then, is that the case be lined up with the moral rule that it instantiates; but this demands a kind of leap of recognition: 'But this would be an act of murder, an instance of the kind of thing we meant when we said murder was wrong!' No amount of subtle specification of the general condemnation of murder will tell us whether what we are about to do is, in actual fact, a case of what we have been talking about. A particular moral decision is never derived directly from a generic rule; an act of recognition must intervene. There can be no rule for performing this act of recognition; if there were one, it would be a part of the moral rule itself. Recognition must just happen; it depends on 'insight'. That is the element of truth in situation ethics; but it is only one element of the truth, since no-one could recognize a case as being an instance of a kind unless there were rules that distinguished kinds of case.

Most of the time, it appears, recognition is no problem. Someone who acknowledges that lying (see Truth*) is wrong, but fails to see that a favourite politician's untruth was actually an instance of lying, usually strikes us as obtuse or prevaricating. This appearance, however, is misleading. Even the most obvious recognitions have to be learned in childhood, and there are, furthermore, recognitions that are genuinely difficult even for morally educated adults.

Let us press the example of the so-called 'justified lie'. The secret police are searching for an honest dissident, and only an elaborate subterfuge, involving outright deception, will protect him. Apparently it would be a case of lying, generally condemned. What account can we give of our intuitions, if we have them, that a falsehood in this case could not be blameworthy?

Three theories have been advanced: 1. There are cases which simply lie outside the scope of any rule – 'exceptional' not merely in the sense that they are unusual, but in that they are not capable of being encompassed in any generic formulation at all; 2. some cases arise at points where two moral rules conflict in the claims they make on us, the point of 'dilemma'; and 3. any moral rule may, in some specifiable circumstances, not demand of us what on the face of it it might seem to demand.

1. The difficulty with the first of these theories is that if the situation lies outside all moral rules, no appreciation of the moral claim it makes can ever be reached. We have no more reason to think that mercy* is appropriate than that truthfulness is.

2. The difficulty with the second is how we are to decide which of the two conflicting demands – mercy or truthfulness – should be decisive for our action. We seem to need some third rule to arbitrate between the two conflicting rules. But that rule-to-order-rules will either be a formal one (as in the ‘proportionalism’ advocated by Richard McCormick, 1922-), applicable to all conflicting rules regardless – though there can be no such rule; or it will express an insight into what these specific rules demand in this kind of conflict-situation, and then we end up with the third account after all.

3. The third theory, represented by Paul Ramsey* and Helmut Thielicke,* is the best. If we decide that a demand to know the truth is weakened when it is asserted with a hostile and illegal purpose, then we have discerned something important about what truth itself demands of us and the conditions for the exercise of truthfulness. We have not merely decided that mercy should prevail in this case; we have gained an understanding of the law of truth itself.

See especially: ABSOLUTES; ATONEMENT; BENEVOLENCE; BLESSEDNESS; CASUISTRY; CHOICE; CONSCIENCE; CONTEXTUAL ETHICS; CREATION; DECALOGUE; DOUBLE EFFECT; DUALISM; DUTY; ENDS AND MEANS; ESCHATOLOGY AND ETHICS; EVIL; FAITH; FALL; FORGIVENESS; FREEDOM; FREE WILL AND DETERMINISM; GODLINESS; GOODNESS; GOSPEL AND ETHICS; GRACE; HAPPINESS; HEAVEN AND HELL; HOLINESS; HOLY SPIRIT; HOPE; HYPOCRISY; IDEALISM; IMAGE OF GOD; INTENTION; INTUITIONISM; JESUS; JEWISH ETHICS; JUDGMENT AND THE JUDGMENT; JUSTIFICATION; KINGDOM OF GOD; LAW; LAW AND GOSPEL; LAW, USES OF; LIBERATION THEOLOGY; MEAN, DOCTRINE OF THE; MELIORISM; MERCY; MERIT; MORAL AGENCY; MOTIVE, MOTIVATION; NATURAL LAW; NEIGHBOUR; NORMS; OBLIGATION; PHILOSOPHICAL ETHICS; PIETISM; PRACTICAL REASON; PROPHECY, OLD TESTAMENT; PROSELYTISM; REASON AND RATIONALISM; RECONCILIATION; REPENTANCE; RESPONSIBILITY; RESURRECTION; REVELATION; RIGHTEOUSNESS; RULES; SANCTIFICATION; SERMON ON THE MOUNT; TEMPTATION; THEODICY; VALUES; VICE; VIRTUE, VIRTUES; WILL, HUMAN; WISDOM; WORLD.

Bibliography

Augustine, On Christian Doctrine, in NPNE, 1st series, vol. 2; K. Barth, Ethics, tr. G. W. Bromiley (Edinburgh and New York, 1981); J. M. Finnis, Fundamentals of Ethics (Oxford, 1983); S. Hauerwas, The Peaceable Kingdom (Notre Dame, IN, 1983; London, 1984); J. W. McClendon, Systematic Theology 1: Ethics (Nashville, TN, 1986); R. McCormick and P. Ramsey (eds.) Doing Evil to Achieve Good: Moral Choice in Conflict Situations (Chicago, 1978); O. O'Donovan, Resurrection and Moral Order (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 1994); G. H. Outka and P. Ramsey (eds.), Norm and Context in Christian Ethics (London and New York, 1968); H. Thielicke, TE 1, ch. 27.

O.M.T.O'D.

PART TWO

A

ABELARD, PETER (1079-1142). Born in Brittany, Abelard studied and then taught at various schools in France, and in 1113 became the head of the cathedral school of Notre-Dame in Paris. His account of his rise to fame and his humiliation because of his love affair with Héloïse is found in his Historia Calamitatum. Abelard turned to theology only later in life, using the same dialectical skills that had made him so incisive as a philosopher to treat of such problems as the Trinity. Although criticized by Bernard of Clairvaux (1090-1153) for putting faith on the level of human opinion, it is fairer to say that Abelard employed a new, dialectical method for the understanding of faith,* a method that advanced theological method significantly.

In his ethical theory Abelard distinguishes between defect (or vice) and sin. Because of defect one consents to do evil and not do good. Such consent is sin. The wish or desire to do wrong is not sin, but only the consent. Also, sin is not increased by the action. Abelard, then, makes morality consist in intention* alone, and actions, apart from intention, are morally neutral.

Intention is not to be called good just because it seems good, but because it is what is pleasing to God. Persons who do not know the gospel cannot be held responsible for what they do not know, and so Abelard is unable to explain why those who die not knowing the gospel are none the less condemned (cf. Rom. 1:18-23).

In his Theologia Christiana (1123-24) Abelard argues that non-Christians also have access to God's laws and that those pagans and Jews who followed them were saved. Christianity is the total truth that contains the teachings of the pagans and Jews within it.

Bibliography

Peter Abelard's Ethics, tr. D. E. Luscombe (Oxford, 1971); The Story of Abelard's Adversities, tr. J. T. Muckle (Toronto, 1954).

J. R. McCallum, Abelard's Christian Theology (Oxford, 1948).

A.G.V.

ABORTION is an emotive issue. Varied descriptions of the same act carry different emotive contents. Evacuating the uterus sounds very different from 'scraping out the baby'. Spontaneous and natural abortion is distinguished from human intervention to end a pregnancy. Such intervention may be by drugs or surgical procedures. Some contraceptives like the intra-uterine device or coil and the RU486 drug act as abortifacients (causing abortions) expelling fertilized eggs. From the Roman Catholic perspective, all contraception (see Birth Control*), even what prevents fertilization, is unnatural. In many countries, abortion is legal under specified circumstances.

Usually permission from at least two physicians is required, and some time-scale, e.g. 24 or 28 weeks, is set as the upper limit for performing abortions legally. The age limit varies, and in India may be up to 40 weeks. Specific conditions often refer to risks to the mother's life, to her social and psychological well-being, to the social, psychological and economic wellbeing of other children, and when the foetus is thought to be abnormal. This last category will grow as we are better able to diagnose congenital abnormalities. In such cases, abortion prevents the suffering of the abnormal individual and of the family and carers. While this may be true, it also implies a particular view of human worth, i.e. that handicap and abnormality make life not worth living, and calls in question society's view of normality. Doctors are thus permitted to perform abortions legally. There is a conscience clause which allows doctors and nurses to refrain from taking part, but this creates great problems in a medical unit and has discouraged many from becoming specialists in obstetrics and gynaecology. In practice, this legal permission has become almost abortion on demand, and doctors find it very difficult to refuse requests for abortions.

The language used to describe the foetal life itself can carry value. Some talk of embryos (potential humans), as opposed to foetuses (people with potential). Part of this is disagreement about when life begins. For some it begins at fertilization, when the sperm and the egg unite and the full genetic potential is in place, but the possibility of twinning and the over 40% loss of fertilized eggs in the normal monthly cycle without any suggestion of pregnancy are adduced as evidence against this. Research in embryology* and infertility uses 14 days as a cut-off point for experimentation on embryos, on the grounds that the individual is formed near that point as the primitive streak develops with the capacity to register pain. Implantation, when the fertilized egg fastens on the wall of the womb, is the next option, which allows the use of the coil - which many argue is vital for population control in the Third World, where it is the most effective contraception. Then quickening, when the child moves within the womb, or viability, when high technology medicine can preserve life, are selected. Medical practitioners favour viability as the point when a clear patient becomes the responsibility of the doctor. With advances in intrauterine surgery, this line will not only continue to be reduced from 24 to 21 weeks, but be questioned as genetic engineering* and manipulation* become more viable. In practice, many doctors adopt a developmental life of the unborn, recognizing that as the foetus develops there is greater claim made on the rest of us by the foetus. When viable, the foetus can be considered as a patient to be cared for in the same way as the mother. Others, however, suggest birth, stressing that the Genesis account links life with the breath of God, and some claim that genuinely independent existence is necessary before we have human life in its fullness. This latter view links with moves to define human life in the having of certain fundamental capacities rather than in biological terms. The modern debate rejects all discussion of ensoulment, which was the traditional basis for asserting the value of foetal life. The arbitrariness of the moment of animation and the alleged difference between male and female ensoulment make the traditional view difficult to propound in a secular society. Even if we could agree about when life begins, that would not in itself solve the dilemma of the value implicit in or attached to human life at its various stages.

The heart of the abortion debate seems to rest on a decision between the rights (see Rights, Human*) of the mother and the rights of the child. The status of the child thus does have significance for there to be rights involved. Legal decisions about inheritance in utero, and the awarding of damages for accidents which happened in utero, seem to suggest that the foetus does have legal rights. In contrast, the women's movement in particular has argued that every woman has the right to do whatever she wants with her own body. It is hard to accept such claims, for society limits the freedom of all its members and their autonomy by restricting what people are allowed to do with their bodies. Laws about seat-belts, motor-cycle helmets, pornography and prostitution embody such limits. The lesser claim is that in a situation of conflict of interests, the rights of the woman should have precedence over the rights of the father or of the child. Courts have usually found in favour of the mother rather than the father and the foetus. This would justify the rare occurrence of aborting the foetus when the life of the mother was at risk. More commonly, in situations of crime or incest,* abortion has been legally justified on the grounds of the woman's right over that of the foetus. Those opposed to abortion stress the need to protect the innocent and the principle of the sanctity of life.

The Christian perspective

The principle of the sanctity of life* is clearly established in Gn. 9 and in the Ten Commandments. The OT does picture God as permitting and requiring the taking of human life in terms of warfare and the death penalty for specific crimes. Some see this as justifying the killing only of the guilty and not of the innocent; others as a basis for a consistent, 'seamless robe' of the sanctity of life in every situation. The Bible as a whole clearly states that life comes from God as his gift and that we are answerable to him for what we do with our own and other people's lives. Such responsibility means that we shall all answer before the judgment* seat for our actions and failures to act. Thus, any and every taking of life is a most serious business and requires justification to God. Some suggest that in a fallen world there may be situations where no matter what we do it will be evil. Thus, in extreme settings, the taking of life may be the 'lesser of two evils', remaining an evil which needs confession and repentance. This may be reflected in Ex. 21:22-23, where a distinction is drawn between the loss of a woman's life and a baby's as a result of an accident. In the one case, the legal requirement is a life for a life, but in the case of foetal life, a fine is required. Though exegetically ambiguous, at most this shows a distinction between foetal and fully developed human life, but does not in itself justify abortion. Indeed, it is clearly seen as a wrongdoing requiring recompense, even though this is in the setting of accidental death and not, as in modern abortion, where death is the intention.

The calling of the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah while in the womb, and the detailed description of foetal life as portrayed in Ps. 139, offer a clear picture of God's concern for and intimate involvement with human beings from before conception. While there is no doubt about God's role in the creation of life, these passages are all written from the perspective of psalmist and prophets looking backwards. All of their life has been in God's hand, and they testify to that. Whether we are able to look forwards from every embryo to the person they would be, if other things were equal and nothing else happened, is less certain.

In the NT, after the annunciation by Gabriel to Mary, the now newly pregnant Mary goes to visit the six-months-pregnant Elizabeth. She describes how the child in the womb (John the Baptist) leapt at the coming of the Saviour's mother (Lk. 1:39-45). This seems to point to foetal awareness in John and the foetal identity of both Jesus and John. The same note of backwards-looking reflection matters here, for the physician Luke records what happened to those who were known as John the Baptist and as Jesus. Whether the forwards projection or the generalization from such a unique, doubly miraculous event can in itself justify a high view of foetal life is more debatable.

The early church and its successors firmly held to the need to defend the unborn and the inviolability of the foetus, once it was ensouled. The modern debate has moved on, and Christians may disagree, but not about the central need to preserve the principle of the sanctity of life, and limit the idea that people are free to please themselves with regard to their own bodies regardless of the impact on others. This is not a patriarchal imposition, but a recognition that the vulnerable need to be protected. Within the Catholic community, abortion has sometimes been justified on the basis of the double-effect* argument. If the aim of an operation (e.g. an abortion) is to save the life of the mother, then that primary effect and intention* are morally acceptable; the second or double effect is the death of the child. While still ultimately responsible, if the doctor's primary intention was to preserve the woman's life and there was no alternative, then a doctor may be considered to be morally justified in ending foetal life.

Current issues

With increasing technological and genetic advances, the problems will continue to grow in this area. Selective reduction, where healthy implanted embryos are destroyed to avoid multiple births in infertility treatment, is now common. The use of foetal tissue from aborted fetuses raises moral questions about the integrity of the foetus and who should give permission for such work, if it should be permitted. Some regard this as a means of bringing some good result out of an evil situation, while others regard this as 'playing at God' and reducing the value and integrity of human life. As our capacity to measure and manipulate foetal and embryonic life grows, so will the moral dilemmas. Christians must remember that behind the dilemmas are real people facing unwanted pregnancies, bringing up handicapped children, or coping with the long-term results of rape*. and incest. The need to offer genuine assistance to the unmarried mother, to the mother who already has a large family and no proper means of support, to the parents of handicapped children, and to those who have been criminally assaulted should be part of the Christian response regardless of our own attitude towards abortion. Such loving care may well decrease the number of abortions. Likewise, Christians must reflect on their responsibility in a society where human life is regarded cheaply. It is proper to ask what kind of society we become when human life is regarded as disposable; all of us may then be vulnerable. The prophetic proclamation of the principle of the sanctity of life must be matched by concern for those who do not and cannot accept that standard. Practical help with practical alternatives must be produced. In political terms, Christians are free in a democracy to work for a change in the abortion laws and to persuade society of the evil of abortion on demand. They do not have the right to inflict their morality on society. This creates a tension for politicians and law-makers who are Christians. Do they refuse to accept anything but the ideal they believe in, or are they willing to work by a process of compromise at reducing the conditions and time-scale for abortions, thus killing the abortion law by a series of reductions? As part of restraining evil in a pluralist society, many will feel that saving the few is better than saving none, and that, in time, science will show the integrity of human life from its earliest stages.

See also: ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE.†

Bibliography

D. Cook, The Moral Maze (London, 1992); R.F.R. Gardner, Abortion: The Personal Dilemma (Exeter, 1972); O. O'Donovan, Begotten or Made? (Oxford, 1984).

E.D.C.

ABSOLUTES. When used in an ethical context, the word 'absolute' usually refers to a rule which maintains obligatory force under all circumstances. It allows no exceptions.

Ethical absolutism has a variety of roots. Some religious thinkers root it in the holy and unchanging nature of God (see†), who has revealed his will in propositional, prescriptive statements which are valid for all time. Some Enlightenment* thinkers (notably Immanuel Kant*) root it in the dictates of human reason,* which posits unconditional imperatives of a universal nature. Some 20th-century thinkers root it simply in human intuition: we simply know that a duty* such as keeping a promise should always be kept, even if we cannot fully explain why.

In some ways the Bible appears to support ethical absolutism. The Mosaic law* is presented as absolute and inviolable. In the narrative sections of the OT God is often portrayed as intolerant of the slightest disobedience to his commands, an attitude apt to be conveyed through acts of spectacular divine punishment (see, e.g., Lv. 10:1-2; Nu. 15:32-36; 2 Sa. 6:6-7). Jesus affirmed the law down to its last jot and tittle, and said that his would-be followers must exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, who were known for their precise observance of the law (Mt. 5:18-20). Paul lists various practices which seem to be forbidden absolutely, being seen as incompatible with inheritance of the kingdom of God (see, e.g., 1 Cor. 6:9-11).

Good grounds exist for making certain rules absolute. The prohibition of rape* is an example. By very definition, rape is an unloving act; it forces another person into the most intimate of human behaviour against his or her will. It invariably humiliates, hurts and damages the victim, mentally and physically. There is no need to hedge qualifications and possible exceptions round a rule against rape; there is everything to be said for forbidding it absolutely.

Most of the rules which have strongest claims for being accorded absolute status have something important in common. Rape, bestiality, torture, 'framing' an innocent person, performing potentially lethal experiments on someone without his or her consent: all are serious violations of human dignity. They fail to respect the special value inherent in human beings which comes from the fact that we are made in God's image.*

But even from a biblical perspective, it may be argued that ethical absolutes are fairly few in number. The fact is that different God-given commands can come into conflict. One might think that the most fundamental violation of human dignity is the taking of human life. Certainly, the Bible forbids that in general terms. But the commandment not to kill (Ex. 20:13) is clearly qualified by express permission to kill in the circumstances of war* and capital punishment.* It appears that human beings can act in such a way that they forfeit the right to life. It is only killing of the innocent which receives absolute condemnation in the Bible.

As far as the duty to preserve the lives of innocent people is concerned, this can be an obligation which outweighs other moral duties which normally hold sway, e.g. telling the truth. Although some biblical commentators, notably Augustine,* have argued an absolutist line on truth-telling, lying to save life seems to receive clear biblical sanction in the stories of the Heb. midwives (Ex. 1:15-21), Rahab (Jos. 2) and Elisha at Dothan (2 Ki. 6:8-23). Again, the justification would seem to be that, in exceptional cases, human beings can forfeit their right to know the truth because of their malicious intent.

Conflicts of moral duty do occur, most often in times of war and political upheaval, but in many more everyday situations as well. Human beings are then obliged to rank one duty higher than another, to disobey one rule in order to obey another. This raises a question-mark about the absolute status of the vast majority of rules. Any rule that might, in some circumstance, be set aside in favour of another can no longer, strictly speaking, be called an absolute. However, there are many rules* (like truth-telling) which are not absolute, but which have a strong prima facie case for being obeyed.

It is also important to note that, despite Mt. 5:18-20, Jesus often adopted an attitude of radical reinterpretation of the law. He interpreted the Sabbath* not in terms of a prohibition of all work but as an opportunity for doing good. He directed people's attention towards 'the more important matters of the law - justice, mercy and faithfulness' (Mt. 23:23) and, of course, love. These are moral obligations of perennial significance, which are rooted in the heart and character (not merely the will) of God. As such they are perhaps more deserving of the description 'absolute', but that would be to use the word in other than its usual sense.

See also: CHRISTIAN MORAL REASONING;† TRUTH.

Bibliography

J. A. Baker, The Foolishness of God (London, 1975); N. L. Geisler, Christian Ethics: Options and Issues (Grand Rapids, 1989; Leicester, 1990); R. Higginson, Dilemmas: A Christian Approach to Moral Decision making (London and Louisville, KY, 1988); J. Murray, Principles of Conduct (Grand Rapids and London, 1957); P. Ramsey, Deeds and Rules in Christian Ethics (London and Edinburgh, 1965; New York, 1967); H. Thielicke, TE 1.

R.A.Hig.

ABSOLUTION is the expression to penitent believers that God for Christ's sake forgives them their sins. For example, English Anglican prayer books (1662 and 1980) offer congregations a declaration of, and prayers for, absolution, but avoid an indicative absolution ('I absolve you') except in illness if someone 'cannot quiet (his) own conscience' (Book of Common Prayer).

In Scripture, sin is not the last word (Lk. 23:43; Acts 9:10-19). God's mercy, expressed in Christ's supreme priestly sacrifice, secures release (Tit. 3:5; Heb. 4:14-16; Jas. 2:13b). Ministry (e.g. adult mutuality, Jas. 5:16) according to Christ's pattern, sensitive to the Spirit (Jn. 20:22-23), can help mediate the assurance of God's forgiveness* and acquittal (Mk. 2:5; Jn. 8:11; Rom. 5:1; 8:1; 1 Jn. 1:9-10).

Personalized absolution provides confidentiality and can assist the discrimination of real from imaginary guilt.* A traditional pattern of absolution can be understood theologically in this context. (Some ministers conclude: 'Please pray for me. I also am a sinner.') The 'crisis' of absolution encourages the 'process' of self-controlled life in the Spirit. Absolution reunites brethren in the bond of peace (Calvin), reminding Christians that personal relationships need continual attention.

An awareness of the moral dimension in pastoral care is expressed through a sensitive use of absolution. In corporate worship, for example, people can be helped to face failure, resolve occasions causing feelings of guilt, and overcome personal insecurity. However, opportunities for self-discovery and greater self understanding are lost if absolution is offered too quickly. Thus the carer may select from this and other approaches when caring for those in need.

See also: CONFESSION.

Bibliography

M. Dudley and G. Rowell, Confession and Absolution (London, 1990); G. Oliver, 'Model and Myth in Pastoral Care', Anv 6.3, 1989, pp. 211-222.

G.O.S.

ABSTINENCE is refraining from certain practices, such as eating, drinking or sexual intercourse. It may be total (such as an absolute fast, see Est. 4:16; Acts 9:9), or partial (such as avoiding certain foods proscribed by the dietary laws of the OT, see Lv. 11; Dn. 10:3; also Acts 15:29). It may be perpetual (such as celibacy), or for a specific time or occasion (such as abstinence from sexual intercourse to devote oneself to prayer, 1 Cor. 7:5; fasting* for religious observances, Lv. 23:2; Zc. 8:19; or fasting in the context of a worship gathering, Acts 13:3; or the appointing of elders, 14:23). It may involve one person or a whole nation (see 2 Ch. 20:1-4).

Reasons for abstinence may be spiritual (Lk. 4:1-2), cultic (Lv. 11; Nu. 6:1-4; Je. 35:6), economic, medical or out of consideration for others (Rom. 14; 1 Cor. 8; 10); however, biblical abstinence focuses on spiritual purposes, such as gaining mastery over one's appetites (Mt. 4:3-4; 1 Cor. 6:12). Wrong reasons for abstinence include an attitude towards the body as inherently evil, atoning for sins, and acquiring merit with God and humans (see Zc. 7:5; Mt. 6:16-18; Rom. 6:19). In any case, all is to be done to the glory of God (1 Cor. 10:31).

Partial abstinence (such as fasting) seems to be expected by Christ (Mt. 6:16; 9:15) and was practised by the NT church (Acts 13:2-3). While the Bible does not command perpetual total abstinence, it does proscribe indulgence, such as drunkenness (e.g. Pr. 20:1; 23:29ff.; Is. 5:11, 22; Rom. 13:13; 1 Cor. 6:10). Ethical arguments in favour of total abstinence (of alcoholic beverages or of sexual intercourse, for instance) focus on the risk of injury to the individual who is intemperate or to the surrounding community.

In modern times abstinence (see Temperance*) has been directed at alcoholic beverages in Britain and the US (especially since the 19th century and particularly in the Wesleyan tradition), at the eating of meat or fish (see Vegetarianism*), and most recently at sexual relationships in light of the AIDS* epidemic. While abstinence is not exclusive to Christianity and has not been popular in modern society (which is biased against depriving any appetite) or among evangelicals (perhaps in reaction against the excesses of medieval asceticism), practices such as fasting have received much attention recently.

Bibliography

R. Foster, Celebration of Discipline (San Francisco, ²1988; London, ²1989); A. Wallis, God's Chosen Fast (Eastbourne and Fort Washington, PN, 1969).

D.L.O.

ABUSE. Person-abuse refers to the perversion/misuse of the privilege of caring for another person, e.g. a child, elderly relative or spouse.

In the NT, the Lord Jesus shows a deep concern for children and their care (Mt. 18:5-6; 21:16; Mk. 10:16; Lk. 18:15-16; Acts 2:39). His desire to 'release the oppressed' (Lk. 4:18) could be taken to include the defenceless and others who are abused in various ways.

In defining abuse, secular texts in the main only cite examples, but some authors have suggested that it is characterized both by the abuse of power and by behaviours that are not acceptable to a given society.

Examples of abuse

Non-accidental injury includes bruises, cuts, fractures, burns, internal haemorrhages, unconsciousness and brain damage. Any object to hand may be used as an instrument. Methods include suffocation, shaking, punching, burning, throwing down or against a wall, or pushing downstairs. Lesser assaults are repeated and escalate. The younger the child the more likely is this latter type of abuse. The perpetrator may be the mother, cohabitee, father, or other relative or minder. Husbands are the more usual instigators of spouse abuse; sons more usually abuse the elderly. The possibility of accidental injury must be recognized and a hospital diagnosis of abuse should be made by two senior doctors.

Physical neglect consists of inadequate warmth, cleanliness or nourishment, resulting in disease, starvation, hypothermia, retarded development or death.

Emotional abuse is typically verbal, including belittling, teasing or terrorizing, but might include partiality towards other siblings or physical restraint.

Munchausen-by-proxy submits a child to unnecessary medical procedures by fabrication of symptoms.

Abuse of the unborn child is rarely considered as such; destruction of the inconvenient unborn is often accepted, whereas smacking of infants is not.

Sexual abuse of children is perpetrated by adults or much older children. Spouses and the handicapped may also be sexually abused. Child sexual abuse includes exhibiting pornographic material, indecent exposure, inappropriate touching, deliberate sexual arousal, and oral, anal or vaginal penetration. Risk increases with age but can occur from the first day of life. The usual setting is the home, and incestuous abuse (see Incest*) by the father of a daughter is the common form, but adults of either sex may abuse boys or girls. Organized child prostitution is included, and abuse may occur in residential care and schools. It is claimed that ritual sexual abuse is practised to produce offspring for ceremonial mutilation or sacrifice, but, whatever the motivation, young people seduced into such communities suffer rape* among other traumas.

Prevalence

Child labour, child murder, exposure of newborn girls, etc., have a long history, but recent discovery of a syndrome of injuries attributable to 'baby battering' has led to systematic concern and public attention.

Quoted rates vary widely with the design of the investigation: sample, type of problem, control group (unfortunately rarely obtained), quality of questioning, etc. Claims such as '1 in 10 sexually abused' are always inadequate. Many rates include cases where abuse either has not actually occurred or was fairly insignificant. Child Protection Registers also include nonabused siblings and 'at risk' children.

There has to be a low threshold of suspicion for abuse, but also wariness of 1. desire to help on the grand scale, and 2. ignorance of alternative explanations for weaknesses. Overreaction, including some intrusive forms of spiritual ministry, can traumatize clients.

Increasing prevalence may be an outcome of permissiveness. 'Safe sex', abortion,divorce and single parenthood* ultimately leave many carers unsupported. Media display of violence and sex and fascination with the occult* may also contribute. The registered increase in cases of abuse is undoubtedly also related to accepting attitudes, better detection and reporting.

Intervention

Diagnosis is rarely easy. Fantasy may occasionally produce claims of sexual abuse. Older children with other problems sometimes use false accusations to harm adults. Much has been done to enable children to tell the truth. The use of video-recording and restriction to one specialist interview help to minimize repetition and courtroom appearances. Nonprofessionals should ask sympathetic and few questions before reporting their concerns.

If a friend or relative is suspected, a direct approach is desirable as a first step. Showing genuine interest in the family's life can prepare the way for sensitive enquiries about any difficulties with the child or other family member. If denial persists and the victim's safety is in any doubt, reporting must be explained as the best course for all concerned, and must be carried out. Protection of a helpless and suffering person must override misgivings.

Much help with child abuse is now available in the UK. Out of classic disasters and their careful recording (e.g. Maria Colwell, 1972 and Cleveland, 1988), procedures have been developed for inter-professional teamwork. Social Services or the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children are contacted first, or the police if agency help is unobtainable. Indication of concern should elicit careful Social Services investigation, and removal from the home may not be necessary. The 1989 Children Act allows parents, grandparents, children and their assigned legal guardians more involvement in the investigation, and will reduce periods of separation. A key worker from the Social Services usually co-ordinates the crucial update and communication of information required. In spouse-abuse and elder-abuse, help may be sought at an even later stage. It is sometimes effective to summon the police, and often supportive to help the victim arrange a safe haven and establish a temporary separation with conditions spelt out for her (or his) return. These should include therapy.

Serious emotional abuse provokes many kinds of behavioural or mental disorder, and often psychotherapy for offenders and victims is a sufficient course of management.

Causes

Physical injury is seldom deliberate. Persistent crying, unresponsiveness, provocation or naughtiness are precipitants only. Self-control in the carer may be poor because of childhood trauma, bad role-models, succumbing to irresponsible partners, parenthood while very young, desertion, parental rejection, difficult accommodation and poverty,* unhelpful relatives, loneliness,* poor learning ability, depression* or anxiety.* Absence of partner or lack of partner's support are crucial features, being the factors most closely related to frequent resort to physical punishment of a small child. Severe physical injuries (which ultimately reach hospital and can therefore be counted) are particularly common among manual and unskilled workers' families, contrary to many claims that abuse is indifferent to socio-economic class. Adult victims of physical injury are often isolated, avoiding social contact or being kept away from it; at home they may be anxious and manipulative. With the elderly, unforeseen deterioration adds to other stresses. In any adult relationships, unresolved independence issues are often at work. Perpetrators are also insecure, communicating and asserting their needs with difficulty.

Alcohol and other disinhibitors sometimes feature in sexual abusers, but more prominent are a poor sense of being needed (see Self-esteem*), early sexual experience as victim, and current opportunity for illicit intimacy. Marital rape can express a need to dominate or a rigid view of marriage-roles which the wife resists.

Therapy

The causal factors suggest therapies. Once 'found out', abusers may lose reputation, carer, child or spouse, but can begin to admit difficulties. Although sometimes requesting and needing better circumstances, abusers also need effective means of communication, companionship, someone to love them loyally, control of their own thought patterns, forgiveness* from God and neighbour, and a stronger sense of responsibility for the future rather than of helplessness because of the past.

The sexually abused need to work on their perceived personal guilt* and shame* (their experiences having involved pleasure as well as pain, even in children). Both hatred and love for the abuser often co-exist in the victim; she (or he) has to deal with memories which do not go away and hopes, which may not be fulfilled, for regret and respect from the abuser. Contempt for self may find expression in a sexually immoral life.

Therapy is conducted with individuals, groups, families or family dyads. For serious sex-offending, treatment may be legally enforced. A well-trained therapist, using cognitive* with other methods carefully selected from a wide spectrum of psychological thought, can be constructive. A Christian friend can complement or correct aspects of the process with a realistic and balanced biblical perspective.

Prevention

Prevention ideally rests in the upbringing of children to maturity. Where home has failed, young people can still be helped to understand the needs of the children for whom they will eventually care. The small-group situation, with enthusiastic, imaginative adults leading, develops truth and involvement. If Christians teach, there is hope that a scriptural vision will be applied, which regards children from infancy as growing persons, as God's gift, as equally precious to him as are their carers, as made in God's image* for companionship, each called uniquely to learn to enjoy and steward the creation, and needing to have happy parents.

Conclusion

Abuse is an extreme sign of unhappiness in relationships. Its intergenerational transmission seriously affects capacity for learning. Recovery calls for work which is honest, humble, down-to-earth and costly.

Bibliography

F. G. Bolton and S. R. Bolton, Working with Violent Families (London and Newbury Park, CA, 1987); J. V. Cook and R. T. Bowles, Child Abuse (Toronto, 1980); P. Dale, Dangerous Families (London and New York, 1986); F. Finkelhor, The Dark Side of Families (London and Beverly Hills, CA, 1983); N. Prude, Understanding Family Problems (Chichester, 1991); M. Grant, Counselling for Family Violence and Abuse, vol. 1, in G. R. Collins (ed.), Resources for Christian Counselling series (Waco, TX, 1987); R. Hanson, 'Key characteristics of child abuse', in A. W. Franklin (ed.), Child Abuse (Edinburgh, London and New York, 1978); C. Lyon and P. De Cruz, Child Abuse (Bristol, 1990); P. Johnson, Child Abuse (Rainsbury, Wiltshire, 1990); P. Maher, Child Abuse (Oxford, 1987); W. S. Rogers, Child Abuse and Neglect (London, 1989).

R.M.H.

ACCEPTANCE. The word 'acceptance' in everyday Eng. usage has a wide and often ill-defined range of meanings. To accept things, words, ideas or people includes the concepts of resignation, accommodation, acknowledgment, agreement, approval and welcome. More generally, acceptance means both a taking, receiving or responding to what or who is offered, and the state or situation of being favourably received.

Acceptance in the Bible

Apart from the more everyday use of acceptance, such as receiving gifts, the term is widely distributed in the OT with respect to God's relating to humankind, especially in the prophetic and Wisdom literature. Within the Heb. word group, the words laqab (take, receive), rasa (accept, be pleased with) and rason (acceptable, giving pleasure) frequently point to the reality and conditions of this relationship. The prime mover is God, in his acceptance of his repentant and obedient people (Ps. 49:15; Ezk. 20:40-41), his reception of their prayers

(Ps. 6:9; Ho. 14:2) and his offer of a time of favour and restoration, thought by some to be linked with the concept of jubilee* (Lv. 25:10; Ps. 69:13; Is. 49:8; 56:7; 58:5; 61:1-2). In turn, the people of God are called to receive and take to heart God's words and instruction (Pr. 2:1; 4:10; 10:8; Ezk. 3:10).

In the NT, the Gk. verbs dechomai and lambano, in its more passive usage, and their compounds, cover the main range of meanings of receiving and accepting. We can discern five main uses of these various words with respect to acceptance:

1. As in much of the ancient world, the giving and receiving of hospitality is highly valued in the NT record, particularly in the wandering ministries of Jesus, Paul and the other apostles. Jesus sets the example in his warm receptivity of others (Lk. 9:11), and his openness to their welcome in turn (Lk. 8:40; Jn. 4:45). Similarly, the apostles respond to the acceptance of those they meet (Acts 21:17; Gal. 4:14), readily receive others (Acts 28:30), and urge their fellow-Christians to obey the call to hospitality (Acts 18:27; 2 Cor. 7:15; Col. 4:10).

2. At a deeper level, there is clear teaching in the Gospels that to receive and accept other people is to receive and accept Jesus and, in turn, God himself. This principle, of welcoming God in a practical acceptance of others, is seen in a loving response to many whom society dubs as the 'least': Christ's disciples (Mt.10:40-42; Jn. 13:20); little children (Mt.18:5; Lk. 9:48); and anyone with unmet basic human needs (Mt. 25:31-46).

3. Just as we accept God by accepting others, so we are to accept others because God accepts us (see Justification, Doctrine of*). This principle comes through most clearly in the verb proslambano where it means 'to admit into fellowship'. We are to follow the divine example in welcoming a brother or sister whose 'faith is weak' (Rom. 14:1) and, more widely, we are called to 'accept one another ... just as Christ accepted [us]' (Rom. 15:7).

4. Another dimension of our acceptability in Christ is found in the use of dektos (acceptable, welcome, favourable) and its compounds. In contrast to the cultic sacrifices of the OT (Lv. 22:18-25), the new covenant declares God's acceptance of lives laid down and lived out in his service (Rom. 12:1; 15:16; Phil. 4:18; 1 Pet. 2:5).

5. Finally, the idea of accepting and receiving God's message is closely linked with faith* in Christ. The receiving of Christ is at one with the affirmative acceptance of his words and rule (Acts 2:41; 1 Thes. 1:6-8; 2:13).

Acceptance in counselling

The tide of optimistic humanism* and American pragmatism* which gathered force during the first half of the 20th century, strongly influenced the rise of 'third force' psychology (see Humanistic Psychology,* and Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy†) and, in turn, the emerging counselling movement of the 1940s and 50s. Within the individualism* and quest for autonomy* of these worldviews, counselling fostered the widespread use of the word 'acceptance' to demonstrate an attitude of affirmation towards the client in every aspect of his or her inner or outer life. A number of synonyms for this brand of acceptance have become common currency in personalistic counselling (see Client-Centred Counselling*), including 'respect', 'prizing' and 'non-possessive warmth'. Following Stanley Standal (1922-) in The Need for Positive Regard, Carl Rogers* popularized the phrase 'unconditional positive regard', whereby the counsellor communicated a 'deep and genuine caring' for the client, a caring 'uncontaminated by evaluations of [the client's] thoughts, feelings, or behaviors' (C. Rogers, The Therapeutic Relationship and its Impact, p. 102; G. Egan, The Skilled Helper, p. 123). Such an approach in counselling reasons that it is this quality of non-judgmental acceptance which encourages self-acceptance (see Self esteem*) in the person in need. Because previously unacknowledged feelings, thoughts and actions are disclosed and yet uncondemned by the counsellor, the client begins, it is argued, to value and face the self's realities.

The notion of unconditional acceptance can be misunderstood and mishandled. It is important to see that the concept concerns valuing the personhood of the client, and his or her capacity to make choices and live out their consequences. Such acceptance of another, rightly understood, steers a path between condoning and condemning. The counsellor's respect for the client, rather, seeks to encourage a climate within which the client can gain insight and begin to make more responsible decisions. Within this process, the counsellor's critical faculties need to be continually applied and there may be the need for challenge and confrontation. Where the counsellor's acceptance of another becomes indiscriminating and gullible, there are the twin dangers of collusion with the client or manipulation by the client.

Acceptance in pastoral care

It is important that the biblical principles of receiving and welcoming others are reflected on and applied in the church's pastoral care and counselling. This enterprise should include a discernment which avoids assimilating, on the one hand, a humanistic gloss on the concept of acceptance and, on the other, a reactionary approach that lapses into judgmentalism (Mt. 7:1-5). Pastoral carers are called to follow Christ's example in an acceptance of others that crosses the barriers of sex and gender, class, race, health and age, without losing sight of people's need for repentance* and forgiveness" (Mt. 9:9-13; Mk. 1:32-34; Lk. 17:11-19; Jn. 4:7-18; 8:2-11).

One example where the term 'acceptance' has sometimes been taken over uncritically by pastoral care is in the area of bereavement,* where Elizabeth Kübler-Ross (1926-) uses this word of the fifth and final stage of the grief process. Walter Brueggemann (1933-) questions whether Kübler-Ross signifies affirmation or resignation in her stage of acceptance. He contrasts this apparent ambiguity with the form of the lament in the Psalms, where the outcome of the psalmist's complaint moves towards 'words of assurance' and the 'vow to praise'. He criticizes the modernist's tendency to omit the dimension of a sovereign God who can 'powerfully intrude to transform' in the life of the grieving or dying person. In fairness to Kübler-Ross's analysis, a number of the Psalms do not conclude their lament so positively, although the final note may be a cry for help or of anguish rather than a resigned form of acceptance (see, e.g. Pss. 38; 88).

See also: LOVE.†

Bibliography

D. W. Augsburger, Pastoral Counselling Across Cultures (Philadelphia, 1986); D. Bonhoeffer, Life Together (ET, London, 1954; San Francisco, 1976); W. Brueggemann, 'The Formfulness of Grief, Int 31, 1977, pp. 263-275; G. Egan, The Skilled Helper (Monterey, CA, 2 1982); E. Kübler-Ross, On Death and Dying (New York, 1969; London 1970); H. J. M. Nouwen, Reaching Out (New York, 1975; London, 1976); C. R. Rogers, On Becoming a Person (Boston, MA, 1961; London 2 1967); idem, (ed.), The Therapeutic Relationship and its Impact (Madison, WI, 1967); S. Standal, The Need for Positive Regard: A Contribution to ClientCentred Theory, unpubl. doctoral thesis (Chicago, 1954); C. Truax and R. R. Carkhuff, Toward Effective Counselling and Psychotherapy (Chicago, 1967).

R.F.H.

ACCIDIE. A state of lethargy attested by monks, especially hermits, engaged in intense spiritual warfare. The word derives from the Gk. akedia, which means 'weariness' and is usually written in its Medieval Fr. form, giving it a somewhat exotic appearance in Eng. This may reflect the fact that the concept is little understood today and does not figure at all in most manuals of Christian spirituality.* Accidie was defined by Nilus of Ancyra (d. c. 430) as a weariness of the soul, rendering it incapable of having spiritual interests and unable to resist temptations (De octo spiritibus malitiae 13).

Its earliest exponent was Evagrius of Pontus (346-99), who contrasted it with 'patience' (hypomone), and linked it to the concept of the midday plague or 'demon' (Ps. 91:6, LXX), because its pressure was most keenly felt in the midday heat (De octo vitiosis cogitationibus 7). Accidie would tempt the monk to abandon his devotions, and sometimes even his calling itself. It is fully described by John Cassian (c. 360-435, in Institutes, Book 10), John Climacus (c. 570-649, in Scala Paradisi 13) and Thomas Aquinas* (STh 222ae 35). The main cures for accidie are given as hard labour, constant prayer and contemplation of the nearness of death.

Though not a feature of Protestant spirituality, something very like accidie is experienced in the form of spiritual dryness or depression. The terminology is different, but the phenomenon is well understood and studied by evangelical exponents of the Christian life, notably the late Dr D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones.*

Bibliography

G. Lampe (ed.), A Patristic Greek Lexicon (Oxford, 1961), pp. 61-62; D. M. Lloyd-Jones, Spiritual Depression (London and Grand Rapids, 1965); S. Wenzel, The Sin of Sloth: Acedia in Mediaeval Thought and Literature (Chapel Hill, NC, 1967).

G.L.B.

ACCOUNTABILITY. Most therapists cherish the independence of their own particular discipline, although this state is not always compatible with the extent and direction of their responsibilities. All have more than one area of accountability, and some of these areas may be in conflict with one another. Every truly professional therapy is founded on the twin principles of confidentiality* and accountability. The first must be complete, but it cannot always be absolutely and totally so to the particular individual therapist concerned, and therein lies a frequent source of tension, especially for the more junior therapists. The second principle has until recently been accorded far less attention and is in general inadequately explored.

Who are the people and the institutions to whom the doctor or other health-care professional owes this duty and this obligation of being accountable? First and foremost it is of course to the one receiving their therapy, the patient or client. The therapist is responsible to his or her patient for keeping all professional matters confidential between the two of them for all time. Note that this very particular and personal responsibility does not pass away with the death of the patient; it remains intact when the person has ceased to do so, a fact which is not always appreciated by relatives and friends.

As well as the issue of confidentiality there is the expectation that each individual practitioner will always provide appropriate treatment to a consistently high level, and that he or she will at all times maintain proper professional standards. These extend to the whole matter of personal relationships and there may sometimes be a rather fine line between private and professional behaviour. Practitioners are answerable to their own conscience* for their private behaviour, although this may also come under the scrutiny of their professional bodies, and they are expected always to keep their conscience well honed. There can never be a 'day off' regarding moral behaviour in a professional setting. As well as being responsible to themselves and to their patients for their professional and private integrity, practitioners are also ultimately accountable to God - who created both them and their patients, together with all the resources of whatever kind that are used in the therapy, and who cares for all his creation, especially for people and their hurting areas.

When the patient is a minor, there is additional accountability to the parent or guardian, the extent and nature of this varying with the age, capacity for responsibility, and expressed preferences of the child. The nature and type of therapy also affect the degree of accountability to the parent(s) where this apparently conflicts with that of the minor. The older the minor the greater the difficulty experienced in working out the details of accountability in each particular instance.

Accountability is far more than the concern of the individual practitioner and it is of greater extent than a private matter between therapist and patient. For a salaried person there is always accountability to the employer for both quality and quantity of service, an increase in one frequently resulting in a decrease in the other. Therapists have the progress of individual patients as their paramount concern, while employers are preoccupied with wider issues of overall service provision, stressing such things as cost-effectiveness, turnover, occupancy rate and numbers of patients seen per session or annum. These differing parameters are a potential source of conflict in the provision of psychological therapies, much remedial work and all other time-consuming treatments.

Therapists also have the obligation to restrict their services to those categories of people for whom their employer has an expressed responsibility, which may conflict with their individual preferences. They are not self-contained systems; each is likely to have some responsibility to the person who referred the patient as well as to their colleagues. There is a duty of communication within professional bounds, having regard to the necessity for preserving confidentiality. Some therapists have administrative functions in addition to their clinical work, perhaps being head of department as well as clinician, which involves them in other areas of accountability. Every role, every responsibility carries with it accountability for each duty undertaken.

As well as being accountable to the individual patient, to their employer, to their own conscience and to their professional body, therapists as members of society also have a responsibility to the society of which they and their patients form a part. The only way to hold all these issues in balance is as part of the ethical, moral and theological framework of their lives. Societies can be mistaken, individuals can be misled. Behind the general accountability to society is the bedrock on which all else rests, accountability to God.

See also: PROFESSIONAL ETHICS; RESPONSIBILITY.

R.F.

ACCREDITATION. There is currently a rapidly increasing demand for counselling and psychotherapy but absolutely no standard training, qualifications or formal accreditation. Most people needing help with emotional and relationship difficulties approach voluntary organizations, some of which may specialize in particular areas of work, e.g. bereavement* marital problems (see Marriage and Family Counselling*), eating disorders,* etc. These organizations, however, can no longer meet the demand, and they themselves are not subject to any uniformity or accreditation, relying simply on reputation and the upholding of their own published values.

The public is often confused about the meaning of the terms 'counselling' and 'psychotherapy', although practitioners would usually agree that counsellors tend to focus on specific current problems while psychotherapists would expect to work with long-term patterns of behaviour and those hoping to restructure their lives. Clearly, without adequate accreditation or protection, abuse and exploitation can occur.

Pressure to regulate this morass is being exerted by the EU on training institutions and practitioners in the UK, and from July 1992 the UK Standing Conference for Psychotherapy, acting as an umbrella organization, is compiling a register of practitioners but, like the list of those accredited by the British Association of Counselling, it has no legal status. The youthful Association of Christian Counsellors also aims ultimately to train practitioners eligible for recognition. Even so, the uneven distribution of resources in terms of quality and quantity will continue for some time to come.

In short, the situation remains very fluid, but most recognize the urgent need to clarify the private-sector muddle with the least possible delay, for the sake of consumers' protection.

J.A.H.F.

ACTS OF COMMISSION AND OMISSION, see ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE.†

ADAMS, JAY, see BIBLICAL COUNSELLING; REPENTANCE.

ADDICTION, see DEPENDENCE.

ADLER, ALFRED (1870-1937), the founder of 'individual psychology', grew up in the outskirts of Vienna as one of six children within a Hungarian Jewish family. A sickly child and experiencing a poor relationship with his elder brother, Adler's own story illustrated his later emphases on a sense of inferiority that stems from childhood and on sibling rivalry. His early acquaintance with illness and the death of a younger brother were instrumental in his choice of a career in medicine. As a young doctor he developed an interest in the sociological aspects of socialism, and a sense of community and a concern for social justice became lifelong characteristics. He was influenced by the French psychiatrist Pierre Janet (1859-1947), whose observation of a 'sense of insufficiency' in his neurotic patients predated Adler's notion of 'inferior feeling' as the basic factor in every neurosis.

Working in private general practice in Vienna, Adler became a devoted follower of Freud,* joining the psychiatrist's inner circle of colleagues in 1902 and being made president of the Vienna Psychoanalytic Society in 1910. However, Adler soon diverged from Freud's more mechanistic and reductionist* approach: Adler's emphasis on social and environmental factors in disease, his work in 1907 on 'organ inferiority' (the idea that developmental abnormalities in children* lead to compensatory behaviour), his stress on aggressive drives and ego mechanisms, and his crusading interest in education* were all seen as a betrayal of 'depth psychology' by the psychoanalytic traditionalists. In 1911, two papers presented by Adler were quickly and publicly rebuffed by Freud, who saw Adler's approach as speculative rather than 'scientific'. Adler resigned as president of the Viennese group, and shortly after formed the Society for Individual Psychology. The rift between Adler and Freud was lifelong.

In 1912 Adler's The Neurotic Constitution was published, encapsulating his methodology of individual psychology. The assumptive basis of Adler's approach saw human nature as purposive unity which finds ways of compensating for childhood's disadvantages by establishing a 'life-plan', whose 'guiding fiction' serves as the individual's reality. Although, like Jung, Adler rejected Freud's exclusive emphasis on sexuality (see†) as the source of human motivation,* he acknowledged the encultured realities of sex and gender and argued that a fear of femininity within the nurturing family leads to the 'masculine protest', a compensatory quest for superiority. Adler regarded neurosis* as a deliberate ruse to avoid life's tasks, and saw the aim of therapy as one of active intervention in order to help patients with their feelings of inferiority, to lead them away from egoism* and towards a 'social feeling' that engages with society's needs. Adler's method was, ultimately, one of synthesis rather than analysis and, as a result, offered encouragement and support through a face-to-face approach, with less frequent sessions and a shorter span of therapy than classical Freudianism.

After the First World War, Adler founded child guidance clinics in Vienna, Berlin and Munich, and an experimental school, run on the principles of individual psychology, in Vienna in 1931. Following the first international Congress of Individual Psychology in Vienna in 1924, he began a series of lecture tours in Holland, Britain and the US up till his death in Aberdeen in 1937.

During his visits to Britain in 1936 and 1937, Adler's emphasis on social justice aroused the interest of Anglican and Roman Catholic clergy. However, his stance was essentially that of an optimistic humanist, as was made clear in Religion und Individual psychologie (1935), a joint publication with a Protestant pastor. Here he criticized the attempts by Fritz Kunkel (1889-1956), a former colleague, to integrate Christianity with the psychologies of Freud, Jung and Adler himself. Adler insisted on the 'scientific nature' of his work and, although he conceded the social value of religion, he saw the idea of God as arising from 'the ever-present feeling of inferiority of necessitous mankind'. As well as in the fields of child and parent* education ('parent effectiveness training' is a movement in N. America which emphasizes Adler's notion of the child as a moral equal), Adlerian emphases are found in the parallel humanistic challenge to Freud in such neo-Freudians as Karen Horney (1885-1952), Harry S. Sullivan (1892-1949) and Erich Fromm.*

Bibliography

The Practice and Theory of Individual Psychology (London, 1929).

T. Gordon, Parent Effectiveness Training (New York, 1970); P. Roazen, Freud and His Followers (London, 1976);

L. Way, Alfred Adler: An Introduction to his Psychology (Harmondsworth and Baltimore, MD, 1956).

R.F.H.

ADOLESCENCE (a word in use in Eng. since the 15th century, from the Lat. adolescere, to grow up) is the transition period in normal human development between childhood and adulthood. The duration of adolescence has varied throughout history and from one culture to another for cultural, sociological and nutritional reasons.

The phenomenon of adolescence as an extended 'in-between' state is difficult to discern in the biblical record, since early betrothal and marriage* (and, for some, lives of extramarital sexual activity, such as prostitution, concubinage or serving the inheritance needs of the childless, as in Gn. 16 and 30) were common. Among Jews at the time of Christ, for example, girls under the age of twelve could be married off by their fathers. In the Bible, a range of Heb. and Gk. words that denote 'youth' or the comparatively young occur in verses which warn about the sins of youth (Jb. 13:26; Ps. 25:7; 2 Tim. 2:22); express gratitude to God for his teaching and sustenance in life's earlier stages (Pss. 71:5, 17; 119:9); urge the young to make wise choices (Ec. 11:9-12:1); and offer them encouragement in the face of divine calling (Je. 1:6-8; 1 Tim. 4:12).

There is strong evidence that the hormonally-controlled bodily transformation of puberty (from the Lat. pubertas, 'the age of manhood'), which marks the onset of adolescence, has speeded up over the last century or so where young people have reaped the benefits of better health, nutrition and living conditions. It is established that the onset of periods, for example, has come sooner by about four months every ten years since 1850, so that a menarche at the ages of sixteen or seventeen in the Victorian era has been replaced by one in the twelve- to fourteen-year-old age range since the early 1970s. The combination of earlier physical and sexual maturity, a trend towards later marriage, and the prolongation of educational opportunity, has led to protracted adolescence in more affluent countries.

Whereas early adolescence strongly features adjustment to bodily change and late adolescence sees the entry into the 'age of coping', it is the middle period of adolescence that witnesses the clearest shaping of a sense of identity - an awareness of inner cohesion and self-respect. Although Erik Erikson,* writing in the late 1960s, saw the 'identity crisis' as normative for adolescents, more recent research suggests, according to John Coleman, that only 25% to 35% of teenagers suffer from an experience of such intensity. Coleman sees it as probable that the majority of young people adapt 'very gradually over a period of years to the changes in identity experienced by them' (The Nature of Adolescence, 1980, p. 56). This adaptation involves the acceptance of a newly developing body-image, a period of 'adolescent egocentrism', in which the teenager is acutely self-conscious towards an 'imaginary audience' (see David Elkind, 'Egocentrism in Adolescence') and the gradual emergence of a clear sexual identity.

Pastoral care and counselling of teenagers has many distinctive features relating to the transitional nature of adolescence. Of particular importance is the process of 'identification', whereby the young person, for good or ill, incorporates the values, attitudes and styles of other significant people, including parents, other adults and peers. Where, for example, parents or parent-figures, instead of adopting a democratic approach to child-rearing, are autocratic or permissive, the consequently inadequate role-models may lead to suppressed personalities, low self-esteem,* rebelliousness, hedonism* or rootlessness. The rising tide of teenage petty crime* from the late 1980s onwards, to take one instance, has been attributed to anti-social attitudes in parents and general emotional conflict at home, as well as to group pressures and social deprivation. Parental role-modelling may be not only poor in quality but positively destructive, as when teenage children are physically or sexually abused (see Abuse*). In such instances, it may take sufferers till their thirties before the roots of suppressed anger* or self-disgust can be faced.

Relationships with contemporaries are at their most formative in the teen years and often serve to enhance both a sense of personal identity and of group belonging. In many ways, the rapid changes in adolescent subcultures (see Pop Culture*), expressed through music, clothes and lifestyle, help foster a sense of connectedness and solidarity that is all the more effective where the parental generation is, to some extent, excluded and even outraged. Adolescence is an age of experimentation, and this testing out of the environment is often powerfully reinforced by peer pressure. Although the use of tobacco and alcohol* amongst adolescents is commoner where parents are also smokers and drinkers, both these potential addictions* and the extension of pleasurable experience to illegal drugs* are influenced strongly by the habits and lifestyles of other young people. Further, susceptibility to peer pressure and the urge to experiment, coupled with the quest for sexual identity, an increasingly early sexual maturity, a decline in sexual mores and the exploitation of teenage sexuality by the mass media, have led to a great increase of sexual activity, unwanted pregnancies,* abortion* and sexually-transmitted diseases amongst the young since the 1960s. The links between the sexual transmission of hepatitis B virus and HIV (see AIDs*), the intravenous use of illegal drugs, criminality and social deprivation are well documented.

The transitional nature of adolescence is also linked with a number of maladaptive conditions, which may require psychotherapeutic (see Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy†), psychiatric (see Mental Health*) or medical intervention. One example is the eating disorder* of anorexia nervosa, whose causation may relate to any of a range of factors, including for the 'ideal' figure, a rejection of developing sexuality,* a bid for excessive control over one's own body at the expense of others, a fear of separation from a much-loved mother, and disappointment in an emotionally distant father. Anxiety* states, phobias, a tendency to depression,* and an incidence of suicide* and attempted suicide that has risen since the 1960s, are other elements that can point to disruption in the teenager's domestic, relational, educational and communal world.

Pastoral work amongst young people is both demanding and rewarding. The formative nature and emotional liability of the adolescent years, not least where teenagers are caught up in delinquent behaviour, feel trapped by poor living conditions and the bleak prospect of unemployment,* or are the victims of racist (see Race*) or classist attitudes, can lead to a great deal of frustration amongst parents, teachers, youth workers and church leaders. Particularly where parental role-models are lacking, the friendship and example of other significant, caring adults can provide a bridge into the future. Similarly, where there is unresolved conflict,* emotional disturbance or the danger of mental breakdown, a counsellor or psychotherapist, experienced in working with the young, may provide a stable and healing relationship through which the adolescent can regain confidence and hope. It is the fluidity and flexibility of adolescence, coupled with its idealism* and intense loyalties,* that can facilitate and encourage within the pastoral care of young people.

See also: HUMAN DEVELOPMENT.

Bibliography

E. Cashmore and B. Troyna (eds.), Black Youth in Crisis (London, 1982); J. C. Coleman, The Nature of Adolescence (London and New York, 2 1989); D. Elkind, 'Egocentrism in Adolescence', Child Development 38, 1967, pp. 1025-1034; E. H. Erikson, Identity: Youth and Crisis (London and New York, 1968); P. Everett, You'll Never Be 16 Again (London, 1986); L. J. Francis, Teenagers and the Church: A Profile of Church-going Youth in the 1980s (Glasgow, 1984); M. Herbert, Living with Teenagers (Oxford, 1987); R. F. Hurding, Understanding Adolescence: A Time of Change (London, 1989); L. Smedes, Sex in the Real World (Grand Rapids, 1976; Tring, 1979); J. White, Parents in Pain (Downers Grove, IL, 1979; Leicester, 1980).

R.F.H.

ADOPTION is the legal act in which at least one adult, not the biological parent of the child to be adopted, undertakes the responsibilities of parenthood* and is recognized as that child's parent. Traditionally, the norm has been for married couples only to adopt, although the adoption of children by single parents or unmarried couples is not generally prohibited in Western nations.

Christians are, in principle, well disposed to the practice of adoption for a number of reasons:

1. In his letter to the Galatians, Paul uses the metaphor of adoption to describe the relationship of the Christian to God (Gal. 4:4-5). As we, whatever our heritage, have been welcomed into the family of God by adoption, so we welcome others into our families.

2. Love of neighbour is a second reason for support of adoption, i.e. the Christian responsibility to care for the needy, in this case the biological or birthmother as well as the child. This motivation for adoption is most relevant in situations in which adoption is understood as an alternative to abortion,* the birth-mother offering her child up to God and to a Christian family, and the Christian community supporting both the birth-mother who makes this wrenching decision and the adoptive parents who will nurture and raise the adopted child. Understanding God as the creator and giver of life, the church affirms the welcoming of new life into its midst as vastly preferable to the destructive act of abortion.

3. An additional basis for the Christian embrace of adoption is the recognition of the goodness of the family* the natural desire of couples to parent and raise children. To be sure, Christians recognize in the teaching of Jesus a relativization of the family. 'Whoever does God's will is my brother and sister and mother' (Mk. 3:35, RSV). The family, while good, must be made new by Christ and find its proper place in the service of God. The church as the extended family of God displaces the household family as the primary community of God's people. Nevertheless, the family remains a good institution, created and blessed by God, a worthy context in which to offer and to receive love and care and to be trained in the love of God and neighbour. Thus, many infertile couples, desiring children and feeling a gnawing emptiness in their absence, appropriately turn to adoption as a means for creating a family (see Childlessness*). The widespread practice of abortion in many countries, however, has made it increasingly difficult to find children to adopt.

It can be argued that adoption is, for the infertile, a morally superior means of creating a family compared with most means of technological reproduction. Although the similarities between adoption and surrogate motherhood* are frequently alluded to by supporters of the practice of surrogacy, a great gulf divides the two practices. In surrogacy a new child is created for the purpose of being adopted by an individual or a couple. But many would say that the intention to create a child independent of a context of the union of a man and woman is not warranted in light of Christian understandings of sexual union and the family. In adoption no attempt is made to put a monetary value on the conception of the adopted child. Rather, recognizing the presence of the gift of new life in her womb, the birth-mother attempts to respond faithfully to God by securing the conditions under which she and her child can live humbly and in service to God.

The moral preferability of adoption to artificial insemination by donor (see Reproductive Technologies*), while more difficult to establish, may lie in the fact that in adoption kindness and relief are offered to an already existing child and birth-mother, while at the same time the adoptive parents benefit. The desire for artificial insemination with donor sperm may suggest that there is a moral significance to the genetic relationship between mother and child that a Christian understanding of the biological family as a relativized good cannot support. Furthermore, the financial costs of adoption, while not non-existent, may well be lower than the expenses of artificial insemination, and thus adoption may be better stewardship* for Christian couples.

This is not to suggest that the moral and pastoral problems of adoption are few. There are good prudential and legal reasons for arranging adoption through a reputable agency, although private adoption is not, of itself, morally questionable. Christians will view the adoption of a child into a family as morally and emotionally superior to adoption by a single parent, although adoption of special needs children and older children to a single parent is often preferable to institutionalization. The church rightly has reservations about the adoption of children to same-sex couples or unmarried parents, not because we know of damaging psychological effects of such adoptions, but because these relationships do not comport well with Christian understandings of the family.

Given the decision to adopt, many of the questions adoptive parents must ask themselves are the same as any prospective parents will ask; other questions will be unique to the adoptive parents. A first question may be whether the adoptive parents will accept a 'special needs' child, i.e. a child with some mental or physical defect. There is no guarantee that biological parents will produce a 'perfect' child. Prospective adoptive parents must consider whether a refusal of a 'defective' child would be warranted.

The contemporary prevalence of bi-racial and international adoption raises several questions. Adoptive parents will want to be certain that the available children in international adoptions are not offered under duress, and that their birth-mothers freely offer them for international adoption. Adoptive parents of bi racial and international children have a responsibility to be well-informed about the cultural heritage of their children, and will want to raise the children with an understanding and respect for their own cultural backgrounds as well as that of their parents.

It is generally agreed that it is in the best interests of both adopted children and their parents that there be candid recognition that a child is adopted from its earliest years. Secrecy about adoption is far more likely to damage a child's self-esteem than the open admission and delight in an adopted child's participation in the family.

At this point we know little about what sort of contact between birth-mother, adoptive parents and adopted child may be best for all individuals involved. Often the pain of offering a child for adoption can be mitigated by a meeting between the birth-mother and prospective adoptive parents. As they mature, adopted children will be curious about their biological parents and the circumstances of their adoption. This information may be gradually revealed and should be available to them in full upon the age of maturity. Assuming that confidentiality* is not violated, adoptive parents should not discourage their adopted child from seeking out and meeting the birth-mother. Such a meeting may be critical for the adopted child's self-understanding and appreciation for his or her birthmother as well as the adoptive parents.

Bibliography

H. Bouma III et al., Christian Faith, Health, and Medical Practice (Grand Rapids, 1989), pp. 195-202; T. Whaling, 'Adoption,' PTR 21, 1923, pp. 223-235.

T.D.K.

ADULTERY is marital infidelity, the breaking of the marriage* bond. Adultery is usually seen as sexual intercourse between a married woman or married man with someone other than his/her partner in marriage. In fact adultery covers all the ways infidelity can take place in a marriage. Adultery is specifically prohibited in Ex. 20:14. In the OT, it is intercourse by a married woman with another man, but a married man is not guilty of adultery if he has sexual intercourse with an unmarried girl. In the NT this inequality is corrected (cf. Mk. 10:12) in the light of the relationship which exists between Christ and the church (Eph. 5:27-33). Although traditionally the focus has been on the physical act of adultery, Jesus shows the way to a wider interpretation when he declares that a lustful look is already adultery (Mt. 5:27-28). Moreover, adultery in the OT is used as a metaphor for the faithlessness of Israel in respect to God. 'You shall not commit adultery' teaches us that marriage will be a blessing only when the partners 'keep the troth'.

Although a graphic form of adultery, physical adultery is often symptomatic of the fact that the marriage has already been in serious disrepair. Marriage is a total troth communion which can be broken by any kind of prolonged infidelity, whether through the squandering of monies, unwillingness to share of self, breaking of confidences, or other betrayals of trust.

Although a most serious offence, adultery is first of all something to be worked through, repented of, and forgiven. At the same time, when a marriage is irretrievably broken, divorce* may be the only alternative.

See also: REMARRIAGE.

J.H.O.

ADVANCE DIRECTIVE, see COMA; CONSENT; DEMENTIA; EUTHANASIA.

ADVERTISING. Long before the printing press and telegraph, and perhaps coincident with human-kind's initial experiences with trade and services, there was advertising. Today, advertising is a social science and basic to competitive capitalism. In early commerce it was the woodcut of a large shoe outside a cobbler's shop, or the sing-song of a knife-sharpener rolling his cart past village homes. As long as people have tried to persuade others to buy, barter or believe, some form of advertising has been part of the process.

The development of modern communications technology merely altered the form and cost-effectiveness of advertising. Early English and American newspapers were frequently called 'Advertiser', to signal their appeal to merchants and coverage of trade. In 1840 Volney Palmer opened the first advertising agency in Philadelphia. He bought space from rural and frontier newspapers, sold it at a premium to manufacturers, and thus became an important conduit between coastal industrial centres and the country's interior. In 1870 N. Y. Ayer and Son began to provide marketing surveys and media strategies for clients, while mail-order merchants, entertainers such as P. T. Barnum (1810-91), and patent medicine-sellers discovered the riches to be won through demographics and hype - all part of the advertising mystique.

Advertising raises a number of ethical issues. 1. It can be used to manipulate people into purchasing goods by appealing to a desire for status ('keeping up with the Joneses'), acquisitiveness, feelings of insecurity or guilt. Subliminal advertising is the supreme example, now banned in many countries. Children may be manipulated so as to put pressure on parents to purchase expensive toys, etc. 2. Advertising may make inflated claims for a product, or draw false inferences (e.g. 'Nine out of ten housewives prefer ...' when the sample is too small to be significant statistically). 3. Advertising is frequently guilty of the exploitative use of women (e.g. using scantily clad models to sell cars, etc.) and of stereotyping them in such a way as not to address them as intelligent persons.

From a Christian perspective, manipulation is prohibited by the gospel (cf. 1 Cor. 2:1-3), inflated claims by the commitment to truth-telling (Eph. 4:25), and the exploitative use of women by seeing them not as sex objects but as persons made in the image of God (Gn. 1:27).

Because of the recognized ability of advertising to create expectations which disappoint purchasers, many governments have sought to check its power. In the US, the Food and Drug Act of 1906 and the Federal Trade Commission Act of 1914 asserted federal authority over product-labelling, puffery and false claims.

In the UK, such measures as the Trade Descriptions Act (1968), the Consumer Credit Act (1974) and the Independent Broadcasting Authority Act (1973) regulate the ways in which products and services may or may not be advertised. Statutory bodies such as the Office of Fair Trading and the Advertising Standards Authority administer the law and implement agreed codes of practice. Associations of advertisers have also adopted their own regulatory codes.

Grassroots efforts in the US have led to restrictions on TV advertising to children, while Denmark, Sweden and Belgium ban all such advertising. Protecting the poor from exploitative advertising becomes legally more complex, yet casino gambling advertisements, restricted in Puerto Rico (to protect a vulnerable public), are completely legal elsewhere in the US (to lure mainland trade).

Advertising is clearly not a value-free exercise. It uses creativity," one of God's gifts, to sell products which may either benefit or exploit the user or consumer (see Consumerism*). It also helps to harm the environment* by creating demand for products which are wastefully (see Waste*) packaged or sold in non-returnable, non-biodegradable containers. Yet advertising can also be used to create public awareness of conservation issues.

Churches and parachurch organizations need to be awake to the power and ambiguity of advertising and to watch that their own use of it comports with the gospel they profess. The Christian movement is inextricably part of the cultural web of advertising, seldom setting but often copying successful trends, frequently decrying advertising's influence but rarely witnessing to alternative communication systems.

Bibliography

C. G. Christians et al., Media Ethics: Cases and Moral Reasoning (New York and London, 1991); K. Rotzoll et al., Advertising in Contemporary Society (Cincinnati, OH, 1990).

P.M.F.

AGEING. The whole process of ageing is a highly individual one, and there is a wide variation in how it manifests itself. The age of a person is normally measured chronologically, but gerontologists have tended to be dismissive of this reckoning of age: some people are old at 50 years and others young at 80 years.

J. E. Birren (1918-) and V. J. Renner set out four concepts of ageing: 1. biological age, judged by the condition of one's life-limiting organ system; 2. psychological age, referring to a person's adaptive capacities and relating to learning, intelligence and motivation; 3. functional age, reflecting the individual's practical capacities for coping; and 4. social age, determined by how much and how well one performs within the social community (see 'Research on the Psychology of Ageing', in Handbook of the Psychology of Ageing, New York, 1977).

Aspects of ageing

There is often an association between old age and poverty, in that the oldest tend to be the poorest. Throughout Scripture emphasis is placed on the need to care for widows, the poor and deprived (e.g. Jas. 2:16).

In the UK and US there is a growing tendency, which increases with age, for elderly people to live alone. This tendency can be seen as social policy in practice, in that it is now widely recognized that most elderly people prefer to remain in their own homes and should be enabled to do so as long as they wish. Such a policy has implications with regard to the responsibility to provide adequate and appropriate services within the community, tailored to the individual's needs and desires (see Health and Health Care*).

The most common mental health problem in elderly people is depression,* which is often unrecognized and untreated. However, dementia,* which is based on brain cell loss, is the most significant and serious problem affecting family, neighbours and carers (see Care, Caring*), and making demands on health and social service resources.

Quality of life in old age

Factors which determine good quality of life for elderly people are not intrinsically different from those which apply to other age groups. In the UK, the Social Services Inspectorate of the Department of Health (1989) has set benchmarks for measuring quality in residential care for elderly people. These values could be seen as universally relevant: choice; independence; dignity; privacy; rights; and fulfilment.

Age Concern's Manifesto in 1984 advocated that elderly people should be encouraged to continue to develop their full potential.

S. Jones states: 'Mental health can be considerably improved after retirement if a sense of purpose and of belonging to the whole community can be found' (Liberation of Elders, Keele, 1976, p. 68). In 1984 a Danish Government Commission, set up to produce a policy to enhance the quality of life of elderly people, stated three basic principles: 1. that a sense of continuity in the life span should be created; 2. that elderly people should have self-determination; and 3. that the resources of older people themselves should be used.

In social relationships there is a need to give as well as receive. P. Townsend (1928-) says that old people are 'members of families and whether or not they are treated as such largely determines their security, their health and their happiness' (The Family Life of Old People, p. 227).

Contributory factors to mental health are self-esteem* and a sense of identity and of being valued by others. In the development of education for older people in the USA, David A. Peterson states: 'Older persons are seen as individuals with potential who can contribute and serve as well as cope and survive' ('The Development of Education for Older People in the USA', in F. Glendenning, ed., Educational Gerontology, p. 94).

Values, rights and responsibilities

To protect the rights and civil liberties of elderly people it is necessary that the values outlined are actively promoted. Where a degree of dependency has to be accepted, it will be important to identify and safeguard the areas that the person can still manage, so that they remain in control and as independent as possible. Where there is mental impairment 'the principle of self-determination has to be practised in a manner which acknowledges the person's limited capacity for decision-making and selfcare but which preserves those areas of decision-making of which he is still capable' (C. Rawlings, Social Work with Elderly People, p. 50). The fact that people have lost certain faculties does not mean they have lost their adulthood.

Giving elderly persons time to answer for themselves, and not talking about them in their presence as though they were not there, demonstrates respect for them. The use of language will contribute to or detract from the person's dignity. Referring to 'the elderly' rather than 'elderly people' stereotypes them as an homogeneous group, thus denying their individuality.

Ageism

The term 'ageism' was coined by R. N. Butler in 1968 (see Educational Gerontology, p. 12). It signifies prejudice or discrimination against people on account of their age. It is a process of systematic stereotyping, associating age with an inability to contribute anything of value and involving many negative assumptions.

Ageism demeans old age; it insinuates that people who have lived a certain number of years become different from and inferior to people younger than themselves; it subtly encourages younger people no longer to identify with their elders as human beings. However, in both the OT and NT old people are honoured for their wisdom (e.g. Dt. 32:7). Their discernment is recognized (Jb. 12:12) and lack of respect for them is condemned (La. 5:12; cf 1 Tim. 5:1).

Though ageing can bring with it disability and weakness, for the Christian there is a future hope through the resurrection of Jesus (2 Tim. 1:10) and the present reality of being renewed daily in the inner self (2 Cor. 4:16-18).

See also: HUMAN DEVELOPMENT; RETIREMENT.

Bibliography

D. B. Bromley, Human Ageing (London, New York, 1988); F. Glendenning (ed.), Educational Gerontology: International Perspectives (Keele, 1985); J. and C. Hendricks, 'Ageism and Common Stereotypes', in V. Carver and P. Liddiard (eds.), An Ageing Population (London, 1978; New York, 1979); S. M. Pearce (ed.), Researching Social Gerontology (London, 1990); M. Poner, To the Good Long Life (London and New York, 1978); C. Rawlings, Social Work with Elderly People (London, 1981); A. Tinker, The Elderly in Modern Society (London, 1984); P. Townsend, The Family Life of Old People (London, 1963); B. Wade et al., Dependency with Dignity (London, 1983).

AGGRESSION, see ANGER; WAR.

AIDS. One of the greatest challenges the church has had to face in the moral and pastoral arena in the past decade has been caused by the rapid spread of the disease known as AIDS (Acquired Immune-Deficiency Syndrome). The virus that causes the illness was first identified and described almost simultaneously by scientists on both sides of the Atlantic in 1981, and the incidence of AIDS has been reported in many countries around the world. The dramatic spread of the virus, named Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV), has been called 'a global epidemic' by the World Health Organization. The early reporting of the spread of HIV by the media of the Western world gave rise to a frightening mythology producing irrational fears and prejudicial attitudes towards infected individuals by some people. Early Christian comment could have been clearer, calling for compassion and a commitment to care in the face of an illness that strikes at the heart of humanness and leads to a fatal illness. The absence of literature from the church was remedied around the mid 1980s with a number of helpful leaflets published by most denominations.

The term 'AIDS' comes from the fact that the illness is acquired from some other person, rendering the body's immune system deficient so that a syndrome or group of illnesses takes hold of the person and results in the progressive disease. HIV is blood-borne, and the main route of infection is sexual. As the disease spread from individual to individual, it became clear that blood or blood products from infected people could pass on HIV. Intravenous drug-abusers have been infected through sharing injecting-equipment contaminated by infected blood. Babies have become infected from their HIV-positive mothers during pregnancy or birth and occasionally through breast milk.

HIV is a frail virus and does not survive long outside the body. It is not contagious through normal social contact. It has a long incubation period, when the carrier is virtually symptomfree but is able to infect others. This latent phase can last up to ten years or more, after which most HIV-positive people become unwell with a debilitating generalized illness or present to their physicians with one or more of the specific diseases which categorize AIDS. There is much that can be done for patients as system. The skills and compassion of healthcare professionals in controlling symptoms can make life bearable and assist the person with AIDS to live life to the full. Patients prefer to speak of themselves as 'living with AIDS' and not dying of AIDS. None like to be referred to as 'victims'. Research scientists have made some headway in discovering helpful anti-viral drugs that slow down the rate of physical decline in patients but the pharmaceutical challenge to find a cure for AIDS remains. During the next decade, progress is needed that calls for close co-operation between all concerned, so that people infected with, or affected by, HIV can be supported compassionately and the spread of the disease arrested.

Pastoral opportunities

AIDS presents the pastoral worker with the opportunity of coming alongside people who are HIV-positive, or have AIDS, and their families and friends. Many people in the churches who work directly with the public may be anxious about possible infection, and could present the pastoral worker with a complex emotional, social and practical problem. There are informed policies in place in many institutions, like schools and factories, to guide in circumstances where staff or pupils are suddenly ill or injured. Pastoral support may be to refer those concerned to these policies, or to aid those responsible for others to seek advice from their local public-health experts.

A diagnosis of HIV or AIDS may accompany a lifestyle of intravenous drug* abuse, homosexuality* or sexual promiscuity. However, infection could result from a single sexual encounter, or from having only one regular partner. The pastoral worker needs to be clear in these situations about how to respond, in order to reflect something of the Christ who came alongside the sick, the weak, the desperate and the disadvantaged to bring the good news of help and hope. For the pastoral worker, opportunities arising from people with HIV/

AIDS demand the greatest exercise of pastoral skills, where a non-judgmental attitude, with an approachable and compassionate disposition, will help to bring appropriate support to enquirers. The individual concerned could be deeply anxious about many issues but especially the issues of confidentiality.* The pastor may be faced with a person seeking comment about a number of deeply disturbing questions, e.g. euthanasia* or suicide.* As the disease progresses, issues about taking powerful drugs to control troublesome symptoms and pain may arise. A frequent question asked by people with AIDS nearing the terminal stage of their illness is whether or not to continue with active treatment. The pastoral worker may be consulted to clarify the choices to be made, and will need to stand with the person as he or she chooses. Help may be requested to explain to family and friends a decision to stop treatment. The pastoral worker's attitudes to the individual's decision will have a profound effect. Sensitivity should be exercised, and wisdom will be called for as to how deeply to engage in personal and private areas. The temptation to be intrusive, beyond consent, ought to be resisted.

Death comes with its own challenges to all who support the dying, and carers should be appropriately cared for themselves. Pastoral workers with a firm, vital and personal commitment to Jesus Christ, the Resurrection and the Life, will be sustained and able to share their faith mainly by their presence. At the right moment, the spoken word could bring a sense of hope and comfort to those who are near the end of life.

Moral challenges

The AIDS epidemic has confronted the church with a complex of ethical issues that cannot be avoided. It is important for the pastoral worker to face these issues in order to develop a non-judgmental attitude to, and compassionate care for, those affected or infected by the virus. An approach based on a biblical ethic but offered with pastoral sensitivity is possible, where human nature can be honestly acknowledged with all its problems and positive possibilities. A view of human nature as created with rights and responsibilities, in which there is a balance between personal preferences and public needs, is presented in Gn. 3. Here the male and the female are created as people of value and the objects of God's love and concern. The first humans, according to Genesis, are viewed as social beings set in a relational context of family where mother and father are committed to each other in a lifelong bond of responsibility. This view of humanity (see†) is set against the theological framework of creation/Fall/forgiveness/reconciliation, where the central purpose of God in Christ is to seek and save the lost.

In the literature addressed to Christians about AIDS, the concept of God's judgment* is often the moral and theological starting-point. However, the justice of God is sometimes almost dismissed in the effort to discourage a thoughtless judgmentalism. Judgmentalism is a grave disqualification for work in AIDS care. But the word 'judgmentalism' is also used in such a way as to suggest that the pastoral worker should abandon all notions of justice and personal judgments of any kind in AIDS care. The Bible portrays a pattern around events of judgment that involve warnings before and mercy* after. Divine judgment is the reluctant response of a God intensely concerned for justice, compassion and mercy. The cross* of Christ is the ultimate point where God's justice and mercy meet.

The apostle Paul's inspired commentary on humanity is found in Rom. 1:18-32. Humanity is pictured in moral and spiritual chaos. Judgment is a releasing from God's protective care and a giving-up to sinful personal choices, resulting in injustice, sexual confusion, family disintegration and violence. God's wrath is his response to those who destroy humanity through their greed and self-will. It is matched by God's love (see†) in his personal involvement to rescue and reconcile through faith in Christ. Here all are seen as deserving of God's judgment, but all are seen as loved by him. All are seen as in need of reconciliation. AIDS does not seem to be a specific judgment on certain individuals but has come about due to a complicated mixture of medical, social, moral and sexual factors. Some people have been infected through contaminated blood products; some by an unfaithful partner; newborn babies have been infected by HIV-positive mothers. However, HIV has life only if given an environment in which to live and reproduce itself, i.e. our bodies.

No right-minded person deliberately acquires HIV and no-one needs to contract AIDS, so there is an urgent need to inform. Moral difficulties and pastoral challenges arise in the area of information-gathering and strategic planning in health care (see Health and Health Care*) and education. The Department of Health refrained from moralizing during the first ten years of the epidemic in the UK, and based its major efforts on reduction of infection rate through campaigns of preventive advice and information. These campaigns included the commendation of condoms to provide 'safer sex' practices, and the encouragement of schemes to issue free, sterile injecting-equipment to intravenous drug-abusers. Running parallel with these campaigns has been a movement to bring the claims of homosexual people to the public's attention. The pastoral worker needs to face the challenge of sensitive support for those with a homosexual orientation. Safe-sex practices and free issue of syringes are another challenge to pastoral engagement where the worker is seeking to maintain traditional Christian values. Here is an opportunity to show by example, supported by convincing argument, that sexual fidelity before and sexual faithfulness within the bond of marriage* not only guarantee freedom from HIV infection but are beneficial to the individual and society. Pastoral workers can also make a positive contribution in their congregations by helping to create an accepting and welcoming attitude to people who are HIV-positive. Thereby, the stigmatizing and rejection of people with AIDS will be reduced, and this will enable a greater freedom to develop so that HIV-infected people can feel safe and supported in our churches.

Adequate planning of the use of available resources for AIDS care needs accurate information about trends in the spread of HIV, so pastoral example and education of congregations will promote openness, which will be important and helpful. The general public are still frightened by HIV after ten years. Clear and compassionate pastoral input will help reduce the incidence of scapegoating. Intravenous drug-abusers, homosexual people, prostitutes and the promiscuous have all been blamed and persecuted by a resentful or ignorant but frightened public. It is not individuals but behaviour that needs to be challenged. It is more helpful to focus on risky behaviour than on specific groups.

AIDS is a problem for us all. A sensible and sensitive pastoral approach that takes hold of opportunities to support the anxious and that cares for the sick will reflect a gospel of hope* from a God of love and grace.*

See also: CARE, CARING; ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE;† HOSPICE.

Bibliography

AIDS Care Education and Training (ACET), HIV: It's Your Choice (teacherpupil resource pack; London, 1991); I. Ainsworth-Smith and P. Speck, Letting Go: Caring for the Dying and Bereaved (London, 1983); S. Cassidy, Sharing the Darkness: The Spirituality of Caring (London, 1988; Maryknoll, NY, 1991); M. J. Christensen, The Samaritan's Imperative: Compassionate Ministry to People Living with AIDS (Nashville, TN, 1991); P. Dixon, The Truth About AIDS (Eastbourne, 1987); R. McCloughry and C. Bebawi, AIDS: A Christian Resource (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1987); Salvation Army, AIDS Care: Practical and Pastoral Guidelines (London, 1988).

P.J.C.

ALCOHOLISM is one form of drug dependence,* which has many features peculiar to itself. Alcohol drinking is a social habit in most cultures, so that alcohol dependence is facilitated by cultural norms and social connections (e.g. meeting friends, business deals). There are several different patterns of alcoholism; drinking may be social or solitary, steadily continuous or intermittent (bout drinking).

The psychological and social damages associated with habitual drinking are those of any drug dependence, with the added feature that alcohol behaves as a nervous-system depressant (an anaesthetic). The features of depression* of the nervous system include release of inhibition, leading to garrulous, indiscreet or violent behaviour, and then to loss of consciousness (drunkenness). Physical consequences of long-term drinking include malnutrition, when someone drinks instead of eating food, and target-organ damage; the target organ may be the liver, pancreas, brain or peripheral nerves, or heart; there is marked variation among individuals as to which organ sustains the impact. The behavioural features of heavy chronic drinking include times when individuals may find themselves inexplicably at a distant destination without realizing how they got there ('blackouts'), episodes of tremor and sweating ('the shakes') or of great fear ('the terrors'). These episodes (which have no relation to ordinary faints or 'blackouts', or to the sweating which can accompany them) are signs of nervous-system damage and alcohol withdrawal reaction; they indicate the onset of irreversible brain damage, and soon progress to episodes of wild nightmares and hallucination (delirium tremens) and dementia.* The dementia of chronic alcoholism often comprises socially damaging features; the alcoholic fills in gaps in conversation with imaginary material (confabulation), often of a very plausible kind.

Social deterioration in alcohol behaviour is often insidious, and family and colleagues often notice it only after alcohol dependence is well developed, and then find it very hard to know whether or how to intervene with help. The most difficult decision is whether to continue to tolerate the alcoholic's destructive company, or to exclude him or her. Domestic violence to property and persons is a common feature, plus the financial drain caused by a drinking habit.

Alcoholism may be associated with sexual violence, promiscuous behaviour and homosexuality, with reckless choices or with bouts of psychiatric depression.

Attempts to help alcoholics to relinquish their habit involve all the steps needed in countering any form of drug dependence. The outlook for success is no better than in any other form of dependence. A period of 'drying out' (detoxification) is followed by residential care with a regular programme of activity, including occupational therapies. Forces which militate against success include the social nexus which drinking occupies, and the constant availability of alcohol in the community. There is intense temptation, when sorrows are recollected, to seek the immediate release of alcohol, only to suffer the consequent return to the habit.

Some regular stepped method is undoubtedly useful to help dependent people to recognize their need in a way which also leads them directly to the next goal in the process of release. The 'Minnesota Model' is one such ladder of progressive recognition, and organizations like Alcoholics Anonymous have made successful use of such structures, used in a group setting. But the environment in which this is done, in particular its spiritual nature, the practical help provided, and the step to which the person moves on at the end of a successful programme are all extremely important elements. Not only can spiritual experience not be prescribed, but also breaches of disciplined growth cannot be accepted in such programmes. This is a narrow ethical path with many problems and lapses.

The pastoral concerns are for the drinker, and for his or her family and colleagues. Pastoral care is made very difficult by the untruthful and confabulative nature of alcoholic communication, by the hurts suffered by those who might normally be the chief carers among the alcoholic's social group, and by failure to recognize psychiatric depression in the alcoholic, especially amongst bout drinkers. Crime* by alcoholics adds the frequent dimension of legal constraints, imprisonment and fines. Counselling is essential, but requires long, time-consuming contact, with the need for patience with the frequent relapses that occur. The gospel of Christ has great power in practice and in perception, both to displace alcoholism and to restore that self-esteem* which is so essential for the alcoholic to gain. But the hurts and fears which lead to alcoholism are very deep, and the gospel cannot be prescribed or enjoined for anyone (see *Inner Healing). No-one is relieved from alcoholism without the inner will to emerge from the habit, and this cannot happen until all hurts are opened and dealt with and self respect has been recreated.

See also: ADDICTION.

Bibliography

P. W. Brunt, 'Alcoholism as a Medico-social Problem', in D. W. Vere, Topics in Therapeutics, vol. 4 (London, 1978), pp. 124-135; S. Carroll, 'Spirituality and Purpose in Life in Alcoholism Recovery', Journal of Studies on Alcohol 54.3, 1993, pp. 297 -301; A. L. Klatsky et al., 'Alcoholism and Mortality', Annals of Internal Medicine 117.8, 1992, pp. 646-654; K. Nakamura et al., 'Family Involvement for Improving the Abstinence Rate in the Rehabilitation Process of Female Alcoholics', International Journal of the Addictions 26.10, 1991, pp. 1055-1064; J. R. Peteet, 'A Closer Look at the Role of a Spiritual Approach in Addictions Treatment', Journal of Substance Abuse Treatment 10.3, 1993, pp. 263-267.

D.W.V.

ALIENATION is a common theme in any analysis of the condition of people in the modern world, especially the West. It has been the basis for thoroughgoing critiques of a contemporary society unable to provide an emotionally and psychologically satisfying existence to its members. The concept has been used, with significant variation, by Marxists, humanistic psychologists, Freudians, existentialists (see Existentialist Psychologies* and sociologists. Karl Marx is credited with contemporary awareness of the topic, particularly in his Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts of 1844, which were discovered in 1932.

Alienation is the state of being estranged, at odds with other individuals, society and oneself. It has been taken to mean any and all of the following: a sense of powerlessness, the experience of lack of meaning and purpose in life, the absence of commitment to standards of behaviour, an antagonism to the values of one's culture, a sense of being socially excluded, and the condition of being out of harmony with oneself (M. Seeman). Of course, these distinct meanings are not unconnected, and might well be found together or to have a common etiology.

While alienation is ancient, the modern understanding of the phenomenon owes much to 19th-century German idealism, and particularly to G. W. F. Hegel (1770-1831). Hegel took alienation to be an essential feature of the human condition, since human beings are both subject and object and their creations become objects outside of them. The concept was developed by the Hegelian Left, including Ludwig Feuerbach (1804-72) and Marx. Feuerbach saw religion as the source of alienation, because in religion people project human qualities on to a God who stands over and above them. Marx believed that religion is a creation of alienated people, but not the root cause of human alienation. Its cause is alienated labour, i.e. work done under the control of another and for the other's purposes. Since the essence of being human is to work, humanity will be frustrated and distorted in a social situation in which this labour is unfree. Alienated labour alienates the worker from himself, his product, the capitalist who is owner of his work, and from humanity at large (his 'species being'). In short, for Marx capitalism* is the cause of modern alienation, accounting for the worker's experience of powerlessness, meaninglessness, poverty and misery, and for social antagonisms. However, Marx believed that alienation could be overcome, not by an internal adjustment within the worker, but by a radical restructuring of socioeconomic structures.

With the rise of urbanization,* regimentation in the workplace, the loss of traditional family and social ties, and the decline of religion in many segments of society, the 20th century has been called the era of alienation. Books with such titles as The Organization Man (W. H. Whyte, New York and London, 1957) and The Lonely Crowd (D. Reisman, et al., New Haven, CT, 1950) have depicted modern life as a struggle to find meaning in relationships, society and a universe in which the individual seems to have no genuine significance.

Existentialist thinkers regard alienation as the state in which all individuals must find themselves, under the weight of mass society which imposes on them group values that they find themselves accepting uncritically. To be unalienated and 'authentic', we must realize that we are indeed alienated, however comfortable and complacent we may feel (in fact the more so, as we unthinkingly accept more and more our socially imposed false identity). According to existentialists, human beings have a tendency to create 'false consciousness', to accept and even defend these externally imposed norms and mores. Søren Kierkegaard* located alienation in the tendency to gravitate toward unauthentic existence as a member of the crowd rather than finding one's true identity, purpose and meaning as an individual, which he believed is possible only in an individual and personal relationship with Christ. This stress on individual authenticity, if not in its essential connection with Christ, is seen in secular existentialists such as Jean-Paul Sartre.* Sartre saw alienation as the condition of being both a free, self-conscious being and an object in the world. Reminiscent of Hegel's subject-object dichotomy, Sartre's analysis stresses the incongruity between our freedom, self-awareness and lust for transcendence, and our limited, determined and 'given' nature created by our personal history and social condition and physical limitations. In his extensive treatment of this dichotomy, Sartre discussed phenomena such as 'the Look', the experience of noting that in being observed by others we become an object to them. In social terms, we are alienated in that our relationships with others are characterized by a need to dominate them or be dominated by them, a theme reminiscent of Friedrich Nietzsche.* For Martin Heidegger (1889-1976), alienation stems from our inability to face the fact of our own imminent and inevitable death, a true realization of which would oblige us to take seriously the fact of our own individual responsibility for our lives.

Psychologists who have identified the problem of alienation include neo-Marxist Erich Fromm,* who combines psychological insight with existentialist analysis to stress the tendency of capitalist society to force people into economically useful roles rather than to allow their creativity* to flourish. For Freud,* alienation is a creature of the repressed subconscious, with its wild urges and drives which are denied even to oneself.

Although now out of favour among sociologists, the term was widely used and the phenomenon studied by a variety of social scientists, including Max Weber (1864-1920), who saw it as a reaction against a society viewed as corrupt and bureaucratized, and against which one was powerless. In the 1950s and 60s, sociologists like Seeman and R. Blaumann saw it as dissatisfaction with life and social experience, and devised tests to measure it and correlate it with antisocial behaviours.

Alienation has been blamed on economic factors by the Marxists, on the tension between subjective existence and objective existence by the existentialists, and on the structure of mass technological society by sociologists such as Talcott Parsons (1902-1979) or David Riesman (1909-). Recently the sociological version has been influential in the work of philosopher Alasdair Macintyre (1929-). In his widely-read After Virtue (Notre Dame, IN, 1984; London, 1985) he depicts modern bureaucratic society as unable to provide meaning or shared values and as treating problems of human meaning as ones to be managed by professional specialists such as managers and bureaucrats. Modern society and its intellectual resources are incapable of providing genuinely meaningful, unalienated life, and Macintyre's solution is to find meaning in small communities of shared vision, a new Benedictine* movement to preserve what is left of the Western heritage.

Alienation theorists differ as to whether the problem is created by external conditions or by internal philosophical-psychological conditions, whether it is accompanied by feelings of alienation or is an objective state in which one finds oneself unknowingly, and whether it is capable of being overcome or not.

Christians will find elements of truth in many of the major accounts of alienation, yet perhaps will be particularly drawn to Kierkegaard's insistence that alienation is overcome by a relationship with Christ, who alone can give meaning and purpose in any age or society. Alienation theorists certainly are correct in linking social dislocation to disordered individual life. Christ gives true meaning and significance to the life of the individual (Jn. 10:10) and brings reconciliation not only between people but between 'alienated' humanity and God (Col. 1:21-23).

Bibliography

D. B. Fletcher, Social and Political Perspectives in the Thought of Søren Kierkegaard (Lanham, MD, 1981); R. F. Geyer and D. Schweitzer, Theories of Alienation (Leiden, 1976); E. Josephson and M. Josephson (eds.), Man Alone: Alienation in Modern Society (New York, 1962); B. Ollman, Alienation: Marx's Critique of Man in Capitalist Society (Cambridge and New York, 1976); R. Schacht, Alienation (London, 1970); M. Seeman, 'On the Meaning of Alienation', ASR 21, 1959.

D.B.F.

ALMSGIVING, see GIVING.

ALTERNATIVE MEDICINE, see HEALTH AND HEALTH CARE.

ALTRUISM (from It. altrui, of or to others) is generally understood as unselfish concern for the good of others. Since acting for the good of others is thought to be an important part of personal ethics, considerations of altruism raise two important ethical questions: 1. Is genuine altruism possible? 2. Is altruism always required?

Since Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679), many have denied that genuine altruism is even possible. Human action is always selfish, they argue, since it is always motivated by desire, and an agent's desires are all ultimately for his or her own well-being. Given this egoistic* conception of human nature, apparently altruistic action must be explained away in terms of selfish ulterior motives. Hobbes may relieve the distress of a beggar by giving him alms, but his motive for doing so is to relieve his own distress at seeing the beggar's distress. Similarly, Christian egoists such as William Paley (1743-1805) argue that it is in our selfinterest to benefit others, since God will reward those who do and punish those who do not.

Critics have argued against the egoistic analysis of human action in various ways. Joseph Butler,* for example, denies that all desires are selfish, holding that we may at times desire the well-being of others for its own sake. Alternatively, Immanuel Kant* denies that all actions are motivated by desire alone, arguing instead that some actions may be motivated by the will to do one's duty out of respect for the moral law. Moreover, many Christian thinkers reject Hobbes's egoism because of its roots in a secular, naturalistic world-view. These Christians never doubt that altruism is possible; the question for them is instead whether there are times when we are permitted, but not required, to be altruistic.

This question arises because the NT, especially in the teachings of Jesus, urges a concern for the well-being of others and an attitude of self-sacrifice (e.g. Mt. 25:31-36; 10:37-39). In view of this, it might be thought that sacrificial regard for the well-being of others is the whole of Christian morality. To balance this view, other Christians have noted that the NT also allows a place for proper selfregard (e.g. 'Love your neighbour as yourself,' Mt. 22:39; 'What good will it be for a man if he gains the whole world, yet forfeits his soul?' Mt. 16:26).

In conclusion, it may be noted that the above discussion is couched in terms of personal ethics, since it is a matter of some controversy whether altruism can or should be present at the level of the nation. It might be argued, for instance, that national governments are specially ordained to promote justice rather than well-being, or even that only persons can be altruistic, so that the concept of altruism cannot apply to non-personal entities such as nations.

For historical sources of the debate over altruism and egoism, see Joseph Butler, Fifteen Sermons (1726), ed. T. A. Roberts (London, 1970), esp. Sermon XI; Thomas Hobbes, Leviathan (1651), ed. M. Oakeshott (Oxford, 1947); Immanuel Kant, Foundations of the Metaphysics of Morals (ET, Indianapolis, IN, 1959); and William Paley, The Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy (London, 1785; repr. New York, 1977). For a contemporary introduction, see Alasdair Macintyre, EP, pp. 462-466. For a detailed contemporary study, see Thomas Nagel, The Possibility of Altruism (Oxford, 1970).

M.T.N.

AMBROSE (c. 339-97), bishop of Milan from 374. After a very rapid transition from provincial governor and unbaptized catechumen to bishop of a strategic see, Ambrose became an outstanding church leader and preacher, whose sermons were an important factor in the conversion of Augustine.* He successfully made

Roman emperors subject, as 'sons of the church', to ecclesiastical teaching and discipline, thus influencing the course of church-State relations in the medieval West.

Ambrose was a pioneer of congregational hymnody, and a champion of monasticism* and virginity.* His most significant work was On Duties, addressed to clergy and loosely modelled on Cicero's (106-43 BC) similarly named De Officiis. It is the first thorough account of Christian ethics, rather than a handbook of ministerial practice. It discusses virtue and expediency and concludes that neither is attainable without the other. It distinguishes between 'ordinary' requirements binding on all and the 'perfection' attained by few. Stoic* influence is obvious, e.g. in the guidance on living 'according to nature' and in the subjection of appetite to reason. Ambrose seeks to show that Christian morality is superior to pagan philosophy's counsel. He maintains a constant reference to eternal life, a corporate dimension (what is expedient for others) and a practical concern (e.g. in disapproving of profit in business). Despite many scriptural examples, Ambrose's thought remains largely in a Graeco-Roman orbit.

Bibliography

On Duties, tr. H. De Romestin, NPNF, 2nd series, X.

I. J. Davidson, A Commentary on the De Officiis of St Ambrose, unpubl. PhD dissert. (Glasgow, 1992); F. H. Dudden, The Life and Times of St Ambrose, 2 vols. (Oxford, 1935).

D.F.W.

AMNIOCENTESIS is the withdrawal of fluid that surrounds the foetus (see Embryology*) in the womb, by inserting a needle through the mother's abdomen. The risk of harming the mother is negligible, but there is a risk of about 1 in 150 that the procedure will precipitate a miscarriage.

The fluid, which is largely derived from the foetus, can be taken late in pregnancy to ascertain whether or not the infant's lungs are mature. More frequently, however, the test is done at about sixteen weeks into the pregnancy to test for the presence of foetal abnormalities. The results, which may take up to four weeks to obtain, can identify chromosome disorders (most frequently Down's syndrome) and many rarer genetically determined conditions.

Amniocentesis is offered to women who have some increased risk of giving birth to a child with handicap (see Disability and Handicap*) and it is usually done with a view to abortion* of the pregnancy* if the abnormality is detected. Parents need to inform themselves about the conditions being tested for and think through their views about abortion before having the test undertaken. Those Christians who believe the foetus to be inviolate from conception will consider all such testing wrong.

Other Christians believe abortion to be permissible (though distressing and disruptive) in certain circumstances, and will see amniocentesis as providing information which is part of the basis upon which they can make a prayerful decision whether or not to continue the pregnancy.

An earlier test, the chorion biopsy, is now also available. Carried out at ten weeks, it has a slightly higher miscarriage risk, but if abortion is indicated it can be undertaken at twelve weeks, rather than at twenty weeks as with amniocentesis.

A.C.B.

ANABAPTIST ETHICS, see ANABAPTISTS; MENNONITE ETHICS.

ANABAPTISTS. Taken from the Gk. expression for one who 're-baptizes', the term 'Anabaptist' refers to the radical expression of the 16th-century European Reformation movement which reacted to the contemporary social, political, economic and religious context. Early Anabaptist leaders in Zurich included Conrad Grebel (c. 1498-1526) and Felix Mantz (1498-1527).

The first 're-baptism' took place on 21 January 1525, at which time selected believers were baptized on confession of faith. Anabaptists claimed not to baptize a second time, since they discounted the validity of infant baptism. Fierce persecution followed, and within two years Mantz was executed by drowning (a 'third baptism' it was called by the civil authorities), becoming one of the early martyrs of the movement. Anabaptists were persecuted by both Roman Catholics and other Protestants, with thousands of adherents killed in the early years.

Affirming that Scripture is authoritative for the church and should consequently be held above church tradition and civil authority, Anabaptists agreed with much of the Protestant Reformation. Anabaptists asserted, however, that the true church comprised those adults who freely and voluntarily expressed faith in Christ and submitted to baptism as an outward sign of their inward commitment. In addition, they maintained that the civil government existed only to hold evil in check, and that Christians should remain separate from the State and should thereby not wield the violent sword (see Violence*). Today, Anabaptists are represented by various groups, including the Amish, Brethren and Mennonites (see Mennonite Ethics;* Menno Simons*).

Characteristic of Anabaptist thought is the prescription that how one lives one's life is more important than how one systematizes one's faith. Within this tradition, theology has been formulated principally as an avenue through which to understand how Christians are to live. Anabaptist theology, and thereby Anabaptist ethics, is guided by five assertions: 1. Jesus is the model par excellence presented in Scripture; 2. the life of Jesus must be followed and his commandments obeyed by the Christian; 3. when obedience is activated, discipleship becomes the norm; 4. discipleship is best attained when the Christian is in community with fellow disciples; and 5. discipleship in the community of God's people requires a critique of and mission to the world. Contemporary emphases within Anabaptist ethics include concerns relative to militarism, issues of wealth (see Money*) and poverty* and nationalism.*

Bibliography

R. Friedmann, The Theology of Anabaptism (Scottsdale, PA, 1973); W. Klaassen (ed.), Anabaptism in Outline (Scottsdale, PA, 1981).

D.L.P.

ANALYTICAL PSYCHOLOGY. Unlike psychoanalysis,* analytical psychology is a methodology that is difficult to systematize, since its founder, Carl Jung,* both majored on the unmeasurable world of the unconscious* and argued for a fluid, dynamic understanding of the human psyche. We can, none the less, consider his approach and later modifications under the three headings 'Jungian concepts', 'Jungian analysis' and 'the Post-Jungians'.

1. Jungian concepts

Philosophically, some of the main influences on Jung's understanding of the human mind were: Plato's* concept of original Ideas, immaterial forms from which all material experience flows; the innate categories of perception put forward in the writings of Immanuel Kant;* and the pessimistic theodicy* of Arthur Schopenhauer (1788-1860) with its picture of a 'blind world-creating Will'. Such considerations fostered Jung's archetypal theory and his emphasis on opposites, including that of a God who evokes 'not only man's bright and positive side but also his darkness and ungodliness' (Memories, Dreams, Reflections, p. 88). We can sample something of the complexity and, at times, amorphous nature of Jung's concepts by looking at four pairs of opposites. It is important to remember in Jungian bipolarity that the opposites are linked and that psychic energy is said to flow between them.

The most fundamental bipolarity in Jungian psychology is that of the 'conscious' and 'unconscious'. Consciousness is seen as that aspect of human nature which discriminates, controls the instincts, and enables the person to adapt to life's demands. In contrast, the unconscious, comprising both the 'personal unconscious' and 'collective unconscious' (a hidden repository of instinctual and inherited mythological material), is undifferentiated and acts in a compensatory way to balance any one-sidedness in the conscious.

The 'ego' and 'self'* in Jungian terminology are a source of confusion, since Jung used these terms in a variety of ways. However, his prime concept of the 'ego' is as an executive entity at the centre of consciousness whose main functions are those of establishing personal identity and a sense of continuity. Whereas Freud* saw the ego as the prime mover in human development,* Jung maintained the notion of the 'self' as the integrating force within the personality* - both its centre and, mysteriously, its entirety. This latter notion led Jung, at times, to lay claim to the concept of the self (the 'Self' in some post-Jungian writing) as indistinguishable from the 'God-image' within the human psyche.

The 'persona' and 'shadow', although not strictly opposites, are two further aspects of the polarity between consciousness and the unconscious respectively. Jung coined the term 'persona' from the Lat. for 'mask', as worn by actors, and saw it as 'a complicated system of relations between individual consciousness and society' (Collected Works 7, para. 305). The persona acts as a bridge between the ego and the outside world, through which gender and social roles are expressed. The 'shadow' represents the darker side of human nature, the thing we have 'no wish to be' (CW 16, para. 470). Whereas over-identification with the persona leads to a vulnerable superficiality, the shadow, when unfaced, may project (see Defence Mechanisms*) powerfully on to others, leading to prejudiced and destructive behaviour.

Fundamental to all Jungian concepts lies the theory of the 'archetypes', inherited structural patterns within the collective unconscious which may be expressed through 'archetypal images' within the life of the individual. Of particular importance among these images are those of the 'anima' and 'animus', contrasexual archetypes which form a bridge between the unconscious and consciousness. Jung argued that the anima gives 'relationship and relatedness' to a man's self-awareness and the animus gives 'to woman's consciousness a capacity for reflection, deliberation and self knowledge' (CW 9ii, para. 33). Various writers have questioned Jung's views on gender and sexuality (see†, acknowledging both that his apparent sexism* was intrinsic to Swiss patriarchal society in the first half of the century, and that his emphasis on anima and animus can be seen as an integrating contribution to an understanding of human nature (see, e.g., Wehr, Jung and Feminism, pp. 1-25).

2. Jungian analysis

The aim of Jungian analysis, and of life itself, is for the person to embrace the process and goal of 'individuation' (see Self-actualization*), an 'at-one-ment with oneself and . . . with humanity' (CW 16, para. 227). Individuation is a progressive integration and, at the same time, differentiation, of the conscious and unconscious, the collective and uniquely individual, of the spiritual and instinctual.

Jung anticipated many of the emphases of humanistic psychology* and the counseling movement (see Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy†). He saw the method of analysis as 'an art', which stressed the individual's uniqueness, sat loose to theory and technique, emphasized the therapeutic relationship as one of equals (or, better, of 'assymetrical mutuality'), and engaged in a 'dialectical process' at every level (between analyst and patient, conscious and unconscious, ego and shadow, etc.). Such principles contrast Jung's approach with Freud's: Jung engaged the patient face to face, eschewing the Freudian couch; he was more positive about regression (see Defence Mechanisms*); and was more tolerant of the 'fantasy relationships' between analyst and patient, including that of counter-transference (see Transference*). Using the analysis of dreams* (which Jung saw as 'compensatory' towards the conscious life, with both causal and purposive perspectives) and 'active imagination' (allowing a picture, mood or event to stimulate fantasy images which, in taking on a life of their own, can speak to the conscious) to explore the patient's unconscious, Jung saw the analytic process in four stages: 'catharsis', a 'cleansing' brought about by the patient's confession* and unburdening; 'elucidation' in which unexamined ties to the unconscious are revealed and conscious attitudes begin to change; 'education', a 'drawing forth' into the lengthy process of integration; and 'transformation' - not only of the patient but of the analyst too.

3. The post-Jungians

Unlike the post-Freudian tradition, with its clearly defined schools of systematized methodology, post-Jungians, influenced by the less doctrinaire approach of Jung, form a more diffuse body. None the less, there have been a number of attempts to classify post-Jungian forms of analytical psychology into broadly orthodox and innovative strands. Andrew Samuels (Jung and the Post-Jungians, pp. 1-22) has reviewed these attempts and puts forward his own schema: the 'Classical School' which follows Jung's theory and practice closely; the 'Developmental School', influenced most by such psychoanalysts as Donald Winnicott* and the object-relations theories of Melanie Klein* and her successors; and the 'Archetypal School' which emphasizes the importance of highly differentiated archetypal imagery and plays down the interpretative aspects of analysis.

See also: PASTORAL CARE, COUNSELLING AND PSYCHOTHERAPY. †

Bibliography

C. G. Jung, The Collected Works (London and Princeton, NJ, 1953-1978); idem, Memories, Dreams, Reflections (London and New York, 1963); A. Samuels, Jung and the Post-Jungians (London and New York, 1985); A. Samuels et al., A Critical Dictionary of Jungian Analysis (London, 1986); A. Stevens, On Jung (London and New York, 1991); D. S. Wehr, Jung and Feminism: Liberating Archetypes (London, 1988).

R.F.H.

ANALYTICAL PSYCHOTHERAPY, see ANALYTICAL PSYCHOLOGY; CHARACTER, †

ANARCHY (lit. 'no ruler') denotes a range of conditions, from lawlessness and social chaos to a co-operative system of voluntary associations as the preferred structure of society. Common to all these usages is a rejection of authoritarian government* in favour of voluntary organization, to ensure the utmost individual freedom* compatible with the existence of society. Legal structures, including democratic institutions and political parties, are all suspect.

Anarchist trends are a recurrent historical phenomenon. Examples include Zeno (d. 263 BC), the Gk. Stoic* who repudiated dependence on the trappings of culture; the ancient Essenes; some early Anabaptists;* the Doukhabors, the 18th-century Russian sect; the Levellers in the Eng. Civil War; and other groups emphasizing that Christ has freed us from the evils of this world and bondage to the law. On similar religious grounds Leo Tolstoy* denounced the State and its rule of laws, renouncing even his own property and social status. The American writer Henry Thoreau (1817-62) adopted kindred ideas on romanticist grounds, and some Russian revolutionaries repudiated Marxism's 'dictatorship of the proletariat' in favour of a syndicate of voluntary labour groups. More recently, student activists of the 1960s in various countries revolted against the political and social establishment. A more right-wing American expression of anarchist ideas appears (1938-) Anarchy, State and Utopia, with his insistence that individuals have the freedom to acquire whatever they can provided only that they do not take it illegally from others. An individual's acquisition rights are the centrepiece of society.

Anarchy's preference for voluntary rather than legal structures assumes that human beings are naturally good, that coercion (see Force*) is unnecessary, and that governmental authority tends to cause more harm than good. The Bible, by contrast, speaks of civil authority as ordained by God for the restraint of evil and the promotion of good (Rom. 13:1-7; 1 Pet. 2:13-17).

Bibliography

R. Nozick, Anarchy, State, and Utopia (New York, 1974; Oxford, 1975).

A.F.H.

ANGER is an emotion or passion directed towards self* or others in response to a real or perceived wrongdoing. Anger as emotional energy, and aggression as its physical expression, emerge in all humans, either in covert and subtle or in overt and confrontive forms. Anger should be differentiated from hostility, which is a state of animosity or antagonism and a negative orientation; anger may be either negative or positive, unloving or loving. Anger must also be distinguished from aggression, which is an action of invasion or injury towards another which may or may not be motivated by anger.

1. Anger theory. Theories of anger and aggression have emerged from three major perspectives: a. The psychoanalytic, instinctual, ethological group finds its most influential roots in Freudian theory. From his earliest formulations of anger and aggression arising from desire, to his final formulation of a self-destructive death instinct, Sigmund Freud saw anger in terms of a hydraulic model of accumulating instincts which require tension discharge. Although the majority of psychoanalysts refuse the theory of a death instinct (thanatos), they acknowledge a destructive drive which is the reverse pole of the sexual instinct (eros). b. The behavioural and sociallearning theorists, such as J. Dollard, J. B. Rotter (1920-) and Albert Bandura (1925-), saw anger and aggression as environmentally induced, and invariably a consequence of frustration. These responses were seen as both innate and learned, so the focus of causal analysis included external instigations, stimulus events, and learned internal responses. c. The existential and phenomenological theorists, such as Rollo May,* Carl Rogers,* Abraham Maslow* and Frederick Perls (1893-1970), saw the individual's reactions to the environment as shaped by the perceptions which form the subjective reality of the person.

2. Anger dynamics. Anger is an emotional response with four component parts. a. Arousal: a physiological state of bodily arousal, with autonomic, facial, respiratory and metabolic manifestations, lies beneath the anger emotion. b. Appraisal: a cognitive state, appraising and defining the arousal, makes internal demands on both internal and external events. c. Approval: a moral-cultural approval process directs the anger emotion, censoring and filtering the response according to cultural expectations and the local moral order. d. Action: an energizing state with drive properties intensifies aggressive or assertive actions while also disorganizing concentration, attention and impulse control.

3. Anger and theology. The capacity for anger is a basic human endowment which is morally neither positive nor negative in and of itself. Its ethical value is found in the constructive or destructive impact of its effects on self and others. Anger may be either redemptive or destructive in its purposes. This is evident in both OT and NT. The anger of Cain, of Esau, of Joseph's brothers, of Moses, and God's own anger offer opening models of both destructive and constructive styles of anger management. The Bible treats anger as a neutral emotion, judging its causes, behaviours and effects by the communal standards of Israel and later by the context of the early church. Jesus expressed anger in various circumstances, yet forbade its destructive forms. Paul and James express both criticism and approval of properly controlled and directed anger (Eph. 5:26; Jas. 1:19).

4. Anger management. Anger is a crucial emotion in the pastoral counselling process. For the therapist, anger must be owned, appreciated, channelled and utilized to summon the inner resources of feelings, both positive and negative, into the counselling encounter. For the counsellor, anger must be welcomed, its impact weighed, its dignity prized, its demands clarified, cancelled or negotiated. In the therapeutic process, anger is a signal that growth, maturation and autonomy from the therapist is occurring. (When there is no negative transference, there is little or no therapeutic progress or growth.)

Destructive forms of anger management can be unlearned and creative patterns learned. Behavioural theory differentiates between styles of non-assertive (passive or internalized responses), assertive (appropriate caring and confronting responses) and aggressive behaviour (explosive or exploitive reactions). Modelling, rehearsing and reinforcing assertive behaviour patterns is an effective way of teaching constructive anger behaviours.

Anger training which combines theoretical, ethical and theological perspectives can assist the person in moving from being emotionally reactive to becoming emotionally responsive. The therapeutic goals are to facilitate differentiation between the thinking processes and the emotional processes. The capacity to think about one's experience and feel congruent emotions can be separated from the automatic emotional process which dominates or overwhelms thoughts and filters or blocks perceptions. As the person is able to separate anger and self-esteem,* anger and goal-orientation, anger and self-instructions, anger and power needs, anger and self-evaluation, then anger does not lower esteem, distract from goals, flood with negative self-instructions, exaggerate power needs and end in guilty negativism in review of the episode. Instead, the anger functions as increased arousal, heightened concern, deepened intensity of passion and more powerful expression of needs and wants. Anger management training has moved from the ventilationist process of flooding, which was used in mid- and late-20th century, to channelling, differentiation and cognitive clarification of boundaries between thought and emotion which permits control and direction of feelings and more effective relating in life.

See also: DEADLY SINS, HATRED.

Bibliography

D. Augsburger, Anger, Assertiveness and Pastoral Care (Philadelphia, 1979); A. V. Campbell, The Gospel of Anger (London and Philadelphia, 1986); M. Chave-Jones, Living with Anger (London, 1992); C. Tavis, Anger, the Misunderstood Emotion (New York, 1982).

D.W.A.

ANGLICAN MORAL THEOLOGY. In Book I of his Treatise of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (1594), Richard Hooker* established Anglican moral theology on foundations that owe much more to Thomas Aquinas* than to Martin Luther.* As a consequence, the Anglican tradition of ethical thought has tended to esteem more highly than its Lutheran,* Reformed (see Calvinistic Ethics*), or Anabaptist* (see also Menonite Ethics*) counterparts the power of natural reason to discern what is good and right, without the aid of the grace of special revelation. Accordingly, it has been more ready to accredit sources of moral wisdom other than Scripture. This is evident, for example, in the confidence that Joseph Butler* placed in common moral sense and in the moral philosophical character of his influential writings. It is also evidenced by the respect with which William Temple* regarded the contributions to ethical debate of experts in the social and natural sciences, and by the Church of England's post-war proclivity - applauded by Ian Ramsey (1915-72) - for multidisciplinary working parties on ethical issues.

Anglicanism has inherited from Thomist* moral theology a comparatively high regard for natural reason. It has also inherited a similar regard for moral reasoning (see Christian Moral Reasoning †). This has found expression in an Anglican tradition of casuistry,* which flourished in the 17th century in the hands of divines such as William Perkins (1558-1602), Robert Sanderson (1587-1663), Joseph Hall (1574-1656), and Jeremy Taylor,* and which Kenneth Kirk* sought to revive in the 1920s. Anglican casuistry has differed from its Roman counterpart in two respects. First, it has been set loose from the confessional (see Confession*). This means that its aim has not been to reach a retrospective judgment about the gravity of sins confessed, so that an appropriate penance might be imposed. Instead, it has sought to aid the formation of prospective judgments about the right course of action to be taken. Secondly, out of a high regard for the liberty of individual conscience* it has sought to aid the layperson directly, and not mediately through the priest. For this reason Anglican casuists have tended to write in the vernacular rather than Latin. On more than one occasion in the history of Anglican moral theology the high value placed upon liberty of conscience has combined with the high esteem of natural reason to erode belief in the need for moral reasoning. As examples of this take the confidence of Butler in the sufficiency of the intuitions (see Intuitionism*) of common moral sense, and of Joseph Fletcher* in the sufficiency of love's insight (Situation Ethics, London and Philadelphia, 1966).

A more fundamental point at which the Anglican ethical tradition has diverged from its Roman counterpart after the Council of Trent (1545-63) is in its location of moral considerations within the larger context of spiritual ones: Anglican moral theology stands firmly in the context of spiritual (or ascetical*) theology. This has had the salutary effect of checking the tendency of moral theology to degenerate into a legalistic preoccupation with the observance of rules, by making its aim not merely the avoidance of sin but also the pursuit of holiness. Anglican moral theology has thus been blessed with a positive orientation towards the cure of souls. This Anglican connection between the moral, the spiritual and the pastoral is well illustrated in the case of Kirk, whose most famous work in the moral field is entitled The Vision of God (London, 1931), and for whom the Regius Chair of Pastoral Theology at Oxford was renamed the Regius Chair of Moral and Pastoral Theology in 1932.

Anglicanism's relatively high estimation of 'nature', its corresponding tendency to affirm the persistent goodness and redeemability of the world by paying more attention to the divine incarnation (see Jesus*) than to the cross, and its public responsibility as the established Church of England all combined with the prominence of the 'social question' in the second half of the 19th century to produce an Anglican tradition of socialism." This flourished vigorously under the leadership of such eminent figures as F. D. Maurice,* Charles Gore (1853-1932) and William Temple up until the 1950s. Unlike the liberal Protestant social gospel* movement in America, this Anglican socialism has retained a strong and characteristic interest in spiritual formation, especially through the eucharistic liturgy, as necessary to sustain Christian political commitment (see, e.g., Kenneth Leech, The Social God, London 1981).

Bibliography

P. Elmen (ed.), The Anglican Moral Choice (Wilton, CT, 1983); H. R. McAdoo, The Structure of Caroline Moral Theology (London, 1949); J. Oliver, The Church and Social Order (London, 1968); M. B. Reckitt, Maurice to Temple (London, 1946); T. Wood, English Casuistical Divinity (London, 1952).

N.J.B.

ANIMAL EXPERIMENTATION, see RIGHTS, ANIMAL.

ANIMAL RIGHTS, see RIGHTS, ANIMAL.

ANIMAL WELFARE, see RIGHTS, ANIMAL.

ANOINTING, see SACRAMENTAL HEALING.

ANOREXIA, see EATING DISORDERS.

ANSELM (1033-1109). Born at Aosta, Italy, Anselm studied at Bee in Normandy and later became prior of Bee (1063) and abbot (1078). He was made Archbishop of Canterbury in 1093.

The spirit animating Anselm's thought is the Augustinian goal of faith seeking understanding. As he addresses God in the opening chapter of the Proslogion: 'I long to understand in some degree thy truth, which my heart believes and loves. For I do not seek to understand that I may believe, but believe in order to understand.' Anselm is perhaps best known for his argument for the existence of God, the so-called 'ontological argument' of the Proslogion, which moves from the idea of God to God as a reality.

In theology Anselm made a major contribution to the doctrine of the atonement* in his work, Cur Deus Homo (Why God Became Man). Anselm rejects the view, known as the ransom theory, that the devil, by virtue of man's sin, had 'a rightful ownership of man'. Sin is 'nothing else than not to render to God his due', with the result that God is dishonoured. It would not be proper for God to cancel sin without compensation or punishment;* rather, the one who sins must suffer the punishment of sin. Since humanity is created by God, we owe everything to him and cannot atone for our sin. Only Christ, by willingly assuming human nature and dying, can render God his due. Christ, by freely offering the Father payment for that which he did not himself owe, makes atonement for mankind.

Bibliography

Basic Writings (La Salle, IL, 1962).

A.G.V.

ANTINOMIANISM. The word 'antinomianism' derives from two Gk. words, anti (against) and nomos (law). In general it designates those who reject moral law as binding on conduct. This view has made its impact both inside and outside the Christian church.

Non-Christian forms of antinomianism include the ancient Epicurean saying 'eat, drink and be merry', and 2nd-century gnosticism, whose followers claimed that, since the law came from the Demiurge (a demonic being in opposition to God) and not from the loving Father, Christians had no obligation to obey it. In modern times, many existentialists have been considered antinomian, since they encourage individuals to 'do their own thing'. French existentialist Jean-Paul Sartre* claimed that it made no difference whether one decided to lead the nations or get drunk (Being and Nothingness, 1943; ET, London, 1957). The German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche* claimed that God had died and all absolute values died with him. Situation ethicists, such as Joseph Fletcher*, have also denied all contentful ethical absolutes, and they are thereby open to the charge of lawlessness, though Fletcher distances himself from antinomianism.

Antinomianism has not been limited to nonChristians. Even in NT times Paul warned against it when he opposed the cry 'Let us do evil that good may result' (Rom. 3:8). Later, the Adamite sect in N. Africa condemned marriage and worshipped in the nude. A tract by Augustine* (Against Adversaries of the Law and the Prophets) reveals the presence of an antinomian element. During the Reformation, Martin Luther* opposed Johannes Agricola (1494-1566), who that denied that Christians owe obedience to any part of God's moral law, even that expressed in the Decalogue*. Traces of antinomianism were also found among Anabaptists,* High Calvinists in the Commonwealth, New England Puritans (e.g. Anne Hutchinson, 1591-1643) and even some Wesleyans. The latter elicited a strong response from John Fletcher (1729-85) in Checks to Antinomianism (1771). Antinomian trends still exist today among certain Christian cults and sects.

See also: LAW.

N.L.G.

ANTI-SEMITISM. While the term 'anti-Semitism' was not coined until 1879, the reality of anti-Jewish racialism has a long history. Because the Jews often remained a distinct community and refused participation in emperor-worship, they faced persecution under such emperors as Nero and Domitian.

In the 1st century the church and synagogue competed for the souls of those who were increasingly disillusioned with current immorality and decadent polytheism. Theological disputes concerning the person of Jesus, the role of the law/Torah and the position of Gentile believers fanned the hostility. The Gospels of Matthew and John reflect the tensions, although accusations of anti-Semitism in them seem unfounded, for both their authors were Jews.

With the shift in political power after 321 AD, Christian anti-Semitism became institutionalized. Despite the fact that Jesus and the apostles were Jewish and the NT teaches against racial discrimination, the church has been guilty of continuous anti-Semitism. High points were the Crusades, the fourth Lateran Council (1215), the Inquisition (1232 onwards), the Dreyfus affair in France (1894), Russian pogroms and supremely the Nazi Holocaust. While Islam, and more recently anti-Zionism, Marxism and the formerly Communist-bloc countries of Eastern Europe, have also exhibited anti-Semitism, the Christian church has particularly contributed to this ugly phenomenon.

An early stimulus towards anti-Semitism was the accusation that it was the Jews who killed the Messiah Jesus, ignoring the guilt of Pilate and the Roman authorities. Later Jews were accused of plotting against Christians as agents of the angel of death. Christian painters and cartoonists popularized this accusation, as also the idea that Jews sucked the blood of Christian babies and seduced Christian maidens. The Nazis inherited these prejudices and linked them with Richard Wagner (1818-83), Friedrich Nietzsche* and German nationalism to reduce Jews to sub-human nonAryan vermin. Perhaps jealousy of Jewish financial expertise also played its part in fostering anti-Semitism.

Luther's* anti-Jewish writings encouraged Lutherans to follow in Roman Catholic anti-Semitic footsteps. Calvinism (see Calvinistic Ethics*), however, with its work ethic and its emphasis on the Heb. Scriptures and on the church as the new Israel, was less inclined to anti-Semitism.

See also: RACE.

Bibliography

J. G. Gager, The Origins of Anti-Semitism (Oxford, 1983); M. Gilbert, The Holocaust (London, 1986); C. Klein, Anti-Judaism in Christian Theology (London, 1978); R. S. Wistrich, Anti-Zionism and Anti-Semitism in the Contemporary World (London, 1990); Bat Ye'or, The Dhimmis: Jews and Christians under Islam (Cranbury, NJ, 1985).

M.F.G.

ANXIETY is part of the human condition from which no-one (including Christians) is exempt. It is an unpleasant emotion,* caused by external events and/or internal conflict which are experienced as presenting an actual, imagined or potential threat to one's equilibrium. Anxiety can be positive when it is seen as an amber light warning of danger ahead. For some people it acts as a positive stimulus to creative action (e.g. working hard for an examination), and they are able to take it in their stride. For others it produces some degree of paralysis (e.g. not being able to work at all for the examination). Both these reactions depend upon the complicated network of emotional, mental and biological structures which constitute the personality.

Anxiety is always an uncomfortable emotion with its physical accompaniments: pounding heart, tension headache, sweating palms, over-activity of the intestines, nausea, dilated pupils, etc. These reactions are the responses to increased adrenalin in the bloodstream, which prepares the body for fight or flight in the short term. If anxiety continues unabated over a long period, this increased adrenalin can produce biochemical changes and instigate various physical illnesses.

Some people live in a state of inner anxiety-producing conflict. For some it is a permanent state of dread and fear* of impending disaster, out of proportion to reality, which slows them down and diminishes their effectiveness severely. This is usually referred to as an 'anxiety state' or 'morbid anxiety'. It is often about a fear of nothingness, annihilation and nonrelatedness (ultimate death).

Separation anxiety is always present in healthy children to whom separation from parents would represent real danger. However, its excessive manifestation in adults is usually related to some other anxiety-producing factor, probably traumatic events in childhood which have never been satisfactorily resolved and live on in the active memory or the unconscious (see Loneliness*).

There is a variety of defence mechanisms* which people use to shield themselves from the pain of awareness of the cause of the anxiety. This is not a conscious operation; it is an activity of the unconscious mind. These defences do not abolish the anxiety; they merely divert it. People then do not complain of the anxiety but of the headaches, the nausea, trembling hands, abdominal symptoms, etc. The defences are called 'neurotic anxiety'.

These defence mechanisms can take various forms: 1. Constant physical pain of no organic origin, which can involve endless medication and even multiple surgery. 2. Paralysis of a limb or impairment of a physical function which would be required in a threatening situation (e.g. an inexplicable and crippling pain in the arm before a written examination, with no conscious association). Any part of the body may be involved in the 'mysterious leap from mind to body' (Freud). This is referred to as 'hysterical conversion'. 3. Various phobias such as school phobia (the child's anxiety about going to school is usually not about what may happen at school but what may happen at home while the child is at school); agoraphobia; claustrophobia; arachnophobia (fear of spiders or other insects which dash about unpredictably and represent instincts which are hard to keep under control). 4. The obsessional performance of certain ritual behaviour, e.g. handwashing or not stepping on the cracks in the pavement. This has to do with an attempt to control excessive free-floating anxiety about dirt or some other 'contaminating' substance or idea and reduce its terror by making it manageable. In all these phobias the basic anxiety is hidden underneath some crippling social inability.

Another reaction to anxiety can be a complete emotional withdrawal from active participation in normal life. Depression* often results from prolonged anxiety.

Stress* is very similar to anxiety in its physical manifestations, including changes in sleeping patterns, timekeeping, personal organization, proneness to accidents, tiredness, loss of interest and efficiency at work, over-reaction and irritability. It is usually connected with external events which impinge too heavily on the limits of the personality. Thomas H. Holmes and R. H. Rahe produced a Social Readjustment Rating Scale which measured forty-two stressful events. The death of a spouse (see Bereavement*) is the highest (100), minor violations of the law the lowest (11), with marriage,* pregnancy,* and environmental change graduating between. Any change in the known routine is stressful to some extent. We can do various things to reduce our anxiety-level or prevent it from becoming abnormal, i.e. try to know ourselves, decide priorities and clarify boundaries where possible; have adequate relaxation and physical exercise; secure enough personal space; ensure enough support from others; not repress internal or interpersonal conflict. When the anxiety is high, all efforts to help oneself are of no avail until the level has been reduced, probably with medical help, so that we can start working at problem-solving again.

There are various therapeutic approaches to the treatment of severe anxiety. The behaviourist* school aims to submit the patient's symptoms to gradual, prolonged exposure, with support, to the external manifestation of the anxiety (e.g. fear of spiders) until the patient is able to tolerate its presence. This can be successful, but there is always the danger that the underlying anxiety, if not itself treated, will present in some other form. The psychodynamic approach takes much longer and works at the unconscious activity in the anxiety rather than the observable symptoms. Neurotic anxiety is sometimes helped by the support of prayer and a 'healing ministry', provided this is done with patient understanding of the whole problem.

Christian belief is totally relevant to one's sense of perspective. The providence of God includes his fatherly care for his children; thus they need not panic in their reactions to anxiety and stress. They need actively to remind themselves that 'underneath are the everlasting arms' (Dt. 33:27); they are not alone; and nothing can separate them from God's love (Rom. 8:38-39). It is sometimes hard to hold on to this knowledge in the face of some enigmatic situations, and then believers need the solidarity of Christian friends. However, the ultimate perspective for all of life, including anxiety, is eternity (2 Cor. 4:18).

Bibliography

J. Bowlby, Separation: Anxiety and Anger (London, 1973); G. Davies, Stress (Eastbourne, 1988).

M.C.-J.

APARTHEID (lit. 'apartness') particularly designates the policy of racial separation and discrimination pursued by the National Party government from 1948 till 1991 in the Republic of South Africa. (Apart from the introduction of a new Constitution, with voting rights for all races, all apartheid laws were scrapped by mid-1991.) Apartheid was characterized by the hierarchical ordering of economic, political and social structures on the basis of race, by political and economic discrimination against the 'non-white' races, and by the segregation of the races in most spheres of life. This system was legalized, institutionalized and enforced by the government (M. Lipton, Capitalism and Apartheid, pp. 14-15).

Historical roots

The roots of apartheid are complex and date back at least to the early 19th century. A major strand of apartheid thinking developed within the Dutch Reformed Church (DRC). Successful missionary work resulted in 'coloured' persons being added to the church. Presbytery and Synod decisions in 1829 and 1834 upheld their right to partake of the Lord's Supper together with 'born Christians' (whites), but in practice this was ignored. Then, in 1857, in a bid to gain support for its mission work, the Synod 'as a result of the weakness of some' permitted separate places of worship for the 'coloured' converts. This historic resolution paved the way for the 1881 decision to form the Dutch Reformed Mission Church. Racial prejudice, at least in part, had led to church 'apartheid'. While this development was more pragmatic than ideological, it nevertheless set a precedent which helped create a climate receptive to the idea of racial separation as a solution to racial prejudice or friction.

Apartheid as an ideology, however, only really developed in the 1930s. According to J. Kinghorn (in M. Prozesky, Christianity Amidst Apartheid, p. 61) the major factors in growth of the apartheid philosophy were economic and ideological, theology following their lead, though other scholars assign a more formative role to theology.

The Afrikaners were humiliated in the Anglo-Boer War (1899-1902) and subsequently impoverished and urbanized (see Urbanization*). Many were unemployed and lived in slums with blacks. It was into this situation that the ideological factor entered in the 1930s. 'A racially defined nationalism imported from Germany, Spain, Portugal and Italy penetrated Afrikanerdom like a veld fire' (J. Kinghorn, in M. Prozesky, Christianity Amidst Apartheid, pp. 61-62). Afrikaner nationalism developed in sympathy with these views and there were widespread calls for black/white separation. Even the Afrikaans churches joined in.

The Afrikaans churches believed that such a separation would restore the self-respect of the Afrikaner and save him from the slums. It did, but at the cost of denigrating and subjugating other races. In a number of delegations to the government, the DRC pressed for separate suburbs, schools and industries and for an end to racially mixed marriages. In 1942 the DRC told the government they were in favour of 'racial apartheid' and racial purity. No wonder they could claim with pride after the National Party victory in 1948: 'As a Church, we have always worked purposefully for the separation of the races. In this regard apartheid can rightfully be called a Church policy' (J. de Gruchy, The Church Struggle in South Africa, p. 59).

Identification with the plight of the Afrikaner was not the only factor that led the Afrikaans churches to support apartheid. The way was also prepared by the wide influence of Abraham Kuyper's* theology in the 1930s. Kuyper had emphasized the God-given diversity of the races and the right of each race to maintain its identity. His views were then modified and used to provide a theological justification of apartheid. This backing of apartheid by the churches gave it a moral legitimacy in the eyes of the Afrikaners, a church-going nation, and it was only after the DRC withdrew its support of apartheid in 1986 that ideological apartheid began to crumble.

Apartheid legislation

Before 1948 a number of discriminatory Acts were already on the statute books. The 1913 and 1936 Land Acts reserved 13% of the country for the 70% black majority, and in 1923 urban blacks were confined to segregated townships. There was discriminatory labour legislation, and only coloureds in the Cape and whites had the vote.

The victorious Nationalists soon began to turn their apartheid vision into reality, ushering in an all-embracing programme of social engineering. 'Within less than three decades, a total reconstruction of South African society, politics and the economy enabled the poverty of the poor whites to be converted into great affluence' (J. Kinghorn, in M. Prozesky, Christianity Amidst Apartheid, p. 63). The fulfilment of their dream, however, became a nightmare for millions of blacks.

Few areas of life were left untouched by the host of discriminatory laws that followed. Racially mixed marriages were prohibited in 1949 - later, even sex between whites and other races was forbidden. In 1950 the Population Registration Act classified all people racially, and via the Group Areas Act (1950) they were residentially segregated. The Influx Control Act of 1952 ('pass laws') denied freedom of movement to blacks. Reference books ('passes') had to be carried at all times and were bitterly resented. Rural blacks could work in the cities only by becoming migrant labourers* - this meant they only spent one month a year with their wives and children in the 'homelands'. Four of these homelands became 'independent' states - 8.5 million blacks thereby losing their South African citizenship - while another six opted for self government.

Labour discrimination was extensive - skilled jobs were reserved for whites, blacks could trade only in their own areas, could not own property, and were even removed from the Unemployment Insurance Fund. The Bantu Education Act of 1953 effectively transferred the control of black education from the State-aided mission schools to the State, and funds for black education were deliberately kept very low to prevent them rising above their station as unskilled labourers. At its height, in 1970-71, the State spent over eighteen times more per capita on the education of white children.

The implementation of apartheid resulted in the forced resettlement of 3.7 million people, 17 million pass-law convictions (1916-81), 78,000 political detentions, many without trial, and 73 deaths in detention since 1960.

The effects of such laws and their enforcement were devastating. Psychologically, blacks suffered a loss of dignity and self-esteem.* The older generation developed a dependence mentality, while many youth rebelled. Without hope of change, despair, bitterness and anger set in, though a surprising degree of goodwill remained between the estranged races. Sociologically, there was a breakdown of family life, a loss of parental authority, increased sexual immorality, a rising culture of violence, and the development of separate institutions from churches to sporting bodies. Judicially, apartheid resulted in a loss of respect for the law and its enforcers, the police and defence force. Economically, poverty was entrenched, especially in the rural homelands, with its consequences of malnutrition, a high infant-mortality rate, poor health and lower life-expectancy. In the end, factors such as poor black education, the mismanagement of economic resources, the high cost of apartheid (10% to 20% of the annual budget) and finally disinvestment and economic sanctions* proved too much for the economy, pressurizing the government to move away from apartheid.

Theological evaluation

Fundamental to the biblical doctrine of the State is that it should exercise justice (Rom. 13), that it should show neither partiality to the poor nor favouritism to the rich, but judge fairly (Lv. 19:15). Under apartheid, the whites in South Africa were legally favoured economically, educationally, medically, socially and politically. Consequently, in all these areas there were massive inequalities.

By pursuing justice the State is also to seek the good of all its subjects (Rom. 13:4). Under apartheid, however, the welfare of the whites was continually promoted to the detriment of the other races.

Apartheid also discriminated between people on the basis of race, a category J. B. Root argues is foreign to Scripture (see 'Race', in NDT, pp. 555-556), judging people on the basis of external appearance or genetics rather than on character and obedience to God.

Apartheid, based as it was on the fundamental irreconcilability of the different races, in effect denied the reconciling and uniting power of Christ to overcome human divisions through the cross (Eph. 2:11-22).

Anthropologically, Scripture stresses the absolute unity of humanity in Adam, and the relativity and fluidity of the nations, while apartheid absolutized ethnic diversity and relativized human unity. This made it easy to regard some races as intrinsically superior to others and so devalue their dignity.

While ecclesiastical apartheid was never enforced, the country's policies led to racially separate churches and the failure of many churches to demonstrate their unity in Christ. Further, for many Afrikaners, race or nationality took precedence over their covenantal commitment to Christ. They found their identity first in their race and then in the people of God. Nationalism* thus became idolatrous, and the church's integrity and unity were denied.

Ethically, apartheid violated the fundamental moral principle of neighbour love, to love others as yourself and to treat them as you would be treated. Love for one's own people was stressed, and since power was in the hands of whites, white interests usually came first.

For reasons like these, the Alliance of Black Reformed Christians in Southern Africa in 1981 rightly declared that the moral and theological justification of apartheid was a heresy, while the dehumanizing aspects of apartheid led the mainline churches to oppose apartheid vigorously. The smaller evangelical churches, however, because of their pietistic heritage and individualistic emphasis, were very late in their public criticism of apartheid, with the gospel losing credibility as a result.

When ideas of ecclesiastical racial separation were first mooted in the DRC, Andrew Murray (1828-1917) had warned: 'The danger exists that the voice of blood, the voice of passion, of partisanship, of group interest will overpower the voice of the Gospel!' (C. Villa-Vicencio, The Theology of Apartheid, pp. 10-11). Tragically, the church failed to hear his prophetic voice and a whole nation suffered the consequences.

See also: EVANGELICAL WITNESS IN SOUTH AFRICA; KAIROS DOCUMENT; RACE.

Bibliography

M. Cassidy, The Passing Summer (London, 1989); J. W. de Gruchy, The Church Struggle in South Africa (Grand Rapids, 1986); J. W. de Gruchy and C. Villa-Vicencio (eds.), Apartheid is a Heresy (Cape Town, 1983); M. Lipton, Capitalism and Apartheid: South Africa, 1910-1986 (Aldershot, 1986); J. A. Loubser, The Apartheid Bible (Cape Town, 1987); D. J. Morphew, South Africa: The Powers Behind (Cape Town, 1989); M. Prozesky (ed.), Christianity Amidst Apartheid (London, 1990); C. Villa-Vicencio, The Theology of Apartheid (Cape Town, n.d.).

J.G.C.

AQUINAS, see THOMAS AQUINAS.

ARCHETYPAL THEORY, see ANALYTICAL PSYCHOLOGY; JESUS.

ARCHITECTURE. In 1624, Sir Henry Wootton (1568-1639) suggested that there was a moral imperative in the art of architecture: 'The end is to build well ... well building hath three Conditions: Commodity, Firmness and Delight.' These conditions still relate to the challenge facing any designer to satisfy and integrate social, technological and aesthetic requirements, in order to produce a holistic approach to architecture and physical planning.

Potentially, such criteria relate closely to the application of Christian ethics in social, economic, legal, political, environmental and philosophical terms, both in the design process and in building performance. However, 'potential' is an appropriate word in view of the fragmentary attention to ethical matters, aside from a continual and frequently self-serving debate on professionalism and the contractual obligations and liability of architects to their clients and builders. In the UK, the issues of professional responsibility and ethical concern (see Professional Ethics*) came into sharp focus in 1993, when the Government declared its intention to abolish the legal protection of the description 'architect'. If this change had occurred, then anyone, trained or not, qualified or not, would have been entitled to use this designation. A fierce debate followed on a wide range of themes: professionalism, elitism, the demands of a free market relative to public service, and an ethical concern for public protection. As a direct response to pressure from architects and consumer groups, the Government unexpectedly abandoned the proposal. This result highlighted conflicting ethical issues: 1. it was seen as a victory for the consumers of architecture, who would continue to enjoy protection from charlatan designers; and 2. it was seen as an example of the power of professional self-interest, masquerading as ethical concern for the public good.

Ethical issues

The symptoms of the disregard of ethical issues can be found in the areas of writing, education and the assessment of competitions. 1. Until 1994 at least, no book has been specifically devoted to 'ethics and architecture'. 2. There is a major educational gap, since the subject rarely figures directly in the curriculum of architectural schools, although it is more prominent in planning education. 3. When a major architectural competition is assessed, whilst there is no shortage of comment on technological, stylistic and conceptual issues, it would be an exceedingly rare event for an assessor to comment on relevant ethical dimensions. This omission could include such 'incidentals' as the selection of non-renewable building materials, the social consequences on the population displaced by the proposed new building, or even the likely well-being of the occupants of the proposed entry.

However, despite this apparent neglect, there is no doubt that architectural ethics has been considered by many responsible designers since the mid-19th century, particularly within the arts and crafts movement (see P. Davey, Arts and Crafts Architecture). This tradition still continues in the work of certain responsible architects. (See B. Mikellides, Architecture for People, and R. Maguire, 'In Defence of Modernism'.) But in the absence of detailed documentation, or effective patterns of accountability of architects to their public, the concern remains fragmentary.

An incentive for a new awareness of the subject has come through the recent barrage of criticism (much of it coming from a broadly ethical position). This has assailed architects from various directions: from the Prince of Wales (1948-), planning officers, unsatisfied occupants of new buildings, and their vocal, unhappy neighbours. Such critics share a conviction that the consumers of architecture and physical planning deserve much better service from the relevant professions (C. Caddy, 'A Christian Planner and Development Control', and P. Dearnley, 'No Mean Cities').

There is one area of planning and architecture where ethical issues have been central: the debate on urban planning and public housing policy. In Europe and N. America, a series of influential studies was produced from the 1960s which challenged many utopian architectural and planning ideologies for the provision of new towns and mass housing with a strong social and ethical critique.

These culminated in the UK in 1985, when Professor Alice Coleman (1923-) of King's College, London, developed a hypothesis, tested through the analysis of 10,000 dwellings, that linked social malaise (expressed in urban vandalism, criminal activity, litter and children in care) to the design and layout of public housing estates (A. Coleman, Utopia on Trial). Since the underlying philosophy that influenced planning concepts and the design of high-rise and low-rise dwellings was heavily dependent on the ideas of leading architects and planners of the day, her study was inevitably vigorously opposed by the professional establishment. However, criticism from lay persons, official sources and academic researchers was influential, and it is clear that social concerns are now much higher on the agenda of the design process. The critique may have contributed to the sharp decline in the creation and maintenance of the public housing sector, which has been vigorously opposed in policies of successive Conservative governments with a commitment to the virtues of home ownership and growth in the private sector.

Architecture and Christian ethics

The roots of an understanding of Christian ethics and its relationship to architecture lie deep within three great biblical doctrines.

1. Creation.^{*} God has created a world of abundant resources for our well-being and aesthetic delight.

In recent years, there has been a renewed concern to promote a 'green architecture' that avoids wasting precious natural resources (see Environment^{*}). Christians believe that God has provided and continues to sustain his creation with adequate provision (land, energy sources, building materials, skills and labour) for all habitation needs. But this abundance does not offer a licence for profligate waste. In practical terms, the desire to apply Christian ethics may need to exercise increasing influence on decisions about the specification of non-renewable materials, on how to avoid wasting land in locating a building on a site, on land-use planning and energy conservation.

As well as conserving and managing God's creation (see Stewardship^{*}), designers will continue to recognize the wonder and diversity of creation as a primary inspiration for fertile design ideas in terms of colour, tone, form, texture, structural strength, etc.

The concept that 'Man does not live on bread alone' (Mt. 4:4) is not only a reminder of the spiritual dimensions of life; it can also refer to the realm of aesthetics, beauty and delight, since the giving of pleasure^{} is an essential part of Christian loving (see†). Goodness^{} is concern expressed in action; action without love is morally meaningless, and love without action corresponds to faith^{*} without works (see Good Works^{}). Christian architects should therefore be even more concerned than any designer coming from a humanist^{} stance to create wonderful structures that bring joy to their users and viewers, as well as to designer colleagues (G. Carey, 'Finding Security in an Insecure World').

But an important question concerning Christian ethics remains to be resolved in the complex field of beauty and taste. This concerns the 'accessibility' to the untrained eye of the architectural language that is used.

Thus, the doctrine of creation embraces the goodness of a loving God as he gives gifts to men and women, including all creative gifts necessary to design, build and manage the built environment for the good of present and future generations.

2. The image of God.^{*} The doctrine that humanity is made in the image of God has some important implications for architecture. The design and ambience of buildings need to reflect this truth.

Vital links need to be established between designers (including the expanding range of professionals involved in the production of buildings), the 'producers' of buildings (including builders and persons with craft skills), and the occupants of buildings. Such relationships need to lead to mutual trust, the sharing and delegation of creative gifts, the development of patterns of accountability, and the detailed participation of users with the producers of their physical environment (R. Macleod, 'Christian Belief and the Built Environment').

There are encouraging signs of a more positive approach towards a socially responsive architecture. For example, the rapid growth in the community-architecture movement in Europe and N. America indicates that many architects (often motivated by a humanist rather than Christian concern) care deeply about the needs of disadvantaged people. They perceive their role to be 'enablers' to their clients, as opposed to assuming a passive acceptance of what they are perceived to need. The biblical understanding of humanity also relates to the demands of such disadvantaged groups, including the physically and mentally handicapped, and their access to appropriate architecture.

Human comfort, safety and health can all be affected for better or worse by building design. Christian designers and planners will need no reminder of this, not just with regard to homes, but also offices, studios and factories. Our Lord's demanding injunction 'Do to others what you would have them do to you' (Mt. 7:12) has its application in such areas.

3. Sin. Architecture does not operate in a spiritual and moral vacuum. It is designed to serve the needs of sinful humanity in a world contaminated by evil.

Powerful people and institutions have always promoted structures (including buildings) which can serve their own sectional interests to the detriment of the needs of other less influential groups. Effective legal action, 'citizen action groups' and mediating structures are thus needed to curb such vested interests, and to ensure that justice is promoted in the planning process in order to make certain that buildings and cities are not manipulated for the satisfaction of private greed as opposed to public good.

In addition, there is a need to design with an awareness of sin (see Sin and Salvation†). Much architectural writing glamorizes human behaviour with a heavy dose of utopian optimism. Christian ethics applied to architecture will lead towards practical design measures that may reduce crime and vandalism (O. Newman, Defensible Space). Such measures need to be regarded as a realistic rather than a pessimistic response to human needs.

Through considering the implication of basic doctrines, a 'Christian mind' needs to be developed in order to shape architectural and planning values in the time of uncertainty that grips the professions. To fulfil this noble aim, three exacting demands have to be met: 1. to design and build in harmony with the natural and human environment;* 2. when selecting spaces, forms and materials, to regard design as an act of service to others, especially vulnerable groups; and 3. to retain a realistic awareness of evil,* avoiding any utopian tendency to idealize social behaviour.

Ethical dimensions, and more specifically Christian considerations, need to be developed, documented, shared, applied and tested through design and contractual experience. This is needed in order to create a more responsible architecture and well-planned environment that celebrates a Creator God and his created world and brings joy* and satisfies the practical need of all sections of human society.

See also: COMMUNITY ETHICS.†

Bibliography

A. Coleman, Utopia on Trial: Vision and Reality in Planned Housing (London, 1985); P. Davey, Arts and Crafts Architecture: The Search for Earthly Paradise (London, 1980); B. Mikellides (ed.) Architecture for People: Explorations in a New Humane Environment (London, 1980), esp. P. Aldington and J. Craig, 'Understanding People and Developing a Brief', pp. 27-33; O. Newman, Defensible Space (New York, 1972; London, 1973).

The Association of Christians in Planning and Architecture Newsletter is a valuable source of Christian discussion of ethical issues relating to physical planning and architecture. See esp. C. Caddy, 'A Christian Planner and Development Control', ACPAN 13/14, 1988/89, pp. 19-31; G. Carey, 'Finding Security in an Insecure World', ACPAN 11, 1987, pp. 4-14; P. Dearnley, 'No Mean Cities: A Christian Perspective on Urban Planning and Policy', ACPAN 15, 1989, pp. 7-17; R. Macleod, 'Christian Belief and the Built Environment', ACPAN 1, 1983, pp. 6-17; idem, 'The Idea of a Christian Architecture', ACPAN 24, 1993, pp. 11-14; R. Maguire, 'In Defence of Modernism', ACPAN 24, 1993, pp. 15-19.

I.R.D.

ARISTOTLE (384-322 BC), the student of Plato,* the tutor of Alexander the Great (356-323 BC) and the founder of the Lyceum. His ethical writings (Nicomachean Ethics, Eudemian Ethics and, sometimes attributed to him, Magna Moralia) need to be understood against the background of his work in metaphysics, politics, biology and psychology.

Aristotle starts in his ethical writings with the search for the chief human good. He suggests that people agree in calling this 'happiness', but they do not agree on what happiness is. He himself ties happiness to human functioning, saying that the chief good is the activity of the soul which expresses virtue (or excellence in functioning). For Aristotle, the ethical virtues are the virtues* (or excellences) of that part of the human soul which listens to reason although it does not reason itself. They are acquired by habituation of character. They are stable dispositions to feel the appropriate amount of some passion in the appropriate circumstances and to act appropriately (where what is appropriate is decided by practical reason). Each virtue lies in a mean between two vices, one of excess and one of defect.

Practical wisdom is, for Aristotle, an intellectual virtue, or an excellence of the part of the human soul which reasons. It requires the perception of particulars as having or not having value, and links this to the agent's vision of the good, resulting in action.

He concludes that the chief human good is study or contemplation, since this is the most divine kind of life.

See also: HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN ETHICS.†

J.E.H.

ARMAMENTS. In a general sense, the term 'armaments' refers to the military and naval equipment and forces of a nation. In a more limited sense, it indicates the weapons with which these forces are supplied, such as guns, planes and missiles. Early armaments made from wood and stone evolved during prehistoric times until the development of bows, arrows, spears and slings. The use of metal during the third millennium BC gave one group technological superiority, thus forcing the disadvantaged to achieve or surpass the technology of the oppressors. This practice has led to a constant development of superior armaments through the ages.

Early Roman craftsmen looking for more plentiful metal produced iron, and by the end of the first millennium AD Chinese and Islamic workers made heat-forged steel. In Western Europe this harder metal made possible the replacement of wooden shields and leather protective garments with armour. As long as weapons were this simple the arguments for a 'just war'* based on a distinction between defensive and offensive weapons were quite persuasive. Using the example of ancient warfare as described in the Bible, the just-war theorists referred to body armour and shields as defensive and the sword and spear as offensive. During the Middle Ages, the use of cavalry led to the heavily armoured horsefighter or knight becoming the supreme offensive weapon, and castles the best means of defence.

In the late medieval period, gunpowder revolutionized warfare. Cannons were decisive in the Hundred Years War and the Italian Wars (1494-1559). By the mid-16th century, in addition to artillery, small arms were widely used. Further developments occurred in the 17th and 18th centuries, but the major change in armaments came with the increased productive capacity of the 19th-century Industrial Revolution.

The ideology for the use of modern armaments came from a Prussian military instructor, Karl von Clausewitz (1780-1831), who devised the concept of 'total war'. To him warfare was to be pushed to the 'utmost bounds' of violence in order to win. His ideas were accepted in most European military academies during the latter part of the 19th century.

The First World War made it possible to test these new weapons. Modern artillery, machine guns, poison gas, tanks, submarines and aerial bombardment gave war* a terrifying threedimensional character that had never been known before. The invention of new armaments continued after the conflict. It can be argued that the Second World War was actually won by the Allied scientists who were better organized than their Axis counterparts. The British and Americans developed electronic gear such as radar, submarine detection devices and new types of long-range aircraft. However, the Germans and Japanese contributed more efficient torpedoes, submarines, jet planes and rockets to the advancing technology. Further development of armaments was continued during the Cold War, with the result that it became difficult for Christians to support the idea of a 'just war'.

The distinction between offensive and defensive weapons could no longer be maintained when armaments were produced for the express purpose of indiscriminately destroying civilian populations. This became apparent during the Second World War with the escalation of aerial bombardment. When the Nazis bombed innocent civilians, both President Franklin D. Roosevelt (1882-1945) and Prime Minister Winston Churchill (1874-1965) denounced such attacks. Yet by the end of the war, Allied air raids had destroyed 40% of the developed areas of sixty-six Japanese cities. Prior to this they had rained death on dozens of German cities with 'obliteration bombing', culminating in fire storms which turned both Hamburg and Dresden into huge furnaces where hundreds of thousands of innocent people died.

In addition to the horror visited on humankind by these conventional armaments, the war ushered in a new type of weapon, the atomic bomb. This was first used in 1945 on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, and since that time the power of nuclear weaponry has been greatly increased. At the present time, if several hundred nuclear weapons in the range of 100 kilotons were used, they would deplete the ozone layer, spew deadly radiation and cause a nuclear winter. This last phenomenon refers to lofting soot and smoke into the stratosphere and thus blocking the sun's rays so effectively that the average land surface temperature would cool by 10-20°C, causing crop failure and environmental damage in areas far removed from the explosion.

In addition to these nuclear armaments, several nations have developed chemical and biological weapons. The former consists of the deliberate use of chemical substances to kill plants, animals or humans, and the latter biological organisms to produce disease or death. Modern chemical warfare began during the First World War when both sides experimented with agents such as mustard gas and various ways to release these on the enemy. By the conclusion of the conflict, artillery shells filled with gas were being fired on the enemy. The heavy casualties resulting from these convinced military leaders that toxic chemicals were effective in warfare.

Research during the Second World War led to the manufacturing of more lethal nerve agents. The Germans produced these, and when the Soviets seized their war plants they became part of the Communist arsenal. However, no major power used gas in Europe during the war, largely because of the fear of massive retaliation. The development of chemical armaments has continued to the point where the US has vast stocks of toxins, such as VX, which are so lethal that one drop on a person's skin will result in death in less than four minutes. Although the major powers are hesitant to unleash these weapons, States such as Iraq have used them.

By the end of the Second World War, several nations had worked on the technology for large-scale use of biological warfare agents. These include toxins that cause food-poisoning symptoms, anthrax, tularemia, and various fungus agents. In addition, scientists have devised a large number of anti-animal and antiplant substances that cause foot-and-mouth disease, potato blight, cereal rust, and destruction of other economically important crops. Biological weapons have never been used in any major war, although the Japanese experimented with them in China during the Second World War.

The 'ABC' weapons as they are often termed (atomic or nuclear, biological, and chemical) make the categories of the just war difficult to maintain. It is hard, if not impossible, to rationalize the use of these weapons of mass destruction with a 'just cause', a 'just goal' and respect for non-combatants. Such misgivings have led many to adopt a 'nuclear pacifist' position and to work for agreements among the nations to dismantle this gruesome arsenal of destruction.

Many non-pacifist Christians have come to regard nuclear and biological weapons as intrinsically evil on the ground that their use is utterly indiscriminate. Many also refuse to participate in the manufacture of armaments, because there is no guarantee that they will be used in a just cause. Moreover, there is widespread concern over the huge sums spent on armaments by many countries to the general impoverishment of their populations.

Bibliography

J. Adams, Engines of War: Merchants of Death and the New Arms Race (New York, 1990); T. J. Gander, Nuclear, Biological, and Chemical Warfare (London and New York, 1987); R. E. Lapp, The Weapons Culture (New York, 1968); W. H. McNeill, The Pursuit of Power: Technology, Armed Force, and Society Since AD 1000 (Chicago, 1982; Oxford, 1983).

R.G.C.

ART AND THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. Historically, the role of the Christian church with respect to the arts has oscillated between that of patron and persecutor. Both negative and positive attitudes can be traced back to before the beginnings of the Christian era, in the writings of the OT. The prohibition against the making of graven images as one of the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20:4-5) has been an extremely influential text at particular moments of church history. Other OT books, e.g. the Song of Songs, have been equally important in their affirmation of the natural creation and a rich use of verbal images. The NT itself is silent on the specific issue of the visual arts. However, there is a strong 'imaginary' and visionary content in the NT writings themselves, particularly the parables of Jesus, the metaphors of Paul and the book of Revelation. Christian art per se began with the use of simple symbols, such as the fish and the cross. The use of symbol has subsequently played a great part in its development.

The first great period of Christian art came about through the use of icons in the Eastern Orthodox and Russian churches. Painted on wood, and adapted from ancient Egyptian funeral rites, icons became a highly sophisticated and precise art-form; they were made originally for public liturgies, but were subsequently also extremely popular as aids to private prayer. However, in the mid-8th century they became the centre of ecclesiastical and political controversy. The fierceness and prolonged length of the controversy bore witness to the ambiguous and ambivalent attitudes towards image-making in the OT and NT. Icons were condemned by some as idols and upheld by others as valuable means of worship. The controversy also points to the way in which early Christian thought concerning the arts had been heavily influenced by the distrust of the material and imaginary in Platonic Gk. thought.

The medieval period saw a flowering of Western Christian art under church patronage. The church was then at the pinnacle of its political power, with the ability to command the services of the greatest artists and craftworkers of the day. Gothic cathedrals such as that of Chartres, frescoed church walls, and intricate, vividly coloured illuminated manuscripts still survive as monuments to the era when virtually all art was religious. During the Renaissance, Christian art still predominated: major works were made on biblical themes. However, there was also a movement towards increased classical, historical and secular subject matter, which eventually gave rise to the modern art movement.

The Protestant Reformation saw a renewal of iconoclastic ideals, with many churches being stripped of perceived idolatrous images; church interiors were drastically simplified and purified. The growth of Protestantism and increased secularization have often combined to divorce church or religious patronage from the arts in the modern era. Modern art itself was conceived as a rejection of 'bourgeois' society and the implicit conservative Christian ideals which were seen to underpin such society. The Protestant tradition has historically incorporated within itself a distrust of artistic images as a part of worship; the Catholic tradition has historically relied on repetitive and stale images which frequently fail to convey the eternal newness and challenge of the Christian message.

There are indications of the beginnings of a rapprochement in the late 20th century between the church and the arts, particularly with the growth of the ecumenical movement. However, this often remains on the level of individual thought and enterprise. It is in no way a coherent movement. There are on the one hand comments and perceptions of individual modern artists who are not strictly affiliated to a particular Christian denomination, concerning the essentially religious or 'spiritual' nature of art. Then there are also secular artists who have used classic Christian themes in their work as a way of addressing the issues of war, violence and suffering in the 20th century. These include well-known artists such as Picasso (1881-1973), Epstein (1880-1959), Otto Lange (1879-1944), Stanley Spencer (1891-1959), Elisabeth Frink (1930-93) and Craigie Aitchison (1926-). There are also artists who incorporate a wider spectrum of Christian belief into their work to give expression to the lordship of Christ in themes of resurrection and renewal. Often a strongly calligraphic element is incorporated. These include artists such as Norman Adams (1927-), Ann Clark, Conwy Evans and John Poole.

Within many churches there has also recently been an increased interest in art as a means of self-expression, which can be used for creative healing and spiritual renewal.

See also: CENSORSHIP.

Bibliography

P. Burmansa and K. Nugent (eds.), Prophecy and Vision (Bristol, 1982); T. Talbot Rice, Icons (London, 1990); N. Usherwood (ed.), The Bible in Twentieth Century Art (London, 1987).

A.H.A.C.E.

ARTIFICIAL INSEMINATION, see REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES.

ARTIFICIAL INTELLIGENCE, see INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY.

ASCETICISM is derived from the Gk. word askesis, which in pre-Christian usage referred to exercise, practice or training for some aspired goal, such as that undertaken by an athlete or soldier.

In the Christian tradition

Early patristic sources use the word with reference to spiritual exercise or training to attain Christian perfection. Given the obstacles to reaching this end, asceticism included struggle, self-denial* and renunciations (e.g. celibacy and poverty) in order to discipline the senses and free the mind for the contemplation of higher things. It soon came to be associated with the eremitic and monastic* life of withdrawal from a worldly Constantinian church. Some of these ascetics went to extremes (such as the Stylites), buttressed by a dualism* inherited from Gk. and oriental philosophies. Heretical forms of asceticism were also found among Gnostics, Montanists and Manicheans.

Old Testament precursors. For the most part, the Hebrews in the OT did not practise the self-denial and renunciations characteristic of the asceticism described above, perhaps due to their rejection of any dualism* and their reception of God's good creation. They did practise rites of purification and penitential fasting* (e.g. Lv. 15:16-18; Jdg. 13:4-5, 7, 14; Dn. 9:3). Abstinence* was practised in later Judaism, particularly among sectarian groups such as the Essenes and in Pharisaic schools.

New Testament asceticism. The NT excludes a legalistic asceticism (Col. 2:16-23; 1 Tim. 4:1-5). Fasting is retained from OT practices, particularly in association with prayer (e.g. Lk. 2:37; Acts 13:2). But NT asceticism is characterized as: 1. watchfulness, vigilance and sobriety in the Christian life (e.g. Mt. 24:42-44; 1 Thes. 5:5-11; 1 Pet. 1:13-16; 2 Pet. 3:11-12); 2. fulfilment of Christ's call to deny oneself, take up one's cross and follow him (e.g. Mt. 16:24-26; 19:16-22); 3. part of the moral struggle by which one gains victory over the 'old self or the flesh' (i.e. sarx; not soma, the physical body) and walks by the Spirit (Rom. 8:1-17; Gal. 5:16-25; Eph. 4:22-24); and 4. the discipline necessary to bring the body into subjection as an instrument of righteousness (1 Cor. 9:25-27). Success in the disciplined struggle of the Christian life is ensured by God's grace (Rom. 7:24-25).

Medieval ascetical theology. The early church (e.g. John Cassian, c. 360-435) produced literature that detailed this process of discipline, often using the metaphors of steps on a ladder or stages in a journey. In medieval theology, associated largely with monasticism and mysticism, this culminated in a spirituality* outlining three stages of the ascetic life in the quest for perfection: purgation, illumination and union with God. Ascetic practices were especially pertinent to the first step. This medieval asceticism was developed in connection with a soteriology grounded in a system of penances and works of satisfaction. Some saw asceticism as the way to imitate the poverty and sufferings of Jesus (e.g. the Desert Fathers and Francis of Assisi*).

A healthy asceticism

Asceticism must be seen as a response to God's call and therefore to God's offer of enabling grace to live the Christian life. As a step of faith in obedient submission to God's will, Christian asceticism conversely involves a renunciation of the self (see Self-denial*) - the daily exercise of bearing one's cross. This is done in the knowledge that one is sharing in the life of 'the author and perfecter of our faith' (Heb. 12:2; Mk. 8:34). And it is done in hope. As mentioned, the ascetic life is one of watchfulness and vigilance for Christ's coming. Thus, this life is one of pilgrimage, open to the future, not attached to human conceptions of what fulfils us.

A healthy asceticism must be seen as part of the process of salvation, specifically sanctification*, in which one engages in the struggle of overcoming the self-centred desire to possess and to be in control - a discipline that leads in the end to true freedom (Rom. 8:19-23; 1 Cor. 7:29-31) and which will result in the edification of the church and loving service to God and neighbour (Phil. 2:1-13).

Such a chastened asceticism will avoid the un-Christian dualistic hierarchies of soul over body and of will over emotions, as well as sinful pride and austere otherworldliness. Instead, a holistic emphasis will see that ascetic practices help one in the struggle to achieve mastery over natural powers and processes, habituating one's nature to do God's will, and opening up clogged channels in one's life through which God's grace can be experienced. In this way, like the athlete who practises for the main event, one trains to overcome sin and perform good works.

The modern era. The Protestant Reformers criticized the double standards of contemporary Catholic ascetic practices whereby more was demanded of the religious (monks and nuns) than either the secular clergy (priests) or lay people. They also saw many ascetic practices as reinforcing the idea of salvation through meritorious works.

The Reformation took ascetism in several directions, including Lutheran pietism (e.g. Philipp Jakob Spener, 1635-1705), Calvinist Puritanism (e.g. John Owen, 1616-83), Anabaptist community discipline and primitive purity (e.g. Menno Simons*), and Catholic severity (e.g. Ignatius of Loyola*). Today it is difficult to find agreement on a definition of asceticism.

Contemporary misgivings

Actually, asceticism is not valued highly by most contemporary people. There may be good reasons for this. As mentioned above, asceticism has often been associated with a dualism that disparages the body in relation to the soul. Also, at times it has disguised misgivings about the affective dimension of life, training the will to achieve a dispassionate repose.

This contemporary evaluation is welcomed and may actually lead us to a healthy asceticism in keeping with emphases we have noted in the NT. Modern psychology, for instance, has uncovered pathological aspects of asceticism, such as masochism, unhealthy repressions and unconscious defence mechanisms.* But to deal with gluttony or sloth simply through psychotherapy to the exclusion of ascetic practices may be a modern pretension. A healthy asceticism will take into account the observations of modern psychology and strive to be faithful to categories of Christian theology.

Bibliography

L. Bouyer, Introduction to Spirituality (ET, New York, 1961); O. Chadwick, Western Asceticism (London and Philadelphia, 1958); R. Foster, Celebration of Discipline (San Francisco, ²1988; London, ²1989); K. E. Kirk, The Vision of God (London and New York, 1931; repr. New York, 1966); R. Williams, Christian Spirituality (Atlanta, 1979) = The Wound of Knowledge (London, 1979); D. Willard, The Spirit of the Disciplines (San Francisco, 1988).

D.L.O.

ASSERTIVENESS TRAINING, see CHARACTER.†

ATONEMENT. First appearing in the 16th century as two words, ‘at onement’, this term signifies a making of amends and rendering of satisfaction for wrong done that brings an end to alienation and restores good relations. Through being used in AV for ‘reconciliation’ (katallagē) in Rom. 5:11 and for the regular covering of Israel’s sin by the shedding of sacrificial blood (Lv. 16; 17:11; 23:27), the word came to connote comprehensively the death of Christ in its many-sided saving significance. Languages other than Eng. have no single word that covers so much.

In the New Testament

Atonement in this broad sense is the main theme of the entire NT. Salvation (see Sin and Salvation†) is often said to be the NT’s main theme, and is itself a large reality, embracing rescue from the jeopardy of guilt* for the past, and of enslavement to sin and death* in the present, and from hell (see Heaven and Hell) to come; but all of salvation rests on and flows from Christ’s atoning death. His cross* - i.e. his shameful and scandalous judicial execution - is the climactic centrepiece of each of the four Gospels; and as a sacrifice for sin, the cross is set forth as the object of faith, the focus of worship, the basis for living the saved life, and the reality signified by both sacraments, throughout the apostolic writings. Christ’s resurrection,* we are told, demonstrated the efficacy of his death as an atonement for sin (1 Cor. 15:3, 17), and his present kingdom (see Kingdom of God*) was entered via, and on the basis of, this atoning death (Mt. 1:21; 20:28; 28:18; Phil. 2:5-11; Heb. 1:3; 2:9; 10:19-22; 12:3; Rev. 1:5b; 5:6-14). Biblical Christianity is cross-centred and atonement-oriented throughout. Life in Christ risen is life through Christ crucified; every aspect of the relationship of Christians with God is ultimately determined by the atonement.

Scripture depicts all human beings as needing to atone for their sins but lacking power and resources for doing so. No acceptance by, or fellowship with, the holy creator, who hates and punishes sin (Ps. 5:4-6; Hab. 1:13; Rom. 2:5-9), is possible without atonement, and we who need it cannot make it, since sin spoils everything we do. Paul in particular makes way for his proclamation of atonement in Rom. 3:21-26 by explaining at length that all humans live under the power of sin (Rom. 3:9) and so are guilty before God, with nothing but ‘wrath and anger ... trouble and distress’ to look forward to (Rom. 2:8-9; see 1:18 - 3:20; Eph. 2:1-3). But against this background of human hopelessness, the gospel declares that out of love, grace,* mercy, pity, kindness and compassion, God, the offended creator, has provided the atonement that human sin made necessary. The cost of so doing was great: he ‘did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all’ (Rom. 8:32); ‘God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us’ (Rom. 5:8; cf. Jn. 3:16; 2 Cor. 8:9; 1 Jn. 4:9-10). This amazing grace is the focal centre of all NT faith, hope, ethics, spiritual life, doxology and devotion.

God established in Israel as part of his covenant* a sacrificial system whereby the blood of unflawed animals was regularly shed and offered to God to make atonement (Lv. 17:11). These sacrifices set a pattern that would be fulfilled in the one all-sufficient sacrifice of Jesus Christ, the sinless Son of God, who was both high priest and victim in this atoning transaction (Heb. 9:11 - 10:14). Though sins were indeed ‘left ... unpunished’ (Rom. 3:25) when the prescribed OT sacrifices were faithfully offered, it was not the animals’ blood, but Christ’s, that atoned for them. His death was for all the sins that were remitted before the event, as well as for sins committed after it (Rom. 3:25-26; 4:3-8; Heb. 9:11-15). Most NT references to the blood of Christ are theological affirmations fitting into this frame of salvation through sacrifice.

In the NT Paul is the master theologian of atonement, welding into a single scheme all the insights into the cross that are developed separately by other writers such as Peter and John and the author of the letter to the Hebrews. Paul explains Christ’s achievement in a series of linked categories. As a perfect sacrifice for sin (Rom. 8:3; Eph. 5:2), his death secured redemption, i.e. rescue by ransom, liberation of captives from helpless enslavement through payment of a price (Rom. 3:24; Gal. 4:4-5; Col. 1:14). This redemption was God’s act of reconciling sinful humans to himself (2 Cor. 5:18-19), overcoming the hostility to us that our sins had provoked (Rom. 5:10; Col. 1:20-22). Thus the death of Christ propitiated God, i.e. quenched his judicial anger against sinners by expiating the sins that caused it (Rom. 3:25; cf. Heb. 2:17; 1 Jn. 2:2; 4:10). Christ’s cross had this effect because Christ himself, as the ‘second man’ and ‘last Adam’ (1 Cor. 15:47, 45), represented sinners, taking their place under divine judgment (‘the curse of the law’, Gal. 3:13) and enduring the retribution due to them, so that he truly died as our substitute, with the damning record of our transgressions nailed to his cross as the God-appointed reason for his death (Col. 2:14; alluding to the written statement of the crime or crimes that was always attached to a felon’s cross, see Mk. 15:26). Hereby, in a way that sounds paradoxical, he not only broke the power of satanic hosts that had assaulted him, evidently seeking to disrupt his obedience in accepting the predestined agony, but actually made it apparent that their power was gone (Col. 2:15).

Benefits

Paul sees three benefits flowing from Christ’s death to believers, who are united to Christ risen by faith from the human side and by the Holy Spirit from the divine side.

1. Through their faith, believers receive reconciliation and the gift of righteousness (Rom. 5:11, 17), and thus they are justified - i.e. pardoned for the past, accepted in the present, and instated for the future (see Justification, Doctrine of*). The thought here is of the final verdict at the last judgment being pronounced now, and of the judge declaring that their sin is no longer counted against them, so that in and through Christ they have now become ‘the righteousness of God’ (2 Cor. 5:18-21; i.e. right with God relationally: the unexpected use of the abstract noun ‘righteousness’, like ‘enmity’ in Rom 8:7, AV, is an idiom of intensity). With this gift of justification comes the further gift of adoption: justified sinners are now children in God’s family, sealed as his by the indwelling Holy Spirit* who prompts them henceforth to call on their creator as their Father (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:4-6). Thus their personal relationship with God is restored and renewed.

2. In receiving justification through their faith, believers are themselves received into the reality of God’s covenant commitment to Abraham and his seed (Gal. 3:6-29). They are now ‘all one [Gk., ‘one man’, the new humanity] in Christ Jesus’, and as such ‘the Israel of God’ (Gal. 3:28; 6:16), the community that from God’s standpoint is at the centre of this world's history as well as being the corporate inheritor of the world to come. Thus their communal identity is established.

3. Believers live henceforth in liberty, freed and indeed debarred from legalism* in all its forms, and so no longer exposed to the inward bandages of pride* or despair that legalism begets (Gal. 5:1). Our inbred legalistic mentality constantly prompts the feeling that for a good, or a better, relationship with God we must do more, sweat more, and merit more, and teaching on discipleship in the churches is often legalistically skewed as a result, as was already happening in the 'Christ-plus' legalisms of Galatia (Gal. 3:1-5; 4:8-11; 5:2-6; 6:12-16) and Colosse (Col. 2:16-23). But Christ's death fully secured the present and future salvation that is ours in him, and our only task now is to receive and keep receiving this inexpressibly wonderful gift - which is Christian liberty in full childlike expression, and is truly a life's task, and is actually what each discipline of the Christian life is about. Thus the authentic Christian temper is fostered and internalized.

Theories of the atonement

What are called 'theories' of the atonement are so many attempts by thinkers who already know something of trust, love, adoration and gratitude Godward through Jesus Christ to reason back from the benefits they see reaching them to a coherent rationale of how these benefits became available. Different theories highlight different elements in the complex weave of biblical analogy and affirmation about the atonement. Thus, patristic writers, viewing salvation as primarily deliverance from the devil and death, celebrated the cross as Christ overcoming these powers on our behalf. Anselm,* focusing on absolution, and Martin Luther* appreciating justification, saw the cross as satisfaction to the world's offended Lord and judge, Anselm rating it as a compensatory sacrifice and Luther as a substitutionary bearing of the judicial retribution due to us. Hastings Rashdall (1858-1924), following Abelard* and various liberals, saw the cross as meant simply to make us forgivable through melting our rebel hearts by showing us God's love for us. Other theories have other emphases, and each has some truth in it. The Bible will not, however, permit elimination of the objectivity of God's judicial wrath against sin, wrath that only the cross could quench.

The Christian life

The atonement has regulative significance for the whole of the Christian's life with God. It is striking to see how many moral and pastoral problems the NT writers resolve by invoking it in one or another or both of its two aspects, as a marvellous achieving of peace with God on humankind's behalf and thus as a marvellous expression of love for sinful humans on the part of the Father and the Son. The death of Christ, we are told, deals with the problem of our guilt in both its objective and its subjective dimensions (objective: propitiation through Jesus' blood leads to just, i.e. justified, justification, Rom. 3:23-26; subjective: Christ's blood cleanses consciences* that knew themselves defiled and deathbound through moral failure, Heb. 9:14). The atonement deals too with the problem of hopelessness, unveiling and guaranteeing a sure hope of glory (Rom. 5:1-11; Eph. 2:11-22; Col. 1:19-27). As 'the measure and the pledge of love' (Thomas Kelly, 1769-1854), Christ's cross dispels doubts as to whether our creator is really concerned about us (Jn. 3:16; Rom. 5:8), and counters fear of loss in God's service by assuring believers that every other good gift that God can devise will be given them too, however much the world may take from them in the short term (Rom. 8:32).

Alongside these assurances, the atonement provides motivating restraint and constraint (1 Cor. 6:20; 2 Cor. 5:14), plus a standard of active, self-denying goodwill and humility by which believers must henceforth live (Eph. 5:1-2; Phil. 2:3-8; 1 Jn. 3:16). It models for them quiet acceptance of human hostility and life's rough treatment (Heb. 12:1-14; 1 Pet. 2:21-22), and enforces the forgiving spirit that Jesus taught was so important (Mt. 6:14-15; 18:21-35; Lk. 17:3-4, cf. 23:34; Eph. 4:31-5:2).

Finally, by terminating 'the curse of the law' (Gal. 3:13) for believers and opening to them the door into adoption and heirship in the Father's family (Gal. 4:4-5), the atonement solves in advance the very modern problems of stubborn self-hatred and low self-image (see Self-esteem*). If God has accepted us, we must not decline to accept ourselves, and if he has raised us up by adoption to be joint-heirs of his glory with Christ (Rom. 8:17), we must not put ourselves down and cast ourselves for losers, but must learn instead to walk tall, as infinitely privileged royal children.

As determining the mind-set, character and conduct of the Christian, as the foundation for the fellowship of the new multi-racial reality called the church (Eph. 2:14-22), and as the centrepiece in the grateful praise of God in both earth and heaven (Rev. 5:9-14), the praise that goes on for ever, the atonement is truly the focal point of the NT and the fulcrum of Christianity.

Bibliography

G. C. Berkouwer, The Work of Christ (Grand Rapids, 1965); S. Clark, Redeemer (Ann Arbor, MI, 1992); J. Denney, The Death of Christ (London, 1902; ed. R. V. G. Tasker, London, 1951); F. W. Dillistone, The Christian Understanding of Atonement (London and Philadelphia, 1968); R. S. Franks, The Work of Christ (London, 1962); L. W. Grensted, A Short History of the Doctrine of Atonement (Manchester, 1920); A. A. Hodge, The Atonement (New York, 1867); L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross (London, 1965); idem, The Atonement (Leicester and Downers Grove, IL, 1983); idem, The Cross in the New Testament (Exeter and Grand Rapids, 1965); J. R. W. Stott, The Cross of Christ (Leicester and Downers Grove, IL, 1986); V. Taylor, The Atonement in New Testament Teaching (London, 1940); idem, Forgiveness and Reconciliation (London, 1946); R. S. Wallace, The Atoning Death of Christ (London and Westchester, IL, 1981); B. B. Warfield, The Person and Work of Christ (Phillipsburg, NJ, 1950).

J.I.P.

AUGUSTINE (354-430), the greatest of the Latin Fathers of the church. The story of Augustine's early life and conversion as told in his Confessions, his work as a bishop in N. Africa, and his many philosophical, theological and pastoral writings contributed to his vast influence on the Western church.

Born in N. Africa, Augustine received the usual schooling of his time, an education that focused narrowly on a few pagan classics. Through reading Cicero (106-43 BC) he acquired a desire for wisdom. The influence of his Christian mother Monica led him to seek his wisdom where the name of Christ was found. He read the Bible but found it lacking both in style and content - style because of its bad Latin, and content because of the morality of the patriarchs. Rejecting the church's understanding of Scripture, he became a Manichee, and remained a follower of his heresy for more than a decade.

After Faustus, a Manichaean leader, was unable to resolve the inconsistencies in Mani's (c. 216-76 AD) science, Augustine began to lose faith in his view. He had also found that the Manichaean ritual did not make him a better person. After moving to Rome and then Milan, Augustine discovered through the preaching of Ambrose* that Christians did not hold the simplistic view of God that he had been attributing to them, and that the offensive OT stories could be interpreted spiritually.

In the summer of 386 Augustine became a Christian. He gave up his teaching position, retired to the country with friends, and returned to Milan at Easter to be baptized. A year later he returned to Africa, planning to live a contemplative life with friends. However, in the spring of 391, while visiting in Hippo, he was forced by the congregation to be their priest, and in 395 he succeeded Bishop Valerius (d. 396). There, in the second largest city in Africa, Augustine worked tirelessly, becoming the most prominent bishop in the African church. Through his writings his influence rapidly extended to the far reaches of the Roman world.

The major themes in Augustine's theology arise out of his life. After the Manichees' claims on behalf of reason failed him, Augustine insisted that one must first believe and then seek to understand. All of his major works are efforts to articulate this understanding of faith. God is truth, and happiness is found in loving him.

Such love is a gift of God. Through divine illumination - a teaching which reflects the influence of the Platonists - our minds are able to share in divine truth. Similarly, through the conscience we are aware of the moral law, which flows from the eternal law of God. Our will must be set right so that we can do the right. Prudence, justice, fortitude and temperance are present in God and establish a similar order in our souls.

God created Adam and Eve good, but through disobedience, they fell. The consequences of the Fall* extend to all humankind in the form of original sin.* Before the Fall, humans possessed all that was necessary to be good, but afterwards sin manifests itself primarily in ignorance and concupiscence. Not only is reason blinded by its ignorance, but human beings are dominated by their appetites. As love of God grows, the hold of concupiscence* or lust* is lessened, but complete freedom from it will be gained only in the future life.

Christians now must live in a world that, though disordered, still retains much that is good. Human nature retains the capacity for friendship,* a great natural good. The first natural social tie is that of man and wife. Although the woman was taken from the man, so indicating the priority of the man, still they are to walk together, partners in a friendly union. Three goods come from marriage:* children, fidelity and sacrament. With 'children' Augustine has in mind also nurture and education. 'Fidelity' refers to the right each spouse has to the other's body. 'Sacrament' refers, for Christians, to the indissolubility of marriage, as Christ is faithful to the church. Following Paul, Augustine holds that continence is best. Marital fidelity is good in that it brings concupiscence under control. To have children is a great good and so intercourse for the purpose of generation is without fault. Sex 'for the purpose of satisfying concupiscence' is a venial sin, but sex outside of marriage - fornication- or adultery* - is a mortal sin. This view of the place of sex dominated the West until Thomas Aquinas.*

After the sack of Rome in 410, its fall was blamed on the Christians. In City of God (413-26) Augustine responds to these charges, arguing that it is not Christian virtues which caused the ruin of the empire, but rather the vices of the pagans. In the last half of this work, Augustine sketches the origin, development and ends of two cities, the heavenly and the earthly city. The two cities are two societies which are inextricably intermingled, but which are distinguished by their love. The members of the earthly city have the goods of this life as their goal, as things to be enjoyed; but for the members of the heavenly city, the city of God, these same goods are merely to be used to reach the true end. Any conflicts that arise between the two cities stem from their different attitudes towards the same things.

The earthly city is not to be identified with the State,* for the members of the city of God are also citizens of the State; nor is the church composed only of citizens of the heavenly kingdom. As long as society is just, members of the city of God will respect this order and do their part to maintain it. However, when the earthly city fails to observe civil laws, then members of the city of God are to correct what they can, and endure what they cannot change.

Christians are not a threat to civil society, therefore, but will do their part to uphold the laws. All nations desire peace, and a society may even go to war to secure peace (see Just War*). Peace in society is 'the ordered harmony of authority and obedience between citizens'. The highest peace is that of the heavenly city where is found the 'harmonious communion of those who find their joy in God'.

See also: HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN ETHICS.†

Bibliography

Confessions (ET, Harmondsworth, 1961); The Writings of Saint Augustine, 14 vols. (New York, 1948-52). P. Brown, Augustine of Hippo (London and Los Angeles, CA, 1967); E. Gilson, The Christian Philosophy of St Augustine (ET, New York, 1960; London, 1961); F. VanderMeer, Augustine the Bishop (New York, 1961).

A.G.V.

AURICULAR CONFESSION, see CONFESSION.

AUTHORITY. Much moral thinking in the modern era has been fundamentally hostile to the notion of authority and the correlative notion of obedience.* The 17th century witnessed the culmination of a profound mutation in Western culture, in which authorities such as Scripture, church tradition or inherited social custom ceased to function effectively as a sufficient ground for knowledge or action. Truth or rightness, that is, could no longer be established by arguing from authorities; rather, claims to authority are themselves subject to critical appraisal, so that authority comes to be the conclusion, rather than the premise, of argument. This rejection of appeal to authority as a vehicle of rational persuasion is bound up with a certain understanding of the human self as fundamentally autonomous. The self, that is, is authentic or rational only in so far as it is unencumbered by prejudices derived from religious tradition or social convention. Rational selfhood consists therefore in the exercise of judgment. In the moral sphere, this means that authority may not be appealed to as a basis for action; authority has rather to be validated by a judgment of rightness on the part of one to whom an appeal for obedience is made. To be a free moral agent (see Moral Agency*) is thus to act in accordance with norms which are contingent upon my 'authorization' (even my creation).

This profound suspicion of authority is deeply embedded in Western moral thought, as well as in political and legal practice. Its persuasiveness depends upon the extraordinary success of its exposure of the pathological or oppressive character of many conceptions of authority and their social embodiment. Christian moral theology (see Christian Moral Reasoning†) has developed at least two strategies in response.

1. One strategy has been the deployment of a range of arguments to accommodate Christian understandings of moral authority to the climate of modernity. Thus, for example, the liberal Christian tradition has in many respects maintained a critical stance towards such norms of Christian moral discourse as the Bible and the Christian tradition, suggesting that they can no longer be considered as axiomatically authoritative since they are themselves subject to criteria of evaluation such as human experience or developing moral consciousness. Or again, the notion of the autonomy of the moral self has found a place in modern Christian thought, most frequently through the association of a (philosophical and political) notion of undetermined moral freedom with a (theological) notion of conscience* - though conscience no longer 'informed' by the Bible and Christian tradition. It is noteworthy that Christian moral thinking of this variety is largely indistinguishable from its non-Christian counterparts, since it shares common assumptions about the nature of moral actions and moral agents.

2. A quite contrary theological response to modernity's critique of authority has been to propose that both the nature of authority and the proper exercise of authority are defined by reference to the gospel of Jesus Christ. The task of a Christian account of authority is thus primarily one of describing the contours of Christian conviction, rooted in revelation* and testified to in the corporate life of the Christian community. Such an approach can acknowledge the justice of much of the critique raised by modernity, whilst proposing that Christian moral theory (if not Christian practice) is exempt from critique to the degree to which Christians have been faithful to the logic of the gospel.

Such a theology of authority would exhibit a number of distinct characteristics. a. Rather than analysing all authority in terms of the dynamic of arbitrary or irrational force, Christian theology could propose a view of authority as the givenness of a certain order within reality. Such an ordered structure within the creation is authoritative in that it elicits and sets limits to appropriate responsive human action. Authority is thereby conceived, not as a restriction of human autonomy* but as the formation of the moral self in response to a given context for moral growth. b. Accordingly, authority is essentially a moral concept in that it addresses itself to free, personal agents. On this account, to be 'under' authority is not to be subject to domination by an alien will, but to be required to become a responsive agent. Authority invites assent and decision, not simple compliance to superior power. For Christian anthropology, to be a full human person is to enter into the liberty of the children of God. But such liberty is God's gift, not the fruit of self-assertion over against external constraints. Thus, for Christian theology, obedience to authority is more a matter of glad acknowledgment of the possibilities and limits set by a person's status as a contingent creature than it is a matter of submission to threats or suppression of criticism. c.

The authority of persons and social institutions is in important respects a function of the professed vision and goals of the community. Authority, again, is not arbitrary or abstract, but a means of promoting patterns of action which express and further the community's ends. In this way, authorities serve the community by inviting it to adhere to its fundamental commitments; they are, therefore, not to be isolated from the process of the reception of their claim by the community as a whole. d. Authority must consequently be exercised in accordance with the professed goals of the community. For Christian moral theology, this will mean that the manner of the exercise of authority will always be subject to criticism by the model of Jesus Christ, the servant Lord. e. Finally, human and creaturely authority is subservient to the authority of God declared in the gospel of Jesus Christ. Human authority is never final, always relative. Its significance consists in its fragmentary mediation of or witness to divine authority. In Christian moral theology this is a principle of criticism by which contingent, creaturely authorities are subject to the final authority of the risen and ascended Jesus Christ, 'the Head over every power and authority' (Col. 2:10) in whom God's authority is definitively embodied and exercised.

See also: COMMUNITY ETHICS.†

Bibliography

P. T. Forsyth, The Principle of Authority (London, 1952); N. Lash, Voices of Authority (London, 1976); O. O'Donovan, Resurrection and Moral Order (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 1994, chs. 6 and 7; J. Stout, The Flight from Authority (Notre Dame, IN, 1981); J. M. Todd (ed.), Problems of Authority (London, 1952).

J.B.W.

AUTOCRACY means unrestrained and arbitrary rule by one person. Executive power is thus entirely concentrated in the autocrat, who is not subject to any constitutional or legal constraint. Autocracy may be thought of as the opposite of democracy* because of the absence of limitations on the power of the ruler, the lack of any forms of accountability,* and the requirement that the people merely submit to the ruler.

The term 'autocrat' is a strong one. Few genuine autocrats have existed, though the Russian Tsars may be cited as examples, as may some modern military rulers. Totalitarianism is a form of autocracy where an attempt is made to legitimize rule through the use of ideology. Traditionally autocrats maintained their rule by keeping people in ignorance and fear.

The word 'autocrat' is used loosely to describe someone who wields power within an organization but who flouts rules and procedures and refuses to acknowledge accountability. Those who behave like this in, e.g. schools, churches, trade unions or companies may be said to be undermining the values on which a democratic way of life is based, and by so doing are failing to recognize the intrinsic worth and dignity of every person. Thus it may be said that in contrast to autocrats strong leaders develop genuine authority* through their willingness to accept procedures ensuring accountability, because by this means the reasons for their decisions become better understood and support is thereby generated for their leadership.*

Bibliography

C.J. Friedrich and Z. K. Brezinski, Totalitarianism, Dictatorship and Autocracy (New York, 1956).

D.R.S.

AUTONOMY refers to the free, sovereign exercise of an individual's rational will choosing self-determined, self-regulated moral rules. These should be universalizable as a check against self-centred judgments.

In medicine, there has been a shift from medical paternalism to patient autonomy. Autonomy depends on the free, unforced volition of the individual. It implies that the individual is able to understand not only what is happening, but the likely outcomes of the decision and the refusal to decide. This is part of an existentialist view that individuals are free to do whatever they want with their own bodies.

However, universalizability means that almost anything and everything could be universalized and offers no specifically moral content. The existential stress exaggerates freedom of choice and ignores the dependency of the will on reason and emotion, and of the individual on community. It also exaggerates our capacity to grasp what is involved, for example, in our medical care, when we may be in pain and unable to understand what is involved in treatment outcomes.

In reality, autonomy is always limited in a society. People are not free to do whatever they want with their own bodies, as legislation on seat belts, motorcyclist helmets, prostitution, surrogacy and pornography indicates. Autonomy is limited, where the best interests of another are at stake. This may be part of the proper exercise of a professional responsibility. Human freedom is always limited as we are responsible to the God, who created, redeemed, and has an eternal purpose for us.

Bibliography

R. S. Downie and E. Telfer, Respect for Persons (London, 1969); S. Hampshire, Freedom of the Individual (London, 1965); I. Kant, Fundamental Principles of the Metaphysics of Morals (ET, New York, 1949).

E.D.C.

AXIOLOGY is the theory of values, or things which are worthwhile in themselves. Strictly speaking, 'axiology' is a wider term than 'ethics', as something may be valuable even when it is outside our power to bring it about; but axiology also forms a part of teleological* ethics, as the end to be pursued is presumably seen as worthwhile in itself.

Axiological ethics can be traced back to Plato,* but is especially associated with a series of thinkers beginning with the Austrian Franz Brentano (1838-1917). Brentano held that the mind, besides being conscious and forming beliefs, valued things as good or bad, and when it did so its valuations might have an intrinsic rightness we could not ignore. His fellow Austrian Alexius Meinong (1853-1920) added that valuation must consider a thing as a contribution to reality as a whole, and distinguished between two kinds of valuation: desiring a thing and delighting in it.

In Britain, the philosopher G. E. Moore (1873-1958) and the theologian Hastings Rashdall (1858-1924) developed a theory of 'ideal utilitarianism' (Rashdall's term) which entailed axiology. According to this view one's duty is to act so as to produce the greatest good one can (see Consequentialism*). Moore claimed that 'goodness' was so basic a notion as to be indefinable, and that it inhered in many different states of affairs; hence it was necessary to evaluate the goodness in these to determine the best course of action. According to Moore, a state of affairs might be good even if no-one were aware of its existence; in this he differed from Rashdall, who thought only states of consciousness could be good (or bad) in themselves. Virtuous states of consciousness were, he held, the highest form of good; then, what might be called cultured states; and lastly, pleasurable states: but all three were necessary for the human or social ideal. For Rashdall (not for Moore) this ideal was part of God's purpose for the universe, and love for God and love for others combine, meeting above all in the love of Christ.

The last major figure in axiology was the German Nicolai Hartmann (1882-1950). Our feelings of approval or disapproval (which may be of things wholly beyond our power to affect) reveal the intrinsic nature, the value, of that of which they approve or disapprove. There are many kinds of value and disvalue, which Hartmann discussed at some length. Some are higher than others - we feel a greater deference towards them; but the absence of a lower one has a greater disvalue than that of a higher. (Thus appreciation of art* is nobler than freedom from pain;* but lack of appreciation is a less serious disvalue than the presence of pain.) Values* by their nature demand realization; hence the sense of duty* or obligation.*

Axiology lost much of its popularity during the 1930s. Its appeal to feelings opened the way to theories which saw ethics as entirely subjective and denied the real existence of any values except those we create for ourselves, though a theistically-grounded axiology might be better protected against this defect than others.

Bibliography

F. Brentano, The Origin of our Knowledge of Right and Wrong (ET, London and New York, 1969); idem, The Foundation and Construction of Ethics (ET, London and New York, 1973); J. N. Findlay, Axiological Ethics (London, 1970), also published in W. D. Hudson (ed.), New Studies in Ethics, vol. 2 (London, 1974); idem, Values and Intentions (London, 1961); N. Hartmann, Ethics (ET, London, 1932); G. E. Moore, Principia Ethica (Cambridge, 1903); H. H. Rashdall, The Theory of Good and Evil (Oxford, 1907).

R.L.S.

AXIOM. In logic and mathematics, an axiom is a basic principle which is not argued for, like Euclid's (c. 300 Be) 'Things equal to the same thing are equal to each other'; similarly, in ethics, it is an unargued principle of action. A 'middle axiom' is an ethical principle which is obvious in itself but can also be derived from one more fundamental (which may on occasion override it); thus the commandment 'Thou shalt not kill' needs no argument to prove it, and can be used as the basis for more detailed guidance in personal life or social policies, but still derives from the more fundamental commandment to love one's neighbour as oneself. The term has been criticized on the grounds that an axiom should be basic, not 'middle'; but even principles derivable from others can be described as axioms if they are treated in practice as basic.

R.L.S.

AYER, A. J. (1910-90). Sir Alfred Jules Ayer, professor at the University of London from 1946 to 1959 and Wykeham Professor of Logic at the University of Oxford from 1959 to 1978, was the leading figure of the 20th-century British philosophical movement of logical positivism.* His most influential work is Language, Truth and Logic (London, 1936). Ayer attempts to bring the insights of the logical theories of Bertrand Russell (1872-1970) and Ludwig Wittgenstein* to bear upon the empirical philosophical tradition of David Hume.*

Ayer's most important doctrine is his principle of verification. According to this, a statement is meaningful only if tautological or capable of being empirically verified. Tautological statements, e.g. 'All bachelors are unmarried', provide no information about the world, but only information about the meanings of the terms of the statement. Statements are capable of empirical verification only if they can be confirmed by sense-perception. Thus, 'Few Scots are bigamists' is meaningful because the number of Scottish bigamists can be determined by observation.

The implications of the verification principle for theology and ethics are startling. Theological statements such as 'God exists' and moral judgments such as 'Euthanasia is wrong' are literally meaningless when the verification principle is applied to them. This is not to say they are unimportant, only that they should be considered merely the subjective verbal expressions of individual feeling or commitment.

Few philosophers today identify themselves as logical positivists; indeed Ayer's own views were modified in his revised edition of Language, Truth and Logic (London, 1946). The challenge to identify a principle of verification which is itself meaningful has proved more difficult than Ayer and his followers expected.

T.D.K.

B

BANKING has become a highly complex industry, comprising large and small, generalist and specialist, international and domestic institutions. For the purpose of this article, banking will be regarded as essentially a service industry receiving deposits from the public, and utilizing these deposits by lending or by other forms of facility, in order to add value to the life of the communities within which the operations take place. This broad definition will embrace advisory services, which complement the basic business of providing a safe home for the customer's money and lending it productively.

The ethics of banking

Banking is an ethical activity provided it issues in value added for the benefit of the community. The essential element of value added is in the management and transformation of risk. Typical customers leave their money with the bank at interest because they want it kept safely. Probably their funds are not large enough to sustain a risky enterprise; probably they themselves lack the skill or courage to undertake such enterprise. They know that the bank has this skill, and that it can combine their funds with others to 'spread' the risk and (in common with insurance* and equity investment*) enable activities to take place which otherwise would not be possible.

Borrowers take out loans on terms and conditions agreed in advance (unauthorized overdrafts are another matter!). Provided the terms are adhered to, borrowers can undertake their enterprises without being at the mercy of arbitrary or distress claims for repayment, to which they might otherwise be vulnerable if the money were borrowed from an individual.

This activity of taking and lending money is a legitimate one under the divine command to develop and improve the creation in harmony with the divine purposes for it (see Gn. 1:28 and 2:15). The banking industry shares with the corporate sector generally a set of obligations* which stem from its relationships, both with its customers (i.e. borrowers, lenders and recipients of advice) and also with its employees, shareholders, and the community as a whole. These relationships require integrity of dealing, transparency (i.e. renouncing obscurity in contractual agreements), and adherence to the law in both letter and spirit. Such obligations are not merely those of the individuals employed by the bank, but apply to the corporate entity itself by reason of its existence as a legal 'person' under the provisions of the law. In the UK in 1990 and 1991, codes of conduct were prepared by the major banks in consultation with consumer representatives, in order to give more detailed expression to these obligations as far as customers are concerned. A revised Code of Banking Practice, according to which banks are required to pre-notify customers of interest and debit charges, came into effect in March 1994.

Company ethics, in historical terms, is a topic no more than 150 years old, although corporate ethics in a broader sense is familiar from Scripture. The 19th century saw the introduction of the joint stock company, which enabled people to group together to undertake an enterprise with limited liability: in other words, only their subscribed capital was at stake, and no further financial obligation rested upon them as shareholders if the enterprise failed. The morality of this was much discussed at the time (see J. W. Gilbart, 'The Moral and Religious Duties of Public Companies', 1856) and is under review again today. J. W. Gilbart in particular draws parallels between the corporate accountability required by God of nations, tribes and families as evidenced in the OT, and the position of public companies today. He stresses their obligation to God in recognition of the created gifts which they receive from him, particularly in the ability of their employees or workforce.

The obligations by a bank to its customers, shareholders and the general public are paralleled by the obligations owed to it by its customers and staff. All need to exhibit the integrity that they expect to be displayed by the bank itself, and to exercise care in the handling of their duties and responsibilities.

Usury

One particular issue arising within banking is that of the validity of the rate of interest.* Current opinion on this is divided. Until the Reformation, OT strictures on usury were the basis for universal condemnation by the church of the charging of interest. But since Western economies developed sophisticated financial systems, the concept of money as a commodity, carrying a price, has become generally accepted, except in the Islamic world, though there is now emerging criticism by certain commentators (e.g. at the Cambridge-based Jubilee Centre) regarding the practice of charging interest (see P. Mills, Interest in Interest). The OT strictures seem to be limited to transactions within the nation of Israel, and specifically exclude transactions within the nation of Israel, and specifically exclude transactions with 'strangers'. But in today's world the concept of exclusion that this implies is less sustainable, and concerns prompted by the burden of debt* on Third World countries (see Global Ethics;† Third World Aid*) have raised this question again. Attempts to distinguish between actually committing money as a partner (good) and merely lending it (bad) envisage a financial system of much simpler structure than that pertaining in the modern Western economies, and do not present viable options. Islamic banking practices, while abjuring interest as such, at least find substitutes which are closely analogous with it; though these practices too do not obtain in dealings with non-Muslims. The problem of Third World debt needs to be studied in a global context, bearing in mind that some nations have accepted, and overcome, similar burdens by quality of government, though others are too weakly resourced for quality of government to be a decisive factor.

Bibliography

G. W. Goyder, The Just Enterprise (London, 1987); B. Griffiths, Morality and the Market Place (London, 1982); P. S. Mills, Interest in Interest: The Old Testament Ban on Interest and its Implications for Today (Cambridge, 1990).

C.F.G.

BARNARDO, THOMAS JOHN (1845-1905), founder of the children's charity that bears his name. The son of a Dublin furrier, he was converted to Christ in 1862 at a Brethren hall and four years later moved to London with the intention of serving with the China Inland Mission. While undertaking medical training, however, in 1868 he launched the East End Juvenile Mission, which was to become the basis of his life's work. Vigorous evangelism created a non denominational church which from 1872 occupied the Edinburgh Castle in Limehouse in E. London, a former gin bar that was turned into a coffee palace. Meanwhile homeless boys were given shelter, elementary education and training in a trade. From 1876 girls were accommodated in cottages at Ilford in Essex.

Barnardo's success as a money-raiser aroused envy and his autocratic methods gave pretexts for criticism. His unauthorized use of the title 'doctor' before 1876 and his refusal to concentrate on the deserving poor also attracted censure, though in a protracted unofficial court of arbitration in 1877 he was declared worthy of public confidence. He sponsored child emigration to the colonies and, from 1886, organized extensive boarding out of his charges. Barnardo's enterprise was less remarkable for innovation than for scale. He acted on the principles that no destitute child should be refused admission and that race, creed and handicap should never be disqualifications. Since the State was not providing remedies for a major social problem, his evangelical faith drove Barnardo to take action.

Bibliography

G. Wagner, Barnardo (London, 1979).

D.W.Be

BARTH, KARL (1886-1968). Often hailed as the most influential and prolific theologian of the 20th century, Barth served as a pastor in the Swiss Reformed Church, and then held teaching positions at the universities of Gottingen, Munster, Bonn and Basel. The theological world began to take notice of him after the publication of his commentary on Romans (1919). Besides his theological contributions, he is noted for his prominent role in the German church's struggle against Hitler (1889-1945), being the principal author of the Barmen Declaration (1934).

Barth's theological pilgrimage can be traced through various stages: a neo-liberal phase in which Immanuel Kant* and Wilhelm Herrmann (1846-1922) are influential; an existentialist phase, where he leans heavily upon Søren Kierkegaard;* a neo-Calvinist phase, in which church and sacraments are viewed as means of grace; and a position that approaches Christomonism, which envisages the whole of salvation (see Sin and Salvation†) as enacted and completed in the life, death and resurrection of Jesus* Christ. Barth does, however, make a noteworthy place for the Holy Spirit* as the one who reveals and conveys the saving work of Christ to humanity, and therefore the Christomonistic label is not altogether accurate. His last phase is better described as a Christocentric triumphalism, for he sees Christ enacting a cosmic redemption in which the whole of creation* is caught up in the forward movement of the history of salvation.

Barth's emphasis is on the reconciling and redeeming work of Jesus Christ; justification,* sanctification* and calling are included within reconciliation.* While affirming justification as a forensic imputation of the righteousness of Christ to those who believe, he insists that justification contains within itself the demand for sanctification. Sanctification, like justification, is a completed work outside us, for we - the whole of humanity - are reconciled and sanctified in the sacrificial, atoning work of Jesus Christ. Justification needs to be received by faith; sanctification must be apprehended and manifested in works of love. Our human righteousness* is only a reflection and witness to the divine righteousness that alone justifies and saves. Through the grace* of God it can be made to correspond to God's righteousness, but it cannot duplicate or complete it.

The theme that runs through Barth's writings is that divine action is always something different from human action. Human action can bear witness to divine action, but it is not the necessary instrumentality for divine action. This is why the later Barth prefers to speak of the Bible, the sermon and the so-called sacraments as signs of grace rather than means of grace.

Barth shows his distance from Lutheranism by affirming the priority of gospel over law (see Law and Gospel*). The law* is not a necessary preparation for the gospel, but the gospel prepares the way for a new understanding of the law. Just as grace is prior to works and revelation* prior to reason,* so the divine promise precedes the divine command. Yet this command is never a universal principle but always a concrete and specific word addressed to individual believers standing in a particular socio-historical context. The written commandments in Scripture testify to the divine commandment, but they cannot be extracted from their original historical context and converted into universal principles. They do serve, however, as guidelines that direct us to the Word of God and enable us to hear and understand it when it comes to us.

An emphasis on the inseparability of freedom* and obedience* is also characteristic of Barth. We are made free by grace to believe and obey, and works of obedience are not simply an appendage to faith but the crown and fruition of faith. These works do not procure reparation for sin but instead demonstrate our gratefulness for Christ's atoning work, which is already enacted and completed. In an apparent break with Reformation theology, Barth insists that we can do works that are pleasing to God - yet only because of the work of the Spirit within and upon us. These works do not justify us because in and of themselves they are imperfect and deficient, but they attest the justification and sanctification already accomplished for us by Christ.

The witness of the church,* Barth insists, will have a political dimension, since the lordship of Christ pertains to the whole of life. Not only the church but also the State* is under the rule of Christ, though it does not yet know this as such. The political service of the church consists in setting up signs and parables of the coming kingdom of God.* We cannot bring in or build the kingdom, but we can witness to it by working for peace, justice and political liberation (see Justice and Peace†). We are called, Barth believes, not so much to moral excellence as to the service of the downtrodden and needy. His focus is not on a pious and holy life but on a responsible and obedient life under God. Barth is adamant that we cannot make ourselves saints, but we can live out our vocation,* as joyful servants and ambassadors of Jesus Christ.

Because of his stress on the solidarity of the church with the oppressed of the world, Barth has been accused of upholding a purely cultural Christ - the advocate of the oppressed and disenfranchised. Yet Barth is emphatic that our striving for human justice will always bring us into conflict with the vested interests that control society. We cannot create the kingdom of God, but we can work for human justice in the light of the promise of this kingdom. Christ and his gospel comprise the transforming leaven within society, the hope and goal of humanity.

Barth came to identify himself as an evangelical theologian, and he can be regarded as such because of his emphasis on salvation by grace rather than works; the universal crippling effects of sin; the vicarious, substitutionary sacrifice of Christ on the cross,* which makes God's forgiveness* available to us; the primacy of holy Scripture over church tradition and religious experience; and the call to discipleship as a demonstration of our gratitude for God's reconciling work on our behalf.

See also: HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN ETHICS.†

Bibliography

The Christian Life (E T, Edinburgh and Grand Rapids, 1981); Ethics (ET, Edinburgh and New York, 1981); Church Dogmatics, 1/1-IV / 4 (ET, Edinburgh, 1936-81).

D.G.B.

BATTERY FARMING is a description for intensive livestock husbandry systems which house indoors large numbers of animals in cages, crates or stalls. The building environment is carefully controlled to maintain lighting, temperature, ventilation and humidity. The animals are fed diets formulated to maximize growth and to promote efficient food conversion into meat or eggs. The standards of stockmanship demanded are high and there is a reliance on vaccines and drugs to prevent disease outbreaks.

The factors which originally encouraged the development of battery farming were partly the result of post-Second World War food shortages and included the demand for cheap food,* the reduction of food imports and the high costs of labour.

It has been stated that the welfare of an individual animal is its state with regard to its attempts to cope with its environment (A. F. Fraser and D. M. Broom, Farm Animal Behaviour and Welfare, London, 1990); but the scientific assessment of that state can be very difficult. Such an assessment may be based on five factors: freedom from thirst, hunger and malnutrition; appropriate comfort and shelter; prevention, or rapid diagnosis and treatment, of injury and disease; freedom to display most normal patterns of behaviour; and freedom from fear. The close confinement of farm animals may be associated with abnormal behaviour patterns which have been interpreted as indicative of poor welfare. Such animals have behavioural needs or freedoms which we are obliged to fulfil. Indeed some would contend that these animals have rights (see Rights, Animal*).

In the UK and some other countries there has been a move away from intensive battery farming methods towards extensive husbandry systems. Hens, for example, instead of being cooped in battery cages may be seen in large flocks, walking around a barn or aviary flapping their wings, or even outdoors free-range. Even so, in advocating alternative systems one has to be aware of the problems, including risk of disease, aggression (especially in pigs), the need for good observant stock-manship, and the fact that not all customers are prepared to pay the higher cost of the product.

It is important that Christians are at the forefront of the animal welfare debate, raising issues of priorities and values in the use of animals for food.

Bibliography

R. Ewbank, 'Intensive Livestock Production and Animal Welfare', in Food and Farming Issues (London, 1989), pp. 9-19; A. Linzey, Christianity and the Rights of Animals (London, 1987); T. Regan, The Case for Animal Rights (Berkley, CA, 1984).

A.P.F.

BAXTER, RICHARD (1615-91). Puritan clergyman, and author of doctrinal, apologetic, evangelistic, ethical, pastoral, ecclesiastical and devotional books. After an outstanding ministry at Kidderminster, Worcestershire, in 1641-42 and 1647-61, Baxter with almost 2,000 others declined the oath attached to the 1662 Act of Uniformity - which required the clergy of the Church of England to give unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained in the Prayer Book of 1559 - and he withdrew from parish ministry. Thereafter he wrote tirelessly and became the most voluminous British theologian ever.

Self-taught but well-read in medieval and patristic as well as 16th- and 17th-century theology, Baxter thought himself a mainstream Puritan, and in most things he was. However, he taught an Amyraldean universal redemption as a basis for the universal gospel invitation, an Arminian view of justification* as an amnesty conditional upon sustained obedience to a new law ('neonomianism'), and an implicitly Socinian view of the coherence of Christianity with natural theology which led to unitarian rationalism after his death.

On practical Christianity, however, Baxter is peerless. His huge work of 1673 - A Christian Directory . . . in Four Parts: I. Christian Ethics (or Private Duties), II. Christian Economics (or Family Duties), III. Christian Ecclesiastics (or Church Duties), IV. Christian Politics (or Duties to our Rulers and Neighbours) - claims to tell Christians how to use their knowledge and faith; how to improve all helps and means, and to perform all duties; how to overcome temptations, and to escape or mortify every sin. Standing on the shoulders of William Perkins (1558-1602), William Ames (1576-1633), Robert Sanderson (1587-1663) and Jeremy Taylor,* Baxter fulfils the promise of his title amazingly fully.

Other devotional classics from his pen (e.g. The Saints' Everlasting Rest, 1650; The Life of Faith, enlarged ed. 1670; The Divine Life, 1664; Self-Denial, 1659) amplify aspects of the analysis contained in this compendious overview, while The Reformed Pastor (1656) is a supreme statement, enormously energetic and energizing, of the spiritual demands of ministry to a congregation. Baxter-readers over three and a half centuries have unanimously acknowledged his mastery as a guide to the Christian life.

Bibliography

Practical Works, ed. W. Orme, 23 vols. (London, 1830); 4 vols. (Ligonier, PA, 1990-91).

C. F. Allison, The Rise of Moralism: The Proclamation of the Gospel from Hooker to Baxter (Wilton, CT, 1965; London, 1966); H. Martin, Puritanism and Richard Baxter (London, 1946); G. F. Nuttall, Richard Baxter (London, 1965).

J.I.P.

BEATITUDES are a literary form used to describe an individual whose life is consistent with what God expects, and to indicate that ‘reward’, or blessing, is to be anticipated. Beatitudes are used in Scripture to hold up the character or action of the person for others to see. In doing so, the beatified individual is praised and the hearer or reader is encouraged to emulate that person’s character.

Beatitudes are found in both testaments. Examples from the OT are numerous, particularly in the Psalms (see Pss. 1:1-3; 40:4; 112:1; 128:1; and 32:1-2, which is quoted in Rom. 4:7-8). The form was, consequently, a familiar one for Jesus and the Hebrew community of his day. Most NT examples are from the teaching of Jesus.

The best-known collection of beatitudes is to be found in Mt. 5:3-10 and Lk. 6:20-22. Their context is the kingdom of God;* their meaning is best appreciated, and they are realized most fully, within the context of God’s reign. They are both a present reality and an eschatological promise, for in them Jesus both proclaims the kingdom and extends future hope in the fully realized kingdom to those who are already part of it.

The beatitudes in Matthew and Luke reflect the paradox of understanding the kingdom of God in human terms. Here the poor, those who mourn and weep, the meek and merciful, those who hunger, the peace-makers, the pure in heart and the persecuted, are all considered blessed.

The Lukan beatitudes are set within references to Is. 61, a prophecy about the Messiah which Jesus claimed as a reference to himself (see Lk. 4:18-21 and 7:22). The inclusion of parallel curses, or woes, in Lk. 6:24-26 illustrates the theme of reversal prominent in the Isaiah prophecy.

The beatitudes throughout Scripture deal both with personality and lifestyle. Each beatitude looks to the implementing of the righteousness of God within the world around us. To live the beatitudes is thus to reflect something of God’s character.

D.L.P.

BEHAVIOUR CONTROL, see BEHAVIOURISM, BEHAVIOUR THERAPY AND MODIFICATION; MANIPULATION.

BEHAVIOURISM, BEHAVIOUR THERAPY AND MODIFICATION. Behaviourism is a metaphysical theory, which has had a very substantial influence on academic psychology and the development of psychological therapies in the 20th century. Its chief characteristics are the views that human beings are no more than higher primates whose behaviour is ultimately determined by evolutionary selective factors; that complex ‘higher’ psychological processes can be explained by multiple combinations of simple reflexes or conditioned responses (psychological *reductionism); that the exclusive immediate determinants of behaviour are its environmental antecedents and consequences (the conditioning history); and that human behaviour is amenable to study using paradigms similar to those employed in natural science.

This radical behaviourist position was first articulated by J. B. Watson (1878-1958) in 1913, and represents a reaction to the mentalism and method of introspection characteristic of the contemporary psychology. He was influenced by the work of I. Pavlov (1849-1936) on the classical conditioning of appetitive and aversive responses in animals (i.e. the learning of associations between neutral and biologically meaningful stimuli). Watson’s ideas were developed by B. F. Skinner* into a full-blown metaphysical theory, culminating in 1948 in a utopian novel (Walden Two) which describes a society based on behaviourist principles. Skinner’s experimental work, which almost exclusively used animal subjects, investigated the properties of operant conditioning (i.e. the learning to connect responses with their consequences in order to achieve rewards or avoid/escape punishment by processes of positive or negative reinforcement respectively).

The epistemological implication of the radical behaviourist theory for the study of humans is a requirement that the subject of study should be amenable to reliable measurement and rigorous experimental test procedures. Any concepts which are not amenable to these methods should be operationalized (i.e. translated into behavioural terms). Explanations of behaviour should not be given in terms of inferred, irreducible mental concepts (e.g. 'he went to bed because he felt tired'). Thus precision is achieved and tautology avoided. The aim of this empirical approach is the prediction and control of behaviour rather than the understanding of the mind.

Many psychologists would value the methodology of the behaviourist approach for pragmatic reasons, while not being committed to the metaphysical theory from which it developed. For example, it might be useful to employ a paradigm where humans are viewed as machines, under certain circumstances, without accepting that humans are 'nothing but' machines. However, it has been argued that there is both logical inconsistency and psychological difficulty in accepting methodological behaviourism while rejecting metaphysical behaviourism (M. S. van Leeuwen, The Person in Psychology).

Behaviour therapy arose from Watson's early attempts to condition classically fear in naive subjects. In the 1950s the first reports of successful treatment of specific phobias using systematic desensitization were reported (e.g. J. Wolpe, Psychotherapy by Reciprocal Inhibition). The technique involved graded exposure of the subject to the feared stimuli paired with an activity such as muscular relaxation (thought to be incompatible with anxiety responses). Its well-documented success led to a burgeoning of related therapeutic techniques in the 1960s and 1970s, used to treat a variety of neurotic disorders, though the link to the principles of learning theory had become more tenuous. These techniques include flooding, modelling, response prevention used to treat anxiety and obsessive compulsive disorders. The degree of success obtained has been variable, but, in general, high. More recently there has been a re-emergence of mentalistic concepts (although often operationalized into verbal responses) in the development of an integrated Cognitive Behaviour Therapy.*

Behaviour modification employs the operant conditioning paradigm to manipulate behaviour such that adaptive behaviour is increased and maladaptive behaviour reduced. Examples of the former are the enhancement of social, motor or life-skill acquisition in subjects with learning difficulties or suffering mental disorder, or in children. Examples of the latter are the control of habit disorders or violent or socially deviant behaviours in similar subjects. Positive reinforcers (rewards) may be primary, such as cigarettes or sweets, or secondary, such as tokens or stars. Secondary reinforcers may be exchanged for primary reinforcers or certain privileges. Aversive stimuli may be the removal of positive reinforcers, including brief temporary removal from the whole community in a side room (time out), or, in unusual cases, active punishment in various forms.

There is no doubt that specific behaviours can be brought under control where the environment is closed and the reinforcers sufficiently potent; but, like many other therapies, the gains achieved do not automatically generalize to other related behaviour or to other environments. Both behaviour therapy and behaviour modification share the characteristics of having developed out of learning theory research: both are applied directly and experimentally to the treatment of specific maladaptive behaviour patterns (being little influenced by more global diagnostic categorizations), and they focus on current maintaining factors rather than temporally or psychologically remote origins of the problem.

The advantages of the behavioural approach to problems are that treatment is usually of relatively brief duration; the technological quality of the approach enables it to be taught to primary carers and relatives and avoids mystique; the procedures are rigorously evaluated; even the most cognitively impaired person can benefit from the techniques; it aims to deal with specific problems without requiring the client to participate in the more threatening process of examining his or her whole life; on ethical grounds, it may be a preferable approach to sedating medication or physical restraint.

The disadvantages of the approach are that it may over-simplify complex problems. The role of language and verbal learning is almost entirely neglected by the behavioural approach (N. Chomsky, 'Review of "Verbal Behaviour"'). It also places little emphasis upon social and developmental issues. It is open to abuse, or can be used to maintain the status quo, particularly where the clients are of limited ability; the use of aversive stimuli and deprivation are ethically questionable, and in fact illegal in certain parts of the world (G. La Vigna and A. Donnellan, Alternatives to Punishment).

The fact that therapeutic procedures based loosely on learning theory show a relatively good degree of success in their own terms is not sufficient either to confirm or to discredit metaphysical behaviourism; it is essentially a belief system. As such it has some attractions when viewed from a Christian perspective: it is realistic about the tendency of humans to gratify desires and pursue self-interest; it does not offer a spurious quasi-spiritual alternative to the biblical description of our inner experience - rather, it ignores it; and it draws attention to the importance of the environment in shaping behaviour (see Fall* and Sin and Salvation†). For these reasons, and because of the efficacy of behaviour therapy and modification, many Christian counsellors (e.g. James Dobson, 1936-), adopt a methodologically behaviourist position in the context of a broader scriptural perspective. However, it must be noted that, in its most extreme form, behaviourism is fundamentally atheistic: God's direct influence upon behaviour is denied; humans are viewed as no more than complex animals; and the spiritual aspect of the individual is dismissed as having no reality.

See also: PASTORAL CARE, COUNSELLING AND PSYCHOTHERAPY.†

Bibliography

N. Chomsky, 'Review of "Verbal Behaviour"', Language 35, 1959, pp. 26-58; G. Davey, Applications of Conditioning Theory (London, 1981); J. Dobson, Dare to Discipline (New York and Eastbourne, 1975); G. La Vigna and A. Donnellan, Alternatives to Punishment: Solving Behavioural Problems with Non-Aversive Strategies (New York, 1986); M. S. van Leeuwen, The Person in Psychology (Grand Rapids and Leicester, 1985); I. Pavlov, Conditioned Reflexes (Oxford, 1927); B. F. Skinner, Walden Two (New York and London, 1976); J. Wolpe, Psychotherapy by Reciprocal Inhibition (Stanford, CA, 1958).

J.R.McG.

BENEDICT OF NURSIA (c. 480-c. 550), known as 'the father of Western monasticism', was born in the Umbrian region of modern Norcia, Italy. Most of what is known about his life derives from the Dialogues of Pope Gregory I.*

Alarmed at the profligate lifestyle of fellow students in Rome, Benedict withdrew for three years into solitary life in a cave at Subiaco. Once discovered by local inhabitants he quickly attracted many followers, whom he subsequently organized into twelve monastic communities. However, Benedict eventually settled at Monte Cassino, south of Rome, where his most famous monastery was founded.

Much more can be deduced about the character of Benedict from the monastic 'rule' with which his name is ever associated; for, as Gregory put it, Benedict 'cannot have taught otherwise than as he lived'. Benedict's Rule - a comparatively short compilation drawing on the best of earlier monastic 'rules' - provides a flexible framework for daily life within which members of a stable community governed by an abbot undertake to learn obedience and humility, 'following the guidance of the Gospel'. The focus of community life is the opus Dei ('the work of God'), a daily pattern of praise and prayer comprising seven day 'offices' (cf. Ps. 119:164) and one night 'office' (cf. Ps. 119:62), each compiled almost exclusively of psalms (sung 'that mind and voice may be in harmony') and Scripture readings.

The influence of Benedict's Rule upon Christian spirituality* in Western Europe is incalculable, the rule having been officially adopted as the norm for monastic and religious life, and the daily office, likewise, as an obligation of prayer for secular clergy.

Bibliography

J. McCann, Saint Benedict (London, 1979); idem (ed.), The Rule of St Benedict (ET, London, 1972).

R.A.Hin.

BENEVOLENCE is an attitude of goodwill towards others, a desire to promote their well-being.

It is clearly seen in God (see †) as an expression of his love (see †) and grace.* He longs for the good of his creatures, and is committed to bringing it about as far as is possible. His benevolence is universal: he makes the sun rise on the evil and on the good (Mt. 5:45), he desires that all should be saved (1 Tim. 2:4).

Benevolence in men and women can be viewed in a number of ways. Some have argued that it is an innate quality, a natural bent towards desiring the well-being of the people we encounter. Others would contest this, suggesting that we are in essence self-centred: any apparent concern for the well-being of others can be traced back to our own self-interest; we express kindness to others so that they will be kind to us; we feed the hungry to salve our own consciences, and so on (see Altruism*). It could be that benevolence is a learned attitude; the growing child is taught to replace his basic self-centredness with a developing concern for the well-being of others.

A case can be made from the Bible that true benevolence is the fruit of the Spirit: unless God plants his character in us, any expressions of benevolence will be at best pale reflections of the real thing; true benevolence springs from agape love; only those filled with the love of God can truly, selflessly, love their fellow women and men. Yet even in Christians it is still the case that benevolence never manages to become wholly altruistic.

Benevolence is a matter of the mind and the will, our attitudes and volitions, though the word is sometimes used to refer to the acts of kindness to which benevolence gives rise (i.e. beneficence). The Bible teaches that the relationship between attitude and action, wellwishing and well-doing, is a very close one indeed. The two must always be integrated. Kind thoughts and good wishes without corresponding action are valueless (Jas. 2:15-16); and good deeds that are not rooted in true benevolence are equally useless (1 Cor. 13:3).

Right action must be determined by right attitude. Deeds to others that are truly pleasing to God must spring from benevolence. Just as murder, adultery, immorality, theft and the like come 'out of the heart' (Mt. 15:19), so loving and caring and beneficial deeds must come from that inner spring of thought and will that the Bible calls 'the heart'. The story of the Good Samaritan (Lk. 10:25-37), however, makes it clear that a truly benevolent attitude is not necessarily one of smiling benignity and warm feelings. The Samaritan presumably found the wounded Jew at least superficially repulsive, yet he was at heart committed to his well-being.

Modern society has made virtues out of competitiveness, aggression and self-assertion. While these may seem to leave little room for benevolence, they at least provide a backdrop against which benevolence can stand out more clearly. Christians, especially, are called to 'do nothing out of selfish ambition or vain conceit, but in humility consider others better than yourselves. Each of you should look not only to your own interests, but also to the interests of others. Your attitude should be the same as that of Christ Jesus' (Phil. 2:3-5).

The task of recalling Western Christians to a true attitude of benevolence is a major one. Emptying ourselves for the sake of others, giving away all we have to the poor, or even sacrificing half our wardrobe (Phil. 2:5-7; Mk. 10:21; Lk. 3:11) are largely alien concepts; even our largesse is often little more than the disposal of our excess. Additionally, the sheer volume of the demands made on us makes the task seem impossible: the world's billions press in on us on every side; how can we feel or express benevolence to so many?

It may be that besides focusing on the commands and exhortations to benevolence in Scripture, and on the needs of the people of the world, the most fruitful ways of encouraging benevolence are to seek to look on others as Jesus sees them, and to ponder the truth that in showing benevolence to others we are in fact showing it to him (Mt. 25:31-46).

P.A.H.

BENTHAM, JEREMY (1748-1832), regarded as the father of classical utilitarianism (see Consequentialism*). For Bentham utilitarianism was primarily a theory to undergird progressive social policy and reform in the light of what he took to be the failure of natural rights* and social-contract theories.*

Bentham's version of utilitarianism was developed in his Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation (1789; London, 1970). While asserting that 'Nature has placed mankind under the governance of two sovereign masters, pain and pleasure', he also maintains that humans feel pleasure* upon increasing the sum total of happiness in the universe, and pain upon the failure to accomplish this. Thus the principle of utility is foundational for Bentham's theory: we ought to perform only those actions which will bring about the greatest amount of pleasure for all involved.

Recognizing the difficulty in identifying which of the possible actions would increase the sum total of pleasure for all involved, Bentham presented a 'hedonic calculus' as an instrument of moral analysis (see Hedonism*). In estimating the value of a pleasure or pain, the moral agent should consider such factors as the intensity, duration, certainty and propinquity of respective pleasures and pains, as well as their likelihood to lead to additional sensations of the same kind or of the opposite kind. This calculation was to be performed not only with reference to oneself, but to all those affected by the action in question. Bentham's quantitative utilitarianism was later revised by John Stuart Mill.*

See also: HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN ETHICS.†

T.D.K.

BEREAVEMENT is the experience of losing a loved person or loved object. Typically 'bereavement' describes a person's reaction to the death* of a spouse or close relative, although the term may also be used to describe the experience of other losses such as the amputation of a limb, moving house, going abroad, losing a job, or divorce. 'Grief' is the emotion of bereavement; it is part of the cost of having loved, a normal response to the loss of a significant loved person or object.

For a dying person, all his or her losses come together, and they are coupled with the fundamental further loss, namely the finality of death.

In the 1960s, Dr Elisabeth Kübler-Ross (1926-) established a seminar at the University of Chicago to consider the implications of terminal illness for patients and for those involved in their care. Her classic book On Death and Dying documents the attitudes she found among her terminally ill patients, which came to light during many conversations. She indicates that a patient may pass through several stages in coming to terms with his or her own death: denial and isolation; anger; bargaining; depression;* acceptance and hope. These are frequent, but not invariable, phases in the grief-work (see Grief*) of the dying (see Death and Dying*).

There is a growing literature concerned with the processes of grief and mourning, much of it written to help society relearn that death is an inescapable part of life, and that freer discussion of the processes of grieving might contribute to a more acceptable social attitude towards mourning. Following on from Freud's* early work 'Mourning and Melancholia' (see Sigmund Freud: Collected Papers, vol. 5, New York, 1917), Erich Lindemann published a major paper in 1944 ('The symptomatology and management of acute grief', AJP, Sept 1944, pp. 7f.) in which he argued that a clear 'grief syndrome' can be described: sometimes this may appear immediately after a crisis; sometimes it may be delayed; sometimes it may apparently be absent. Bereavement, and the 'grief-work' which has to be undertaken during bereavement, are processes of coping, involving emancipation from bondage to the loss of the deceased, readjustment to the environment in which the deceased is missing, and the formation of new relationships. In 1972, Colin Murray Parkes (1928-) published his acclaimed study Bereavement, in which he isolates four main phases of normal grieving: a phase of numbness, shock and partial disregard of the reality of the loss; a phase of yearning, with an urge to recover the lost object; a phase of disorganization, despair and gradual coming to terms with the reality of the loss; a phase of reorganization and resolution. Often there will be physical reactions: stress symptoms, loss of appetite, change of sleep patterns, various somatic disorders. This is not necessarily a tidy process. Grief is complex, and different for each person. For some it continues for a long time, or may never seem to be completed; for others, there can be gradual progress back to stability and to a good resolution of the grief so that life can proceed normally. Typically, after a major bereavement such as the death of a spouse, the phase of shock may last up to two weeks, while the rest of the grief-work until satisfactory resolution may take two to four years. As C. S. Lewis* graphically illustrated in A Grief Observed, grief-work is not necessarily a linear progression: 'Tonight all the hells of young grief have opened again; the mad words, the bitter resentment, the fluttering in the stomach, the nightmare unreality, the wallowed-in tears. For in grief, nothing "stays put". One keeps on emerging from a phase, but it always recurs. Round and round. Everything repeats. Am I going in circles, or dare I hope I am on a spiral? But if a spiral, am I going up or down it?' (p. 46).

At each phase of grief, a positive resolution can enable the bereaved person to work back to normality. But things can also go wrong: the reality of the death may be denied, either by 'mummifying' the deceased's room or belongings, or by the superspirituality which refuses to face the pain of death; the normal depression may become chronic; the bereaved may become a recluse, or overdependent, or irresponsibly helpless. Abnormal grieving may need skilled intervention.

Grieving young children can often best be helped by helping the bereaved parent, as much of a child's grief may be a reflection of the parent's. If the adult can express feelings, and be advised that it is not harmful for the child to do likewise, both can be helped.

The Christian pastor, sometimes more than the family doctor or other helpers, may have a special ministry in assisting a bereaved family cope with loss. He or she is permitted by social convention to break through the taboos associated with death, in a way that is not open to many others. Many people think that helping at a time of death is in some way part of what the clergy are for. The pastor is a representative figure. His or her personal presence can give permission for those in need to share religious concerns and talk seriously (sometimes angrily) about them. The pastor represents the community of faith, and can serve as a bridge for grieving persons to get back into contact with their wider community. The pastor bears a shared tradition of interpretation about death and resurrection, within which the grieving person can be gradually helped to make some sense of the loss. The pastor can also be a reconciling figure, bringing the resources of divine grace. He can stand with the bereaved in their loneliness* and uncertainty, and his (sometimes silent) presence can support the grieving person as processes of reconciliation are undertaken towards God and towards others. It will sometimes be important for the pastor to help a grieving person come to terms with feelings of guilt* and find ways of handling this appropriately through forgiveness.* The pastor also serves a ritual function, sometimes in sacramental ministry to the sick or dying, and also in the funeral. The funeral can serve a most important social and psychological, as well as a spiritual, function for the bereaved person. It helps him or her to face the reality of the death, to interpret the changes that are happening, to focus the choices that are open and to recognize the status transitions going on. It offers the pain and the sorrow of the living, as well as the one who has died, to the mercy and grace of God, and provides an opportunity for the community of faith to surround the bereaved with their prayers and their support. The value of the funeral ritual is reinforced through monuments and memorials, which provide a focus for feelings, and through subsequent pastoral ministry, especially at significant times like the first anniversary. The pastoral task in relation to the bereaved is to seek to help them understand and use their experiences of loss in a way that enables them to let go appropriately, and build creatively for the future.

See also: BURIAL AND CREMATION.

Bibliography

E Kübler-Ross, On Death and Dying (New York, 1969; London, 1970); C. S. Lewis, A Grief Observed (London, 1961); C. M. Parkes, Bereavement (Harmondsworth, 1985; Madison, CT, 1987); Y. Spiegel, The Grief Process (London, 1977); A. Stedeford, Facing Death (London, 1984); H. Thielicke, Living with Death (ET, Grand Rapids, 1983); P. Tournier, Creative Suffering (ET, London and San Francisco, 1982); N. Wolterstorff, Lament for a Son (Grand Rapids, 1987).

D.J.A.

BIBLICAL COUNSELLING. Within the range of Christian responses to the rise of the secular psychologies (see Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy†), there have been a number of strands which have laid claim to the Bible as a basis for pastoral counselling. These have been outlined by the N. American pastoral theologian Donald Capps (1939-), and include: the open use of biblical passages in hospital chaplaincy work by Richard C. Cabot and Russell L. Dicks (1906-65); a more cautious approach in handling specific texts by Seward Hiltner;* the diagnostic use of the Bible by Wayne E. Oates (1917-); the Barthian stance of Eduard Thurneysen;* and the thematic style of William B. Oglesby (1916-), which looks to such biblical themes as ‘fear and faith’ and ‘risk and redemption’; and to the work of OT theologian Gerhard von Rad (1901-71). Capps, in turn, develops his methodology by referring to form criticism, allowing the literary genre of the psalms, proverbs and parables to shape non-directive, directive and indirect styles of counselling respectively.

Parallel to such explorations of the use of the Bible in pastoral care and counselling, there has been a more conservative strand, whose various methodologies have been summed up in the generic term ‘biblical counselling’. Under this banner can be grouped a number of approaches which maintain a high view of the Bible’s inspiration and accuracy - ranging from ‘excluding’ positions, strong on special revelation* and tending to dismiss the validity of psychiatry and the allied disciplines, through to ‘integrational’ stances, stressing general as well as special revelation and open to dialogue between a biblical theology and the insights of psychology. In the US, this range includes: the ‘nouthetic counselling’ of Jay Adams (1929-); the ‘spiritual counselling’ of Martin Bobgan (1930-) and Deirdre Bobgan (1935-); the ‘biblical counselling’ of Scope Ministries (and the International Association of Biblical Counselors, also based in Oklahoma City and founded in 1987); the more integrational ‘biblical counselling’ of Lawrence Crabb (1944-); and Gary Collins’ (1934-) ‘discipleship counselling’ with its openness to dialogue. In the UK, mainstream biblical counselling is represented by the ‘Christian counselling’ of Selwyn Hughes (1928-), influenced by transatlantic contact with Crabb and with Clyde Narramore and Bruce Narramore (1941-), and forming the Institute of Christian Counselling out of a training programme launched in 1975. In 1981 and 1982, Adams (and, subsequently, John Bettler and Wayne Mack, also from the US) held courses in biblical counselling at Hildenborough Hall, Kent. One outcome of these enterprises was the setting up of the British Association of Biblical Counsellors in 1984.

Amongst others who look to the Bible as foundational in their counselling theory and practice, the influence of the London-based Care and Counsel (1974-90) has been important in fostering a more integrational approach. In 1992, the Association of Christian Counsellors (with a Statement of Faith and Practice that refers to counselling ‘according to biblical assumptions, aims and methods’) was launched in the UK to encourage recognition and accreditation* of Christian counsellors, supervisors and training courses.

Within the spread of biblical counselling approaches, nouthetic counselling, introduced in 1969, has held a unique and controversial position. Jay Adams, its founder, influenced by the anti-Freudianism of O. Hobart Mowrer,* has produced a methodology with an assumptive basis that looks solely to the special revelation of the Bible: ‘All that is needed to form values, beliefs, attitudes, and behavioural styles is in the Scriptures’ (‘Nouthetic Counselling’, in G. R. Collins, Helping People Grow, p. 158). From this stance, Adams has argued a 'duplex' view of human nature (the visible 'outer' and the 'inner', or 'heart') which sees all malady as either sin* or bodily disorder: there is no 'non-bodily psychological area' which is either unaffected by sin or is not a source of further sin (More than Redemption, pp. 110ff., 141-142). Within this framework, the place of psychotherapy becomes irrelevant and the focus of human need lies with the biblical counsellor or physician. Adams has centred his attention on the use in the NT of noutheteo (to warn, advise) and nouthesia (admonition, warning, exhortation) and is, thereby, faithful to the biblical contexts of their use, i.e. within the fellowship of believers, in propounding that his nouthetic counselling is suitable only for Christian clients. The aim is 'biblical change', whereby the Holy Spirit works through God's Word to effect new, Christcentred patterns of thinking and action. The style is directive, exhortatory and confrontational, and the cognitive-behavioural* approach includes the 'two-factored process' of 'dehabituating' and 'rehabituating' (see, e.g., Eph. 4:22-32) and the assigning of carefully monitored 'homework'. Criticisms of nouthetic counselling have included comment on Adams' apparent neglect of the much more widely used NT words parakaleo (to exhort, encourage, comfort) and paraklesis (encouragement, exhortation, consolation), and a questioning of his use of the book of Proverbs as a blueprint for directive counselling (Capps, Biblical Approaches to Pastoral Counselling, pp. 101, 144ff.).

The debate continues on the relationship between the Bible and the theory and practice of Christian counselling. Crabb, for example, wrestles with what it means to be 'biblical' in the province of counselling and makes a plea for openness and non-defensiveness amongst biblical counsellors (Understanding People, pp. 14-15). Roger Hurding (1934-) has given a detailed critique of biblical counselling (Roots and Shoots, pp. 275-306) and argues for a more comprehensive model for the use of Scripture in pastoral care and counselling, in which the prophetic in so-called 'biblical' counselling, the therapeutic in the healing methodologies, the pastoral in 'relationship' counselling (see 'Christian personalism' in Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy†), and the priestly in spiritual direction, can all develop their distinctive understanding and handling of Scripture (The Bible and Counselling, pp. 147-173).

Bibliography

J. E. Adams, Competent to Counsel (Grand Rapids, 1970); idem, More than Redemption: A Theology of Christian Counseling (Grand Rapids, 1979); D. Capps, Biblical Approaches to Pastoral Counseling (Philadelphia, 1981); D. E. Carlson, 'Jesus' Style of Relating: The Search for a Biblical View of Counselling', JPT 4, 1976, pp. 181-192; G. R. Collins (ed.), Helping People Grow: Practical Approaches to Christian Counseling (Santa Ana, CA, 1980); L. J. Crabb, Effective Biblical Counseling (Grand Rapids, 1977); idem, Understanding People: Deep Longings for Relationship (Grand Rapids, 1987; Basingstoke, 1988); R. F. Hurding, Roots and Shoots: A Guide to Counselling and Psychotherapy (London, 1986) = The Tree of Healing (Grand Rapids, 1988); idem, The Bible and Counselling (London, 1992); W. B. Oglesby, Biblical Themes for Pastoral Care (Nashville, TN, 1980).

R.F.H.

BIGAMY, see POLYGAMY.

BIOETHICS, see ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE.†

BIRTH CONTROL, or contraception, is the restriction of procreation by human choice and control. Long practised, birth control was known in Egypt in 1900 BC and throughout the ancient world. Medical technology's recent achievement of effective contraception, beginning in the 19th century, has been called 'the most significant and farreaching advancement produced by the new biology' (C. E. Curran, 'The Contraceptive Revolution and the Human Condition', p. 42).

The process of conception can be interrupted at several points. Mechanical methods of contraception prevent the introduction of sperm into the uterus and Fallopian tubes and include the condom, the diaphragm and the intra-uterine device (IUD). Chemically, contraception can be achieved by means of the 'Pill', in use since the 1960s, and the more recent Depo-Provera (DMPA) injection, particularly used in the Third World. Sterilization* is a more permanent means of achieving control over conception, and includes in females tubal ligation, or deliberate occlusion of the Fallopian tubes, which usually is permanent, and in males the partially reversible vasectomy. Less technological and less reliable methods include coitus interruptus (withdrawal by the male before ejaculation) and the 'rhythm' method in which intercourse is restricted to infertile periods. Technological contraception is known as 'artificial contraception' and has been received slowly, or not at all, by various Christian traditions and moralists. Abortion* has also come to be seen, in some quarters, as an acceptable means of contraception.

Historically, supporters of contraception could scarcely appeal to the people of Israel, who placed a high value both on childbearing and on chastity.* Greeks and Romans favoured high rates of reproduction to produce population for the State, and contraception was specifically condemned by the Stoics and by Philo (c. 20 BC - c. AD 50).

Scripture seems to say little directly about the issue, and it is to Augustine* that the church owes its traditionally negative attitude towards contraception. He believed that the use of contraception even within marriage* introduced moral corruption into the conjugal act, turning it into something akin to prostitution.* Contemporary Roman Catholic teaching holds that while responsible family planning is an important objective, it can be pursued only within the context of the moral law, which teaches that there is an unbreakable union of the unitive (or relational) and procreative 'meanings' of marital sexuality. This view, as elaborated by Pope Paul VI in Humanae Vitae (1968; see Papal Encyclicals*), sees 'artificial' contraception as intrinsically immoral and as having among its negative consequences the encouragement of fornication* and adultery,* the reduction of the woman to the status of an object (much as Augustine had taught), and the potential for political abuse. Negative social phenomena such as the dramatic rise in premarital sex, the rise in sexually transmitted diseases including AIDS, and the serious sideeffects of the Pill can be cited as evidence by those who hold this view. Regarding political abuse, it is instructive that in the mid-1940s, thirty of the United States allowed mandatory non-voluntary sterilization of various groups in society, including the retarded, the deviant, the criminal and racial minorities.

Protestant thought and contemporary social attitudes departed from Roman Catholic teaching in the 20th century. In the late 19th century various laws in the US, influenced by Protestant morality, suppressed contraception. The Comstock Act of 1873, passed as the result of lobbying by the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), prohibited the distribution of contraceptives or birth control information. It was not until the 1960s that the US Supreme Court overturned a Connecticut law that prohibited the use of contraceptives in private by married couples. The birth control movement grew in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, led by Marie Stapes (1880-1959) and Margaret Sanger (1883-1950), often using Malthusian* arguments about the need to limit population growth (see Population Policy*) to keep within resource limitations. In the 'baby boom' period following the Second World War, governments began to advocate contraception both for their own populations and in their foreign aid policy for developing nations. Protestant thinking, led by the Anglicans in the early part of the century, gradually came to accept birth control as a legitimate means of limiting family size and population growth. Karl Barth,* in particular, gave theological backing to couples who wished to engage in marital sexual life without procreation, arguing that unprotected intercourse is impermissible in cases where there is concern for the mother's physical and psychological health, or where other problems are present which make it impossible to see a child as God's blessing. Barth's position has been echoed by theologians such as Jacques Ellul* and Reinhold Niebuhr,* and significantly in practice by many millions of Protestants who have used contraception and sterilization to limit the size of their families.

Christian thinking about contraception will have to take account of several factors. First of all, it must be admitted that contraception has encouraged sexual promiscuity, and that this is incompatible with fundamental Christian teaching about sexuality (see†) and its role in the family. In this sense, it has contributed to personal unhappiness and social disturbance. None the less, an important question today is the provision of contraception and advice to unmarried teenagers. Is the provision of contraception to teenagers a realistic concession to the practices already extant in society, or is it a sign of encouragement to immorality?

Secondly, contraception may well have a place in the Christian marriage when it is mutually agreed upon and seen as a method of postponing, spacing and limiting the bearing of children* in order to provide opportunities to complete education and similar commitments, to develop the personal relationship between spouses, and to enable the couple to provide better nurture and support to those children they choose to have. The biblical injunction to reproduce (Gn. 1:28) must be taken in context with the NT principle that other concerns, particularly the demands of faithfulness to God's call to service, can take precedence over both marriage and reproduction (1 Cor. 7). This seems to suggest that we are not under a divine call to produce as great a quantity of offspring as possible, but to bear children who can be nurtured and given appropriate attention, instruction, love and material resources.

Should a Christian couple use birth control to be permanently childless by choice? While official Catholic teaching refuses to allow any severance of the link between the unitive and the procreative aspects of reproduction and insists that this union be present on every occasion of sexual intercourse, others have argued that the link can be respected more generally by insisting that marital love be open to the bearing of children at some point, even if not in every instance of sexual activity. Perhaps, however, the decision to be childless, like the decision to remain celibate, is one that can be seen by some as a calling, a freeing for service in other ways, rather than mere selfishness. In any case, in view of the high infertility (see Childlessness*) statistics (one in seven couples), it is unwise to assume that couples who have not had children have chosen to be childless.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD III/4, pp. 357-363; C. E. Curran, 'The Contraceptive Revolution and the Human Condition', AJTP 3, 1982, pp. 42-59; R. A. McCormick, How Brave a New World? Dilemmas in Bioethics (Washington, DC, and London, 1981); J. T. Noonan, Contraception: A History of Its Treatment by the Catholic Theologians and Canonists (Cambridge, MA, and London, 1986); W. O. Spritzer and C. L. Saylor, Birth Control and the Christian; A Protestant Symposium on the Control of Human Reproduction (Wheaton, IL, 1964).

D.B.F.

BITTERNESS is an entrenched attitude of unresolved angry resentment. The bitter person sees himself or herself as the innocent victim. This attitude is a projection of unacceptable parts of the self* on to some external person or object. It is easier to contain these feelings if they are perceived as coming from 'out there' rather than 'in here'. Resolution involves taking personal responsibility* and recognizing that when there is a victim within, there is also an aggressor, and they cannot be divided. The bitter person concentrates on being wounded and finds it painful to acknowledge his or her own destructive wishes, preferring to regard them as a justifiable defence against unreasonable injustice (real or fantasied).

Bitterness is found in people who are basically angry with life in general. Probably there has been some lack of adequately warm and generous parenting (see Parenthood, Parenting*); this has led to deep-seated frustration.* Some perceived repetition of this deprivation in adult life will reactivate the sense of grievance which is already there: this new outrage then becomes the focus for hitherto non-specific resentment. Change is likely to occur only within an atmosphere of acceptance* and consistently loving care* which was lacking in the foundational experiences of parental relationships. Within such an atmosphere it may become possible for the bitter person to begin to grieve over lost opportunities and regret pain* received and inflicted, rather than feel victimized. Criticism and condemnation are unlikely to thaw the hurt and angry heart. The task of the church is to offer the quality of care which will facilitate change (see Heb. 12:15).

See also: FORGIVENESS.

Bibliography

M. Chave-Jones, Living with Anger (London, 1992).

M.C.-J.

BLASPHEMY. Since it was Israel's special duty to hallow the name of God (Ex. 20:7), the blaspheming of that name was a special sin and was therefore to be punished most seriously by stoning (Lv. 24:13-16). By a supreme irony which pierces to the heart of biblical religion, the charge of blasphemy is levelled against the Messiah himself as a ground for his death (Mk. 14:64).

The Eng. term 'blasphemy', itself a transliteration from Gk., is used variously for the abusive or careless profaning of God, or the causing of grave offence to believers (and, by extension, for other severe but non-religious insults). Through the Christianizing of Roman law, and then the canon law of the medieval church, a tradition of civil penalty for blasphemy has been carried down to our own time. In the US, that tradition was ended by the Supreme Court. In the UK it continues, and - though it has been rarely employed - the common law preserves an attenuated version of Lv. 24. However, here, as in most historical jurisdictions, the law is intended less to protect God's sensibilities than to protect those of his followers: either directly (necessary to the preservation of the peace), or indirectly (reflecting the dependence of the corpus of law on the Christian religion, and therefore demanding respect for that religion). In 1977-79, the law was tested by a successful private prosecution for 'blasphemous libel', brought against the publication Gay News for having published in 1976 a poem which depicted Jesus as a homosexual. It is unlikely that Western jurisdictions will long retain such privileged protection for the Christian religion, but it is more than likely that blasphemy against the Qu'ran will be increasingly proscribed in a number of Muslim countries. The option of extending legal protection to other religious traditions has been canvassed, and attracted some support in the context of the supposedly pluralist identity of these societies. Yet the danger of general legal regulation of religious discourse is real, since it could so easily disallow the particularist and universal claims of the gospel.

The NT underlines the OT's especial regard for the holiness of the name of God: 'Hallowed be thy name' is the first petition of the Lord's Prayer (Lk. 11:2, AV). The dis-hallowing of the name in blasphemy can take many forms beyond the cursing specified in Lv. 24. The term is used of Paul's persecution of the church (1 Tim. 1:13), of the fruit of religious hypocrisy (Rom. 2:24), of the eschatological opposition of the beast and the harlot (Rev. 13:1; 17:3), and of the perplexing 'blasphemy against the Holy Spirit', a sin singled out in Mk. 3:29 (and par.) as unforgivable - and which seems to refer to persistent and conscious rejection of the light of the gospel rather than to some particular act for which forgiveness would be sought in vain (Mk. 3:28).

Bibliography

L. W. Levy, Treason against God (New York, 1981); F. L. Smith, Blasphemy and the Battle for Faith (London, 1990).

N.M.deS.C.

BLESSEDNESS. The state of blessedness refers to the joy and happiness promised to the individual who lives in the kingdom of God.* Since blessedness is humanly realized in the kingdom of God, it is only perfectly achieved in the future when the kingdom is fulfilled, yet it is already approachable by the children of God as the kingdom* is now present among us.

The presence of such joy is attained both psychologically, through an attitude based on an understanding of one's being blessed by God, and presently, through an acknowledged realization of the blessing of God in this life. The Scriptures reflect the varied nature of blessedness: it is both material and spiritual, present as well as future, human and divine, both personal and social.

This varied nature of blessedness is reflected in contrasting paradigms presented in three parts of the biblical text. In the OT, particularly the Psalms, blessedness is closely connected with following God. The blessed person is one who finds refuge in God (Pss. 2:12; 34:8), is forgiven by God (Ps. 32:1-2), trusts in God (Ps. 40:4), and fears God (Pss. 112:1; 128:1). These activities, characteristic of one who follows God, are collectively referred to in the person of one who 'walks' with God ('Blessed are those who have learned to acclaim you, who walk in the light of your presence, O LORD', Ps. 89:15; 'Blessed are they whose ways are blameless, who walk according to the law of the LORD', Ps. 119:1).

In the NT, the Matthean paradigm implies that blessedness is a result of spiritual maturity. The Beatitudes* which introduce the Sermon on the Mount* affirm the blessedness of the person who is poor in spirit, mourns, is meek, hungers and thirsts for righteousness, is merciful, is pure in heart, is a peacemaker, and is persecuted because of righteousness (Mt. 5:3-10). This spiritual sensitivity is affirmed in Jesus' words to the disciples following the telling of the parable of the sower: Jesus states, 'Blessed are your eyes because they see, and your ears because they hear' (Mt. 13:16). While many people may have access to the kingdom of God, and thereby to the state of blessedness, only the spiritually sensitive will see and hear as necessary, and thereby be blessed.

Blessedness is also present in the midst of injustice and wherever God's justice is practised. The Lukan statement of the Beatitudes ('Blessed are you who are poor, ... you who hunger now, . . . you who weep now, ... you when men hate you, ... exclude you and insult you', Lk. 6:20-22) asserts that even those who suffer injustice will be blessed. Furthermore, the one who gives a banquet and invites 'the poor, the crippled, the lame, the blind' rather than 'your friends, your brothers or relatives, or your rich neighbours' is the one who 'will be blessed' (Lk. 14:12-14). Both living in the context of injustice and responding according to the rule of God in the presence of injustice are means to blessedness. This interpretation of blessedness reflects both Ps. 41:1 ('Blessed is he who has regard for the weak') and more generally Ps. 106:3 ('Blessed are they who maintain justice, who constantly do what is right').

Blessedness, therefore, is both an attitude and a present reality; it reflects both understanding and action. The integration of these in the state of blessedness is ascribed in Jas. 1:25: 'The man who looks intently [i.e. with the proper attitude and understanding] into the perfect law that gives freedom, and continues to do this [i.e. makes it a present reality, an action], not forgetting what he has heard, but doing it - he will be blessed in what he does.'

In the Catholic moral tradition,* the concept of blessedness is closely linked with the beatific vision of God. As such, it replaces pleasure* (see Hedonism*) and happiness* as 'man's chief end', when ethics are viewed teleologically* from a Christian perspective.

D.L.P.

BLESSING AND CURSING. To bless somebody is to express a hope or prayer that good, desirable things will happen to that person. Such prayers and the good things which result are both described as blessings. Similarly, to curse somebody is to call down evil upon him or her, and both the prayers for evil and evil happenings can be described as curses. The most common use of blessing and cursing in Scripture is associated with the covenant.* Israel and individuals within Israel call upon themselves blessings or curses dependent on whether they obey or disobey the covenant commands (e.g. Dt. 27-28; Jos. 23-24).

The blessing and cursing of others (Ne. 13:2; Mal. 2:2) does not control God or limit his freedom, but it is a way by which human beings can act as mediators of God's power and as facilitators of God's purposes. It is vital however to avoid misuse, which does not take God and his character seriously but tries to ensure that one's own desires are carried out (Ex. 20:7; Nu. 24:13).

It seems that blessing can have greater effect than cursing, and although cursing is used on occasion even in the NT (Acts 13:9-11), we are encouraged to use blessing rather than cursing in dealing with those who do us harm (Pr. 25:21-22; Lk. 6:27-36; Rom. 12:14, 19-21). The blessing of children, congregations, bride and groom, etc. is common today, but perhaps the deliberate and meaningful use of blessings by individuals calling for God's goodness to be shown to others including 'enemies' should be more widely used and encouraged.

M.J.E.

BOLSEN, ANTON (1867-1966). Best known for the development of the Clinical Pastoral Education (CPE) movement in the USA in the 1930s, Boisen is a significant figure in the rise of modern pastoral theology (see Practical and Pastoral Theology†). He originally studied linguistics, did graduate work on William James,* and then undertook theological training for the ministry, during which time he studied the psychology of religion under the direction of George Coe (1862-1951). He used his time as a rural pastor to conduct social and religious surveys. At the age of forty-four, Boisen passed through 'a brief but extremely severe period of mental illness'. He then undertook further study at Harvard, and spent eight years as a hospital chaplain, which he claims 'was the first attempt to bring to such a position any special training for the service of the mentally ill'. He later served as chaplain at the Elgin State Hospital in Illinois, combining the work with research and a lectureship in psychopathology at Chicago Theological Seminary. It was from this work that the CPE movement was developed. In 1936 Boisen wrote a major treatise, drawing on his own and others' experiences: The Exploration of the Inner World: A Study of Mental Disorder and Religious Experience. He brought together the worlds of psychiatry and religion, hypothesizing that there is a relationship between acute mental illness - in which he sought theological meaning - and certain forms of religious experience, both being attempts at personal reorganization. Boisen's case-study method of writing practical theology made a major impact on Seward Hiltner,* who took Boisen's method into the more academic setting of post-Second World War pastoral theology.

Bibliography

Out of the Depths (New York, 1960); The Exploration of the Inner World (New York, 1936).

S. Hiltner, Preface to Pastoral Theology (Nashville, TN, 1958).

D.J.A.

BONHOEFFER, DIETRICH (1906-45), theologian and church leader in Germany until his martyrdom, deeply influenced contemporary Christianity by both his writings and his example. His early work from his period as a teacher at Berlin, notably Creation and Fall (ET, London, 1959) and the Christology lectures (ET, London, 1978), is much under the influence of Karl Barth.* In the mid-30s, Bonhoeffer emerged as a leader of both the Confessing Church in Germany and the early ecumenical movement. Until its enforced closure by the Nazis, Bonhoeffer ran a seminary for the Confessing Church; during this period he produced some of his wellknown writings on spiritual formation and pastoral theology, in particular The Cost of Discipleship (ET, London, 1948) and Life Together (ET, London, 1954).

Bonhoeffer's life and work in their entirety are concerned at a very deep level with questions of the relation of the Christian faith to moral practice - a concern most graphically shown in his involvement in the German resistance movement and the plot against Hitler. Until his imprisonment in 1943, he was at work on his major ethical work, the Ethics, published posthumously. The Ethics is not a finished treatise but a collection of substantial fragments which would have formed the basis for the work Bonhoeffer regarded as his major theological contribution. Though the material is sometimes difficult to date, the rearranged sixth Ger. edition (the basis of more recent Eng. editions) gives probably the best sense of the development of the text. The opening section proposes a radically theocentric and Christocentric account of both the moral situation and the moral agent, in which divine action is the primary focus. Other sections use central theological motifs such as conformity to Christ or justification,* and contain hints of the reflections on the gospel and the autonomy of the world which preoccupied Bonhoeffer in his Letters and Papers from Prison (ET, London, 1971). Even in its fragmentary state, the Ethics is a work of acute spiritual and moral sensitivity. Together with the ethical sections of Barth's Church Dogmatics, his Ethics remains a serious challenge to accounts of ethics which focus on moral deliberation or which root Christian ethics in more general considerations of the human moral sphere.

Bibliography

Ethics (ET, London, 2 1971).

E. Bethge, Dietrich Bonhoeffer (ET, London and New York, 1970).

J.B.W.

BOOTH, WILLIAM (1829-1912), founder of the Salvation Army, was also noted for his advocacy of social reform. Converted in 1844 while apprenticed to a pawnbroker in Nottingham, Booth served as a lay preacher among the Wesleyans and then as a Methodist New Connection minister. Accepting the teaching of the American Phoebe Palmer (1807-74) about entire sanctification, he determined in 1861 to be an independent evangelist and holiness teacher. A Christian Mission he founded in Whitechapel, London, in 1865 expanded and, in 1878, took the name of the Salvation Army. Booth, as General, tried to sustain a red-hot fervour that ignored respectability in order to attract converts among the poor. The Army insisted on total abstinence, and in the 1880s established homes for reformed prostitutes, discharged prisoners and the homeless of London. The economic depression of the late 1880s persuaded Booth to publish In Darkest England, and the Way Out (London, 1890), urging that the urban destitute should be transferred to farm colonies or overseas colonies. Only a few parts of the scheme were implemented, but an institutional commitment to social work thenceforward marked the Salvation Army. Yet in his last years, as in his first, Booth's overriding aim was to save souls from sin.

Bibliography

H. Begbie, Life of William Booth, 2 vols. (London, 1920); K. S. Inglis, Churches and the Working Classes in Victorian England (London, 1963).

D.W.B.

BOYCOTT. Though an individual can engage in a boycott, the term is best understood as an organized refusal to deal with a party with whom there is disagreement, generally accompanied by efforts (e.g. a picket* line) to induce others not to deal with this party as well. Such action is called a 'primary' boycott. A 'secondary' boycott describes a refusal to deal with a party with whom there is no disagreement directly, but because this party in turn deals with the party with whom there is a disagreement.

Boycotts have occurred throughout history, though the term was coined in the 1880s growing out of actions in Ireland. The historian Josephus (c. 37-c. 100 AD) records several sitdown strikes by 1st-century Jews in Jerusalem protesting against the nature of Roman occupation. The commonest modern form of primary boycott finds trade-union members withholding their labour from an employer (encouraging other workers to do the same and consumers not to purchase the employer's product). Boycotts of products (often sponsored by churches) have marked recent decades, such as the action against the Nestle company to protest against its promotion of infant-formula milk in poorer nations.

For many years leading to the 1940s, Jewish residents in several European nations were subjected to social and economic boycotts, and the Arab nations have practised primary and secondary boycotts against Israel since its formation in 1948. Nations frequently engage in boycotts against other nations, such as the US boycott of the 1980 Olympics protesting against Soviet military occupation of Afghanistan, or the action of many nations protesting against apartheid* in South Africa.

Assessing the boycott ethically compels examining both the objectives and consequences of the action. A Christian cannot participate in (indeed should work against) a boycott having unjust objectives. Deciding this may have been easier when the target was Jewish residents of Europe yesterday, or recent immigrants there today. Things become muddier with tradeunion* action for higher wages. Is this not largely self-serving? Will not jobs be lost in the long run (along with economic harm to some not parties to the original boycott)? On the other hand, are the owners and managers of the enterprise depriving workers of a fair wage? The church (and society at large) requires the insights of knowledgeable Christians in helping it discern where the objectives of boycott actions are just or unjust.

Given just objectives, the use of otherwise non-violent and non-coercive boycotts as the best means of protesting against an injustice is far from clear. As long recognized, the boycott is a blunt instrument, harming many 'innocents' while seeking to harm those with whom disagreement exists (including the very ones the action is intended to help). Many opposed to apartheid in South Africa were unwilling to support an economic boycott (see Economic Sanctions*) out of concern that black South Africans would bear terrible costs from this.

The arena receiving the greatest social and legal attention over the last century is employment and trade-union activity, and Christian voices have spoken here. In his 1981 encyclical Laborem Exercens (On Human Work; see Papal Encyclicals*), Pope John Paul II grants the need for a struggle to achieve justice in the workplace, allowing the use of the strike (employment boycott) under appropriate conditions and suitably limited: an extreme means that must not be abused. Numerous Protestant conference statements affirm similar sentiments.

Scripture systematically expresses concern for exploitative work situations (Ex. 5; Lv.19:13; 1 Ki. 12:4ff.; Is. 58:3; Jas. 5:4), and is concerned that justice (see Justice and Peace†) and righteousness* be worked out in society (Is. 59:9, 14) - a process that may allow the use of boycotts. One might see God's call through Moses for the Israelites to leave their distressful employment in Egypt as a permanent boycott. God desires that employees receive what is right and fair (Col. 4:1), and it may be that private actions (suitably constrained) to this end may well be less troublesome to the social order than either outright prohibition (with attending suppression of what is right and fair) or extensive bureaucratic oversight of labour relations.

Bibliography

E. B. Bruland, 'Voting With Your Checkbook', CT 35, 19 Aug 1991, pp. 18-21; L. Ranke (ed.), 'Studying the Church's Use of the Economic Boycott', Engage/Social Action 14, Dec 1986; John Paul II, Laborem Exercens (ET On Human Work, London, 1981).

J.D.M.

BRAIN DEATH. It is possible for vital functions (breathing, circulation, excretion) to persist, or to be sustained artificially, despite the destruction of the higher brain by disease. The problems which then arise are: 1. how to be certain that the brain is dead, and so incapable of sustaining the functions of a living person; and 2. given that certainty, when and how to discontinue vital support (the 'switching-off' problem). The answers to the first question are medical: brain death is diagnosed only after a set of rigorously prescribed tests are made. In Britain these tests are repeated once after a suitable interval, and are made only by two doctors of adequate seniority (BMJ 1976, 2, pp. 1187-1188 and 1157-1158).

The forebrain, which contains the cerebral cortex, is the structure essential for thought and the coherent expression of the features of personality. The hindbrain contains the brain stem in which reside those functions which maintain life, especially the 'vital functions' of breathing and circulation. The term 'brain death' implies the loss of at least the cortex irrecoverably. The term 'brain-stem death' implies irrecoverable loss of vital functions. Even when vital functions are for the time being maintained by machine aid, neither 'brain death' nor 'brain-stem death' is compatible with return of conscious function. It is in this situation that life support is withdrawn under conditions of rigorous proof. Neither brain death nor brain-stem death should be confused with the very rare 'locked-in state', where a patient is conscious and can comprehend but is unable to respond to others.

Theological and ethical problems arise in relating the concept of a person made in God's image to the existence of a patient without a functioning forebrain. Pastoral problems are concerned with informing relatives, gaining their acceptance of withdrawal of vital support, and relating to their concerns about how an apparently living, if unconscious, person can be dead. This acceptance may take time. Often there are feelings of guilt,* inadequacy and hopelessness which accompany the normal grieving over the death, and a sense that in some way switching off the machines may have killed the patient. It may be thought mistakenly that the decision to withdraw active therapy was occasioned by medical concerns for cost, for the needed bed, or just unwillingness to try. There may even be concerns in some that the person who has died may have been denied an opportunity to repent or to believe as a result of withdrawing life support. They may be helped to see how the prolongation of vital support, for those who can never again decide, brings only needless suffering to all who are involved.

See also: DEATH AND DYING; ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE;† INTENSIVE CARE.

D.W.V.

BRAINWASHING. The term 'brainwashing', scarcely heard of fifty years ago, has now passed into everyday language. The basic ideas behind it are not new. It describes a coercive process of thought control in which a person's beliefs are, against his or her will, brought into line with another's. Coercion of people for the purposes of extracting confessions was in use in the time of Napoleon (1769-1821). The understanding of why such methods were effective took major steps forward when the relevance to human behaviour of the work on animals by the Russian Nobel Laureate in physiology, Ivan Petrovich Pavlov (1849-1936), became evident. Following the flooding of his laboratories, Pavlov noted that some tasks learned by his experimental animals prior to the trauma of flooding and near-death, were, seemingly, forgotten when the animals were tested in new laboratories. This observation raised the question of how such stress and trauma might result in the disappearance of previously established conditioned responses. It further raised the question of whether similar mechanisms might be at work following externally imposed trauma and stresses in humans.

Brainwashing was used during the Purge Trials in Soviet Russia in 1936 and developed during the Second World War by the Nazis to produce betrayals of loyalties. It gained most prominence when used by the Chinese Communists during the Korean War of 1950-53. The experiences of large numbers of American servicemen led to intensive study of the Communists' techniques by psychiatrists and psychologists in the USA. As a result, the basic component processes of the techniques were identified and it became apparent that there were superficial linkages with what happens in some religious communities. Robert J. Lifton (1926-), for example, identified several of the factors involved. These included assault upon personal identity, the establishment of guilt,* the compulsion to confess, and the final confession followed by rebirth and release.

William Sargant (1907-88), a British psychiatrist, noted that 'it is ordinary, normal people who are most susceptible to "brainwashing", "conversion", "possession", "the crisis" or whatever you wish to call it, and who in their hundreds or thousands or millions fall readily under the spell of the demagogue or the revivalist, the witch doctor or the pop group...' and he believed that 'the root of this alltoo-common human experience is a state of heightened suggestibility, of openness to ideas and exultations, which is characteristic of subjects under hypnosis ...' (The Mind Possessed, p. 31).

Brainwashing and evangelistic crusades

It has been claimed that aspects of suggestion and brainwashing operate in large evangelistic gatherings. The typical ingredients at such meetings include a speaker, already given considerable prestige through media build-up, who communicates with great fervour, conviction and seeming authority. The occasion is frequently one where there are large crowds and emotional hymns are sung repeatedly before and after the address. There are bright lights, massed choirs and stirring music, often with a strong repetitive rhythmic beat. Taken together, it is argued that such factors result in a significantly raised state of emotional arousal and thus facilitate the preacher's attempt to increase feelings of guilt and make more pressing the acceptance of the offered way of escape from these feelings, resulting in sudden conversions. The case is cogently argued and graphically illustrated by Sargant in Battle for The Mind and The Mind Possessed.

That some of these factors are at work in such meetings seems likely. The extent of their influence, however, remains to be clarified. It is probable that personality factors, whether a person is introverted, extroverted or neurotic, will interact with the external circumstances to influence the outcome at such meetings. Certainly physical and psychological stresses skilfully applied can produce dramatic changes in behaviour and beliefs. Sargant illustrates this graphically from his observations in many cultures. One of the most dramatic examples is the snake-handling sects of the southern States of America. There he observed emotional exhaustion, leading to the heightened suggestibility evident in extreme forms in political brainwashing and in some large evangelistic meetings still held today (see *Psychology of Religion).

A Christian perspective

From a Christian perspective there can never be any justification (see Justification, Moral) for treating people like things to be manipulated. According to the Christian gospel, it is the unfathomable love and generosity of God who was in Christ dying for the sins of all humankind that evokes a genuine response. The whole person, and that includes emotions and feelings as well as the mind, is involved in conversion.* Thought, emotion and will are all intrinsic parts of human nature and are all involved in religious commitment and the religious life. The accounts of conversions in the NT, e.g. in a few chapters of the Acts of the Apostles, illustrate the range of different circumstances within which Christian conversions occur. To read these is to explode the myth that only one stereotyped type of conversion is true and constitutes 'the real thing'.

Christians who are psychologists work for a deeper understanding of the many ways in which people are converted and come to faith in Christ. That knowledge, however, can never, with justification, be used to manipulate people through brainwashing or any other technique in order to increase the numbers of converts. It is, however, entirely proper to use such psychological knowledge in order to present as clearly as possible the love of God in Christ, the historical basis of the Christian gospel, and the demands it makes upon the unconverted, and to make unmistakably clear the way of escape offered in Christ. Persuasion and exultation, yes; manipulation* and brainwashing, no. This is the balance that must be maintained.

Bibliography

R. J. Lifton, Thought Reform and the Psychology of Totalism (New York and London, 1961); W. Sargant, Battle for the Mind (London and New York, 1957); idem, The Mind Possessed (London, 1973).

M.A.J.

BRANDT REPORT, THE. Named after Willy Brandt (1913-92), the former West German Chancellor and winner of the Nobel Peace Prize in 1971. Brandt is revered in his country for the policy of Ostpolitik, which contributed to the ending of the Cold War and to the reunification of Germany. Internationally, he is possibly better known for his part in the development debate (see Economic Development*).

In 1978, the Independent Commission on International Development Issues was set up under his chairmanship to look into the critical state of relations between the rich and poor countries and to make proposals for a more just international order.* The Commission's report was published in 1980, under the title North-South: A Programme For Survival. Three years later, worsening economic conditions and the lack of global co-operation compelled the Brandt Commission to publish a sequel, Common Crisis, North-South: Co-operation for World Recovery (see NorthSouth Divide*).

The importance of the Brandt Report is that its detailed proposals have set a global agenda for world development. The main theme of the Report is that everyone stands to gain from the expansion of trade (see International Trade*) which would result from the North assisting the South to develop. This theme reflects Brandt's personal experience of Ostpolitik, in which he saw how important it is for the peaceful resolution of conflict to appeal to the self-interest of both sides. The theme is also a product of the depressed economic conditions of the late 1970s, when the rise in oil prices, in particular, had thrown the richer countries into recession, and when it looked as if calls for substantial increased aid to the Third World would go unheeded unless there was some benefit for the First World.

The main criticism of the Report is that it places too much faith in the enlightened selfinterest of the North and overlooks the realities of political and economic competition between the major world groups. This criticism, which reflects the liberationist-realist division in Christian ethics, goes beyond Brandt to urge the radical transformation of existing international economic institutions and arrangements.

If not all Christians will be united behind the Report, at least all can unite behind Brandt's commitment to the flourishing of the whole human family, because central to the Christian faith is the belief that God is the one creator of all, whether we live in the North or the South.

See also: GLOBAL ETHICS.†

Bibliography

W. Brandt (chairperson), North-South: A Programme for Survival (London and Cambridge, MA, 1980); idem, Common Crisis, North-South: Co-operation for World Recovery (London and New York, 1983); C. Elliott, Comfortable Compassion? Poverty, Power and the Church (London, 1987); J. P. Wogaman, Economics and Ethics: A Christian Enquiry (London and Philadelphia, 1986).

C.Y.

BRIBERY. Consider a public undertaking that provides, e.g., goods for sale or services to others, and that is presumed free of secretive and special pleading. A bribe is an offer (typically covert) of money, goods or services to influence the performance of this undertaking in an improper way. Bribery then encompasses both the offer and the receipt of the bribe, along with the reciprocal impact upon the undertaking.

The Bible and Christian tradition consistently condemn bribery as detestable and to be proscribed. God accepts no bribes (Dt. 10:17). We are not to accept bribes (Ex. 23:8; Dt. 16:19). To accept bribes and to extort are detestable practices (Ezk. 22:2, 12). Most biblical references are to judicial settings, but the condemnation is general. Passages dealing explicitly with bribery make its 'acceptance' the offence. Naboth's contrived conviction (1 Ki. 21) and the rebuke of Simon the sorcerer (Acts 8:9-25) suggest that making the inducement is detestable. J. T. Noonan (1926-), in his comprehensive and masterful work Bribes, systematizes the (sometimes tortuous) development of Christian tradition over the centuries, and finds it consistent with biblical instruction - also noting in careful detail the salutary effect of Christian teaching upon Western societies.

In elaborating biblical instruction, Noonan observes how OT gifts and sacrifices as well as Christ's sacrificial death can appear as bribes designed to extract reciprocity from God. 'How, then, does a [gift] to God to liberate us from sin differ from a payment to a judge to release a guilty prisoner?' (p. 64). Ambiguity resides here, he concludes - albeit his eventual resolution is the correct one. OT gifts and sacrifices, when not a reflection of a pleasing life and expressions of thanksgiving, become a stench to the God who desires mercy and obedience more than sacrifice (1 Sa. 15:22; Is. 1:11ff.; Ho. 6:6; Mt. 12:7).

To view Christ's sacrifice as affecting a lighter sentence fails to grasp both the horror and the wonder of the atonement.* Our sins were not excused; the sentence was paid in full. Jesus Christ 'was pierced for our transgressions, he was crushed for our iniquities' (Is. 53:5). Whatever difficulties surround the mystery of the atonement, bribery is not one of them. Our part here is to acknowledge our unworthiness, seek God's forgiveness, and accept Christ as saviour and Lord: hardly the makings of a gift (or bribe) - and something the poorest person can do as easily as the richest.

If bribery then so clearly is wrong, wherein lies the ethical issue for us? Difficulties arise in discerning where legitimate gift-giving becomes bribery, and where the offer of money, goods or services is a bribe to be condemned or a case of extortion (maybe resulting in lighter moral consequences). Some examples make clear the dilemmas: parents who volunteer in their children's school may well expect better treatment for their children as a result; an undesirable but ethically allowable payment may be made in the face of implicit (if not explicit) extortion; or a company may offer free consulting to some existing and potential buyers.

The type of bribery currently attracting the greatest attention is alleged extortion: a business feeling compelled to make a substantial 'gift' in order to have its product receive proper consideration. Does the Bible's general condemnation of accepting, rather than making, bribes implicitly acknowledge (and maybe pardon) the difficulty here? Note should be taken, however, of Paul's failure to 'bribe' Felix (Acts 24:26) - presumably to be set free (which surely would have enhanced his ministry). How freely should we engage in ethically problematic means to achieve what appears to be a desirable end?

As with so many practices (pride, slander, theft, etc.) the line between right and wrong is often subtle and requires vigilance. Bribery is wrong! We can write laws against the practice in its more blatant forms. But too many cases exist where otherwise innocent gift-giving bleeds over into efforts to extract obligations and favours, and thereby becomes bribery. No State can police against this. The health of a nation requires its citizens to discipline themselves in such cases.

Bibliography

T. L. Carson, 'Bribery, Extortion, and "The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act"', Philosophy and Public Affairs 14, Winter 1985, pp. 66-90; J. T. Noonan, Jr., Bribes (New York and London, 1984); M. Philips, 'Bribery', Eth 94, 1984, pp. 621-636.

J.D.M.

BROADCASTING, see MEDIA.

BRUNNER, EMIL (1889-1966), Swiss pastor and professor of theology, was prominent in neo-orthodox circles. Accordingly, he advocated 'dialectical' or 'crisis theology' with its Kierkegaardian emphasis on God's existential confrontation of the individual through the Word of God revealed in Christ as uniquely witnessed to in Scripture and by the inner testimony of the Holy Spirit.

Brunner developed the idea of Jewish theologian Martin Buber (1878-1965) that God and truth are known in life-changing personal encounters with the One who chooses to reveal himself to humans - an 'I-Thou' rather than an 'I- it' relationship. This avoided Roman Catholic and fundamentalist 'objectivism' which equated revelation" with truths found in the Bible or church dogma, and the 'subjectivism' of classical Protestant liberalism which found truth in experience and feeling. But Brunner argued against Karl Barth* that there is a revelation of God in nature, and that fallen humans retain some 'point of contact' with God by virtue of being in the image of God,* both of which are necessary assertions if humans are to be held accountable for their sm.

Brunner insisted that there is no Christian faith apart from Christian conduct. Christian ethics is 'the science of human conduct as it is determined by Divine conduct' (Divine Imperative, p. 86). Divine conduct is characterized by agape love (see†), reflected in God's commands, obedience to which is determined by particular circumstances in the context of the 'orders of creation' (family, the State,* church,* culture* and economic life; see Economic Ethics †) that God has established to maintain a stable common life. While the Decalogue* and the Sermon on the Mount* are prime indications of the shape that God's commands of love take, we relate to God and to our neighbours in a free act of love, not out of a sense of duty or case law. Brunner was critical of Nazi and communistic totalitarianism, which he argued was ultimately based on positivism.

Though he was overshadowed by the more prolific Barth, Brunner's significance in the English-speaking world of the post-Second World War years should not be underestimated. Evangelicals have appreciated his thought, while wishing that he had better safeguarded the objective normativity of Scripture. Some critics have argued that he was closer to liberalism (see Liberalism, Theological*) than other neo-orthodox theologians.

Bibliography

The Divine Imperative (ET, London and New York, 1937); Dogmatics, 3 vols. (ET, London and Philadelphia, 1949, 1952, 1962); Man in Revolt (ET, London 1939); The Mediator (ET, London, 1934); 'Nature and Grace' in Natural Theology (ET, London, 1946); Truth as Encounter (ET, London and Philadelphia, 1964).

D.L.O.

BUCER, MARTIN (1491-1551). Born at Schettstadt (now Seléstat) in Alsace, Bucer became a Dominican friar at the age of fifteen and was also influenced by Erasmian humanism. He was won over by Martin Luther* at the Heidelberg disputation (1518), but went on to pursue a more independent path, attempting to mediate between Luther and Zwingli (1484-1531). He settled in Strasburg in 1523 and become one of the leaders of the church there. In 1549 he became Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, during the Edwardian reformation, and died there in 1551.

Two of Bucer's works are of especial importance here. His Von der waren Seelsorge ... (On the Care of Souls, 1538) is one of the most important 16th-century works on pastoral care. Bucer stresses the need for a plurality of leadership* within each church, since no one person can have all the gifts. These leaders should be chosen from across the social spectrum. He also discusses strategies of pastoral care to different groups within the church.

His last work was his De Regno Christi (The Kingdom of Christ), which he wrote in the final few months of his life. It was a comprehensive blueprint for the reformation of England, dedicated to Edward VI. In it Bucer covers not just ecclesiastical matters but ethical, social and political issues. These include poor relief, marriage* and divorce,* public education, employment policy and the penal system. By the 'kingdom of Christ' he understood a 'Christian commonwealth' in which the State is as concerned for the first as for the second table of the law (see Decalogue*).

Bibliography

Von der waren Seelsorge ..., in R. Stupperich (ed.), Martin Bucers Deutsche Schriften, vol. 7 (Gütersloh and Paris, 1964); The Kingdom of Christ, in W. Pauck (ed.), Melanchthon and Bucer, LCC 19. Selections in D. F. Wright (ed.), Common Places of Martin Bucer (Appleford, 1972).

W. P. Stephens, The Holy Spirit in the Theology of Martin Bucer (Cambridge, 1970).

A.N.S.L.

BUDDHIST ETHICS. The ultimate Buddhist value is achieving nirvana; to this religious value all moral value is subservient. Desire or craving is viewed as typically inherent in human existence until nirvana is achieved. Moral conduct (not to do evil, to do good, to purify the mind) serves as a means to nirvana. The layperson is expected to follow a morality that forbids such things as lying, stealing, killing and doing violence; the monk, male or female, is required also to practise chastity, abstinence from alcohol, and eating only what is offered in alms.

How nirvana itself is conceived varies from one Buddhist school to another. Interpretations of nirvana range from identifying it with sheer annihilation to saying that it is ineffable. If nirvana is the desired goal of persons, it is relevant to ask what a person is thought to be. Typically, a person at any one point in time is conceived as a bundle or collection composed of five sorts of states (matter, sensation, perception, predisposition and consciousness); over time a person is conceived as a series of bundles. There is often said to be a pre-nirvanic state that one obtains in this life (nirvana-with-residue), achievement of which guarantees attaining permanent nirvana (nirvana-without-residue) upon death. If craving is inherent in all of the states that comprise a person, and craving is inherently unsatisfactory, then nirvana is escape only if it is the annihilation of the person. The only question that then remains is whether what was the person in any sense survives. The early Theravada tradition seems typically to answer in the negative. Even so, the goal here is to become an arhat - one who has achieved enlightenment, which includes accepting the Buddhist account of personhood. The later Mahayana tradition countenances nirvana-with-residue states that are not viewed as inherently involved with craving and so as not intrinsically unsatisfactory. Here, the ideal is not the arhat but the bodhisattva who, upon achieving nirvana-with-residue, deliberately postpones achieving ultimate nirvana out of compassion for others whom one then strives to help to achieve nirvana-with-residue. For those varieties of Mahayana that view ultimate nirvana as identical to cycle of birth and rebirth, the final conclusion concerning personal survival seems the same as that to which Theravada came, but other Mahayana schools deny the identity of nirvana with this cycle.

Bibliography

E. Conze, Buddhism: Its Essence and Development (Oxford and New York, 1951); C. Humphreys, Buddhism (Harmondsworth, 1990).

K.E.Y.

BULIMIA, see EATING DISORDERS.

BULTMANN, RUDOLF (1884-1976), professor of theology at Marburg in Germany, was widely influential, during his lifetime, as a NT historical critic, exegete, and theologian.

Bultmann's theology

Strongly associated with the early, existentialist, philosophy of Martin Heidegger (1889-1976), Bultmann was perhaps most famous for his proposal that theologians 'demythologize' the NT. In his own work, demythologizing amounted to reading the NT documents as embodying, on the one hand, an antiquated world-view from which they must be delivered if we moderns are to understand them and, on the other hand, a message that we desperately need if we are to become authentic human beings. Thus demythologizing was regarded as a deeply practical and pastorally important activity. Through such an interpretation the NT documents would become able to speak to modern people who do not believe in a three-tiered universe, or miraculous divine interventions in natural processes, or the takeover of personalities by spirits (holy or otherwise). Once the mythological husk had been removed, the essential NT message of salvation - the 'kerygma' - could address modern people, calling them to decision and enabling them to become 'open to the future'. According to Bultmann's theology, such openness is what the NT calls faith.*

It may fairly be said that Bultmann's 'theology' is little more than a hermeneutical rationale for reading the philosophy of the early Heidegger into the NT. That philosophy is primarily a theory of human nature, and it says that we are essentially decision-makers. Of course it is banal to say that we make decisions, but what Bultmann's Heidegger has in mind is controversial: if we are decisionmakers, then we betray ourselves to the extent that we identify with anything that is fixed, given, past, established, permanent or objective. For example, if we think of God as a being who is really there, who hears our requests and has a plan for us, then identifying ourselves with this God - e.g. understanding ourselves as his children - is 'unauthentic'. Or if we identify ourselves in terms of Jesus' objective biography, pointing to that historical man as our saviour, then we have betrayed our true nature as decision-makers. Or again, whatever permanent virtues we may have - patience, compassion, courage, faith, hope or love - cannot be the true 'us'; we exist not in our dispositions, but only in our actions, and thus in the 'moment'. It is of course endemic to human beings that we violate our nature by thinking of ourselves in terms of what is fixed, enduring and past; this is what the NT calls sin. To be authentic is to be radically open to the 'future' understood as an arena of pure 'possibility' where nothing is given, established, fixed, etc. - where nothing is metaphysical, historical (in the standard sense of past) or psychological.

Ethical and pastoral implications

What consequences would a consistent implementation of Bultmann's theology have for the ethical and spiritual life of a congregation? A Bultmannian pastor would do nothing aimed at instilling Christian character-traits in his or her parishioners, nor would he attempt to mobilize the congregation in the interest of social change. As Bultmann remarks, 'God's demand... aims neither at the formation of "character" nor at the molding of human society' (Theology of the New Testament, vol. 1, p. 19). The reason for this is obvious from what was said above: Christian spirituality,* on Bultmann's account, is a matter of dissociating oneself from one's character-traits or from any objective results that one's actions may achieve. It is found purely in affirming oneself as a decision-maker and thus transcending any such 'actualities'. The pastor does not aim at any permanent transformation of persons, but instead presents the kerygma moment by moment to elicit 'decisions' which in the next moment must be remade on pain of slippage into unauthenticity. The classical Christian view, that pastoral work consists in fostering the Christian virtues- in the members of the congregation, and the Calvinist view, that the pastor is to lead the congregation in the transformation of the social order, are quite directly denied, on the principles of this theology.

Bibliography

Kerygma and Myth: A Theological Debate (ET, London, 1962 and 1964; New York, 1964); Theology of the New Testament, 2 vols. (ET, New York, 1951 and 1955; London, 1952 and 1955); R. C. Roberts, Rudolf Bultmann's Theology: A Critical Interpretation (Grand Rapids, 1976; London, 1977); W. Schmithals, An Introduction to the Theology of Rudolf Bultmann (ET, London and Minneapolis, MN, 1968).

R.C.R.

BUNYAN, JOHN (1628-88), tinker, preacher and author, was born in Elstow, near Bedford. Although his formal education was slight, he possessed an inquiring mind and a lively imagination. During the early 1650s he underwent various spiritual crises which he later graphically described in one of the classics of Puritan autobiography, Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666). The author of more than sixty books, Bunyan published in 1678 his famous allegory The Pilgrim's Progress, which for generations was the work, next to the Bible, most deeply cherished in English-speaking homes, and earned for him a unique place in Eng. literary history. The allegory also channelled the Puritan spirit into the main stream of the English tradition.

In theology Bunyan adhered essentially to the Calvinist tradition, but he was also indebted for various insights to the writings of Martin Luther* as well as to ideas from the Separatist tradition. Bunyan has been frequently called a Particular (i.e. he believed that Christ died for the elect only) Open Communion Baptist. In line with one strand of the Separatist tradition, he was open-minded about different modes of baptism and was prepared to admit persons to church membership on the basis (only) of a credible profession of faith (hence 'Open Communionist'). Bunyan gave a clear exposition of his theology in The Doctrine of the Law and Grace Unfolded (1659).

His prose writings focused primarily on theology, doctrine, church government and church worship, but showed equal concern with the implications of biblical teaching for personal living. Christian Behaviour (1663), belonging to a group of numerous, popular 17th-century manuals of conduct (see Puritans, Pastoral Counselling of*), emphasized the need for strong families and the role of fathers and their relation to all family members, including servants. It also stressed a view of economics which attacks the profit motive.

The Life and Death of Mr Badman (1680) unfolded Bunyan's most detailed treatment of ethical concerns (see Puritan Ethics*). Without discussing complexities, he pointed up numerous problems, such as abused women, sexual promiscuity, deception in business ventures, cultural mores as standards for living, greed, extortion, inequity in distribution of goods, hypocrisy and compromise, and books that set 'fleshly lusts on fire'. For Bunyan, godly living grounded in sound theology embodies transformation in society.

B.B.

BUREAUCRACY AND ORGANIZATION. Organization is the central concept for groups of people who are working together to realize goals. It includes as subsidiary concepts bureaucracy, management,* business, operations research and automation. It has gone through stages of development which reveal different priorities and frames of reference.

The idea of bureaucracy was first used in the late 18th century and was understood as rule by officials. The most famous historical example was in China, where from the Emperor downwards a vast educated army of officials ordered the society throughout many dynasties. An oftnoted characteristic of political bureaucracies was that, far from just administering orders, they accrued responsibility and executive power to themselves. Rulers came and went, but administrators carried on. This raised the underlying spectre of bureaucracy: officers who are selfserving make rules for their convenience, thus creating institutionalized behaviour. Centralized states, like those of Socialist Eastern Europe, have faced this problem acutely.

Max Weber (1864-1920) pushed the analysis of bureaucracy further. He used the concept to describe not just political organization, but also industrial and business complexes. They all, he argued, had a common structure: tight job descriptions specifying duties, an office hierarchy, the use of files, specialized training, meritocratic appointment, the primacy of administrative concern, and a specialized system of rules. He saw it as the central modern 'rational' way of responding to any large-scale task. This model at first seemed to dominate the development of modern organizations.

However, it had limitations. Adolf A. Berle (1895-1971) and Gardiner C. Means (1896-1988) - who developed the idea of managerial capitalism (see The Modern Corporation and Private Property, New York, 1968) pointed out that businesses may have more than one goal, e.g. both expansion and the maximization of profit, which compete within an organizational structure. The famous Hawthorne Works studies, carried out by Elton Mayo (1880-1949), showed that workers often did not share management aims at all. This led to a recognition of formal and informal structures within organizations, often working at cross-purposes. A deeper challenge came at the Nuremburg War Crimes Trials, which underlined officials' responsibility for all orders carried out. Later, W. H. Whyte's (1917-) book The Organization Man graphically posed the problem of conformity. This raised deeper questions about the values and principles which are supported by all members of an organization, not just by those at the top.

As management studies developed, they also moved away from a rigid bureaucratic model. P. F. Drucker (1909-) and others showed that the central directive model was not applicable to many kinds of production and service industries. Hierarchies were reversed. Often the unit providing the service or developing the product had to lead the managers. Also called into question was the assumption of organizational economies of scale. Charlie Chaplin (1889-1977) in the film Modern Times (1936), and E. F. Schumacher (1911-77) in the book Small is Beautiful (London, 1973), popularized the idea that intimacy in industry might be good, and now Volvo, ICI, and many other companies have built smaller work units into their structures. The personal meaning of work* was accorded respect, rather than just functional output.

Another critique of organizational development came from Jacques Ellul.* He argued that technique, the process of realizing goals, came to dominate organizations to the extent that it transformed the goals. The means became the end. Organizations could be wrapped up in efficient production to the exclusion of considering the value of what they were producing. Arms manufacturers could generate wars, not prevent them. This brought out the importance of the deeper values and commitments of organizations, and moved critique beyond efficiency to Christian and other faith commitments.

At the same time, much organizational theory developed in supposedly neutral scientific ways, which established criteria for efficiency which were objective and could be measured. Some of these were behavioural, and in the late 20th-century systems of incentives have supposedly created the best basis for maximizing efficiency. Yet alongside intense career structures are patterns of stress,* burnout and relocation, which suggest that many of the issues which arise in organizations are wider than considered by those who organize them. Relating them to families, community (see Community Ethics†), environment* and the wider economy requires the kind of awareness which few organizations handle well. Feminist* critiques have shown how male-centred many conceptions of organizations have been.

Finally, postmodernist (see Modernity and Postmodernity*) critics like Michel Foucault (1926-84) argue that organizations which believe they are operating on rational terms can be seen from other perspectives as irrational or mad. Military elites think in terms of efficiently killing millions of people, the prison service in terms of making people passive and docile, and industrialists in terms of selling people things they would otherwise not want. This opens up a more radical questioning of the purposes of organizations.

Christian contributions and systematic work in organization theory have been limited, with the noted exception of Ellul and Schumacher.

Bibliography

M. Douglas, How Institutions Think (Syracuse, NY, 1986; London, 1987); P. F. Drucker, The Practice of Management (San Francisco, 1954; London, 1955); J. Ellul, The Technological Society (1954; ET, New York, 1964, and London, 1965); M. Foucault, Madness and Civilisation (ET, London, 1967); M. Savage and A. Witz (eds.), Gender and Bureaucracy (Oxford and Cambridge, MA, 1992); D. Silverman, The Theory of Organisations (London, 1970); M. Weber, Economy and Society (Berkeley, CA, 1978); W. H. Whyte, The Organization Man (New York, 1956; London 1957).

A.S.

BURIAL AND CREMATION. Along with burial at sea, inhumation (placing a corpse in the humus or earth) and cremation (burning up a corpse and reducing it to ash) are ways to dispose reverently of the body of a deceased person.

Historical and cultural variations

Homer's Gk. heroes (like Buddhist priests and Tibetan high lamas) were cremated as a sign of great honour, whereas in ancient Egypt the honoured corpse was preserved for the afterlife by embalming. First-century Rome (like 11th-century Scandinavia when the gospel arrived there) saw a change from cremation to burial. Since cremation became legal in England in 1884, there has been a growth in the numbers of cremations, especially since the 1940s. In 1988, in Britain 70% of deceased people were cremated, 57% in Switzerland, 15% in the USA, and 1% in Catholic Italy (D. J. Davies, Cremation Today and Tomorrow, p. 6). Variation within a nation was as marked as differences between nations (in the USA: Nevada 56%, Alabama 2%), reflecting different experiences of community (T. Walter, Funerals and How to Improve Them, ch. 2).

Burial places in city or country alike have become 'shrines'. Graves in English country churchyards (D. L. Edwards, Christian England, p. 27) and in Japanese rural cemeteries are alike decorated for special religious festivals (Walter, p. 197). Urbanization* and secular modernity threaten this close connection between the living and their dead, and between our physical existence and spiritual meaning.

Burial and Christian origins

Death followed by burial (perhaps in a family tomb, Gn. 35:29) is the usual biblical pattern (e.g. Gn. 35:20). To be unburied is undignified (Na. 3:3; Rev. 11:9). The 'cremation' of Saul and his sons was exceptional (1 Sa. 31:12) and the burning of bodies and bones was a shameful abuse (Am. 2:1). The burials of Lazarus (Jn. 11) and Jesus (Jn. 19:38-42) seem to have followed common practice. The demand upon descendants to bury the dead is relativized by the demands of the kingdom (Lk. 9:60), and no attempt is made to honour the place where Jesus was buried, because his resurrection* (and the resurrection of the believer) became the controlling hope (1 Thes. 4:14a).

The historically 'accidental' fact that Jesus was buried (and raised to life), reinforced by the sacraments of baptism and communion (e.g. Rom. 6:1-4), was a factor initially prejudicing Christians towards burial. Early Christians were buried together (sometimes near the tomb of a martyr), reflecting the solidarity of the new family 'in Christ'.

Perspectives for pastoral practice

1. The finality of death (see Death and Dying*) is emphasized as a body is lowered into a grave, symbolism which has important ritual functions for grieving relatives. However, at the crematorium, the body usually disappears at the 'committal', to await incineration. The symbolism of destroying fire is thereby hidden. Do traditional funeral liturgies (designed for burial) 'fit' this new symbolism, especially as the ashes are interred on a separate occasion? The whole process of cremation may suggest Gk. ideas of an immortal soul (Davies, pp. 30-35) rather than the Christian doctrine of the resurrection body. Davies (pp. 42-45) offers a revised liturgy with this in mind, though ambiguity in how people interpret events almost inevitably remains (Walter, p. 282).

2. Obituaries in city newspapers, or epitaphs in a country graveyard, also illustrate this ambiguity. Three common epitaphs are: 'He only takes the best'; 'Until we meet again re-united'; and 'Requiescat' (short for Requiescat in pace [or RIP], meaning 'May he [or she] rest in peace'). All three express the need to understand why a death has occurred, the hope of a future reunion and the (Christian) assurance that the dead lie at rest 'in Christ'. However, such popular sentiment may overlook the heart of the gospel, so that 'judgment', being 'at home' in the presence of God, and even the finality of death (albeit at present being asleep, 1 Thes. 4:13ff.; 'cemetery' in Gk. Means sleeping-place) are overlooked.

3. Pastoral care treasures the memory of life and seeks hope* while facing the mystery of death. The choice between cremation and burial (including having access to adequate information, and overcoming any fear of fire that may prejudice a decision) can be made in advance. Thus energy can be focused on death's significance rather than on its form.

Bibliography

A. Billings, 'Obituaries and Pastoral Care', Con 1, 1989, pp. 25-39; D. J. Davies, Cremation Today and Tomorrow (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1990); D. L. Edwards, Christian England, vol. 1 (London, 1989), pp. 27, 50; T. Walter, Funerals and How to Improve Them (London, 1990).

G.O.S.

BURN-OUT, see STRESS.

BUSINESS ETHICS, see ECONOMIC ETHICS.†

BUTLER, JOSEPH (1692-1752). From a Presbyterian family, Butler became an Anglican and entered Oriel College, Oxford, in 1714. He was ordained in 1718 and his preaching won him a reputation for unusual scholarly ability. Moving to a parish near Durham he lived quietly insulated from all but his pastoral duties as he prepared his famous Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature (1736).

He was made Bishop of Bristol in 1738 and is said to have declined an offer to be Archbishop of Canterbury on the grounds that 'it was too late for him to try to support a falling church'. Later he did accept the appointment as Bishop of Durham (1750). His writings, especially the Analogy, became the outstanding work against the Deists, and the moral philosophy contained in his sermons was even more lastingly effective, as it became part of the curriculum at both Cambridge and Oxford.

The Analogy is free from any polemical bitterness and is characterized by a cautious and admirably restrained logic. It shows nature to contain precisely the same kind of difficulties that are found in revelation; thus the Deists' confidence in nature and their discarding of revelation is unfounded. Butler's argument assumes the validity of theism and the immortality of the soul (a priori). He argues from this that on the grounds of empirical evidence there is a governance of the world which encourages virtue, discourages vice, and implies the logical probability of ultimate congruity between moral duty* and self-interest. Both nature and revelation* are seen by analogy to proceed from the same Author.

Butler's rational and philosophical defence of orthodoxy against the Deists was in remarkable contrast to his contemporary, John Wesley,* to whom he complained, 'Sir, the pretending to extraordinary revelations and gifts of the Holy Ghost is a horrid thing, a very horrid thing.' Wesley's reply was to insist that there were no extraordinary revelations but only 'what every Christian may receive and ought to expect and to pray for'.

Butler's appreciation of the imperfect apprehension of human knowledge of truth was much more realistic than that of the Deists but the tragic human capacity for positive evil is unacknowledged. This may explain his confidence in reason* and nature rather than in redemption (see Sin and Salvation†) and grace.* He once asked his chaplain, Josiah Tucker, if public bodies might not go mad as well as individuals, adding that nothing else would account for most of the transactions of history.

It has been remarked of Butler's teaching that such a gospel will never save a sinner, and it is true that his sermons are largely characterized by the absence of biblical exegesis, kerygmatic content and soteriological concern. However, given Butler's assumptions (not always acknowledged), the ability of conscience,* religiously informed in its role in establishing virtue under orderly supervision of Providence, is still able to evoke confidence in Christian moral teachings as it did for John Henry Newman (1801-90).

Bibliography

A. A. Carlsson, Butler's Ethics (The Hague, 1964); W. E. Gladstone (ed.), The Works of Joseph Butler, 3 vols. (London, 1896); E. C. Mossner, Bishop Butler and the Age of Reason (New York, 1936); I. T. Ramsey, Joseph Butler (London, 1969).

C.F.A.

C

CALLING, see VOCATION.

CALVIN, JOHN (1509-64). Born in France on 10 July 1509, Calvin became the chief Reformer of Geneva, where he died on 27 May 1564. His major contribution was the exposition of a type of Protestant theology which is called 'Reformed' or 'Calvinistic'.

Calvin's theology is a permanent resource for Christian reflection. Its pastoral context is Geneva, where Calvin laboured from 1536 to 1564 (except for the important Strasburg years 1536-41) as pastor, preacher, teacher and writer. The reformer of both church and city life, Calvin emphasized the vocation* of all people, with their variety of gifts, to glorify God in every area of life, and he worked to transfer the governance of the church into the hands of pastors and elders.

Unfortunately, the popular view is that Calvin was a 'theo-logician' who taught the absolute sovereignty of God with such conviction that he did not shrink from deducing the corollary doctrine of double predestination. In the latter, human freewill and responsibility virtually disappear before the divine decrees of eternal election for some and eternal reprobation for others. Calvin certainly believed salvation is directly attributable to God's grace alone, but predestination is not his 'central dogma'. Calvin's exposition of 'union with Christ' may be taken as a more basic and comprehensive standpoint from which to evaluate his theological contribution.

The final edition of his masterwork, the Institutes of the Christian Religion (1559), contains four books. In Book One, entitled 'The Knowledge of God the Creator', Calvin rejects speculation about the 'being' of God in favour of what God reveals concerning his will. God is known to us as the creator of all things visible and invisible. Moreover, God continues to care for all that he has made. Therefore events do not occur by necessity or fate, nor do they happen by fortune or chance. Instead, Christians are to understand, and be comforted by, the fact that God governs everything. Thus God's all-encompassing providence requires the firm assertion that in both prosperity and adversity we deal with the God who loves us and became incarnate to save us.

Since Calvin believes that God is revealed first as creator and secondly as redeemer, Book Two deals with the knowledge of Jesus Christ, the mediator and redeemer. The opening five chapters describe human sin. Calvin accepts the traditional doctrine of original sin,* but his primary focus is on actual sin which results in our 'total depravity'. Calvin did not teach that we are as evil as we could possibly be, or that there is no goodness in us. Total depravity means that even our virtues are not exempt from the encroachment of sin.

According to Calvin, the fact of sin is evident, and redemption from it is provided in Jesus Christ, but no theoretical explanation of sin is possible. The cause of sin is unbelief, but, in the light of God's omnipotence and omniscience, the origin of sin is 'adventitious', which means that no reason can be given for its existence. Having rejected the concept of chance in his doctrine of providence, Calvin seems to assert it in his doctrine of sin!

Following the section on sin, Calvin deals with the scriptural disclosure of redemption in the OT and NT under the themes of law and gospel (chapters 6 to 11), insisting that salvation was always to be sought in Christ alone, and that God's grace precedes the promulgation of the law* and the recognition of human inability to fulfil God's commandment.

In addition to a description of the threefold work of Christ as prophet, king and priest, Calvin expounds the traditional view of Jesus* Christ as one person in two natures: human and divine. However, while affirming the deity of Christ, Calvin also places a strong emphasis on the eternal humanity of Christ. His commentary on Gal. 3:13 states that in Christ's human nature there are two things to be considered: 1. that in himself Christ was the sinless Son of God; and 2. that he took our place and became a sinner.

Having dealt with what God does for us as creator (Book One) and redeemer (Book Two), Calvin maintains that what God has done for the world is useless unless the Holy Spirit* applies salvation to us. Thereupon Calvin explains what God does in us as individuals (Book Three) and as a community (Book Four).

According to Calvin, the principal work of the Holy Spirit is the gift of faith,* which is chiefly explained in terms of two interlocking sets of 'double graces': regeneration and justification; and prayer and predestination.¹ Regeneration (or sanctification) means that on the basis of faith, the individual is both encouraged and enabled to do good works and to become more Christlike each day. Justification means that in Jesus Christ our sins are forgiven once for all. Good works are not the cause of justification. Rather, because of our justification, God expects good works from us. 2. The second set of 'double graces' contains prayer, which Calvin defines as 'the chief exercise of faith' (see his commentary on Eph. 6:18) and predestination (or eternal election), the humble exposition of the believer's experience of the gift of faith.

Each of these doctrines exalts the sovereign grace of God but in different ways. Regeneration and prayer have a 'humanly active' component, while justification and predestination are 'humanly passive'. In Book Four, Calvin treats the redeemed community: the church's ministry, sacraments and relation to civil government.

At the beginning of the Institutes, John Calvin declares that wisdom consists of the knowledge of God and of ourselves. However, Calvin does not develop a doctrine of the 'separate self'. We know ourselves truly only in terms of our union with Jesus Christ. Calvin did not produce a system of theology in which all the doctrines are logically consistent and may be rationally defended. Rather, he expounded a systematic theology where each doctrine receives careful reflection in terms of Scripture for the purpose of Christian understanding and obedience.

See also: HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN ETHICS.†

Bibliography

The Institutes of the Christian Religion, LCC 20-21.

E. Doumergue, Jean Calvin: Les hommes et les choses de son temps, 7 vols. (Lausanne, 1897-1927); R. Stauffer, The Humanness of John Calvin (ET, Nashville, TN, 1971); W. Walker, John Calvin: The Organizer of Reformed Protestantism, 1509-1564 (London, 1906; repr. New York, 1969); F. Wendel, Calvin: The Origins and Development of his Religious Thought (ET, New York and London, 1963).

C.P.

CALVINISTIC ETHICS. John Calvin* did not prize novelty. He cared less for originality than for fidelity to the gospel. He celebrated the veracity and authority of Scripture and acknowledged his indebtedness to Augustine,* Martin Luther,* Martin Bucer* and others. But his achievements as a theologian, biblical commentator, pastor and churchman left such a distinctive mark that the tradition sometimes called Reformed or Presbyterian is also sometimes called simply Calvinism, and contemporary Calvinistic ethics continues to find in his work a source and standard.

Among the distinctive features of Calvin's account of the moral life are his emphasis on piety or the religious affections, his positive assessment of the role of the law* as a guide for gratitude, his account of the Christian life as sharing in Christ and in his cross* and resurrection,* his concern for discipline in the church, his representative polity for the church, his positive but limited approval of a civil government* independent of the church, and his acceptance of economic change in the 16th century.

Piety, Calvin wrote, is 'reverence joined with love of God' (Institutes I.ii.1). It is evoked by the presence and power of God. Piety was central to Calvin's theology and to his ethics. Without it there is no genuine knowledge of God; with it people willingly serve God. Piety is not the pretentious display of religion or 'great ostentation in ceremonies' (I.ii.2), which Calvin despised as much as anyone; it is an attitude of reverence and trust, a sense of dependence and gratitude, a readiness to 'observe his authority ... , advance his glory, and obey his commandments' (I.ii.2).

'The natural order was that the frame of the universe should be the school in which we learn piety' (II.vi.1), but rebellion had dulled human senses, and the law was given as a schoolmaster to lead sinners to repentance and to provide for civic righteousness, to lead the proud to humility, and to restrain the licentious (II.vii.6-11). 'The third and principal use' of the law, however, is to teach believers 'a purer knowledge of the divine will' and to arouse them to obedience (II.vii.12; see *Law, Uses of).

The moral law is dependent upon God and upon the meaning and value built into the world by God's creative and sustaining power. And the law is instrumental; it leads to confrontation with the righteousness of God and so, finally, to Christ.

Precisely because it is instrumental, there must be - and is - some natural awareness of the law, an 'inward law' or 'natural law' (II.viii.1, see also II.ii.12-13). God has provided us with a written law as a remedy for 'our dullness and our arrogance' (II.viii.1).

In his treatment of the Decalogue,* Calvin begins with that natural awareness, with particular prohibitions of actions so 'frightful and wicked' that 'our senses might shudder' at the hearing of them (II.viii.10), and he moves by a series of inferences involving synecdoche, intention and contraries (II.iii.8) to other prohibitions and other prescriptions until he reaches finally the dispositions to love God and the neighbour.

The moral law is never disowned or abrogated for Calvin: the gospel holds us to the moral law. But Calvin's treatment of the Christian life in 'The Golden Booklet' (III.vi-x) is not simply identical with the Decalogue. There he begins with our participation in Christ's cross and resurrection by faith. Mortification* and vivification train the Christian for self-denial (III.vii), for cross-bearing (III.viii) and for meditation on the future life (III.ix). These traits enable us to live in the present world with a certain nonchalance, with moderation, and with love for the neighbour (III.x). This account of the Christian life holds Christians to their natural duties in conduct while it surpasses and transforms them by formation of character (see†) according to the pattern of Christ.

For Calvin discipline* was not one of the 'marks of the church', but a discipline which functioned firmly, kindly and equitably was necessary lest the head of the church be dishonoured, the good be corrupted, and the offenders be complacent in unrighteousness (IV.xii.1-13).

In ecclesiastical and in civil government, Calvin rejects both anarchy* and tyranny. He prefers plural authorities and representative governments, insisting on 'the consent of the people' (IV.iii.15, IV.iv.10) in ecclesiastical offices and recommending 'a system compounded of aristocracy and democracy' (IV.xx.8) for civil governments.

Calvin affirmed the legitimate authority of civil government, distinguishing it from spiritual governance, but expecting it not only to maintain 'humanity' (IV.xx.3), 'freedom' (IV.xx.8) and 'equity' ('the goal and rule and limit of all laws', IV.xx.16) but also 'to cherish and protect the outward worship of God, (IV.xx.2). He calls civil authority 'the most honourable of all callings' (IV.xx.4) and calls upon the authorities to fulfil their vocation as 'deputies of God' (IV.xx.6). Citizens are to obey their rulers, even unjust ones (IV.xx.23, 24), but Calvin calls upon 'lower magistrates' to oppose the corruption of tyrants and to 'restrain the willfulness of kings' (IV.xx.31).

In the economic order, Calvin broke with the ancient tradition - both biblical and Aristotelian - which prohibited interest* on loans. He prohibited excessive interest, however, and regarded any interest on loans to the poor as excessive. The inner-worldly asceticism* of Calvin and the dispositions of diligence in one's calling and moderation in one's consumption prompted the development of modern capitalist economies in Calvinistic societies (according to Max Weber [1864-1920] at any rate).

No Calvinistic ethic simply repeats Calvin; there is always, however, some selective retrieval from his work. The emphasis on piety was developed in different ways by Jonathan Edwards* and F. D. E. Schleiermacher* (and recently by James Gustafson, 1925-) and virtually ignored by some others. The account of the law has been retrieved in a variety of ways. Some Calvinists of the Enlightenment*so emphasized the natural and rational moral order that Scripture became nearly expendable, while some others so emphasized the positive law of Scripture that both natural moral wisdom and commitment to the law-giver might be ignored. Some Calvinists have interpreted Calvin's account of civil government along authoritarian lines, but many more (e.g. Theodore Beza, 1519-1605, and Samuel Rutherford, 1600-61) interpreted it in ways which contributed to the development of constitutional democracies.

In spite of Weber's account of the link between Calvinism and capitalism,* many Calvinists have found grounds to challenge not only the autonomy of the economic order but also the assumption about an invisible hand and any single-minded devotion to profit* as economic goal in Calvin's notions of stewardship* and distribution, tested as they are by 'the rule of love' (III.vii.5, III.x.5).

See also: STATE.

Bibliography

J. Calvin, The Institutes of the Christian Religion, LCC 20-21; J. Leith, John Calvin's Doctrine of the Christian Life (Philadelphia, 1989); A. E. McGrath, A Life of John Calvin: A Study in the Shaping of Western Culture (Oxford and Cambridge, MA, 1990); J. T. McNeill, The History and Character of Calvinism (New York, 1954).

A.D.V.

CANNABIS, see DRUGS.

CANNIBALISM, the killing and eating, in part or in whole, of the flesh and vital organs of fellow human beings, has occurred in different societies for different reasons. In many cultures it has been part of the practice of warfare. The Iroquois Indians, after torturing their prisoners, killed them and ate their remains in cannibalistic feasts. This terrible practice seems to have rested on the belief that to eat the enemy is to derive strength from his annihilation.

Cannibalism was often the outcome of ritual sacrifice to the gods. The Aztecs ritually slaughtered great numbers of prisoners, offering the heart to the sun, before they were eaten.

In other cultures, cannibalism has been practised in times of famine. In central Australia Ngali and Yumu women have aborted fetuses in order to feed children, or have killed small children in order to feed older siblings. Cannibalism has also been resorted to in cities under prolonged siege (cf. 2 Ki. 6:26-29).

Cannibalism involving murder is clearly ruled out by the sixth commandment (Ex. 20:13); less clear, from the ethical standpoint, is the eating of bodies of persons already dead as a result of starvation or accident (as in the famous case of sixteen Uruguayan survivors of a plane crash in the Andes in 1973). It could be argued that in principle the only difference between such a situation and the use of organs of a hopelessly brain-damaged person in transplant surgery* is that the consent of near relatives is not involved (though survivors of the Andean plane crash have said that they gave consent for their bodies to be eaten should they die). Yet respect for the mortal remains of the deceased, engendered by centuries of Christian teaching, must not be easily set aside, extreme though circumstances may be.

Bibliography

M. Harris, Cannibals and Kings: The Origins of Cultures (Glasgow, 1978); R. Tannahill, Flesh and Blood (New York, 1975).

D.P.K.

CAPITALISM. The term 'capitalism' relates to a system of organizing economic life and production. Its definition and use tend to vary with the biases of the user. It is treated by some historians as a historical category (Max Weber, 1864-1920; R. H. Tawney; Karl Marx*), which emerged in a time sequence, after feudalism, around the 16th century in Europe.

Weber made the now famous link between the rise of Protestant Christianity and the development of new forms of economic organization called 'capitalism'. The change in world-view which accompanied Protestant Christianity encouraged hard work, diligence, the notion of vocation (that people could serve God in their everyday work), the virtue of saving, and the prudent use of gifts and resources. These were in contrast to the asceticism of Catholicism. Weber argued that these characteristics laid the foundation for business and profit-making to show enormous increase in countries where Catholicism was displaced. More recent historians have debated the timing of capitalism's emergence (K. Tribe, Genealogies of Capitalism) and have found its origins much earlier. There is also a debate over what is the essence of capitalism. Such work has implications for the priority given to Protestantism as a prime cause of introducing capitalism. However, on the whole, there is agreement that Protestant Christianity contributed to the enormous economic growth under capitalism in subsequent centuries.

Karl Marx has probably had the most influence on the definition of capitalism, and it is the Marxist link with capitalism which has made it value-loaded. For Marx, capitalism was a mode of production in which there were two main classes: the owners of the means of production, and wage labourers who were dependent on their labour power for subsistence. Capitalism, in Marx's theory, was an intermediate stage of economic organization before socialism and communism, which were deterministically predicted eventually to emerge. Authors influenced by Marx can differ with him on what is the essence of the capitalist mode of production: it can be the separation of consumption and production, or the rise of a dominant class supplying the capital necessary to employ a large number of workers. It is from Marxists that the idea has come that capitalism is a bad way of organizing economic life, and is unfair, unequal and in need of overthrow.

These historical writings form the background for the contemporary debates which occur over capitalism. Twentieth-century capitalism clearly rests on the freedom of individuals to produce and sell and to buy goods and services in markets which are largely cleared by allowing prices to fluctuate. On the one hand, there are those who think this is an ideal system such that they want to prevent any interference with it, especially State regulation. These libertarians often claim allegiance to Adam Smith's (1723-90) writing in The Wealth of Nations. This camp values, above all, the freedom of the individual which an unfettered capitalism brings. The inequalities which this system also entails are thought to be no bad thing and partly the outcome of people taking up the opportunities to prosper to varying degrees. Also, it is argued, everybody benefits from freely allowing those with exceptional entrepreneurial talents to exercise them. On the other hand, those who stress equality want to regulate markets to prevent those with more money oppressing those with less money and less power. They would like to see much more equality in resource ownership. In the extreme this regulation becomes a planned economy of the sort that used to exist in Eastern Europe. The obvious failure of planned economies to prosper or to remove gross inequalities has removed one of the extremes and a whole wing in this debate. It is now difficult to imagine anyone arguing for a planned economy and there is a universal acceptance that free markets need to be introduced into the former Soviet Union countries. However, the argument over the necessary level of State regulation in market economies will continue.

Judging the economic merits of these arguments is complex. It is possible to find Christian economists who align themselves to one or other of these camps. A useful discussion of these alternatives can be found in D. A. Hay, Economics Today, which seeks in chapter 4 to judge the arguments with a set of scriptural principles which Hay has previously outlined. Capitalism can be criticized for failing to have a concept of care for the natural order which the Scriptures mandate (see Environment*). It does allow individuals to exercise stewardship* through the rights attached to private property, but it fails to encourage the responsibilities which should go alongside, e.g. sharing the product with the poor. Capitalism fails to allow all to exercise stewardship through work opportunities or through influencing the running of their firm, and it encourages the idol of pursuing wealth for its own sake. No doubt market economies which also tried to build on Christian social values would come closer to fulfilling scriptural principles than do the contemporary examples; but then so would the other ways of organizing our economic life. There is clearly much scope for Christians to advocate changes which would improve the capitalist system. Both Hay in Economics Today and Alan Storkey in Transforming Economics have suggested some of these ways.

Bibliography

D. A. Hay, Economics Today (Leicester, 1989); A. Storkey, Transforming Economics: A Christian Way to Employment (London, 1986); R. H. Tawney, Religion and the Rise of Capitalism (London, 1926); K. Tribe, Genealogies of Capitalism (London, 1981); M. Weber, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1904-05; ET, London, 1930).

S.D.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT is execution under legal authority as the penalty for a crime. It is an ancient form of punishment,* which has been applied to crimes* ranging from burglary to homicide to treason. It is currently used by few Western countries outside the US.

Christians are divided on whether biblical teaching supports use of this sanction. For some, OT provisions establishing the death penalty demonstrate its acceptability. Others look to the words and deeds of Jesus, and conclude that it is forbidden. Still others emphasize the importance of the practical dimensions of deterrence (see Deterrence, Nonnuclear*) or risk of mistake.

It is perhaps helpful to consider this issue by addressing three questions, each of which leads logically to the next:

1. Is capital punishment mandated, prohibited or permitted?

a. Those who believe that biblical teaching mandates the death penalty do so on the grounds that life is sacred (see Sanctity of Human Life*), and that those who take another life, or place it in great peril, must lose theirs. They cite the divine command of Noah after the Flood: 'Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God has God made man' (Gn. 9:6). This principle was reflected in the law of Moses, which ordained execution for eighteen offences (including several which did not involve homicide, e.g. rape, cf. Dt. 22:25-27). Several NT passages (e.g. Rom. 13:1-7) imply its continued appropriateness.

b. Those who conclude that biblical teaching prohibits the death penalty argue that the OT arguments supporting this sanction are superseded by NT developments. (i) They note that Israel was a unique nation, a theocracy* ruled directly by God, with unique laws. When Israel ceased to be a nation, its law was nullified. (ii) Christ's death and resurrection ended the requirement for blood recompense and blood sacrifice. His incarnation made it unnecessary to execute murderers in order to establish human dignity and value. (iii) Christ's teaching emphasizes the need for forgiveness* and for suffering evil rather than resisting it by force. His behaviour towards the woman taken in adultery (Jn. 8) does not appear to be consistent with the belief that the death penalty is mandated.

c. There are those who argue that the Bible neither mandates, nor prohibits, but permits the death penalty: (i) They note the presence of the death penalty in OT law, and that its existence was assumed in the NT. Passages such as Rom. 13 are cited as evidence that the government has the authority to impose the death penalty, but not necessarily the obligation to do so. (ii) Both Testaments give illustrations of capital criminals who were not executed, clearly with divine approval. Examples include Cain, Moses, David and the woman taken in adultery. This suggests that use of the death penalty is discretionary, not mandated.

2. Under what conditions may a legal authority exercise capital punishment?

A review of OT law reveals that evidentiary and due-process protections were established to govern death-penalty cases. These include proportionality (Ex. 21:23-25); certainly of guilt established by two witnesses (Dt. 17:6; Nu. 35:30); intent (Nu. 35:22-24); due-process provisions including the cities of refuge which protected an accused until trial (Nu.35); individual responsibility (Dt. 24:16); fairness of legal proceedings regardless of economic standing in the community (Ex. 23:6-7); and restraint in imposing the death penalty (Ezk. 33:11).

Each of these is a principle, which means they must be implemented in a contemporary context different from that found in the OT. The principles are universal even though the specific applications found in the Mosaic law may not be.

3. How should legal authorities be guided in determining whether to impose the death penalty?

If the death penalty is permitted (not mandated or prohibited), and if the government has established procedures which comply with the principles noted above, should it exercise this power? Three reasons are typically given for doing so: a. General deterrence, the theory that when one person is punished other potential offenders will be discouraged from committing similar crimes. Whether capital punishment in fact deters in this way has been hotly contested. b. Specific deterrence, the theory that the executed offender will commit no further crimes. c. Retribution,* the theory that a proportionate penalty must follow an offence.

These issues must be weighed against the fact that death is irreversible. If an innocent person is mistakenly executed there is no remedy. Life's value is the very reason that the death penalty raises such troubling questions.

Bibliography

G. Archer, The Encyclopedia of Bible Difficulties (Grand Rapids, 1982); I. J. Kazis, 'Judaism and the Death Penalty', in H. A. Bedau (ed.), The Death Penalty in America (New York, 1964); o. O'Donovan, Measure for Measure: Justice in Punishment and the Sentence of Death (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1977); V. Poythress, The Shadow of Christ in the Law of Moses (Brentwood, TN, 1991); R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, NJ, 1973); E. van den Haag and J. Conrad, The Death Penalty: A Debate (New York, 1983); D. W. Van Ness, Crime and Its Victims (Downers Grove, IL, 1986; Leicester, 1989).

D.W.V.N.

CARDINAL VIRTUES, see CHARACTER;† VIRTUE AND VIRTUES.

CARE, CARING, stemming from Lat. cura, has a range of meanings which include grief, lament, concern, interest, attention, solicitude, cure, management, administration and guardianship. Recent popular use refers less to 'cares' as a noun with the sense of anxieties; it assimilates 'care' and 'affection'; it speaks of 'in care,' meaning under official oversight and protection; and it understands 'caring' increasingly to describe cherishing or helping, especially by charitable agencies or professional helpers such as medical practitioners, social workers and counsellors.

Government policy has focused attention on the relationship of care provided by the State and by voluntary bodies. With more attention given to training and literature informed by behavioural and social sciences and to the need for support for carers, voluntary carers have begun to shed their 'tea and sympathy' image and are now becoming better informed, more aware of potential problems in caring relationships, and alert to the dangers of stress* and 'burn-out'.

Old Testament social instructions - particularly Deuteronomic concern for the poor, widows, orphans and strangers, and for almsgiving, harvest gleaning and the year of jubilee - and prophetic calls for social justice, belong to a context which emphasizes that Israel, graciously chosen by God, is to be a caring society. Love of God, who is persistently just, good, merciful and full of lovingkindness, means love of neighbour.

In the life of Jesus, his compassionate attitude, healings and other acts, and in his total, sacrificial self-giving, the character of God as gracious is revealed with new depths of meaning. The parables of the good Samaritan, the last judgment and other parables, and sayings of grace,* underline the connection between grace and care. This helps to explain why the first Christians sought to express care through evangelism, communal worship, sharing possessions, daily food distribution, a collection for those suffering from famine, and the ability to weep and to rejoice together. Their caring extended to the complete person, consistent with the integrated view of the person found in Scripture, and to all of life, in keeping with the wholeness of healing and salvation.

The Christian community is to 'love each other as I have loved you' (Jn. 15:12). The Fourth Gospel explains this love as the love the Father and the Son have for each other which extends to 'those who will believe' (Jn. 17:20, 23). Grounded in the love between Father and Son, caring becomes a comprehensive and enduring covenant.* This suggests that, though support for those in need is very important, and although there are specific individuals, problems or needs which require specialist contract care by professionals, caring begins at the basic, everyday level vital for personal worth. Caring belongs within loving, persisting relationship. It expresses the love and grace of God which both helper and helped experience and of which they both remain in constant and common need. It is mutually involving and supportive, encompassing life's normality as well as life's difficulties. It is of a piece with the love of Jn. 3:16 - costly, giving for the world, and loving to the end (Jn. 13:1) .

L.B.K.

CARE OF THE HANDICAPPED, see HANDICAPPED, CARE OF.

CARE OF THE HANDICAPPED NEWBORN, see ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE.†

CARE OF THE DYING, see DEATH AND DYING; ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE;† HOSPICE.

CAROLINE DIVINES. The term 'Caroline' is applied in Anglican studies to those theological writers who lived during the reigns of Charles I (1625 -49; b. 1600) and Charles II (1660-85; b. 1630).

Their writings include the magisterial sermons of Lancelot Andrewes (1555-1626); the metaphysical poetry of John Donne (1571 / 2-1631), George Herbert (1593-1633), Thomas Traherne (1636-74) and Henry Vaughan (1622-95); the moral theology of Ralph Cudworth (1617-88), Robert Sanderson (1587-1663) and Jeremy Taylor*; and the doctrinal works of William Beveridge (1639-1708), John Cosin (1594-1672), Joseph Hall (1574-1656), John Pearson (1612-86) and James Ussher (1581-1656). Together these formed a tradition of Anglican thought that has been widely regarded as manifesting the essence of Anglicanism (see Anglican Moral Theology*).

The Carolines' voluminous writings were characterized by appeal foremost to Scripture, to the early Church Fathers, and to reason,* in order to express the Christian faith in the 17th century. The beginnings of toleration and the roots of the Enlightenment* can be found especially in the second generation of Caroline divines, but there is a departure from the doctrinal and confessional commitments of the earlier generation.

The Tractarian experience of the 19th century gave great impetus to the study of these theological writers who, along with the patristic age, were seen as normative for Anglicanism, more so than the Anglican Reformers of the 16th century or the evangelicals of the 18th century. The Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology (Oxford, 1841-) reprinted and translated scores of volumes of Caroline divinity.

Bibliography

C. F. Allison, The Rise of Moralism: The Proclamation of the Gospel from Hooker to Baxter (Wilton, CT, 1965; London, 1966); H. R. McAdoo, The Spirit of Anglicanism (New York, 1965); P. E. More and F. L. Cross (eds.), Anglicanism (London, 1951); D. A. Scott, Christian Character: Jeremy Taylor and Christian Ethics Today (Oxford, 1991); B. Willey, The Seventeenth Century Background (London, 1946).

C.F.A.

CARTELS. A cartel is an agreement among competing enterprises to regulate competition in some way: e.g. among professional associations (architects, physicians, etc.); in establishing recommended prices and advertising standards; and as seen in OPEC (Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries), where a uniform price is set for oil production quotas assigned among its members. An important historical antecedent is the medieval guild system, and the ethical difficulties surrounding the guilds apply to contemporary cartels.

Competition generally provides benefits to society – lower prices, better service, wider selection and improved quality. The pressure of competition can lead to socially troubling realities, however: unjust working conditions, inappropriate advertising* and harm to the surrounding environment.* How then can the socially beneficial outcomes be obtained without incurring the harmful realities? Every society has opted for government oversight. Aggressive oversight in one direction, however, may create problems in the other, and thus reliance upon self-governance by members of some professions (see Professional Ethics*) or industries (i.e. cartels) therefore seems prudent. This train of analysis can explain the otherwise confusing reality of generally outlawing cartels but de facto allowing them in certain cases.

Whatever their professed intentions, cartels effect a concentration of economic power. The Mosaic legislation (and prophetic appeal) clearly finds dangers in such concentration (e.g. Dt. 17:16-20, Ezk. 45:7-12 and 46:16-18 restrict the power of the king; and Mi. 4:4 and Zc. 3:10 see the ideal economic order as free from the oppression that results from the concentration of economic power in few hands). The Bible also calls for just employment conditions and warns against misrepresentation in commercial dealings - realities often used to justify the necessity for common standards among members of a profession or industry (i.e. cartels).

The long historical experience with cartels however, from the Middle Ages (at least) to the present, is that self-regulation risks abuse of the public interest. Adam Smith's (1723-90) warning in 1776 rings true today: 'People of the same trade seldom meet together, even for merriment and diversion, but the conversation ends in a conspiracy against the public, or in some contrivance to raise prices.' Therefore, when cartels are allowed to function, they should be made accountable for their behaviour to the public in some well-defined way.

J.D.M.

CASTI CONNUBII, see PAPAL ENCYCLICALS.

CASUISTRY is a term derived from the Lat. casus ('case'), and refers to that part of moral theology which seeks to apply abstract moral principles to particular concrete cases. Thus it attempts to 'make real' Christian ideals in all spheres of human life, individual, social or professional.

While abstractly formulated moral principles can be readily understood intellectually, the problem arises when they have to be applied to individual cases which are essentially unique and complex. This is a necessary process if moral principles are to have any validity or meaning in informing and governing human behaviour. Casuistry seeks to bridge the gap between the abstract norm and the concrete act.

Casuistry is to be found in the NT (though Pharisaic casuistry had its origins in the intertestamental period). For example, in Mk. 2:23-28 Jesus' disciples, plucking ears of corn as they went through the corn-fields, were accused by the Pharisees of working on the sabbath. In their defence, Jesus quoted the example of David who, in the time of Abiathar the high priest, entered the Temple and ate the shewbread which only the priests could eat.

In Lk. 20:20-26, when Jesus was questioned as to whether it was lawful or not to pay tribute to Caesar, he replied, 'Give to Caesar what is Caesar's, and to God what is God's.' Paul had to deal with cases of conscience* when, for example, he was asked by the Corinthian Christians whether it was lawful to eat food sacrificed to idols (1 Cor. 8). In the patristic age, cases of conscience arose frequently in connection with the issues involved in military service, and persecutions. In all these cases attempts were made to apply general principles to particular situations.

With the development of auricular confession,* casuistry came to be formulated more specifically so that it could become a guide for confessors. Through typical cases, whether real or fictional, future confessors and counsellors were taught the correct way to handle moral principles. When the fourth Lateran Council in 1215 made annual confession and communion obligatory, a new impetus was given to casuistry as clerics had to be initiated into the solving of cases of conscience.

This gave rise to the need for written works, which was met by the production of manuals such as the Summae Confessorum. Later, it was obligatory for all clerics to take a course in casuistry, and other works were produced to fulfil this need. As a result casuistry was put on a more scientific basis as the principles of morality had to be analysed and clarified. The Institutiones Theologiae Moralis, produced in the 16th century, was the result of this process.

The great weakness of all these productions is that they arose out of a specific practical need and were designed to meet it. They enabled priests to be better prepared, but the inherent danger was that a rigid system could evolve which would deflect from personal reflection and undermine the very basis for casuistry as an aid to conscience. Whilst it guided the confessor in the process of administering forgiveness* and absolution,* it could easily limit itself to that without encouraging the desire and resolve to aim at a higher level of moral behaviour.

Protestant casuistry developed in the 17th century. Such books as Richard Baxter's* Christian Directory reflect this aspect of English Puritanism.

Casuistry degenerated in the mid-17th century when it separated itself in thought from concrete reality and sought to establish itself as an independent system. The failure to recognize that casuistry must form part of a total moral system led in the 18th century to a situation where moral theology was contained exclusively in predominantly casuistic manuals.

The renewal of moral theology since the Second World War has reinstated casuistry in its legitimate position as a valuable aid to conscience and not its replacement. It has to be recognized that it must remain part of moral theology to retain its usefulness and, even more important, it cannot divorce itself from concrete situations.

On the other hand, the advocates of situation ethics* have rejected it altogether since, by definition, case law refers to what was decided in a particular historical circumstance which excluded the personal details that made that case unique. Nevertheless, some would argue that it is still valuable since it can give some guidance to present and future cases of conscience. Others think that casuistry belongs to the sphere of jurisprudence* rather than to morality and is therefore inappropriate in decisions of conscience in the moral sphere.

See also: CHRISTIAN MORAL REASONING.†

P.T.

CATEGORICAL IMPERATIVE. Immanuel Kant* calls what he holds to be the supreme principle of duty* a ‘categorical imperative’. This principle provides a test for maxims (the prescriptions from which an agent acts), such that if a maxim can be willed in a way which satisfies the categorical imperative, then it is morally permissible for an agent to will that maxim. The principle is categorical, because it does not (unlike hypothetical imperatives) depend for its legitimacy upon any other ends we have. It is objective in the sense that a rational agent would necessarily act upon it if reason had full control over inclination.

Kant gives various formulations of this imperative, which he holds to be equivalent, but the most important are the following: 1. ‘Act only on that maxim through which you can at the same time will that it should become a universal law.’ 2. ‘Act in such a way that you always treat humanity, whether in your own person or in the person of any other, never simply as a means, but always at the same time as an end.’ Kant holds that agents are autonomous to the degree that they will in accordance with the categorical imperative, since they are then themselves (in their rational nature) making the law under which they are then bound.

Bibliography

I. Kant, Groundwork of the Metaphysic of Morals (ET, London, 31958), ch. 2.

J.E.H.

CATHOLIC MORAL TRADITION. The word ‘catholic’ means ‘universal’. So in theory our phrase means the moral tradition of the universal church. In practice, the phrase ‘Catholic moral tradition’ often stands for a particular strand of moral thinking within Christianity: Catholic as opposed to Protestant.

The first Christian centuries made no cut-and-dried distinction between theology, spirituality* and morality. Perceptions of the wisdom and desirability of prayer, fasting and almsgiving, and of virginity, arose at least at the conscious level from images of God and traditions about Jesus. The Fathers’ moral concerns had a mystical base (see Patristic Ethics*). The monastic pioneers sought to create an alternative world in which people could pursue oneness with God in Christ without being overwhelmed by the distractions and temptations of the world (see Monasticism*). This approach made headway in the Middle Ages, though in tension with the more reason-centred strand called ‘scholasticism’, which flourished with the recovery of Gk. philosophy and the rise of universities.

The patronage of Pope Leo XIII (1878-1903; b. 1810) at the end of the 19th century gave to the thought of Thomas Aquinas* (though often in a debased form) a status which his work had not enjoyed in medieval times. Nevertheless, the strength of the scholastic tradition which Aquinas represents was its rigorous pursuit of difficult questions in the conviction that reason aided by faith could illuminate them. In this connection it is noteworthy that the concept of natural law* is sometimes seen as the linchpin of Catholic moral tradition. Yet this concept has not had a uniformly central role. In Aquinas it occupies an insignificant place compared to his extended treatment of the virtues,* and yields in practice very modest results.

A quite different strand, the development from the 6th century onwards of the penitentials and the later growth of a highly sophisticated casuistry,* shows the extent to which the church’s thinking about morality came to centre on confessional practice, and specifically on the role of the confessor as judge of the gravity or otherwise of the sins confessed. This could be criticized for perpetuating infantilism in the penitent, and for fostering a sin-centred and juridical picture of Christian moral living.

It is often assumed that Catholic moral tradition is characterized by continuity and consistency (see Roman Catholic Moral Theology*), but even if the enquiry is confined to Roman Catholicism the reality is kaleidoscopic. Current mainstream teaching about the unequivocal goodness of human sexuality (see †) has not been the dominant view, despite Genesis and the Song of Songs. It was only at Vatican II (see Second Vatican Council*) that the principle of religious liberty, hitherto strongly denied, was espoused. To call these and other shifts developments rather than changes of mind strains credulity.

A factor militating against appropriation of the richness and diversity of Catholic moral tradition is the expansion since Vatican I of ‘creeping infallibility’ or infallibility by association. The moral teaching of the Catholic Church has come to be almost equated with detailed statements by recent popes.

A vital dimension of the Catholic tradition is the rooting of Christian behaviour in a perception of created reality as sacramental. Awareness of an awesome harmony and purposiveness, in all that is, founds a distinctive moral response - mystery-encountering rather than problem-centred. In contrast to a mechanistic view of sacramental grace, which evades moral responsibility, this approach concurs with John Wesley’s* view of the eucharist as ‘a converting ordinance’. Those who in eucharistic worship ‘proclaim the Lord’s death’ look to, and are fashioned and sustained by, the hope of that consummation towards which all creation is moving.

Catholic moral tradition is a developing commentary, necessarily inadequate and fragmentary, on human maturing in the light of Christian faith. This is the world of theological virtue rather than that of static moral principles and fixed authorities. Awakened sacramental perception and practice focus on horizons far beyond dependence on these things for the shaping of our personal identity as we become attuned to the resonances of the life, death and resurrection of Jesus in our own story.

See also: CHRISTIAN MORAL REASONING;† HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN ETHICS.†

Bibliography

J. Fuchs, Christian Morality: The Word Becomes Flesh (ET, Dublin and Washington, DC, 1987); J. Mahoney, The Making of Moral Theology (Oxford, 1987); S. Moore, The Inner Loneliness (London, 1982); P. Brown, The Body and Society (New York, 1988; London, 1989).

N.P.H.

CELIBACY, see SINGLENES.

CENSORSHIP is the procedure whereby publications are examined prior to publication, and banned if they contravene certain legally defined criteria.

Censorship is a two-edged sword, which when used wisely can establish the boundaries of decency and acceptability within a community, and when used capriciously, or more often, for political ends, can be a destructive and oppressive force at variance with principles of democracy as well as Christian respect for freedom.*

Historical accounts most commonly attend to the excesses and abuses which have arisen. Politically, censorship has been an instrument of totalitarian States wishing to impose conformity on its members, and this contrasts with the freedom-of-speech principles of democracies. In the religious tradition, strict censorship continues to be a feature of fundamentalist Muslim countries. In the Christian tradition, in the name of protecting orthodoxy against heresy, it was most evident in the Catholic development from the 16th century of the Index of Prohibited Books, revoked after Vatican II.

In more recent times the boundaries of obscenity in the depiction of sexuality (see †) and violence* have become the targets for change, with the case for moral restraint being set over against the desire for complete freedom of expression.

Where to draw the line

Because there are conflicting principles underlying the censorship debate, there will continue to be differences over where the line should be drawn between the acceptable and the unacceptable - how the distinctions shall be drawn, and who shall be empowered to decide. What needs to remain is the conviction that a line does have to be drawn somewhere, and the recognition that past (or even present) abuses of censorship do not provide a sufficient basis for its abolition. The novelist James Michener (1907-), whose novels have often been banned, is committed to free speech yet still maintains that ‘freedom of speech has limits’, and exemplifies this by reference to libel* laws, lying under oath, and production of child pornography.*

The long history of censorship by responsible governments would suggest that it can have a valuable role in the preservation of an orderly society, and the protection of individuals. The existence of what we now see to be oppressive decisions, as with the Roman called ‘Cato the Censor’ (234-c. 148 BC), the suppression of Tyndale’s translation of the Bible in 16th-century England, the burning of the works of Confucius in the Chin dynasty in China (250 BC), and the suppression of Dr Zhivago in Russia, highlights the dangers of abusing censorship for particular political ends.

When it comes to sexual obscenity, a series of ‘landmark’ decisions by the UK courts, such as ‘Lady Chatterly’s Lover’ (1960), ‘Fanny Hill’ (1963), and ‘Tropic of Cancer’ (1965) led to redefinition of the criteria for censorship and increasing pressure for its abolition.

The changing context

Pressures to push back or abolish the boundaries have increased in recent years, fuelled by several concurrent forces.

A loss of respect for authority* in favour of personal freedom of choice has flowed from developments in theology and psychology, and resulted in the ‘permissive society’. The concept of a socially unifying norm of belief and behaviour has been challenged by increasing invocation of a ‘pluralist’ society with no one defining set of norms, and hence no clear criterion for decision-making. This has been amplified by the undoubted change in the ethnic and religious mix of most Western countries. While the Christian tradition remains, it is surrounded by many vigorous alternatives demanding recognition. The abuse of censorship by totalitarian groups has caused many to see it as inimical to a free society and hence to become willing to throw out the baby with the bath water. Technological advances in the mass production of books, magazines, films, videos and other media have produced an unprecedented situation: control of the sources of information is no longer possible, and dissemination into every home can be achieved in a manner inconceivable only fifty years ago.

Censorship can best be seen as a means of last resort, while other strategies pose fewer problems. The guidelines proposed by S. V. Monsma in 1990 are helpful: 1. freedom of artistic expression does not mean the right to produce anything without any restrictions whatsoever; 2. legally imposed restraints should be distinguished from withholding of public funds. Refusal to fund is different from censorious restriction; 3. legally imposed restraints should be distinguished from economic and social pressures. Demonstrations, lobbying and buying elsewhere are powerful forms of expression; and 4. in some situations, the extreme step of government restriction (i.e. censorship) may be needed.

Changing responses

In determining how to respond to such principles in the light of major social changes, one shift has been towards establishing the principles which might govern rational censorship decisions. The concept of harm, derived from the utilitarianism (see Consequentialism*) of John Stuart Mill,* served as a focus for the Williams Report on Obscenity and Pornography (1979). The debate then rages around what we mean by harm, and to whom, and how to balance degrees of harm over against potential benefits. The result has been to turn away from philosophy or religion as sources, to be guided by scientific evidence on harmful effects. The approach, attractive in its apparent objectivity, is fraught with the dangers of inexact science, value-laden interpretations, and a reductionism* that misses much that is of truly human value. Moral and spiritual values are readily relegated or dismissed.

A second shift has been towards replacing censorship by classification. Seeking to avoid the absolute constraints of total prohibition, governments have favoured systems of ratings for films, television, magazines and books, with committees established to create ratings to indicate levels of restriction. This seeks to make some materials available to adults while protecting children from that for which they are unprepared. Although some activists would wish to abolish all restrictions, some degree of censorship is retained even with classification. There is, at present, almost universal support for the complete censorship of child pornography, and increasing evidence of the harmfulness of portrayals of sexual aggression. In the US, with its strong commitment to constitutional protection of free speech (the First Amendment), it remains true that pornography is not protected.

While classification seeks a compromise between the needs of children and the desires of adults, it deals at best only with point-of-sale concerns and fails to prevent classified materials reaching juveniles in many devious ways. Complete censorship is more effective in achieving protection for minors, but it can never operate completely effectively in a free society, and any system needs the active support of the community.

A third recent shift relates to who makes the decisions about censorship. From the fiat of the church, or the opinion of the judge, there is increasingly an active participation by community groups seeking to represent their own standards. Libertarians, conservatives, radicals, financial vested interests all now lobby for their own view to prevail. The debate about censorship has become more audible, and often polarized, as groups seek to represent 'prevailing community standards'.

Christian involvement

Christian groups have been prominent in this movement, with the recognition that silence will simply allow alternative world-views to prevail. Participation in the shaping of community standards assumes the legitimacy of being active on issues of social justice, especially care for the weak, and a belief that there are normative standards of behaviour worth defending against those who would seek their abolition. As Monsma observes, we operate 'under the assumption that both art and freedom are God-given gifts that should be honored and protected'.

The danger for Christians of advocating censorship are many: of lacking artistic sensitivity or cultural awareness and simply defending the status quo; of stridently pursuing self-serving ends without sensitivity to the needs of others; of expecting more from censorship as a moral containment mechanism than it can ever deliver; of appearing to be anti-everything rather than for that which is good; and of seeking to promote orthodoxy by silencing dissent.

The dangers of vacating the field are greater, if the potential for exploitation,* degradation and harm is allowed to proceed unchecked. Paradoxically, many have found that religious freedom falls an early victim to those who, in the name of freedom of speech, become oppressively willing to censor alternative viewpoints. Advocacy of civilized boundaries of expression is a necessary part of stability in society. True freedom of expression exists only when the parameters are adequately defined.

Bibliography

S. V. Monsma, 'Yelling Fire in a Crowded Art Gallery', CT, 22 Oct 1990, pp. 40-41; B. Williams, Report of the Committee on Obscenity and Film Censorship (London, 1979).

J.H.C.

CENTESIMUS ANNUS, see PAPAL ENCYCLICALS.

CHANGE, PERSONAL, see DEPRESSION; STRESS.

CHANGE, SOCIAL, see COMMUNITY ETHICS;† TECHNOLOGY.

CHARITIES have a special interest in Eng. and US law, giving them exemption from both income and succession or inheritance taxes. To qualify for this special status, they must be set up for the promotion of religion or learning, or the relief of poverty or suffering, though these main criteria are fairly widely interpreted. They must also be nonprofit organizations, and any surplus must either be retained, or, if the founding deed of trust allows it, be given to other recognized charities. To obtain legal recognition, a charity in England or Wales must be registered with the Charity Commissioners, who receive annual accounts. Charities in Scotland must be registered with the Inland Revenue.

Political parties cannot register as charities, nor can anybody set up to promote a sectional interest. A trade union, for instance, is not a charity. A body set up to research the medical and social effects of abortion could be a charity, but an anti-abortion body could not be. A body set up to promote better management through seminars, lectures and literature could be a charity, but not a body set up to promote the interests of managers. Sometimes there can be a fine line between the charitable investigation of an unacceptable activity and the non-charitable campaign against the activity based on the study. But money raised for a study cannot be used for a campaign.

All charities must have trustees, and the trustees cannot gain financially from the charity. The trustees are legally responsible for the activities of the charity, which, in England and Wales, are supervised by the Charities mission. Scottish charities are supervised separately.

A great many Christians wish to support overseas activities. To gain tax exemption, contributions have to be made to a home-registered charity whose purposes allow it to use its funds on the overseas activity.

Churches are, of course, charities, though no distinction is made between (say) the Church of England and the Unification Church. But if a church runs a non-charitable activity, then it should pay tax on the profits of that activity.

Since British charities can reclaim tax on regular donations under deed of covenant, most charities, and especially churches, like to receive as much giving as possible in this way. Since it is a commitment to pay a particular charity for a number of years (at present four) it gives the charity a secure income. But, since donors may not want to fix the pattern of their giving too rigidly over a period of years, many give to an intermediate charity under covenant and then ask that charity to allocate the funds to the charitable causes they nominate. Those with substantial funds can set up their own charity, but the simplest way for most donors is to make a covenant to the Charities Aid Foundation, which will reclaim the tax and allocate the funds according to the donor's direction.

Those who want to donate casual fees they receive to charity can also ask that these fees be sent to the Charities Aid Foundation, which then allocates them as the donor requests.

Since 1990, UK donors may give substantial single gifts to charities tax free, using the Gift Aid scheme. The necessary Revenue forms are available from most charities including the Charities Aid Foundation. Those in employment may use the Give As You Earn payroll deduction scheme if their employers agree to operate it.

Donors are faced with a bewildering variety of charitable causes, and it is not easy for the average citizen to know where their giving will do most good. There is, regrettably, some expensive fund-raising, which cuts heavily into the donations income, so donors should ask to see accounts and look at the proportion of income devoted to fund-raising and administration. There is also a temptation to appeal to sentiment rather than real, but less appealing, need.

For these reasons many Christians confine their giving to churches and to missions at home and overseas which they know well, but this puts a heavy onus on churches to make sure that their giving also includes the wider needs of the community in which they live.

A new idea which is being tried in England in the Diocese of Salisbury is a diocesan cheque-book account. A standing-order payment goes to the parish whilst the cheques are available for use for other charitable purposes. Not all churches would have the staff to operate donor accounts, but it could be used by large churches or groups of churches as a mini-Charities Aid Foundation, more geared to the needs of church central giving.

In a Welfare State* many question whether churches and other charities can or should meet the welfare needs of the community. But the Welfare State is also a secular State which cannot help those whose material problem has a moral cause. Nor does bureaucratic welfare have the adaptability and flexibility which is often needed, and the Christian church, above all, should be ready to go the extra mile and help in ways which are outside the State's more rigid rules.

F.C.

CHASTITY refers to the morally responsible exercise of human sexuality (see†) in the human community. To be chaste is to be morally blameless, to treat with honour, respect, troth and integrity ourselves and our neighbours as persons, image-bearers of God. Chastity is often viewed in a more narrow and restricted sense as abstinence* from forbidden sexual lusts and actions: virginity* for the unmarried, sexual fidelity for the married, continence for the widowed. However, it is important that a broader, more positive understanding of chastity be nurtured, which sees chastity not merely as the responsible exercise of physical sexuality within relationships of mutuality, troth and commitment, but as the purity of heart and integrity of person which we owe to ourselves and each other as children of God, called to do everything in the name of love.

Originally chastity meant purity, especially ritual cleanliness in regard to things connected with deity. Then, as in the Scriptures, it came to have the deeper ethical sense of 'morally blameless', 'pure', 'sincere' in all actions (Gk. hagnos, 'pure', 'holy'). In the NT, Christians are encouraged to purify themselves (2 Cor. 6:6; 1 Jn. 3:3), and to seek 'pure' wisdom (Jas. 3:17). Office-bearers are to keep themselves 'pure' (1 Tim. 5:22; Tit. 2:5), wives are to exercise 'purity' (1 Pet. 3:2). Paul chides those who do not preach Christ 'sincerely' (Phil. 1:17), commends those who prove themselves 'innocent' (2 Cor. 7:11), exhorts his readers to think on whatever is 'pure' (Phil. 4:8), and is concerned that the Corinthian church have a 'pure devotion' as a 'pure virgin' to Christ (2 Cor. 11:2-3).

In the early Christian church, chastity came more and more to mean sexual purity, often in the sense of resisting sexual passions. Against the laxity of the pagan world, chastity was considered especially virtuous. Virginity, voluntary abstinence from sexual intercourse out of devotion to God - a dedicated virgin, taught Thomas Aquinas* in the 13th century, was 'wed to Christ' - became the highest form of chastity.

This distorted ideal of virginity and chastity, developed from the view that sex is a lower passion unworthy of intelligent persons, was not wholly overcome by the Reformation. The Reformers did stress the legitimacy of marriage - for Luther 'a remedy against sin' - and it was no longer considered inferior to virginity. But the church's suppression of sex as something lower and base continued - surfacing especially in movements such as Puritanism (see Puritan Ethics*) and Pietism,* and even on into the present - sometimes consciously, but more often unconsciously, affecting thought and action. The harm and frustration caused by the notion that sex always has an element of lust* is still not uncommon.

In reaction to the suppression and devaluation of sexuality, the modern sexual revolution laughed at chastity, and divorced sex from the contexts of love and commitment which give it meaning. However, in the late 20th century we are discovering that such attitudes - 'sex is candy' or 'sex for the fun of it' - can themselves be as harmful and frustrating as the earlier devaluations of sexuality.

In this context Christians are called to avoid both the undervaluation and overvaluation of sexuality. The male-female difference, sexual attraction, and sexual feelings are good, and ought to be celebrated. But our sexuality needs to be exercised appropriately in the contexts of personal commitment, love and sharing.

In its full meaning, to be chaste is to be a person of integrity, true to self and other persons, devoted to love of God and neighbour in all things. The call to chastity is the call to receive, affirm, exercise and celebrate our ways of being human together, including sexual ways, so that respect, love, trust, mutuality and commitment towards ourselves and our neighbours will grow and abound in the human community.

J.H.O.

CHILD ABUSE, see ABUSE; INCEST.

CHILDLESSNESS. Difficulties in childbearing are experienced by 10% to 15% of married couples; of these, approximately one in ten is described as ‘inexplicably infertile’.

These statistics often come as a surprise to those who have had no problems in having children, and herein lies just one of the stresses which childless couples have to bear: not fitting in to the accepted norm.

Experience

Childlessness is often experienced as bereavement* for a person who has never existed. It is acutely felt by the woman, shared by her husband to a certain degree, and often incomprehensible to others who have not had a similar experience. Consequently, relationships are put under enormous pressure. The couple feel isolated from their contemporaries, and they feel isolated from each other, as one or other partner will often feel responsible for the predicament, and in any case, it is almost impossible for the man to appreciate the depths of the desire in his wife. And, tragically, they feel isolated from God, either because their childlessness is seen as a punishment, or because they see it as evidence of the absence of God's love. To be childless is often to feel terribly alone.

Yet the Bible teaches that childlessness is not inevitably related to sin, and that God cares for those in this situation (Ps. 113:9; Lk. 1:5-7); God's salvation plan is worked out through the children of childless couples, children brought about by divine intervention, who played their part in the foundation of Israel (Isaac, Jacob and Jacob's sons) and in the proclamation of the Messiah's coming (John the Baptist). The pattern of family life in the OT, and the church family in the NT, provide a support structure for childless couples, which should mean that this burden is never borne alone. And in declaring that people are made in God's image* and are valuable to him for this reason, the Bible holds out comfort to those who feel incomplete, failures or misfits simply because they have never had a child.

The isolation of the childless within both the secular and Christian communities is a moral issue. Exclusion is discrimination in democratic societies, and within the body of Christ is a denial of the gospel and flies in the face of Jesus' example. He associated with social misfits and called them friends. As with many other people who don't fit, the childless need love and acceptance, and above all, people who will listen to their story and share their burdens.

Support

The need for a support structure is made more acute by the technological means that modern science has provided for overcoming childlessness for many couples. D. Gareth Jones (1940-) lists thirteen ‘technological’ means of providing a child to a couple. Yet none of these methods is ethically neutral, raising such issues as the sanctity of the marriage bond (surrogacy,* AID), the rights of the embryo* (IVF in its various forms; see Reproductive Technologies*); and the dignity and humanity of a carrying mother (surrogacy). They are often costly, never 100% successful, and can subject the couple, particularly the woman, to indignity and emotional stress. If Christians desire that couples make the right ethical choices, then they must be prepared to stand alongside those whose choosing has painful consequences, and be prepared to share their sorrows.

For Christians, the issues of God's sovereignty and plan for his people's lives are real issues. Recourse to technological means, even where ethically acceptable, may not be in God's plan for some couples. Sarai's turning to 'representational begetting' as a solution to her barrenness was a socially acceptable practice, but was not God's will for her or Abram, and had far-reaching consequences (Gn. 16:1-12; 17:19-21). The Bible also encourages God's people to look beyond their own circumstances to God's wider purposes. If Jesus came at just the right time, then so did John the Baptist. The cost to Zechariah and Elizabeth, both of them 'upright in the sight of God' (Lk. 1:6), was years of barrenness, and social disgrace.

The biblical picture would not be complete, however, without the recognition that God can and does intervene in the lives of childless couples, or without the acknowledgment that the experience of childlessness for some couples brought them nearer to God. The gift of children to the barren brings joy and blessing, not only to the parents but to the wider community, and many of the heroes of the Scriptures (Isaac, Jacob, Samuel, John the Baptist) are children of the childless.

It is possible that God has 'called' a couple to childlessness; it is equally possible that he has not. In the latter case, the couple may legitimately pursue medical means of help, having first honestly examined the ethical legitimacy of the means on offer, and having been guided by the Holy Spirit through prayer. However, for some (including this writer) the call may be, like Abraham's, to wait on the Lord, and trust his promises.

Like all other issues of life, childlessness is a faith matter, requiring that we involve God and God's people. The willingness to share the pain of childlessness with one's partner, one's friends, one's church and one's God is the means by which understanding and acceptance, and ultimately fulfilment, are gained.

See also: ADOPTION.

Bibliography

G. R. Collins, Christian Counselling (Milton Keynes, 1985, and Waco, TX, 1980); D. G. Jones, Manufacturing Humans: The Challenge of the New Reproductive Technologies (Leicester, 1987); D. Prior, Living by Faith: Abraham's Example for Today (London, 1986).

G.B.McG.

CHILDREN. In her recommendations contained within the 1988 Cleveland (UK) Inquiry Report on child abuse, Lord Justice Elizabeth Butler-Sloss (1933-) states that 'the child is a person, not an object of concern' (The Report of the Inquiry into Child Abuse in Cleveland, London, 1988, p. 245).

Only just over a century earlier in New York, a child's right to legal protection from ill treatment by her adoptive parents was granted on the grounds that she was 'a member of the animal kingdom'. Laws existed at that time to protect animals from cruelty, but not children (P. Dale, Dangerous Families, p. 1).

Much has changed since then, with the formulation of child-care legislation and various organizations to protect children's interests. The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, 1989, declared the necessity for States to take all possible measures to protect children (P. Newell, The UN Convention and Children's Rights in the UK, p. 69). In the UK, the Children Act of 1989 was heralded as the most far-reaching reform of child law this century. Yet despite all these efforts to safeguard the welfare of children, it has to be admitted that children are far from safe within our world.

This is the case not only in poorer countries; within comparatively prosperous Western societies children are known to be increasingly at risk, not only from unscrupulous individuals, but also tragically from other children and from highly sophisticated organizations trading in child pornography* or prostitution.*

In this disturbing scenario it is vital that the true basis of a child's right to protection is fully grasped and also promoted and acted upon by the Christian church. The important reminder in the Cleveland Report that a child is actually a person must be expanded upon with the full biblical statement that each human being is created by God in his image (Gn. 1:26-27; see Image of God*).

As the most vulnerable bearers of God's image, children have a special right to protection. They must be seen not as the property of their parents or guardians, but as individual unique human beings who are themselves responsible to God and who are entrusted to the care of their parents (see Parenthood*) for a time. As such, children must be accorded the dignity which is richly and equally deserved by every human being, created in God's likeness.

The example which Scripture portrays of Jesus Christ's relationship with children is sensitive and beautiful, his acceptance of and tenderness towards them (Mk. 10:13-16), with their trust of him and loyalty to him (Mt. 21:15-16) demonstrating the relationship which existed between them.

Jesus' words in Mt. 18:5 and the severe warning which follows against harming little ones are often interpreted as referring solely to young ones in the faith, but the overall NT picture of Jesus' care for children, and the fact that he spoke these words with a child by his side, make it difficult to deny any reference to children themselves (W. Hendriksen, The Gospel of Matthew, Grand Rapids, 1973, pp. 686-690).

The dignity and protection which Christ accorded to children must be mirrored in the church. Sadly, the closed nature of some church communities, the teaching of children implicitly to trust their 'aunties' and 'uncles' in the church, plus a reticence to believe that church members can be perpetrators of child abuse in one form or another, has created within some congregations a secluded, impenetrable environment in which abuse, to the shame of the church, can flourish, and has flourished.

The recognition that children are not appendages of their parents but are entrusted to their care under God calls for courageous, compassionate and infinitely wise pastoring of children.

The dilemma of how to protect children effectively when they are found to be at risk is a continuing one, particularly as increasing incidences of children being abused by other children or by adults in residential and foster care come to light. The importance of the church's role in preventive work and in family support cannot be overestimated.

As part of the promotion of children's rights, some societies are seeking to end all corporal punishment of children. This tendency has to be balanced against the biblical view of humankind as not only created by God but also responsible to him. The removal of corporal punishment as one means of disciplining children may lead to an inability to control and thus protect children, or to children failing to develop the self-discipline necessary for their own safety.

The protection of the rights of a child cannot be safely based on changing trends in thinking but only on the biblical view of true humanity.

Men such as Dr Barnardo,* Lord Shaftesbury* and C. H. Spurgeon* championed the cause of child protection in the past. The need for God's people the world over to do the same is as acute as it ever was.

Bibliography

P. Dale, Dangerous Families (London and New York, 1986); P. Newell, The UN Convention and Children's Rights in the UK (London, 1991); R. White, P. Carr and N. Lowe, A Guide to the Children Act 1989 (London, 1990).

E.M.S.

CHOICE is the term used in ethics to describe an agent's selection of a particular action or course of action; it may be as trivial as deciding to take a rest or as important in choosing a career.

Various types of determinism (in philosophy, psychology and theology) have tried to dismiss choice as an illusion, arguing that we only think we choose our actions when actually we are 'programmed' or otherwise determined beforehand to do certain things. While this approach is contrary to ordinary experience and to biblical morality, it also usefully illumines errors in the modern notion of choice as subjective preference, as if life were a kind of cafeteria offering us a range of choices from which we have absolute freedom to pick.

Our freedom* and responsibility* to choose are determined not by the number of options available or by the control we have over a situation and its outcome, but by the characters (see †) we bring to a situation - our desires, beliefs and attitudes. Fundamentally, it is by giving meaning and purpose to what we do that we choose. When Luther said, 'Here I stand, I can do no other', he had few options open to him (we might even say that he had 'no choice' but to take the course he did); but in that decision he was expressing most characteristically what his purpose and faith required in that situation.

Aristotle* in the Nicomachean Ethics set the foundation for analysis of the psychology of action (philosophical and theological) in ancient and medieval thought and in much current discussion. In his analysis, choice (prohairesis) is: 1. a combination of intellect and affect, which he called 'reasoned desire'; and 2. an expression of a person's character - his outlook, principles, values and the quality of his emotional life. Just as our actions reveal our characters, so the pattern of choices we make in turn shapes our characters.

A major difficulty facing the interpreters and adapters of Aristotle has been to describe the relationship between reason* and will* in the act of choice. A common way of describing this process is to split the process into a stage of reason and deliberation, followed by a decision made by the will. This seems right, since deliberation is a matter of rational analysis, and because it accounts for error and sin, i.e. the agent knows what is right and decides against it because of a faulty will.

The problem with this sequential view of deliberation by intellect and choice by will is to make the intellect more of an instrument of the will rather than a full participant in the process of choice as it should be. It also implies that in cases where no deliberation takes place, then reason is not very involved.

If one of your children is in danger (e.g. wandering into traffic), you react immediately. You do not need to deliberate (delay might be fatal), and you see immediately the action that is required. This should not be explained, however, by instinct or an act of will; rather, you instantaneously size up the situation, see the action that is required (which involves cognition), and decide to move quickly to protect your child. Both reason and desire are involved.

Many decisions do require deliberation, such as taking a holiday, or making a change of career. But whether a decision is made quickly or after long reflection, common to the process are the sizing up of the situation and the decision to act. The choice or decision which results in action should be seen as expressing a judgment of the mind which understands the nature and purpose of the action, as well as an affirmation of the will that this is what is wanted.

When the act of choice was reduced to an act of will in the later Middle Ages (liberum arbitrium for Thomas Aquinas* and most of the earlier tradition involved both reason and will), the notion of 'free choice' was confused with the problem of 'free will'. This meant that it became difficult (for Protestants and Catholics alike) to discuss the operation of the human mind without discussing the relation to grace* and providence. But if the distinction is made, and choice is considered a part of normal human agency, then it is possible to affirm the freedom of the agent to make decisions for the goals and purposes he has, and at the same time say that without grace that person has no will for the true good, and that all his decisions reflect the disorder of a mind out of touch with God. We may also see that a person may make a genuine choice to become a disciple of Christ and yet understand the truth of the Lord's statement that 'You did not choose me, but I chose you' (Jn. 15-16).

See also: FREE WILL AND DETERMINISM.

Bibliography

A. Donagan, Choice: The Essential Element in Human Action (London, 1987); A. Gardeil, DTC 4, cols. 2242-2256; J. I. Packer, 'Conscience, Choice and Character', in B. N. Kaye and G. J. Wenham (eds.), Law, Morality and the Bible: A Symposium (Leicester and Downers Grove, IL, 1978); V. S. Poythress, The Shadow of Christ in the Law of Moses (Brentwood, TN, 1991); J. O. Urmson, Aristotle's Ethics (Oxford, 1988).

D.A.W

CHRISTIAN RECONSTRUCTION MOVEMENT. This movement essentially seeks to bring all areas of life under the lordship of Christ. It owes its origin to Rousas John Rushdoony (1916-), an American theologian, whose book The Institutes of Biblical Law (1973) effectively launched the movement. Other important thinkers include Greg Bahnsen (1949-) and especially Gary North (1941-).

A number of theological emphases have come together in Christian Reconstructionism: 1. the sovereignty of God (Calvinism); 2. the theological and sociological significance of the covenant;* 3. the application of biblical law* to modern society (theonomy); 4. the presuppositional apologetics of Cornelius Van Til (1895-1987); and 5. the triumph of the cause of Christ in the world (post-millennialism).

The movement has been influential in theologically and politically conservative circles, though not without controversy. The questioning of critics has focused on the issues of theonomy and post-millennialism. Can laws given to Israel be mandatory for nations not in the covenant relationship with God? How can laws integral to the Mosaic covenant survive the abolition of that covenant? What bearing does Christ's fulfilment of the law (Mt. 5:17) have on its contemporary application? Answers to such questions have not been entirely satisfactory and a more precise understanding of biblical law is still necessary. Eschatologically, the welcome emphasis on victory and dominion needs to incorporate a greater appreciation of the church's suffering and weakness to be fully biblical.

By forcing Christians to grapple with the OT's contribution to Christian ethics and a just society, and by offering insightful biblical solutions to the problems of the modern world, the Reconstructionists have enriched the church.

Bibliography

G. L. Bahnsen, Theonomy in Christian Ethics (Phillipsburg, NJ, ² 1984); W. S. Barker and W. R. Godfrey (eds.), Theonomy: a Reformed Critique (Grand Rapids, 1990); G. North and G. DeMar, Christian Reconstruction: What it is, what it isn't (Tyler, TX, 1991); R. J. Rushdoony, The Institutes of Biblical Law (Nutley, NJ, 1973).

J.G.C.

CHRISTIAN SOCIALISTS. Utopian visions of a future society of peace, community and justice have influenced Christian thought throughout its history. In all traditions - Catholic, Protestant and Anabaptist - there have been those who have kept alive the vision of a better world. This hope has been kept alive in the theology and spirituality of the monastic tradition and in the communal experience of Anabaptist movements.

The great economic changes of the late 18th and 19th centuries in Europe moved social experience into an urban and industrialized culture. The development of market economies after the theory of Adam Smith (1723-90) replaced the feudalism of an agrarian order. The divisions of feudalism gave way to the class structure of mass industrialized societies.

There were many Christian responses to these changes. There were those who, encountering the human damage of the move to industrial life, worked hard to get the law to protect its victims. Clergy were prominent in early 19th-century campaigns to protect women and children in industrial employment and to restrict hours of working. Others began to question some of the fundamental assumptions of a capitalist economy.

The work of F. D. Maurice* and his friends J. M. F. Ludlow (1821-1911), Charles Kingsley (1819-75) and Thomas Hughes (1822-96), in the middle of the 19th century, set in train a way of thought which brought together Christianity and the emerging ideas of socialism.* Maurice and Ludlow both formed co-operative movements and sought to develop a corporate and communal understanding of human life. The kingdom of Christ was a universal reality which was to be the guide for all endeavours.

The Christian Socialist movement had many sides to it as it grew. The tradition which grew directly from Maurice's theological work continued in a long line of Christian leaders who were sympathetic to socialist ideas because they seemed to make sense of important aspects of Christian thought and spirituality. Bishop Westcott (1825-1901) in the 19th century, J. H. Oldham (1874-1969) and William Temple* in the 20th century, were important figures in this tradition. They were all interested in Christian models and themes for contemporary urban society. They felt the need to find new ways of responding to the pervasive problems of poverty and social division. Christianity had much to say in the reconstruction and reform of the social order.

Others took a more radical line. These, following on the work of Stewart Headlam (1847-1924) rooted their socialism in their pastoral experience of ministry to the poor and excluded. Combining a revival of Catholic theology and practice, especially within the Church of England, they found inescapable connections between Jesus of Nazareth and the struggle for a socialist society. These were the campaigners and activists who assisted in the trade-union movement, joined in protest movements and were founders in the early years of Labour political organizations.

Parallel things were happening on the other side of the Atlantic. In different ways Reinhold Niebuhr* and Paul Tillich (1886-1965) both espoused socialist ideas at different points in their ministry. Niebuhr's theology was well suited to the demands of corporate political and economic action.

Those who brought Christian life to the new urban and working-class communities often played a critical role in the formation of working-class political and industrial structures. In the north-east of England, as in other places, there were close links between the growth of Methodism with its training of lay leadership and the development of trade unions. In East Anglia the struggle for better conditions for agricultural workers was often supported from within the Baptist movement, whose roots went back into generations of protest against both agricultural and ecclesiastical power.

The last quarter of the 20th century has witnessed a major decline in both socialist thinking and socialist organization. The failures of Marxism in the former Soviet Union and the collapse of command economies has raised deep questions about the whole socialist movement. Whether Christians committed to socialism can help in turning it to a future contribution is yet to be seen. What is not in doubt is the persistence of those who hold a vision of a better future and who believe that the gospel demands its support.

Bibliography

T. Christensen, Origin and History of Christian Socialism 1848-54 (Aarhus, 1962); E. R. Norman, The Victorian Christian Socialists (Cambridge, 1987); P. Tillich, The Socialist Decision (1933; ET, New York, 1977).

J.W.G.

CHRYSTOSTOM, JOHN (c. 347-407). Born of noble parents, Chrysostom was destined for the law. Under the influence of Meletius of Antioch (d. 381) he turned away from secular affairs, was baptized in 367, and shortly afterwards withdrew to the desert as a monk. When his health failed, he returned to Antioch where in 386 Flavian (bishop 381-404) ordained him priest and appointed him to the special duty of preaching in the cathedral. Here he systematically expounded the literal method of interpreting Scripture - which was characteristic of the Antiochene school - and he earned the title 'golden-tongued'.

In 398 he was unwillingly appointed patriarch of Constantinople. There his leadership was uncompromising and sometimes diplomatically naive. Although having little time for speculative theology, he opposed the Arians, antagonized Bishop Theophilus of Alexandria (d. 412) and the Empress Eudoxia (d. 404), among others. The first time he was deposed and exiled, the crowd ensured his rapid recall. But he died on his second journey into exile.

Chrysostom had entered into an agreement with a friend, in 386, to let their names go forward for election as bishops. In the event Chrysostom fled and then wrote a lengthy work on justification called On the Priesthood. The work displays a very high view of the priesthood but is marred by a male chauvinism. It is full of practical wisdom about the duties and pitfalls of a pastor, sets out excellent advice about preaching, details the high spiritual standards required of leaders and the enormous demands and responsibilities, as well as joys, laid upon them. It remains one of the great classic works of pastoral theology (see Practical and Pastoral Theology†).

Bibliography

On the Priesthood, NPNF 9. D. Attwater, St John Chrysostom (London, 1939); C. Baur, John Chrysostom and His Time (Vaduz, 1988).

D.J.T.

CHURCH. The Christian church is that collection of human societies which is inspired by, and seeks to represent, the significance of Jesus. Hence Paul's description of it as the 'body' of Christ (e.g. Eph.1:22-23). Because Jesus was deemed by early Christians to be the epitome of Israel, the church is described in the NT as 'the people of God' (e.g. 1 Pet. 2:10). Further, since it was believed to be the people among whom God is present to an unprecedented and decisive degree, the church is referred to as 'the temple' of God's Spirit (e.g. 1 Cor. 3:16; 2 Cor. 6:16). When attention focused upon the sanctifying effects of the Spirit, it is spoken of as the new, re-created humanity (e.g. Rom. 5-6; 1 Cor. 15). The ethical and pastoral significance of this society varies according to the terms in which it is conceived, and the history of Christian reflection upon the church - i.e. the history of ecclesiology - has given rise to a variety of typical conceptions.

1. Some have emphasized the institutional dimension of the church. With respect to those who regard its institutionalization as symptomatic of its loss of charismatic vitality, it is inevitable that it should have such a dimension: for the cohesion of any large and continuous society requires the distribution of authority,* the ordering of roles, and the establishment of procedures. It is not inevitable, however, that the institutional dimension should be given primary emphasis, or that it should take a rigidly hierarchical form. This happens when the main task of the church is seen to be that of maintaining unity in the face of internecine conflict, or of guarding right doctrine and practice - i.e. when the need for communal discipline is reckoned paramount, and when the exercise of political authority is thought to be the most appropriate implement. So, for example, Cyprian (c. 200-258), when faced with the Novatianist schism in the 3rd century, developed an ecclesiology which founded the church's unity on the episcopate. In its Counter-Reformation phase, Roman Catholicism virtually regarded divine grace as the property of the church's dominically established hierarchy, to be dispensed by its ordained officers pre-eminently in their performance of the seven sacraments.

The ethical and pastoral implications of this model of the church are several. Here moral and pastoral wisdom is made the special preserve of the priesthood, whose job it is to instruct, judge, and guide the laity according to the official teaching of the church. The moral life tends to be thought of in terms of conformity to law, with the priest-confessor playing a judicial role in his assignation of penance to transgressors. It follows that docility and obedience rank high among lay virtues, and responsible discernment ranks low. Further, although the morally and spiritually formative function of the sacraments is not logically tied to a predominantly institutional view of the church, it acquires a distinctive prominence here where the sacraments are regarded as the institutionally controlled outlets of grace. Finally, when the authority of the ecclesial institution, its officers, and its sanctions, are highly regarded, moral and pastoral discipline acquires a gravity it otherwise lacks.

2. Martin Luther* reacted against the authoritarian and hierarchical character of the predominantly institutional ecclesiology of the late medieval church, which he regarded as unbiblical. He offered an alternative account of the church in terms of its objective, divine basis: the Word of God addressed to humankind in Jesus Christ. For Luther the church is constituted not by a divinely established political authority, but by common acceptance of the Word. This ecclesiology has been made to yield some general moral implications. According to Karl Barth,* for example, one of the basic characteristics of right (i.e. Christian) conduct is the yielding of precedence to the Word, pre-eminently as it appears in Scripture. Stanley Hauerwas (1940-) has recently underscored the primacy of the biblical 'story' in forming the moral identity of the Christian community.

But this classically Protestant concept of the church has also been made to yield more specific moral material. If the church is thought to be constituted by the declaration and acknowledgment of God's Word, then it follows that the first duty of its members is to affirm that Word. What form such affirmation should take has been variously conceived by different Protestant traditions. Pietists and evangelicals have emphasized its verbal form, stressing the importance of proclaiming the redeeming acts of God, pre-eminently in Jesus Christ. Here the Word of God enjoins evangelism upon its hearers. But others have entertained a more practical concept of affirmation. Barth, for example, speaks of 'bearing witness' to the Word, and argues that such attestation usually takes the form of acts rather than words. Moreover, he contends that the basic form of all Christian (re)action is invocation, and that the central Christian acts of invocation are the corporate liturgical ones of baptism and the Lord's Supper. The Anabaptist* tradition, however, identifying the Word of God very closely with the Jesus of the Gospels, understands practical attestation primarily in terms of the abjuration of all forms of violence.

3. This last tradition exemplifies another characteristically Protestant concept of the church (though characteristic also of the Augustinian tradition) - i.e. as a community which displays a distinctive (or, at least, definite) Christian spirit or ethos. Here the emphasis shifts from the objective ground of the church - God's Word - to its subjective character; from Christ as the head of his body to the body itself. Common to all Protestant ecclesiologies, and following from the Pauline metaphor of the church as a body (Rom. 12 and 1 Cor. 12), there has been an emphasis on the ethos of mutuality with a correlative qualification of - if not opposition to - hierarchy. Accordingly, Protestantism has spawned presbyterian and congregational ecclesial polities, and where it has maintained an episcopal polity (as in its Lutheran and Anglican expressions), it has at the same time reduced episcopal authority. Thus the Protestant conviction that the Christian church is a community characterized by an ethos of fraternal mutuality has led to institutional reform on the ground of a moral conception of human relations.

For some, the distinctive Christian ethos is the property of a confessing community: i.e. a community which shares specifically Christian religious beliefs and practices. The church here is held to be a quite discrete society, whose primary duty is to perform a prophetic ministry by representing the kingdom of God* more or less indirectly in itself, its ethos and its institutions. This is the line typically taken by the Anabaptist tradition, whose foremost representative today is John Howard Yoder (1927-), and whose stance has largely been adopted by Hauerwas. This ecclesiology, finding biblical precedent in the Johannine literature of the NT, presupposes a sharp opposition between the church and the world, and prescribes as the first duty of church members 'love for the brethren' (e.g. Jn. 15:9-17; 1 Jn. 3-4). It is not the case that such an ethos is necessarily introverted or socially irresponsible, as has sometimes been supposed, in so far as the point of paying primary attention to the life of the Christian community is to enable it to address the world effectively.

The classic Lutheran and Calvinist ecclesiologies also distinguish between the ethos of the church and that of the world, but they contrapose them less. More unequivocally than Augustine,* Luther affirmed that both the kingdom of God, where the gospel of Christ reigns, and the kingdom of the world, which is governed by the civil law, are ordained by God; and, against the Anabaptists, he maintained that Christians must operate in the latter. Like Augustine, however, Luther was modest in his hopes for the Christian gospel to qualify the secular administration of justice. John Calvin,* on the other hand, was much more sanguine, and in his attempt to create a theocracy* in Geneva he displayed a remarkable confidence in the power of the church to absorb and transform the world.

It is not the case that to understand the church primarily in terms of its ethos necessarily leads one to distinguish it sharply from the world. Sometimes, the Spirit of God is believed to be redemptively effective outside the church as well as in it. Barth, for example, on the one hand adamantly emphasizes the duty of the church to remain faithful to its peculiar identity by placing the precedence of God's Word and the acts of invocation at the heart of its life. But, on the other hand, he argues that the ascendant Christ is Lord of the whole world, that the final boundaries of the church are eschatological and hidden, that Christians should regard all human beings as virtual brethren, and that the church might therefore discover moral wisdom and virtue outside its own walls.

Further along the spectrum lies the liberal Protestant tradition, stemming from Immanuel Kant* through Albrecht Ritschl (1822-89) to the social gospel* movement in America. Here the boundary between the church and the world becomes least distinct, for the church's identity is reduced to the ethos of its secular relations (worthwhile religious beliefs being regarded as reducible to moral ones, and specifically religious practices as immoral distractions from the real moral business of inter-human relations), and its members are held to comprise all who are committed to the cause of just community. The logic of this ecclesiology reaches its apogee in the social gospel of Walter Rauschenbusch (1861-1918), for whom the Christian church is little other than a 'religious' species of the socialist movement. Some liberation theologies* reach the same point when they identify the mission of the church simply as that of lending its support to a particular struggle for economic, social or political liberation.

The ethical significance of the church as community is not exhaustively described in terms of its display of a distinctive communal ethos. As Hauerwas has recently emphasized, it should also be described in terms of its role as the social context of the formation of moral character and the making of moral decisions. The Christian community plays its part in character-formation by means of the socially transmitted traditions of morally exemplary stories and moral practices, in which the individual grows up. It plays its part in moral decision-making by presenting the individual with paradigmatic cases of right and wrong behaviour, moral rules, and the possibility of moral criticism.

The sanctificatory or therapeutic importance of small Christian communities as schools for the moral and spiritual cure of souls has, of course, long been recognized in practice – as witness cenobitic (communal) monasticism, the Pietist collegium pietatis, the Methodist 'class', Bonhoeffer's* community at Finkenwalde, and the liberationist 'base communities'. It is the small community that plays this role because it provides a suitable environment for the growth of intimate friendship, and so for the exercise of fraternal accountability, confession, and aid.

This is the ecclesial model that many contemporary evangelicals have primarily in mind when they refer to the church as a 'family'. The virtue of this metaphor is that it holds forth appropriate ideals of intimacy, care and responsibility. However, in so far as the picture of the family is romanticized, it makes it harder for members of a church to acknowledge the serious conflicts that afflict their community, and thus hinders them from developing realistic and responsible responses.

See also: COMMUNITY ETHICS.†

Bibliography

Augustine, The City of God; P. Avis, Anglicanism and the Christian Church (Edinburgh, 1989); idem, The Church in the Theology of the Reformers (London and Atlanta, 1981); K. Barth, 'The Christian Community and the Civil Community', in Community, State and Church (Gloucester, MA, 1946); D. Bonhoeffer, Life Together (ET, London, 1954; repr. San Francisco, 1976); A. Dulles, Models of the Church (Garden City, NY, 1974); Dublin, ² 1988); S. Hauerwas, A Community of Character (Notre Dame, IN, 1981); H. Küng, The Church (ET, London, 1967); H. R. Niebuhr, Christ and Culture (New York, 1951; London, 1952); J. H. Yoder, The Priestly Kingdom (Notre Dame, IN, 1984).

N.J.B.

CITY. A 'city' is a settlement where a large number of people (there is no general agreement as to how many) is concentrated for residential and economic purposes into a relatively small geographical area. The word has associations with the idea of politics and civic independence (via Gk. polis) and with the idea of civilization (via Lat. civitas), although the common use of another Latin-derived word 'urban', along with such words as 'decay', 'crisis', 'jungle', 'problem' or 'unrest', suggests a more negative view of cities. The claim of smaller historic towns to city status, because of their ancient cathedrals or town walls, reminds us of a world where most important settlements were tiny by modern standards. Indeed it takes us back to the OT where 'cities' (Heb. ir) were little more than fortified villages.

Cities today

Already there are 300 cities of over a million people and in most parts of the world cities are rapidly growing. Before long the Third World will be predominantly urban. For over a century in Europe, N. America and Australasia the majority of people have lived in cities. Despite negative attitudes, flight from inner areas, and the decentralization of economies as transport and telecommunications networks grow, most Western people will continue an urban lifestyle for years to come. Even those who move out to greener pastures will remain dependent economically and culturally on the life of the great urban cities.

Modern cities are far more than a place plus people. We need to understand the complexity of their structures and systems and the variety of their functions. Some cities are mostly industrial (e.g. Sheffield), some financial and cultural (e.g. New York), some governmental (e.g. Canberra), and others combine many functions (e.g. London). There are still cities which have a religious function and symbolic importance (e.g. Rome, Jerusalem, Varanasi). However, most modern cities operate on secular assumptions.

Social conflicts, ever present in this sinful world, become sharply polarized in large cities. As a result there are ethical issues with a distinctive urban flavour. Wealth (see Money*), poverty* and economic justice (see Economic Ethics†) are high on the agenda, whether we look at the favelas of São Paulo, the obscene wealth of Malabar Hill in Bombay or the juxtaposition of the City of London with the deprived East End. Money usually means power* and the powerlessness of many urban people has rightly led urban Christian leaders to campaign alongside the poor, for basic human rights (see Rights, Human*) and an end to oppression. Often struggles centre around issues of land* and housing, even in today's wealthy London, where thousands sleep on the streets, in hostels and in bed-and-breakfast hostels.

International migration adds ethnic and religious plurality to the pluralism* of values and lifestyle which is always a feature of large cities. Housing becomes segregated, community networks (including religious ones) are based on ethnicity, and the economy is stratified on racial lines. Racial justice thus becomes an important issue for urban Christians.

Cities in the Bible

The Bible speaks of an urban past and urban future. According to Stuart Murray in City Vision, there are over 1,400 scriptural references to cities. These range from the small fortified settlements of the Promised Land (e.g. Jos. 21) to the megalopolises of Nineveh (Jon. 3:2-3) and Rome (Acts 28:14-15). The Bible is a surprisingly urban book, and the first churches flourished in cities like Corinth, Ephesus, Philippi and Antioch. Ancient cities obviously differ from modern ones in size, structure, architecture, transport systems and government.

While this makes hermeneutics difficult, there are a number of underlying biblical themes which should shape our attitudes to the cities in which we live.

Personalities and principalities. According to Ray Bakke in The Urban Christian (London, 1987), cities in the Bible are portrayed as having a (usually female) personality. Jerusalem (eventually a bride) has sisters in Sodom and Samaria (Ezk. 16:44-58) and a rival in the prostitute Babylon/Rome (Rev. 17:1 - 18:24). Throughout Scripture Babylon is the symbol of an evil city system, and of an unjust and oppressive empire. Indeed in certain circumstances God's people are called to flee. In contrast Jerusalem - 'the foundation of shalom (peace)' - although repeatedly and tragically falling, and even murdering the prophets, becomes the symbol of what is possible for a city if redeemed. The vision of Is. 65:17-25, taken up in Rev. 21:1 - 22:5, is a model on which to build our urban hopes and dreams.

Charismatic urban theology (e.g. Pieter Bos, as reported by Greg Smith in City Cries 18, 1989) has developed the biblical ideas of city personalities alongside a theology of angels, powers, principalities and ruling spirits. Such writers see an intimate connection between places, history and spiritual oppression. They offer strategies of spiritual warfare to help bring in the kingdom of God* in urban areas.

Judgment, mercy and transformation. Many events recorded in Scripture show that God is merciful to cities and their people, far more than they deserve. God would have spared Sodom if only ten righteous people had lived there (Gn. 18:26-33). He sent Jonah to Nineveh by special delivery to preach repentance, and much to the prophet's chagrin was merciful not only to adults who repented, but to infants and cattle as well (Jon. 4:11). In the NT many cities from Jerusalem to Rome were blessed, and eventually changed for the better by the preaching of the gospel and the 'salting' of the believers.

Some Christian writers such as Jacques Ellul* (and probably the majority of Western evangelicals) take a pessimistic view of cities, emphasizing the depravity which they see as gathering there. For them hope resides mainly in the salvation of individuals out of the evil city. Other modern radicals such as Harvey Cox (in The Secular City) have held an essentially optimistic view of the urban. For them the city offers freedom, choice and the chance to exercise human responsibility in a secular setting. More recent writings by radical evangelicals such as David Lim (e.g. 'The City in the Bible') and Stuart Murray present a more balanced view of the city as a place where good and evil conflict, but where God's purposes for personal and social transformation can be worked out, usually by the children of the kingdom, and sometimes without or even despite them.

Incarnation. To some extent the welfare of any city is connected with the willingness of God's people to live there and follow the pattern of incarnation and service which Jesus showed. In one sense Christians should be pilgrims like Abraham with no abiding city (Heb. 11:10, 16), stressing instead their citizenship of heaven (Phil. 3:20). Yet like the exiles in Babylon (exemplified in the lives of Daniel and his colleagues, Dn. 1 - 6) they are called to settle down and work for the welfare (shalom) of their cities as instructed by Jeremiah (Je. 29:4-7). For us today this commitment involves both a verbal witness to Jesus Christ, and a life of full community involvement, compassionate service, social action and political passion for justice and truth.

The role of the church

Many observers have noted that large cities in the West, and especially the poorer districts, have been 'stony ground' for the growth (or even survival) of the traditional Protestant churches. Certainly the middle-class culture of the church, masquerading as the gospel, when imposed on working-class believers has led to what the American writer Gibson Winter has described as 'the suburban captivity of the churches'. In England, Anglican concern for the plight of communities and churches in 'urban priority areas' led to the publication of the influential Faith in the City report in 1985. Since then there has been a renewed thrust in urban mission activity throughout the UK, and there is now some evidence, from inner London at least, that the trend of numerical decline in church attendance has been reversed (MARC, Prospects for the Nineties, London, 1991). Certainly the inner-city church in the UK is a community of life, hope and vibrancy in the midst of oppression, struggle and despair.

In many large cities neighbourliness and a sense of community are notably absent. Therefore the first great specifically urban calling of the church is to neighbour-love and community-building. Small base community groups, on the pattern of those now common in Latin America, are proving very effective in this context. In multi-ethnic cities there is a special challenge to break down barriers in the church (Gal. 3:28), to express the gospel in more than one culture.

A well-rounded urban church, as a result of its social setting and biblical faithfulness, should therefore display most of the following characteristics: a body of diverse people, striving for unity; an evangelizing and church-planting mission; a community with meetings at cell, congregation and celebration level; one small minority group among many; a prophetic and political witness; a serving and suffering presence; a force standing for justice alongside the poor; an accepting, compassionate, healing, praying and praising community.

See also: DISCRIMINATION; RACE.

Bibliography

Archbishop of Canterbury's Commission on Urban Priority Areas, Faith in the City (London, 1985); H. Cox, The Secular City (New York and London, 1965); J. Ellul, The Meaning of the City (Grand Rapids, 1970); D. S. Lim, 'The City in the Bible', Evangelical Review of Theology 12.2, April 1988; S. Murray, City Vision (London, 1990); D. Sheppard, Built as a City (London, 1975); G. Smith, 'God's Heart for the City: A Few Tips from Amsterdam', City Cries 18, Spring 1989 (a report of P. Bos's lectures); idem, Christianity in the Inner City: Some Sociological Issues (Bromley, 1988); G. Winter, The Suburban Captivity of the Churches (New York, 1961).

G.S.

CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE is a form of political protest, distinguished by the fact that it openly breaks the law (see Law, Civil and Criminal*) for conscientious reasons. Civil disobedience campaigns have been mounted for a variety of causes, e.g. against war, racial segregation, forms of taxation and abortion. Normally such campaigns break relevant laws or challenge particular institutions. Methods may involve sit-ins, illegal marches or protests, tax boycotts or demonstrative attacks on, say, military bases or abortion clinics.

Civil disobedience is usually distinguished from certain kindred actions, namely conscientious objection involving violence,* and legitimate forms of protest. Conscientious objection is not always illegal, for many States make provision for it. Even when it is illegal, it is not usually directly political in intention; its primary concern is the refusal to be actively involved in military service. Campaigns of violence are typically not open to public approbation, and not submissive to the rule of law as a whole. Therefore violent campaigns, such as those engaged in by some animal rights (see Rights, Animals*) activists and some anti-abortionists, are seen as more akin to campaigns of insurgency, like those waged at varying levels by nationalist movements. On the other hand, lawful protests, e.g. orderly demonstrations and marches, which do not break the law, are on occasion a proper part of political life and raise no special moral issue. Civil disobedience openly breaks the law in order to draw attention to political injustice, or to change the law or public policy. Even in its law-breaking, it remains submissive to the rule of law as a whole and is willing to accept the proper legal punishment.

Modern theories of civil disobedience are able to claim authority in Christian tradition. Peter and the apostles argued, 'We must obey God rather than men' (Acts 5:29) when refusing not to teach in the name of Jesus. Much later, Thomas Aquinas* argued that justice was so essential to law that an unjust law was no law, from which it would follow that it cannot command obedience. More commonly, however, the church has more cautiously taught the duty of obedience even to an unjust regime. In this it has followed a clear strand of NT thought (cf. Rom. 13:1-7; 1 Pet. 2:13-14). The points at which Christian thought has reached widespread agreement on the duty of disobedience to the State and its laws are: 1. when believers are required to deny their faith in Christ, or explicitly disown their Lord; and 2. when the State has required Christians to take part in action which is in clear conflict with their Christianly formed conscience.*

Political philosophers gave considerable attention to the question in the late 1960s, and have continued to discuss it. Two movements in the 1960s brought it to prominence: the civil rights movement led by Martin Luther King,* and the anti-Vietnam War protests. It raises points of great interest for political theory. Its paradoxical quality is of obvious interest, but more fundamentally it raises basic questions about the nature of civil law and civil obedience. Naturally, different philosophers answer these questions in different ways. But there would be a general consensus for the view that, though civil disobedience cannot be ruled out on every occasion, it must be carefully justified. It must meet a number of relatively strenuous criteria. These criteria would supply a good starting-point for any Christian view of the matter. The following criteria follow from the nature of civil disobedience as outlined above: 1. All constitutional and democratic means must genuinely be exhausted. It is far preferable to persuade people by democratic argument. Some argue that in practice one can never exhaust the possibilities of lawful democratic methods, and conclude that in practically every case civil disobedience diverts energy and resources from proper democratic channels. 2. Civil disobedience should be open and public. It should be submissive to arrest and punishment, ready to take responsibility for its illegal actions. 3. It should strongly prefer non-violent methods; some would say that it must insist on non-violence.*4. Actions of civil disobedience should display a good knowledge of the law, and a full respect for it. 5. Actions should be appropriate to the cause. 6. Civil disobedience should have a specific and realistic end in view. It should not be designed or undertaken in ways that are politically counter-productive. Fundamentally it remains only an extreme form of protest and persuasion, and it is not a form of coercion.

Bibliography

H. A. Bedau (ed.), Civil Disobedience in Focus (London, 1991); D. Bonhoeffer, Ethics (London, 1971); J. F. Childress, Civil Disobedience and Political Obligation (New Haven, CT, 1971); C. Gans, Philosophical Anarchism and Political Disobedience (Cambridge, 1992); J. Rawls, A Theory of Justice (Cambridge, MA, 1971; Oxford, 1972).

D.J.E.A.

CLAPHAM SECT, THE. A group of politicians, mainly evangelicals and mainly resident in and about Clapham, who acted with William Wilberforce- in his campaigns against the slave trade and other social evils at the turn of the 19th century.

Clapham at that time was a separate village, some five miles from London, that was home to a growing community of businessmen from the City. Among them was Henry Thornton (1760-1815), a banker and MP for Southwark, who erected a house for his fellow evangelical Charles Grant (1746-1823), a director of the East India Company. Wilberforce lived with Thornton from 1793 until 1797, when, on his marriage, he set up a separate household in the village. Others attracted by the group and by the evangelical ministry of John Venn (1759-1813), rector of Clapham from 1792, included James Stephen (1758-1832), a fiery barrister; Lord Teignmouth (1751-1834), a former Governor-General of India; and Zachary Macaulay (1768-1838), a former Governor of Sierra Leone who in 1802 became editor of the evangelical Anglican Christian Observer. The only non-Anglican member of the group was William Smith (1756-1835), a Socinian dissenter, who was also a Foxite Whig. Most, however, were followers of the Prime Minister, William Pitt (1759-1806).

Their powerful political connections enabled the Claphamites to bring about the abolition of the slave trade in 1807, to exert pressure for the stricter enforcement of legislation against disorderly behaviour, and to open India to Christian missionaries. They were also generous to the British and Foreign Bible Society, to Sunday schools and to many charitable causes.

Bibliography

E. M. Howse, Saints in Politics: The 'Clapham Sect' and the Growth of Freedom (London, 1953).

D.W.Be.

CLASS CONFLICT, see INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS; LIBERATION THEOLOGY.

CLIENT-CENTRED COUNSELLING. Carl Rogers,* with his conviction that the individual has all the inner resources needed for innovation and change, was the initiator of client-centredness in the developing counselling movement (see Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy†). In the 1940s, he stressed the technique of non-directiveness in order to facilitate the client's uninhibited expression of feelings, the gaining of personal insight and the making of constructive choices. During the following decade, Rogers shifted his emphasis to the more dynamic notion of client-centredness, in which the therapeutic process is enhanced by the counsellor's basic trust in the client's capacity for insight and personal growth. This trust, to be effective, needs to be demonstrated by the counsellor's genuineness, empathic- understanding, and unconditional acceptance* of the client's thoughts, feelings and actions. Catalysed by the exercise of these therapeutic qualities in the counsellor, the client becomes aware of the distortions and denials (see Defence Mechanisms*) in his or her self-understanding (see Self*), learns to reflect more realistically on and assimilate life's experiences, and thus begins to move towards a more integrated personality.*

In the 1970s, Rogers' stance widened to a more fully developed personalism which has been termed 'person-centredness', a perspective which has extended its influence beyond the realm of individual and group counselling and psychotherapy into the fields of education, management and cross-cultural communication. In this development, Rogers argued that the welcoming and non-judgmental acceptance of the individual releases not only therapeutic change but a process of 'changingness' in every aspect of the person's life. To quote Van Belle's summary of Rogers' person-centredness: 'One becomes an experiential organismic process, and thus a more fully functioning person' (Basic Intent, p. 51).

The influence of client- and person-centredness is widespread too in Christian personalism, since, although humanistic presuppositions will be rejected, the valuing of the person in his or her uniqueness is fundamental in a biblical anthropology. Paul Tournier,* the Swiss medical practitioner, in his dialogue-counselling and co-founding of Médecine de la Personne, established a person-centredness which gave full reign not only to the intra- and interpersonal aspects of the therapeutic relationship but to a Christ-centredness which kept that relationship open to a dialogue with God.

Bibliography

R. F. Levant and J. Shlien (eds.) Client-Centered Therapy and the Person-Centered Approach (New York, 1984); D. Mearns and B. Thorne, Person-Centred Counselling in Action (London and Beverly Hills, CA, 1988); C. R. Rogers, Client-Centered Therapy (Boston, MA, 1951); idem, On Becoming a Person (London, 1967); P. Tournier, The Meaning of Persons (ET, London and New York, 1957); H. A. Van Belle, Basic Intent and Therapeutic Approach of Carl R. Rogers (Toronto, 1980).

R.F.H.

CLIENT-CENTRED THERAPY, see CHARACTER;† CLIENT-CENTRED COUNSELLING; ROGERS, CARL

CLINICAL THEOLOGY. In the 1950s a missionary doctor, Frank Lake,* retrained as a psychiatrist, and developed a radical synthesis of theological and psychological ideas, which he called 'clinical theology'. Influenced particularly by Søren Kierkegaard,* John of the Cross (1542-91), and the 'object-relations' theories of psychoanalysis, Lake explored the pain* that living brought to many people, from these differing perspectives. He wanted those suffering from psychological problems to find help in the Christian faith.

Through the use of the drug LSD (lysergic acid diethylamide) to recover repressed memories, Lake discovered that birth and early life produced significant psychological trauma. Looking for a theological understanding of this, Lake produced his 'dynamic cycle'* based on the life of Jesus. He thus brought together a clinical psychiatric and psychoanalytic understanding that made theological sense, and an existential theology that made psychological sense: hence 'clinical theology'. Lake's ideas were never fully accepted in psychiatric, psychoanalytic or theological circles.

From 1958, Lake established clinical theology groups in various Anglican dioceses. These groups proved successful and in 1962 the Clinical Theology Association (CTA) was formed to develop this work, with other colleagues joining Lake. The significance of these groups was threefold: there was little training in psychology at theological colleges and many clergy felt ill-equipped to meet the demands of parish life; by including doctors and psychiatrists, these groups enabled clergy to be accepted where their traditional 'helping' role had been marginalized; and the groups encouraged self-awareness and helped the personal growth of many clergy.

Throughout the 1960s, the work of the CTA continued to expand. Its theoretical basis was published in 1966 in Lake's Clinical Theology; it helped sponsor Contact, an influential journal discussing psychological, pastoral and theological issues; and as the numbers attending the courses grew, a base was established at Lingdale in Nottingham.

In the 1970s Lake became more influenced by experiential-style groups and he came to see the origins of emotional pain as being the first months in the womb (mother-foetal distress syndrome). The CTA became more experiential with the main focus becoming primal therapy.* Lake found support for his ideas in the 'inner healing'* of the charismatic movement and the writings of Pope John Paul II, developing these ideas in Tight Corners in Pastoral Counselling (London, 1981). On Lake's death the CTA went through considerable trauma in trying to resolve the two foci of Lake's work, and still maintains a difficult balancing act. The CTA's influence in the church lessened in the 1970s, although, among secular psychotherapists, Lake is regarded as pioneering primal therapy in Britain.

Lake had a passionate desire to help those in mental pain, and was known for his intensive involvement with people and his huge capacity for work, sadly at no small cost to his family. Because of his own needs, Lake was difficult to work with and the CTA never developed to its full potential. Out of his struggle to relate his deep faith to his inner pain, Lake produced a creative but flawed synthesis of psychological and theological ideas. His search for new ideas hindered a fully worked integration of his existing ideas. However, the CTA played an important part in developing pastoral counselling in Britain.

See also: PASTORAL CARE, COUNSELLING AND PSYCHOTHERAPY.†

Bibliography

C. Christian, In the Spirit of Truth: a reader in the work of Frank Lake (London, 1991); F. Lake, Clinical Theology (London, 1966), abridged version by M. H. Yeomans (London, 1986); J. Peters, Frank Lake, the Man and his Work (London, 1989).

J.A.R.

CLONING, see MANIPULATION.

CLOSED SHOP, see TRADE UNIONS.

CODES OF PRACTICE, see PROFESSIONAL ETHICS.

COERCION, see FORCE.

COGNITIVE BEHAVIOUR THERAPY is a form of structured psychological therapy which has been developed since the late 1960s, developing from the ideas of behaviourism and behaviour therapy to emphasize centrally the role of cognitions and feelings in psychological disturbance. It now constitutes a distinctive form of secular psychological treatment, contrasted with the other main forms, which are psychodynamic, humanistic and behavioural treatments. It is a more liberal form of behaviour therapy in the recognition paid to thoughts and beliefs in understanding and changing psychiatric and psychological problems, and thus is of special interest pastorally. It is also linked to the more cognitive approach adopted in academic psychology generally, illustrated by a recent study of religious belief from a cognitive perspective (see F. N. Watts and J. M. G. Williams, The Psychology of Religious Knowing).

The extension of the behavioural paradigm essentially proposes a three- or four-systems approach to psychological problems, suggesting behavioural, cognitive and/or affective, and physiological systems. This alternative to a unitary behavioural view is important, because it helps to account for a wider range of symptom patterns which patients report, and leads to a more appropriate evaluation of treatment outcome. In therapeutic practice, cognitive behaviour therapy (CBT) concentrates on the here-and-now, as opposed to the attention paid to developmental issues in more psychodynamic approaches, and it utilizes three major categories of procedures - problem-solving, cognitive restructuring and coping skills - as an integral part of treatment. All aspects of therapy are made explicit to the patient, and therapist and patient work openly and collaboratively towards agreed goals, and to that extent the patient has more control over treatment than in some other forms of psychological treatment. Along with other forms of brief focused therapy, CBT may also offer an effective alternative to the so-called minor tranquillizers, which do have some potential for creating dependency.

Some distinctively Christian approaches to pastoral counselling have been developed within a cognitive-behavioural framework, using terms such as biblical counselling,* misbelief therapy and inner healing.* The steps used in such approaches employ such terms as encouragement, exhortation and enlightenment, and in their detailed identification of problem feelings, behaviour and thinking may closely parallel secular approaches. These specifically Christian approaches may be particularly helpful with people who are depressed (see Depression*). It is not uncommon for the thoughts of such people to focus on their real or imagined guilt,* or to be related to perfectionist characteristics, and the cognitive approach can then integrate the patient's concepts of God, of sin and of judgment, with their present problem, while respecting the patient's own theological position. Inner healing approaches may be helpful for those with problems arising from past events or abuse.*

The Christian pastoral community has not yet fully absorbed the significance of cognitive treatment methods. Along with any other treatment modality, they have their own assumptions and methods. Positively, from a professional point of view they offer well-validated effective treatment for a range of mood- and anxiety-related conditions. From a Christian point of view they may contribute to setting Christians free from erroneous or unbiblical cognitions and beliefs (1 Cor. 12:1-2; Eph. 4:22-24). They view people as active partners in treatment, able to contribute rationally and emotionally to understanding their problem, and they are able fully to integrate the person's own beliefs into treatment. On the other hand, cognitive methods may neglect issues of early relationship and other contextual factors, they can be seen as essentially pragmatic without a coherent underlying philosophy, and can be viewed as denying the experiential and revelational parts of a person's Christian faith. Cognitive approaches have at least as much potential for integration with pastoral practice as other primarily secular approaches that have been welcomed within the pastoral fold, and deserve close attention by pastoral counsellors and theologians.

See also: BEHAVIOURISM, BEHAVIOUR THERAPY AND MODIFICATION; ELLIS, ALBERT; PASTORAL CARE, COUNSELLING AND PSYCHOTHERAPY.†

Bibliography

L. J. Crabb, Effective Biblical Counselling (Grand Rapids, 1977); K. Hawton et al., Cognitive Behaviour Therapy for Psychiatric Problems (Oxford, 1989); F. N. Watts and J. M. G. Williams, The Psychology of Religious Knowing (Cambridge, 1988).

J.N.H.

COHABITATION. A cohabiting couple may be defined as 'any unmarried heterosexual couple who consistently share a common residence and regularly engage in sexual intercourse'. Cohabitation can be very temporary and casual (more like 'steady dating'), or it may be a preparation for marriage* or a substitute for it. Since the 1970s the incidence of cohabitation has increased sharply in many Western societies (D. Dormer, The Relationship Revolution, pp. 7-20). In Britain, for example, cohabitation before marriage had become the majority practice by 1992.

Some of the perceived advantages of cohabitation are: 1. it is easier to begin and end than marriage; 2. it can be cheaper; 3. it seems to be more loving because it does not depend on the external prop of the marriage bond; 4. it provides the opportunity to try out a relationship prior to making the full commitment of marriage; 5. it offers a relationship where sex roles are less stereotyped; and 6. it combines the sexual and emotional closeness of marriage with the autonomy of singlehood.

Cohabitation and the Bible

Marriage is presented in the Scriptures as the normative sexual relationship. Although there is no specific mention of cohabitation in Scripture, all sexual relationships (see Sexuality†) can be measured against the norms governing marriage. A number of key areas of biblical teaching are relevant to cohabitation.

Love. Permanence is at the heart of the biblical understanding of the committed reliable love that should characterize marriage. Cohabitation, however, rarely involves a commitment to permanence because: 1. it is often chosen in preference to marriage precisely because no such commitment is involved; 2. it often begins in a casual and indefinite way with no discussion about the likely duration of the relationship; and 3. there is a bias against permanence in the surrounding culture (it is seen as idealistic and impracticable). It is ironic that many people opt for cohabitation as a trial for marriage because the one thing that you cannot have a trial for is a permanent relationship such as marriage.

Vows. Though vows are not explicitly mentioned in Scripture, they are implicit in the idea of 'cleave' (AV) or 'be united' (Gn. 2:24). Wedding vows have two functions: 1. to define the nature of the relationship; and 2. to declare future intent. Whilst marriage is a commitment for the future as well as for the present, cohabitation tends to be a relationship just for the present with the future left deliberately open-ended. Some cohabitants have defined their relationships and future intentions with written contracts, but these write impermanence and, sometimes, unfaithfulness too into their very heart.

Sex. The Bible views sex in the context of the union of lives. This is the meaning of 'one flesh' (Gn. 2:24). Cohabitation involves sexual union without the full committed union of lives. Sex without a lifelong commitment 'violates the inner reality of the act; it is wrong because unmarried people thereby engage in life-uniting acts without a life-uniting intent' (L. Smedes, Sex in the Real World, Grand Rapids, 1976, p. 122).

Community. Marriage in the Bible is more than a private contract between individuals. It unites families. It is something that society recognizes and respects. The community offers married couples certain protections and places certain responsibilities on them. Cohabitation, however, is an essentially private relationship, and is largely blind to this community dimension.

Children. Couples in Scripture have a general duty to care for children* and educate them. Children need to grow up in the security that a constant permanent married relationship, at its best, affords.

Freedom. Cohabitation appears to be freer than marriage, but the freedom to leave introduces fear* into the relationship. Fear is destructive of real freedom, which grows best in the security of a loving, committed, permanent relationship.

Cohabitation and the church

What practical steps ought the church to take in facing the challenge posed by the present increased incidence of cohabitation? Here are some suggestions: 1. Beware of generalizations. All cohabitation relationships are different. Some are closer to the biblical norms than others, and this needs to be acknowledged, as does the fact that many marriages fall short of them. 2. Be sensitive to those who have opted for cohabitation as a result of painful experiences of marriage (whether their own or others'). 3. Take marriage preparation for cohabitants seriously. A wedding will not automatically regularize a relationship if it is founded on unbiblical ideas that have gone unchallenged. 4. Develop a convincing apologetic for marriage, and be prepared to teach and commend a Christian marriage to a sceptical generation.

The church's approach to cohabitation needs to be rooted in the convictions that 1. marriage is created by God; 2. it is good; and 3. it is for all humankind.

Bibliography

D. Dormer, The Relationship Revolution (London, 1992); G. Forster, Marriage before Marriage? (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1988); G. Jenkins, Cohabitation: A Biblical Perspective (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1992); E. Pratt, Living in Sin? (Southsea, 1992).

G.J.J.

COLLECTIVISM, see COMMUNITY ETHICS.†

COLONIALISM. Narrowly defined, colonialism may be described as that form of imperialism in which the imperial power imposes formal governmental control on a people or territory, usually without having to resort to large-scale human settlement or colonization. In this sense, the term is most commonly used by historians today to refer to the expansion of Western political control into the non-Western world, such as the substantial empires constructed by Spain and Portugal in South America in the 16th century or the tropical empires acquired by the European powers during the 1880s and 1890s, and dismantled only during the 1950s and 1960s. In much Marxist thought, this late 19th century efflorescence of colonialism is seen (developing a theory of Lenin's) as a result of the evolution of capitalism* towards its final or monopolistic phase, in which the control ling financial forces of capitalism dictated the partition of the globe between the capitalist powers.

More loosely, colonialism is frequently employed in popular parlance as a synonym for imperialism, being applied to any tendency on the part of powerful nations and peoples to dominate and exploit the economy, life and culture* of less powerful nations and peoples.

Whatever definition is adopted, colonialism should properly be recognized as a recurring feature of human political behaviour through out history, and not the peculiarity of any one period, economic system or ideology.

From the perspective of Christian ethics, colonialism poses two primary questions. The first relates to the appropriate moral judgment to be passed on the phenomenon itself. In so far as colonial states have existed to serve the interests of the colonial power, and not for the sake of the colonized population, political and economic exploitation of the subject peoples is an inescapable ingredient of colonialism. To that extent, unequivocal moral censure of colonialism seems the only response appropriate to a Christian. However, such exploitation does not necessarily mean that in every case the colonized people were left in a worse condition than before the advent of the colonial power; it means only that any material good accruing to the subject people from colonial rule was ultimately outweighed by the economic or political benefit extracted by the colonial power from the connection.

The issue needs to be seen in the wider context of debates about the function and legitimacy of political power.* In the modern world, made up as it is of sovereign nation-states, colonialism may be more easily differentiated from other forms of political rule than in the past, where political units were less clearly defined and concepts of nationhood often weak or non-existent. Thus neither the OT nor the NT makes any principled distinction between political rule exercised within the boundaries of a nation-state and that exercised over subject peoples beyond those boundaries. The only distinction which matters for the biblical writers is that between nations which seek to reflect the divine values of justice (see Justice and Peace†), righteousness* and compassion,* and those which pay scant regard for such values. Large colonial empires, such as those of Assyria or Babylon, may be intrinsically less likely to exhibit divine values than smaller political units, but they are condemned, not because they are empires rather than nation-states, but because the manner of their rule is unrighteous and arrogant. However, any censure of colonialism has to come to terms with the fact that many colonialists (often animated by religious faith) have genuinely believed themselves to be serving the best interests of the colonized peoples.

The second issue raised for Christian ethics by this subject is thus the ambiguous relationship which has frequently existed between Christian missionary endeavour and colonial powers. Most British Christians regarded the British empire in the 19th and 20th centuries as an instrument of God's purposes for the temporal good and eternal salvation of the subject peoples. This conviction lay behind the general readiness of missionaries and their supporters to espouse the general aims of British colonialism, even though they persistently challenged the repeated failure of colonial policy-makers and administrators to act in the best interests of the subject peoples. Christians today who wish to regard such convictions as fundamentally misguided are surely obliged to attempt to construct a theology of divine providence in history which balances the fact that God can never approve of exploitation* with a recognition that empires can be part of God's purposes of judgment and salvation for the world.

Bibliography

D. K. Fieldhouse, Colonialism 1870-1945: An Introduction (London, 1981); S. C. Neill, Colonialism and Christian Missions (London, 1966); B. Stanley, The Bible and the Flag: Protestant Missions and British Imperialism in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries (Leicester, 1990).

B.S.

COLOUR, see RACE.

COMA is a deep loss of consciousness in which vital functions (breathing, circulation, waste elimination, temperature control) are maintained either naturally or artificially. A person in coma does not respond to stimulation outwardly. There is growing evidence that in some cases stimuli, even spoken words, may be perceived unconsciously, and may alter subsequent behaviour. An anaesthetic is medically induced coma.

The higher brain (cerebral cortex) is depressed in coma; the presence of coma does not itself show whether or not higher brain function can or cannot return.

Natural sleep resembles coma, but a sleeper can be awakened.

Coma can be caused by a wide variety of factors: low or high body temperature, chemical poisons, biochemical imbalances of many kinds, brain injury (e.g. 'knockout'), lack of oxygen or accumulation of carbon dioxide, inflammations of the brain and brain tumours.

Recoverable coma can be very prolonged, even weeks or months in exceptional cases. But coma carries its own secondary dangers such as infections, vascular problems, and skin and stomach ulcers, which can be fatal.

Recovery from coma can reveal brain damage, witnessed by loss of intellect, emotional lability or personality change.

On rare occasions, though expressive consciousness is not regained since the damage to the higher fore-brain has been too severe, the hindbrain is able to sustain control of breathing and circulation and the eyes are open so that the patient appears to be awake, though entirely unresponsive. This is called 'persistent vegetative state'; it raises extreme ethical difficulty because there is no sign that the patient has true consciousness, though this cannot be proven. In the early stages of this state careful nutrition and continuous stimulation have, in a few cases, resulted in a return to full awareness. In chronic cases, however, this has not succeeded. It is then that the difficult decision to discontinue treatment has had to be addressed; such cases have on occasion endured for over three years, with immense stress to all involved. (See C. Dyer, BMJ 305, 10 Oct 1992, pp. 853-854; see also R.V. Rakestraw, 'The Persistent Vegetative State and the Withdrawal of Nutrition and Hydration', Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 35.3, 1992, pp. 389-405.)

Many pastoral problems arise, including: 1. family support during a prolonged, distressing illness; 2. concerns about the spiritual state of the unconscious person; 3. concern about the extent and duration of active medical and nursing measures: How long should efforts be made to save life? What will be the mental condition of the patient given recovery of consciousness? If there is brain death,* should active care be withdrawn?; 4. can any stimuli or messages reach the unconscious person, even if he or she cannot respond? and 5. in coma, patients may move or appear to respond to others for purely reflex (lower brain) reasons. This may lead relatives to draw quite false inferences about their likelihood of recovery or their expressed wishes.

When coma is prolonged, feelings of real or imagined guilt* often appear within families, which add to an already very stressful time; such factors can evoke unhelpful behaviour and reopen old tensions amongst relatives. The prolonged visiting involved is also very tiring and emotionally taxing.

A considerable problem of autonomy* arises. In most illnesses patients are able to express their wishes about their illness, its treatment, and what should happen if they do not recover. If unconscious, patients cannot express such autonomous choices. Relatives are not necessarily reliable guides to a patient's wishes. They cannot give consent* for another. To cover such circumstances, some advocate drawing up a 'living will' or 'advance directive', which indicates what patients want to happen or not happen at such time as they are unable to express their wishes.

It is very important to take care about all that is said near someone who is in coma. Not only is there evidence that spoken thoughts may influence those who are unconscious but there are well-recorded examples of people hearing and remembering things said near them when they seemed to be unconscious.

A central medical duty is to communicate adequately and with sympathy with the family of a comatose patient; much of the distress arises from the uncertainties which inevitably accompany coma, and which are markedly increased by lack of information. Because the outlook is so uncertain, unless there is demonstrable brain death, patients in coma must be treated as if they were going to recover and be accorded the status of those who are potentially conscious.

The 'locked-in syndrome' is a very rare, but extremely difficult, situation in which someone appears to be unconscious but can in fact perceive their surroundings without being able to respond.

It is often difficult to know how hard to try to treat comatose patients after the first few days. Decisions are varied by several considerations: age, outlook for the causal disorder, outlook for brain damage, and how many and how severely body systems are broken down all contribute to the decision. It is important, if efforts to cure cease and only care remains, to remove the paraphernalia of medical technology, so as to restore dignity and calm to an otherwise distressing environment.

See also: ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE.†

D.W.V.

COMMERCE, see ECONOMIC ETHICS.†

COMMON OWNERSHIP. Although it is self-evident that we bring nothing into this world and can take nothing out of it, humankind is instinctively acquisitive and individuals naturally tend to assert the right to possess land or goods to the exclusion of others. A person will not willingly labour to till the soil except in expectation of its crop, or build or manufacture except to earn a livelihood. If people are entitled to benefit from their own labour, society must offer some protection for that benefit. Some have argued with Proudhon (1809-65) that all ownership is theft, but in practice organized society will not long endure without some concept of property.* Most societies have been able to survive and advance only by facilitating the exchange of property by means of a common coin. Normally ownership can be transmitted on death either to heirs of the testator's choice or according to regulations made by society. The tension between what an individual may justifiably treat as his or her 'own' and what ought to be regarded as the common rights of all has led to various schemes of proprietorship.

Invariably in order to regulate the conduct of members of a society for the mutual good, its governments (of whatever sort) must be financed by transferring a percentage of the property in individual ownerships into a fund at the disposal of the government intended to be used for the common benefit (see Taxation*). This revenue in fact represents a form of common ownership, although frequently not recognized as such. Societies differ in the extent to which individuals have any influence or control over the destination of such revenue.

Historically various attempts have been made to create not merely a common purse of some of the wealth of society but an equal sharing in the whole of that wealth. Such common ownership has been mainly confined either to fairly primitive rural societies or else it has been only partial and short-lived. Common ownership is more easily managed over grazing or hunting land than over arable land, buildings or movable property. Common ownership of the means of production and public utilities was fundamental to the ideology of socialism.* Whilst theoretically such industries and services belonged to everyone in the State, in practice they came to be operated bureaucratically and it was sometimes doubtful if they were being run for the benefit of anyone, let alone everyone. Therefore such public ownership is increasingly falling out of favour in the West and Westernized countries.

Although forms of ownership vary in different legal systems, the common elements are control over the property owned and responsibility for it. Where more than one person 'owns' the same property, mechanisms must be provided for resolving internal disputes between the various 'owners' of the same thing. A small group (or an individual) may emerge which is able to impose its will on the use of the property. Thus the group members' 'rights' or enjoyment of ownership tend to bring more benefit to them than to their theoretical co owners. Commonly owned property has often ended up being parcelled out amongst the individual owners, who thereby assumed exclusive rights over their divided share. For instance, in England lands which had from Anglo-Saxon times been common lands enjoyed by the residents of a particular village were mostly 'enclosed' as private land by a series of Acts of Parliament during the 17th to 19th centuries.

Externally, third parties dealing with common property have found it inconvenient to have to deal with every one of a multiplicity of owners. Most legal systems have therefore evolved methods for making a few representative owners responsible vis-a-vis the rest of society, leaving them to resolve the consequences internally amongst all the owners.

Theocratic Israel represented a limited type of common ownership in that the land belonged to God and no-one was able to alienate in perpetuity his tribal inheritance. The most that could be sold was the right to the crops for however many years remained until the next jubilee, when the land reverted to its original tribal family. In essence this was a commonwealth in which every native-born Israelite owned an inalienable (albeit unequal) right to a part of the land.

The famous NT instance of the early Jerusalem church (Acts 2:44-45; 4:32-35) is not strictly an example of common ownership at all, but rather a sale of individual assets (Acts 5:1-4) resulting in the proceeds being placed into a common purse and disbursed for the collective good. No attempt appears to have been made to control and manage jointly owned assets for the long-term support of the group, so that in fact within a matter of a few years the collective purse was empty and they became reliant upon the support of other churches (Rom. 15:26). The fall of Jerusalem (AD 70) meant that little was lost by the earlier sale of property within the city, but the Jerusalem experiment does not appear to have been copied in any other NT churches.

See also: OLD TESTAMENT ETHICS.†

D.P.N.

COMMUNISM. The idea of communism as a social system in which members resign their rights to ownership and share possessions in common has recurred throughout history. Early Christians are described as having 'everything in common' (Acts 4:32, RSV), surrendering their possessions for redistribution by the apostles according to the principle of need (Acts 4:34-35). There are strong echoes of this in Christian communities which adopted this early Christian communism as a model (e.g. the Anabaptist* group called the Hutterites and their Bruderhof communities which are based on the common ownership of property).

In the 20th century the dominant meaning became detached from the communitarian ideal and utopian socialism and became synonymous with the political and social system of the State socialist countries under Communist Party rule. These countries had similar ideologies, political structures and economic systems despite continuing to have distinct national characteristics. The ideology of communism is in direct line of descent from Karl* and Friedrich Engels (1820-95) who, in the Communist Manifesto of 1848, saw communism as the final stage in the history of class societies. Their utopian vision of a society free from material necessity, private property and social exploitation inspired the revolutionary working-class movements which eventually led to the 1917 Bolshevik revolution and to the rule of the Communist Party in the Soviet Union under Lenin (1870-1924). The subsequent development of State socialist societies expressed the tension between two interpretations of revolution: one based on the Paris commune of 1871 in which the citizens of Paris rejected State authority in a popular participatory movement, and another which created a new centralized authority - the 'dictatorship of the proletariat'. Marxism-Leninism in the Soviet Union, like the regimes of post-war Eastern Europe and Maoist China, took the latter course. The common ideological features of the communist world are scientific materialism, atheism and authoritarianism. The political regimes consist of a combined Party-State structure with a monopoly of power which permeates all institutions and levels of society. Economic production and distribution are subject to a centrally controlled command system which, over time, may be modified to include elements of market regulation, but which is still subject to the inefficiencies of planning.

The status and meaning of religion in communist societies is quite clear. It is identified as a reactionary force, either tolerated as a residual phenomenon in the transition to socialism and communism, or deliberately repressed as a form of counter-revolutionary activity. In practice, there have been great variations in the tolerance and intolerance of religion in the history of communism. At the times when communist parties needed internal allies or were under threat from external enemies, as in the Soviet Union in the 1940s, religious institutions and expressions of belief were granted more space, especially if they provided a useful focus for patriotic sentiment. At other times, official recognition for religious groups was withheld or granted with extreme reluctance, thus driving many believers into a shadow or underground existence. The history of attempts to tame or abolish religion under communism are well documented by a number of authors including Trevor Beeson (1926-), Michael Bordeaux (1934-) and the publications of Keston College, Kent.

Communism challenges Christian belief and practice in two quite different ways. 1. Communism is a system of ideology which, despite its atheism, contains a certain structural resemblance to religion. It has a vision of a future kingdom of harmony, the proletariat is like a chosen people, and the revolutionary movement invites total commitment in the ideological struggle. This encouraged the view, popular in some quarters at the height of the Cold War, which identified communism with Antichrist, and attitudes of total hostility which at times have even been used to justify the threat of military annihilation. In sharp contrast to this was the response of the Christian-Marxist dialogue (most active in the years of détente) which explored the areas of convergence as well as divergence between Christian and Marxist communist beliefs, so as to create the basis for co-operation in the building of socialist society. Such dialogue was never officially recognized, and the main practical consequence of communist ideology in Eastern Europe, the former Soviet Union and China has been to deny religion any public role, although the unintended consequence has been to give it inner strength through persecution.

2. Communism as a form of revolutionary praxis* challenges Christians to express their solidarity with the poor. The experience of Latin America and Third World countries is most pertinent here. Some earlier traditions of Christian theology and ethics were prepared to justify resistance to or rebellion* against unjust powers provided that it could be shown by reference to natural law* that the fundamental moral community had been violated (see Civil Disobedience*). Liberation theology,* however, recognizes that class struggle and the violence of the oppressor are endemic and unavoidable facts. The problem for Christian involvement in proletarian revolution is not that it needs to be justified as a special case. Rather, it is the problem of the relationship between means and ends in a world which is in constant transformation. A communist revolution leading to the dictatorship of the proletariat is not committed to justice and peace as primary goals. History shows that the pattern of the communist rise to power is through cynical manipulation of the coercive apparatus of the State, and that revolutionary thinking often becomes trapped by the dualistic conception that through revolution evil can be overcome.

Can one be a Christian and a communist? Most would answer this question in the negative. Membership of communist parties is normally denied to those professing religious beliefs, while active involvement in an atheistic movement is clearly incompatible with Christian witness. But this clear antithesis does not offer any easy way out of the characteristic dilemmas of being a citizen in a communist country where, for example, party membership may be a condition of practising one's profession or any public service.

The events in Eastern Europe in 1989 were hailed as the end of communism. While communism is no longer a force in that region or in the former Soviet Union, except as a burden of history, China and some other countries have yet to follow the same path. Even where communism has ceased to play an active role, its legacy will persist in a number of forms: through continued dependency on the authority of the State, habits of suspicion and secrecy, and ignorance of spiritual teaching. As an idea, the utopian aspect of communist ideology - an end to human alienation* and social divisions based on private property - is likely to remain as one of the key motifs in speculation about the future destination of modern societies.

Bibliography

T. Beeson, Discretion and Valour (London and Philadelphia, 1982); M. Bordeaux, Gorbachev, Glasnost and the Gospel (London, 1990); D. Lane, Soviet Economy and Society (Oxford and New York, 1985); J. Lawrence, The Hammer and the Cross (London, 1986); V. I. Lenin, The State and Revolution (Moscow, 1974).

H.H.D.

COMMUNITY, see COMMUNITY ETHICS;† SOCIETY.

COMPASSION. As popularly conceived, compassion means both the emotion experienced when a person is moved by the suffering of others, and the act of entering into the suffering of another person with the purpose of relieving it. The first conceptualization may include a desire to relieve suffering; the second requires action to relieve it. In Christian ethics the former is an insufficient response to suffering; the expression of compassion must include an active involvement on the part of the one who shows compassion.

Compassion, consequently, involves 'doing' rather than just 'saying'. A compassionate response to suffering requires that one be moved by the suffering of the other, act to remove the immediate effects of the suffering, and respond at length to correct the structures which may have given rise to the suffering itself. The person who shows and lives compassion, therefore, accepts responsibility to heal, bring hope and minister justice. Compassion is the avenue by which God's grace and Spirit - spiritually, emotionally and physically - come to those in need.

Compassion is demonstrated in the life of Jesus, and it is also part of the instruction he gave to those who inquired how they might follow him. The Gospel narratives indicate that as Jesus travelled throughout the towns and villages 'he had compassion' for the people 'because they were harassed and helpless, like sheep without a shepherd' (Mt. 9:36; see also 14:14; Mk. 1:41; etc.).

In the parable of the good Samaritan, Jesus indicates that he who acted uprightly was the one who, upon seeing the wounded man by the side of the road, 'had compassion on him' (Lk. 10:33, RSV). The compassion of the Samaritan was, furthermore, reflected in the specific actions he took to help him recover (Lk. 10:34-35).

Other parts of Scripture as well regard compassion as an essential virtue* of the ethical life. As we fulfil the command to love one another (see 1 Jn. 3:11-18), we express compassion; this is the case also when we 'carry each other's burdens' (Gal. 6:2). The instruction of Jesus, and that of the rest of Scripture, teaches that: 1. compassion centres on the need of the other, rather than on one's own need; 2. it is not obligation to every neighbour, i.e. to all persons in need; and 3. it is not just an emotion or passive feeling, but an active response to need.

Compassion, further, must not be limited to personal relationships. It must also be directed to social problems. Where there is hunger, compassion requires the feeding of the hungry. Where there is poverty,* compassion requires economic justice (see Justice and Peace†). Where there is oppression, compassion requires social and political reform.

Repeatedly, the Psalms indicate that God is a 'compassionate and gracious God' (Ps. 86:15; see also 111:4 and 145:8). Because God is one who suffers with those who suffer, it is in compassionate action that we encounter God. When we fulfil the command to 'show mercy and compassion to one another' (Zc. 7:9) we find God.

In biblical imagery, the antithesis of compassion is 'hardness of heart'. Here compassion is dried up; the person characterized by hardness of heart can no longer see and feel the pain and suffering of others. The Pharaoh of the Exodus is the clearest biblical example of this attitude (Ex. 8:15).

See also: MERCY.

D.L.P.

COMPETITION, see CAPITALISM; CARTELS; MONOPOLIES.

COMPROMISE. A compromise is basically the accommodation of an ethical rule or principle to the exigencies of life in the real world. Within that definition, however, important distinctions need to be made.

At one extreme, compromise may represent evasion of duty,* when a clear obligation is avoided on ethically inadequate grounds for the sake of personal advantage. At the other extreme, a compromise may express an intention to discover God's will in an ethically ambivalent situation, especially when two or more principles dictate courses of action which are incompatible.

In between the two extremes, some compromises are made in a serious effort to adapt principles to life's circumstances. A strike,* for example, may be resolved by a mediating compromise which does some justice to both sides in the dispute, without fully meeting the claims of either.

However a compromise is evaluated, the use of the word implies that deontological* concerns are paramount. Compromises imply the existence of absolutes.* This contrasts with the teleological* language of utilitarianism (see Consequentialism*). The utilitarian evaluates means relatively in terms of their ends. Those who embrace compromise (reluctantly, perhaps) tacitly accept that there are some things which are always right or wrong in themselves.

By his teaching and example, Jesus condemned the kind of evasive compromise which exempts a believer from obvious obligations. If there is a clear choice between the Lord's will and personal gain, Christians are left in no doubt where their duty lies; there is no scope for negotiation between God and money, when both claim mastery (Mt. 6:24). Similarly, Jesus rejected any suggestion that the calls of physical or social security should be allowed to deflect the force of his demand for radical discipleship (Mt. 10:37-38; 18:8-9). In this sense, Jesus' temptations in the desert were the devil's attempts to get him to compromise, and the cross was the logical outcome of his refusal to comply.

Jesus was especially critical of Pharisaic casuistry.* In principle, casuistry aims to construct a logical network of compromises by analysing difficult cases and by categorizing degrees of certainty with which conflicting ethical principles can - in a modified way - be applied (see Probabilism*). Jesus' criticisms (echoed by Blaise Pascal, 1623-62, in countering 17th-century Jesuit casuistry) were aimed not so much at the system but at its abuse. Systematic compromise had led, in his day, to ingenious evasion of clear-cut duties, which he condemned unequivocally (Mk. 7:9-13).

If casuistry accepts the inevitability of compromise when rules and principles are applied to difficult cases, the school of moral philosophy associated with Immanuel Kant* firmly denies it. For Kant, the call of duty allows for no compromising exceptions. In his treatise 'On a Supposed Right to Lie from Benevolent Motives', he explains that both truth-telling and life-saving are aspects of the categorical imperative.* Any clash between their demands can therefore only be apparent, not real. It can never be right to compromise the truth by telling a lie, even if telling the truth (e.g. to a murderer) results in the loss of a life.

Some moral theologians take a similar stance. John Murray (1898-1975), for example, echoes Kant's refusal to justify a lie told to a murderer, by encouraging Christians to trust in God's providence. The Lord will provide a 'third way' out of such dilemmas, as he did for Daniel (in different circumstances) in OT times.

Helmut Thielicke* is typical of other moral theologians (the majority) who reject this view as unrealistic. 'Compromise', he maintains, 'is a tribute that must be paid to a fallen world.' Appealing to Luther's 'two kingdoms' doctrine (see Lutheran Ethics*), he defends the necessity of telling diplomatic lies (for example), because the secular structures of a sinful world make this and similar compromises essential. To deny the necessity of any compromise at all is fanatical radicalism, he complains, not Christian realism but a denial of the world as it is.

To Thielicke, however, the necessity of compromise does not justify it. Our sinful environment may make lesser-evil choices inevitable, but their inevitability does not make them good. Necessary compromise is simply 'gauze in the wound'. God may require us to 'sin bravely' (pecca fortiter), in the assurance that forgiveness is available in Christ, but we must never lose sight of the fact that all compromise is wrong. 'Compromise does not mean that we have an excuse. It means that we participate in the suprapersonal guilt of this aeon' (H. Thielicke, TE 1, ET, Philadelphia, 1966; London, 1968, p. 500).

Norman Geisler (1932-), among other ethicists from the Reformed tradition, is unhappy with Thielicke's claim that necessary compromises are sinful. Jesus, he points out, faced moral conflicts that necessitated compromise (in deciding, for example, whether or not to disobey the authorities in order to perform acts of mercy). But the Bible assures us that he never sinned (Heb. 4:15). Moreover, people in Scripture who compromised by telling lies in order to save lives, like the Hebrew midwives and Rahab the prostitute, are praised, not called to repentance (Ex. 1:15-21; Jos. 2:1-7; Jas. 2:25).

Geisler therefore prefers to speak of choosing the greater good (rather than the lesser evil) when describing the kind of compromise Christians may legitimately make in situations of conflict. On such occasions, the Christian is exempt from the lower obligation by virtue of the higher. 'Exemption' is the proper way to describe such a compromise, because it affirms the lower obligation while temporarily shelving it in the interests of respecting the higher.

This hierarchical approach is attested by Scripture, maintains Geisler. In various ways, the Bible arranges duties in a league table of obligation. Loving God is a higher Christian duty, for example, than loving parents. Obeying God must be set above obeying the government. And the demands of showing mercy outstrip the demands of telling the truth.

Moreover, contrary to Luther, Geisler believes that no guilt attaches to the kind of compromise which expresses the choice of a greater good. 'One is not morally culpable if he fails to keep an obligation he could not possibly keep without breaking a higher obligation' (Christian Ethics, p. 120).

The Christian ethical consensus, therefore, is that compromise may be in line with God's will when it is necessitated either by a clash of principles or by a set of circumstances where mediation is essential, but not when it masks an evasion of responsibility for trivial or selfish purposes.

Bibliography

N. L. Geisler, Christian Ethics: Options and Issues (Grand Rapids, 1989; Leicester, 1990); K. E. Kirk, Conscience and Its Problems (London, 1927); H. Thielicke, TE 1.

D.H.F.

COMPUTER ETHICS, see DATA PROTECTION.

CONCEPTION, see EMBRYOLOGY.

CONCUPISCENCE is a dated word meaning immoderate desire, usually sexual, which comes from the Lat. con + cupere (to desire wholly). The AV used 'concupiscence' as one of the translations of the Gk. epithymia in Rom. 7:8; Col. 3:5; 1 Thes. 4:5. Epithymia itself may have the positive connotation of legitimate desire as it does a number of times in Scripture, but more frequently it bears the negative connotation of inordinate desire or lust.*

According to Augustine,* before the Fall* sexual organs and sexual intercourse were subject to the voluntary control of reason in humankind. After the Fall the genitals are no longer under voluntary control, but are subject to the lust of concupiscence. This view, which makes every act of intercourse an act of lust (only the goal of procreation* stops it from becoming debauchery), helped to set the stage for many centuries of negative Christian thinking about sexuality (see †).

Warnings against concupiscence can serve a function in condemning sexual desire (or any form of desire) which covets satisfaction of needs without regard for the other person as person, without concern to be involved in a relationship of mutual giving and sharing. As such, concupiscence is an overwhelming desire to obtain and immorally possess another person.

It is not sexual urges or sexual intercourse which are wrong or sinful, but their improper use. In this context repression of desires as well as their inappropriate expression is equally bad. Concupiscence, then, is not restricted to sexual matters, but is a deeply spiritual problem of the human heart: the obsession to possess. Put in modern terms, sexual concupiscence (inappropriate sexual desires with or without acting them out) is sexual addiction.* As in treating substance abuse, it is important to treat the underlying personal-emotional-spiritual issue of which the addiction is symptomatic.

J.H.O.

CONFESSION involves the acknowledgment of responsibility* and an admission of guilt,* in relation to God and neighbour. A 'ministry of reconciliation' (in some denominations and under appropriate circumstances) offers a means of making this confession individual and specific. 'Christ crucified' is the 'confession of faith' upon which confession and reconciliation* are based. Debate continues about how confession relates to psychological understandings of human maturing.

Confession and culture

There is a widespread human longing for reconciliation, expressed in public ritual and internal disposition. Traditional Catholic confession is in decline, and reasons can be marshalled to explain this, e.g. the anti-clericalism of a society that often suspects authority figures. No single moral code acts as an 'umbrella' to unite a culture seeking individualistic self-fulfilment, and since Freud* and Jung* human behaviour is understood (at popular and academic levels) to be significantly affected by aspects of the unconscious.* Jung (quoted in Dudley and Rowell, Confession and Absolution, p. 176) said, 'Through confession, I throw myself into the arms of humanity again, freed at last from the burden of moral exile'. 'Confession' is a first stage in psychotherapy (see Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy†). Roger Hurding (1934-) notes the importance of knowing one's faults and owning them (Roots and Shoots, p. 354), but also suggests criteria whereby 'revealed theology' may evaluate such insights (p. 264). Such an evaluation will discriminate between theological and neurotic guilt, so that pastoral care may (as appropriate) offer the grace of God's forgiveness* and/or encourage the owning of hitherto hidden aspects of the unconscious self.

Confession in Christian tradition

OT prophets confess personal sin (Is. 6:5) and national sin (Ne. 1:6; Dn. 9:4ff.), in the expectation of God's covenant mercy. The seven 'penitential psalms' (Pss. 6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130 and 143), integral to Israel's worship, form a bridge into Christian worship. Jesus never confessed sins on his own behalf (Heb. 4:15) but had a unique authority over sin (Mk. 2:5) and the sinner (Jn. 8:11). His teaching expressed the universal need for confession (Lk. 11:4) which Luke records in vivid pen-portraits (the surprised apostle, 5:8; the tax-collector's 'Lord, have mercy', 18:13; the prodigal's proposed confession 'Father, I have sinned', 15:18-19; and the woman weeping at his feet, 7:38). Lest sin deceive (1 Jn. 1:7-10), confession within the congregation (Jas. 5:15-16) is depicted as a normal part of the mutuality of NT Christian relationships.

In the post-apostolic church, confession was a second baptism, allowed only once. By 1215, an annual confession was required in the Western church. According to G. E. H. Palmer (1904-) the Orthodox Desert Fathers of the Eastern church commended confession within the pursuit of holiness. Medieval misuse led to criticism of private confession as unnecessary by John Wyclif (c. 1329-84). John Calvin* (Institutes III.iv.11 and 14) later commended general confession as the norm. (For how Jesus' authority to forgive sins has been understood as delegated to the church, see Dudley and Rowell, pp. 15-132.) Kenneth Leech (1939-), in Soul Friend explores how confession relates to spiritual direction.*

Confession today

1. Confession must be placed doctrinally and pastorally within the wider context of conversion* discipleship and healing.* Confession is 'daily baptism' (Augustine, Sermon 213:8), reassuring the believer of God's grace in Christ. It leads to fellowship in mutual prayer,* service and shared life with other justified sinners.

2. To hear confessions requires discernment (Palmer et al., The Philokalia, p. 359) and the humility to receive direction oneself. 'Too much reliance' on confession can encourage scrupulosity, but 'too little opportunity' for reconciliation and guidance can leave people coping with 'unresolved guilt feelings' (cf. John Macquarrie, Principles of Christian Theology, London, ²1977, p. 484).

3. The Holy Spirit brings conviction (Jn. 16:8) and new joy (Ps. 51:11-12). Grace cannot be restricted to 'sacramental' structures (cf. Dudley and Rowell, ch. 7). However, the warning to Anglican priests in the Canons of the Church of England 'not, at any time [to] reveal ... any ... offence ... committed to his trust' (Canon B 29), reminds all who practise this ministry to seek self-control (2 Tim. 1:7).

4. Responsibility for guilt must be balanced by an awareness of factors beyond a person's control, both in the self and in society (see Campbell, Rediscovering Pastoral Care, ch. 6). In a world that needs to know both its fallibility and its forgivability, the church can show that confession and reconciliation constitute good news.

See also: ABSOLUTION.

Bibliography

D. Bonhoeffer, Life Together (ET, London, 1954; repr. San Francisco), ch. 5; A. V. Campbell, Rediscovering Pastoral Care (London, ²1986), chs. 1, 3 and 6; M. Dudley and G. Rowell, Confession and Absolution (London, 1990); R. F. Hurding, Roots and Shoots: A Guide to Counselling and Psychotherapy (London, 1986) = The Tree of Healing (Grand Rapids, 1988); K. Leech, Soul Friend (London, 1977); G. E. H. Palmer et al. (eds.), The Philokalia, vol. 1 (London and Boston, MA, 1979).

G.O.S.

CONFIDENTIALITY characterizes one important aspect of a relationship based upon mutual trust,* enabling one or all parties to disclose to others matters which, if generally revealed, would embarrass or compromise those concerned. A confidential relationship is thus one in which one or more secrets are shared. Confidentiality is stronger than confidence, for confidence is a general requirement for the establishing or continuing of any relationship between people, e.g. in business. Confidentiality is closely related to privacy* and might be regarded as a controlled extension of it. It is a feature of close friendship* and an important ingredient in certain kinds of professional relationships, e.g. those between doctor and patient, and lawyer and client (see Professional Ethics*).

Its basic justification lies in the right of an individual to decide whether, and to whom, personal information is to be disclosed. Willingness to disclose such information to anyone usually presupposes the existence of a relationship of mutual respect, whether personal or professional. The existence of such a justification creates a presumption in favour of the maintenance of confidentiality which may, however, in certain circumstances be overridden.

Confidentiality raises several interesting and important ethical issues, in particular over the limits of confidentiality, and the purpose of it.

Given that one is told a matter in confidence, is one ever bound to disclose it? A confidential relationship is a special case of promise-making and the same general considerations apply. One may only break a confidence under very exceptional circumstances: e.g. if through growing incapacity one of the parties does not recognize markedly changed circumstances; or if some grave and unanticipatable injustice would result if confidentiality were kept. The law recognizes certain privileged confidential relationships, e.g. that between a priest and his client, and that between husband and wife. A more controversial relationship is that between a journalist and his or her sources of information, journalists arguing that both present undertakings and future sources of sensitive information would be compromised if their sources were to be disclosed in court; the courts arguing that the public interest in some cases requires such disclosure. Similar problems arise in connection with police informers, private detectives and a national secret service (see *Secrecy).

One important justification of confidentiality is to preserve human integrity, and to allow the formation of close human bonds. Other justifications are the integrity and security of the State and the gaining or preservation of commercial advantage. Where only a breach of confidence would prevent the undermining of the public good, or the harming of the innocent, that breach is at least permissible and may, it is arguable, be obligatory. Similar qualifications are necessary in the case of professional confidential relationships established with children, or with those otherwise weak and immature, for such relationships may conflict with other obligations.

The importance of maintaining confidentiality once it is established, coupled with the fact that any such relation cannot be absolute, would appear to caution against entering into a confidential relationship lightly (cf. Pr. 11:13; 20:19b), without due consideration of its responsibilities and the potential conflicts that may arise. Scripture cautions against passing on confidential information ('talebearing'), and in view of this a distinction should perhaps be drawn between listening to confidences in the context of a request to provide counselling and other assistance, and listening to them for personal gratification.

English law has recently placed greater emphasis upon a client's or patient's right to know what is kept on file about him or her. These are all cases of the legality or otherwise of confidential relationships: it may be argued that the legal question is irrelevant to morality. Clearly, if one were bound generally to disclose to a court or some other body what one is told in confidence then the whole relationship would break down, as has frequently happened in totalitarian regimes with a large and active secret police.

The question has also been raised as to whether those in public life can expect the same degree of privacy, and hence confidentiality, in their family and other personal relationships, as others enjoy. Such intrusiveness, e.g. by the media (see Media Ethics), is regarded by some not only as distasteful but as a violation of a basic right. Political liberals, in particular, wish to make a sharp but not always clear distinction between what is private and confidential (what J. S. Mill called 'self-regarding acts'), and what is public and professional ('other-regarding acts').

Confidentiality takes on a questionable aspect when it is used by professionals and professional organizations to protect themselves against investigation, especially in cases where their decisions affect many lives. It is perhaps possible to make a distinction between the confidentiality of procedures, including those procedures necessary for the formulation of policy and the making of decisions, and the confidentiality of the policies thus formed. The former have a greater degree of justification than the latter, which is hard to justify unless there is some larger overriding purpose, e.g. the defence of the State from terrorism or external threat.

The purpose of confidentiality in a bureaucracy cannot be to deprive people of information to which they are entitled, but rather (as with journalism) to help the flow of such information by ensuring its reliability. But the more general reason for confidentiality has to do with human vulnerability and fallibility. Advice may need to be sought, the psychological comfort of telling a confidence to a trusted friend may be needed, ideas (e.g. in business or in government) may need to be tried out. Without the assurance of confidentiality many people would be deprived of access to professional, expert help which they need and to which they are entitled, and would be less willing to give expression to untested ideas.

In addition, the complexity of modern society is such that it becomes important that certain interpersonal relations (involving, e.g. employment) are merely transactional, for which information about the personal lives of the participants (e.g. their marital or family status, or their political or religious opinions), may not in general be relevant. Where confidentiality is the basis for immoral and illegal activity it becomes conspiracy.

There is little direct teaching in Scripture about the ethics of confidentiality, but it is presupposed in a number of places. Gossiping and talebearing are condemned (e.g. Pr. 18:8; 20:19a) and wisdom* is frequently linked with restraint in behaviour, including speech. Jesus praises those whose giving is in secret (Mt. 6:4), and confidentiality is linked with possessing a charitable disposition (1 Cor. 13:4-6). But there are no confidences from God, who knows the secrets of hearts (Rom. 2:16).

See also: DATA PROTECTION; ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE.†

Bibliography

S. Bok, Secrets: On the Ethics of Concealment and Revelation (New York, 1983; Oxford, 1984).

P.H.

CONFLICT is inevitable as people interact with one another. They come with different experiences, expectations and interests that have to be lived with or resolved in everyday life. The important issue is not whether or not there is conflict, but how the conflict is handled. Christians sometimes think that all conflict is to be avoided and that harmony must reign. But this is not a scriptural view; it is more of a personal, subjective view born of unsatisfactory handling of conflict. Conflict is not only inevitable; constructive conflict can be invaluable in strengthening character and deepening understanding.

Conflict exists in group situations and institutions where different factions have differing interests which are in deep opposition to one another. If each party fears that it may lose something that is vital to its cause in the antipathetic struggle, there is probably little room for negotiation or fair bargaining. The vexed question of 'the just war'* - on a minor or major scale - has its roots here (cf. Jas. 4:1-2).

Conflict within communities is a large-scale reflection of interpersonal conflict. Each person has his or her own values and expectations. It may seem very threatening to be required to moderate or abandon them if they represent the totality of the inner self. It is important that people should be operating from their own inner still centre (genuine self-possession), so that they are not easily threatened by external differences. They are then in a position to decide whether the conflictual issue is of sufficient absolute importance to take a firm stand or whether to give way graciously. (Consider Jn. 13:3-5, where Jesus was so secure in his own identity and self-esteem born of his relationship with his Father that he could do the menial task of washing the disciples' feet without losing face.)

Marriage and family life is a major arena for conflict, as people with different backgrounds, expectations and experiences try to blend together and learn how to make their needs and views known effectively. Sometimes this involves toleration of strong conflict and painful acknowledgment that some of these cherished values, views or habits need to be reviewed. Effective conflict-resolution can take place only within an atmosphere of love (see †) and trust* where both parties know that there will be no winners or losers but each is respected for his or her own value. There is an opportunity for personal growth within this type of conflict. The approach to conflict which seeks to get its own way and prove the other person wrong is destructive of both parties and of the relationship. It can lead eventually to much frustration* and bitterness.*

Everyone experiences intrapersonal conflict, to some degree. There are two sorts of internal conflict.

1. The first category of internal conflict is caused by the imbalance between various parts of the ego structure - some parts being over-developed, e.g. conscience,* and some foundational needs being unmet, e.g. the basic need for affirmation and approval which contribute to self-esteem* and internal wholeness. Such conflict is largely resolved when some integration of the self* has been achieved. Conflict which is loaded with morbid guilt* usually belongs in this category. Maturity* is about relief from the sense of drivenness or imprisonment by these unmet needs, and the balance between being able to give and to receive emotionally. The sense of internal conflict can never be resolved until those legitimate love-needs have been met satisfactorily in a personal relationship of some sort. The Christian faith is addressed to this very situation, since the internal conflict is basically about the need for love, unconditional acceptance,* personal value and affirmation.

2. The other type of internal conflict occurs in the spiritual journey into personal holiness,* as new areas of living are discovered and the old egocentric parts of the self are gradually handed over to the love of Christ.

There is often confusion in people's minds between these two different types of conflict. For instance, when a person cannot overcome some addictive habit in spite of much wrestling in prayer* and effort, it is usually because the area of struggle is in the first category of internal conflict. In a general sense, though, the first category is obviously subsumed under the second.

The entire story of redemption is based on conflict on a grand scale and is reflected in a personal way. The great assurance of the Christian is the ultimate resolution of this conflict in the peace (shalom) of the final kingdom of God (cf. Rev. 22:2).

See also: CROSS-CULTURAL CONFLICT MEDIATION.

Bibliography

M. Chave-Jones, Living with Anger (London, 1992); A. Storr, Human Aggression (Harmondsworth, 1970).

M.C.-J.

CONFUCIAN ETHICS. K'ung-fu-tsu, meaning 'Master Kung', Latinized as Confucius, China's first philosophic genius (551-479 BC), was tutor to aristocratic sons of a city-state. He was the first demythologizer.

Confucius reinterpreted the primary religion of China from magic and superstition into an ethical system: thus te, 'magical force', became moral 'virtue', and li is converted from 'rites' into 'gentlemanly conduct'. The Japanese word for shitsu-rei, meaning 'rudeness', means literally 'lack of rei' (li in Chinese). This greatly honoured philosopher changed a superstitious people believing in good and bad 'luck' into moral people concerned with right and wrong behaviour. Jen means to be authentically human, to have achieved ideal sainthood through virtue.

Confucius died despairing of persuading the ruler of his own city-state to put his teaching into practice. Not until the great Emperor Wu of the Han dynasty (140-87 BC) did Confucianism become State orthodoxy in China. No other single person, or for that matter no religion, has so deeply influenced the cultures and society not only of China, but of Korea and Japan as well.

China was a meritocracy, and success in examinations in the Confucian classics (Wuching) qualified the brilliant student to become a mandarin. Both Korea and Japan accepted Buddhism to provide the philosophy, and Confucianism the ethics, which were lacking in both Korean Shamanism and Japanese Shinto.

Confucius was agnostic about 'God', referring to impersonal 'heaven' (tien) and only once to shang ti, 'the emperor above'. He did have to come to terms with ancestor worship, but even there he transformed hsiao, 'filial piety', from respect/fear of the spirits of the dead into obedience towards them while they are still living. This principle extends to all relationships - the junior respects his senior, the mentor who reciprocates with affectionate responsibility towards his protégé. In Japan this principle, known as oyabun-kobun (father part, child part), governs many other areas of life - in business, education and even in the relationship between pastor and his flock.

The 'Five Relationships' (Lord and retainer; father and son; older and younger brother; husband and wife; and friend and friend) provide a sequence of moral priorities for life, as well as for the moral dilemmas of literature and drama. Interestingly 'teacher-disciple' is not one of the five, possibly because Chinese bureaucracy was always fearful to the point of paranoia that a new teacher would gain a following which might result in a revolution overthrowing government.

Though China, Japan and Korea are strongly influenced by Confucian relationships, their emphases are now different. The Japanese tend to emphasize the vertical hierarchical relationship with the feudal lord (or company president!); the Chinese stress the familial relationships; whereas the Koreans particularly stress the friend-friend bond between classmates and peer group. Thus military coups are carried out by classmates at the military academy, and even church growth in Korea may owe something to Confucius, as classmates join the same churches.

M.C.G.

CONSCIENCE is the inner aspect of the life of the individual where a sense of what is right and wrong is developed. Our conscience prompts us to react according to the code of morality it has learnt either with a sense of guilt* or of well-being to proposed or past courses of action. Christians understand conscience as the guardian of the integrity of the person.

There are three basic biblical principles in understanding conscience: 1. Conscience is universal and is given to us by God (Rom. 2:12-16). This explains why those who have no knowledge of God's law may still obey its requirements. Those who have no other guide should obey their conscience. 2. Consciences have been affected by the sinfulness of human nature. Although the conscience is a gift of God, it is not perfect and may be corrupt (Tit. 1:15). Thus it may accuse where there is no reason for accusation and remain silent when it ought to speak. 3. The saving work of Jesus cleanses guilty consciences (Heb. 9:14). The blood of Jesus can both cleanse us from the blight of a guilty conscience and also liberate us for the service of God.

Conscience therefore needs instruction, so that it may be trained to alert us to what is genuinely right and manifestly wrong, and it also needs the liberating experience of forgiveness. The dynamic of conscience in the Christian life is explained by these two things: education and liberation.

Conscience requires educating against a sense of false guilt (such as that of a child who feels somehow responsible for his or her parents' divorce), and against scrupulosity* (an obsession with the minutiae of conduct which destroys all joy* in the Christian life).

Because conscience needs educating, it is a mistake to equate it with the voice of God, as has sometimes been done. That God addresses the conscience is clear from Scripture (e.g. 2 Cor. 4:2), but conscience can either be so stifled as to become utterly insensitive (1 Tim. 4:2) or become so morbid as to refuse the forgiveness promised in the gospel.

Conscience has been the subject of controversy over many centuries. Thomas Aquinas* saw it as the place of moral judgment in human life - the place where a Christian exercised reason in working out what to do. Kant* saw conscience as the faculty of judgment where the person turns the 'is' of the universal law into the 'ought' of what should or should not be done. Freud* understood it as the super-ego developed in the individual in childhood whereby we internalize the prohibitions imposed upon us by those who parent and educate us. For Freud it was a repressive force, capable of doing great damage to the psychological health of the person. He had no time for religious belief which seemed to give universal validity to this deeply damaging aspect of our personality. Jung,* accepting the truthfulness of the psychoanalytic approach, turned these understandings to a more positive understanding of religious experience. He understood the liberating possibilities of the spiritual side of living and recognized that Freud had been too restricted by his preoccupation with sick people. If Thomas Aquinas and Kant relate more to the educative task in relation to conscience, Freud and Jung relate to the liberation aspects. Thus the Christian tradition is able to encompass all serious knowledge about conscience. The experience of conscience is therefore one of the most fundamental aspects of what it means to be a human being made by a creating and redeeming God (see Image of God*).

Bibliography

J. W. Gladwin, Conscience (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1977); C. G. Jung, Modern Man in Search of a Soul (London, 1962); C. A. Pierce, Conscience in the New Testament (London, 1955); I. T. Ramsey, 'Towards a Rehabilitation of Natural Law', in Christian Ethics and Contemporary Philosophy (London, 1966).

J.W.G.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION, see CONSCIENCE; JUST-WAR THEORY; WAR.

CONSCIENTIZATION, see LIBERATION THEOLOGY.

CONSENT. People consent when they give voluntary agreement to something done to them and comply with that decision. Consent may be clearly expressed in written or oral form: implied, as when a patient visits a doctor and offers an arm for an injection, and when someone fails to indicate dissent when a reasonable person would have been expected to do so; or presumed, as when someone is unconscious and a doctor acts assuming that the person would have given consent if it were possible. It rests on the integrity and autonomy* of the individual who has the right to self-determination, which is expressed in giving or withholding of consent.

Most commonly, consent is important in sexual activity and marriage, where the absence of consent is tantamount to rape.* A marriage may be annulled if consent is lacking. The age of consent of male and female to marriage and sexual intercourse varies throughout the world. In politics, many regard the consent of the governed as necessary for democracy to flourish. The clearest example of giving or withholding consent is the doctor-patient relationship.

To be valid, consent must be voluntary and free from pressure and duress. This is shown by the fact that the degree of responsibility varies according to the force and coercion a person was under in making a decision. Consent must also be fully informed. People are to know the facts and likely outcomes of the choices they make. Volition thus is matched by a careful assessment of the facts. For some, this might mean knowing all the facts; for others, knowing all the relevant facts. In the USA, a doctor is obliged to reveal all the facts of conditions and treatments. In the UK, only relevant facts are required and that is defined by what any reasonable doctor would provide. This difference rests on a distinction between all that there is to know, as opposed to all that a patient might want, or that was in his or her best interests, to know. Failure to gain consent is, in law, an assault or battery, and the doctor may be found negligent if he or she fails to gain consent. Defensive, contract-based medicine would have to give all information about a disease, its likely outcome and the risks of treating and not treating. Covenant-based medicine stresses the quality of relationship between doctor and patient and that consent is a process which requires trust,* checking, and continuing involvement of the patient in deciding what happens. Both systems require doctors to be able to communicate difficult information to vulnerable people, allowing them the freedom to reject treatment as well as to accept it. People are free to withdraw consent as and when they wish.

Consent also assumes competence. In the case of children, they are required to give consent. While there is no universally agreed minimum age of consent, a child must be, and parents may be, consulted. The doctor must decide whether the child is competent, and that involves assessing the personal and mental maturity of the child. In difficult areas like contraception for under-age girls, the doctor's first loyalty is to the girl and confidentiality.* Parents do not own their children, and, as with competent adults, no-one is able to give consent for another.

With the mentally incapacitated, no-one is legally empowered to provide consent. Consent forms have no legal standing and are at best indications of a process of consultation. The confused state of British law is likely to be resolved in the direction of advocacy or guardianship. Proxy consent is likely to grow as situations where people are unable to express their own wishes may increase. Those in prison are still entitled to give or withhold consent for medical treatment. This may be difficult for the doctor to safeguard, as in the case of members of the armed forces.

In clinical research, the patient's consent is crucial. The elderly and other dependent groups may be pressurized by family or society to do what they do not wish. Even governments may put individuals under pressure to consent to various immunization and testing procedures. This is often justified by the greater benefit for society as a whole. The need for justification is the mark that consent is important. In situations of organ transplants, living donors may be under pressure to consent to donation. Doctors must protect the donor and ensure that consent is valid. While a willing donor may leave organs to be used after death, the current practice of medicine tends to allow the wishes of the family priority over those of the deceased. In the USA, there have been sad cases where families and medical authorities have had to resort to the courts to establish what is construed as in the best interests of an individual, whether keeping the patient on a life-support machine or the removal of feeding tubes. Technological advances mean that consent will be harder to establish in a wider variety of situations. This has led to 'living wills' or 'advance directives', in which someone indicates what kind of treatment or none that they wish if they develop specified diseases or require extraordinary medical support. This is a natural extension of the consent and autonomy of the individual, but must be seen as an indication of the person's wishes at that time. The doctor must retain the professional freedom to judge whether or not circumstances have changed so that the patient might express a different desire now.

God's creation of humankind so that we are free to accept or reject God's commands is fundamental to human nature. Christ never forced himself or his salvation on people, but allowed them the freedom to reject him and his way. Consent means that in evangelism, pastoral counselling and care, as well as in the formalized areas of sexuality, marriage and medicine, respect for the willing, informed, free consent of others is both a Christian and a moral responsibility.

See also: COMA; ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE.†

Bibliography

S. Horner (chairperson), Medical Ethics Today (London, 1993); D. Cook, Patients' Choice (London, 1993); S. E. Lammers and A. Verhey (eds.), On Moral Medicine (Grand Rapids, 1987).

E.D.C.

CONSEQUENTIALISM is a type of theory of obligation* according to which the rightness or wrongness of an action is completely determined by the action's consequences. Theories of obligation are systematic accounts of what makes actions morally right or wrong, and these accounts usually are of two types. 'Backward-looking' theories hold that actions are made right or wrong by something before the action, such as the agent's motive* for performing the action. 'Forward-looking' or consequentialist theories, on the other hand, hold that actions are made right or wrong by something after the action in time, viz. the action's good consequences. By 'consequences' is usually meant the actual and causal (rather than intended and merely conceptual) consequences of the action.

Consequentialist theories typically differ in two ways. 1. They differ over which good consequences right actions produce, with various theories holding that the good is, e.g. pleasure,* enlightenment or biological survival. Such theories need not require the maximization of this good, but most do. 2. Consequentialist theories also differ over whose good we are to produce. Consequentialist theories range between egoistic* theories, according to which right actions produce good for the individual agent, and universalistic theories, according to which right actions produce good for every being affected.

Universal ethical hedonism,* or utilitarianism, is the most widely discussed consequentialist theory. Championed by Jeremy Bentham,* John Stuart Mill* and Henry Sidgwick (1838-1900) in the 19th century, this theory holds that right actions are those which produce the greatest total pleasure for everyone affected by their consequences and wrong actions are those which fail to produce this greatest total pleasure. The later 'ideal utilitarians', such as G. E. Moore (1873-1958), agreed with earlier utilitarians that right actions were those which maximized the good, but held that some things other than pleasurable experiences were intrinsically good. Contemporary consequentialists have often dropped the term 'pleasure', because of its ambiguity, in favour of 'preference satisfaction', which is more amenable to analysis in terms of contemporary economic theory.

Consequentialism in general, and utilitarianism in particular, have been advocated on several grounds. 1. Some consequentialists have argued that moral choice can be rational only if it is based on an evaluation of the consequences of actions; i.e. in the absence of consequentialist considerations, moral choice devolves into personal preference or arbitrary fiat. 2. Utilitarian theories in particular accord with certain widely held convictions that human well-being is intrinsically good, and that actions should be judged according to their effect on this well-being. Christian consequentialists have extended this second point, arguing that Jesus preached an ethic of love requiring us to work for the well-being of all humanity (e.g. see the Sermon on the Mount,* Mt. 5 - 7; the Great Commandment, Mt. 22:37-40).

Consequentialism has also been criticized on several grounds. 1. Its practical application seems to require the ability to predict accurately the long-range consequences of our actions, something we are rarely able to do. 2. Many versions of consequentialism require that goods and ills be measured, added, and subtracted according to some common scale, but a satisfactory account of such measurement and calculation has proven elusive. 3. Many consequentialist theories have reductionistic* tendencies, and seem overly willing to sacrifice goods they ignore, such as justice, for goods they happen to favour, such as utility. 4. Finally, although there have been Christian consequentialists such as William Paley (1743-1805), other Christian thinkers have had particular complaints about consequentialism, e.g. that consequentialism arrogates to humans God's responsibility for ensuring best overall results in the universe.

For classic statements of consequentialist theories see William Paley, The Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy (London, 1785), Jeremy Bentham, An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation (1789; London, 1970) and John Stuart Mill, Utilitarianism (London, 1863). For a contemporary discussion of consequentialism, see J. J. C. Smart and Bernard Williams, Utilitarianism: For and Against (Cambridge, 1973). For discussion of consequentialism from a Christian point of view, see Gilbert Meilander, 'Eritis Sicut Deus: Moral Theory and the Sin of Pride', FP 3.4, 1986, pp. 397-415, and James Keller, 'Christianity and Consequentialism: A Reply to Meilander', FP 6.2, 1989, pp. 198-205.

CONSERVATION, see ENVIRONMENT.

CONSERVATISM is a short-hand term for a body of political attitudes which tends to prefer the established order rather than the new and untried, and which emphasizes the importance of law and order, continuity and tradition. Premised upon the imperfectability of human nature, it is distrustful of political philosophies which expect more good from it than is warranted by experience.

In English history

Toryism, as Conservatism was originally termed, gave priority to the established church, the family* and private property. The term 'Conservative' seems to have first been used in the British political context by J. W. Croker (1780-1857) in an article in the Quarterly Review for January 1830. He referred to 'what is called the Tory, and which might with more propriety be called the Conservative party'. The coining of this new title was, according to J. C. D. Clark (1951-), a response to the crucial political changes of 1828-32, which resulted in the sweeping victory of the Tories' Whig opponents. The repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts in 1828, which opened the door to nonconformist participation in government, and Catholic emancipation in 1829, broke the exclusive link of church and State, which had been hitherto defended in Parliament 'by a loose and unstructured governing coalition assembled by the crown' (J. C. D. Clark, 'Conservatism before Conservatism', in M. Alison and D. L. Edwards, eds., Christianity and Conservatism, pp. 117-118).

From this period, 'Conservative' began to supersede 'Tory', though inevitably continuities both in membership and in political thought existed between the old Tory coalition and the newly emerging party. For those like Benjamin Disraeli (1804-88), who carried the unfurling banner of Conservatism through the latter years of the 19th century, evolution from earlier Toryism, not revolution, was the natural way forward.

It can be argued that 20th-century Conservatism still has its roots in the old Anglican political theology of Toryism. This conceived of England as a Christian nation, answerable in its spiritual life to the established church and in its secular life to the State, both being ruled by the monarch.

In American history

In the US, the alignment of conservative political philosophy with the Republican party can be traced back to the Jacksonian era. Between 1810 and 1830, the pietists (NT-oriented, anti-ritualistic, congregational in governance, committed to individual conversion and societal reform to usher in the millennial reign of Jesus Christ) began to enter the political world to influence society. They helped develop reforms to eradicate slavery,* saloons, sabbath* desecration and other social ills. In the 1830s they entered the political mainstream and gravitated to the Whig and Republican parties. However, from the 1850s until the early 1870s, the political agenda of the Republicans seemed to be headed by Protestant anti-Catholic concerns rather than conservatism. In the 1870s and 1880s, the Republicans returned to a conservative platform partly out of a concern for moral decline and partly because of political desperation. During the 1950s, William F. Buckley (1925-) was a key force in American conservatism by developing forums for conservative voices. He founded the National Review, a bi-weekly journal designed to express conservative opinions, news and views. He later started a television show dealing with politics and public affairs.

Later, after evangelical and fundamentalist activists helped Ronald Reagan (1911-) defeat Jimmy Carter (1924-) in 1980, a new Christian right was seen emerging in national politics. Events in previous decades set the stage for the new conservatism to rise. The late 1960s and early 1970s became a polarizing time between the New Left (whose aims were to assure equality for women, African Americans and homosexuals) and the cultural conservatives (who affirmed traditional values). Conservatives felt they were watching their country's values 'decline' steadily as legalization of abortion, the availability of sexually explicit material, and prospective ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment loomed. Secular humanism was seen as an encroaching threat. In 1980, Ronald Reagan aligned himself with conservatives and their hopes. His tenure gave conservatives a voice in the White House. Reagan's successor, George Bush (1924-), likewise aligned himself with conservatism.

In the modern world

The market economy of today, operating in an environment of democratic capitalism,* serving an increasingly secular and multicultural society, might seem to prosper precisely to the extent that it leaves the old ways and values of Anglican political theology. But in reality many of its insights find an application today. Thus the assertion of Article 9 of the Thirty-nine Articles, that 'man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil', finds a ready echo in C. S. Lewis'* espousal of democracy*: 'I am a democrat because I believe in the Fall of Man ... Mankind is so fallen that no man can be trusted with unchecked power over his fellows' (C. S. Lewis, Present Concerns: Ethical Essays, London, 1986, p. 17).

The Anglican insistence that 'the individual had the freedom and power, despite his sinful inclinations, to hear and obey divine injunctions' (Clark, p. 150) has been utilized by advocates of democratic capitalism. Michael Novak (1933-), for example, has taken the notions of the individual and conscience as the key to 20th-century capitalism and wealth creation.

Brian Griffiths (1942-) has argued that the success of the market economy can be traced back to the influence of Jewish and Christian teaching: '... the physical world as God's world, the mandate to subdue and harness the earth, the significance of work in a context of vocation and calling, the need for private property rights and the rule of law, a recognition by the state of the creative and innovative character of people, and the importance of government's role in enforcing justice' ('The Conservative Quadrilateral' in Christianity and Conservatism, p. 233).

Critics of Conservatism sometimes charge that its emphasis on law and order can lead to Fascism, but the Conservative emphasis on the individual is inimical to all forms of statist political theory. Others claim that modern Conservatism is so individualistic as to have no real place for a concept of community in its social philosophy, but this criticism overlooks Conservatism's predilection for continuity.

Bibliography

M. Alison and D. L. Edwards (eds.), Christianity and Conservatism (London, 1990); M. Novak, Will it Liberate? (New York, 1986).

M.J.H.A.

CONSTANTINE (c. 274-337), Roman emperor from 306 in the West, and from 324 in the East. Following his capture of Rome in 312, he issued the Edict of Milan, which made Christianity a legal religion for the first time. Constantine presided at the First Council of Nicaea (325) and favoured Christians in the empire, but was baptized only on his deathbed. His reputation as a Christian saint is based largely on the biography by Eusebius of Caesarea (c. 265-c. 339), but nowadays the reality of his conversion is hotly disputed. However, there is no doubt that he passed a number of laws which formed the basis of Christian Europe in later centuries. Because of this, he is frequently credited as the founder of the so-called 'Constantinian Era' of church-State relations, which lasted until 1918. In fact, however, it was Theodosius I (c. 346-395) who made Christianity the State religion (27 February 380) and not Constantine himself.

The main items of legislation for which he was responsible were the payment of clergy salaries (313), the exemption of clergy from public office (313), and the establishment of Sunday as a public holiday (321).

Bibliography

A. Kee, Constantine versus Christ (London, 1982);]. Stevenson and W. H. C. Frend (eds.), A New Eusebius (London, 1987).

G.L.B.

CONSUMERISM. Economically speaking, consumption refers to the using of goods, whether natural resources or human-made, and of services by people, i.e. the consumers. Consumerism, then, is a particular focusing of social and personal life on the processes of consuming. Today, in fact, the world's rich countries are often called consumer societies.

Although at the end of the 19th century Thorstein Veblen (1857-1929) described the practice of buying and displaying expensive items to demonstrate wealth and enhance social status as 'conspicuous consumption', only since the Second World War has this theme been reworked to apply to society at large. This is because the post-war years heralded an era of mass consumption on an unprecedented scale. The productive boom, increasingly enhanced by new technologies, meant that capacity to supply goods and services far outstripped demand. The only way to cope with the resulting gluts was to stimulate demand, or consumption.

Thus marketing ploys such as advertising* were intensified (witness Vance Packard's famous Hidden Persuaders, London, 1957; repr. New York, 1984), goods were designed with built-in obsolescence, and governments encouraged consumption by reducing taxes. Consumer organizations were formed to protect people from sharp practices and to give advice on the best buys. New markets, such as lucrative teenage fashion and music (see Pop Culture*), were opened up. By the 1980s credit cards further extended the capacity to consume.

On the other side of the coin is the way people have become more and more market-dependent. Shopping skills replace older arts such as cooking and laundry as signs of competence. New 'needs' are constantly created, whose satisfaction is imperative. Competition occurs between consumers: 'keeping up with the Joneses' becomes a necessary part of normal life. Not only is entertainment now something to buy rather than do, but buying itself has become entertainment. Shopping malls are theme parks for family outings. The effortless McDonald's culture of fast foods and false smiles epitomizes the world of consumerism.

The implications of consumerism have yet to be fully understood; the phenomenon continues to expand at an accelerating pace. Three major aspects deserve attention, however.

1. Consumer society is highly unequal; mass consumption does not mean that all benefit. Indeed, within the world's wealthier nations, a widening gap exists between those with and without the means to consume. Today it is non-consumers, not necessarily non-producers, who are stigmatized and shunned. Consumption integrates people into society, seduced by the promise of market freedom and affluence. Those who fail the consumer test for whatever reason slip into more or less punishing regimes of 'welfare'. Meanwhile the gap between wealthy and poor nations is ever more marked.

2. The second consequence of consumerism relates to waste,* and the rate at which creation's resources are used. On the one hand, say critics, such resources are finite. There are limits to the ever-increasing expansion of production and consumption. On the other hand, they observe, such expansion does not seem to have increased the happiness promised in consumption. Perhaps fulfilment lies elsewhere than in amassing possessions? Unfortunately, of course, consumerism has established such a hold that alternatives to it appear rather quirky.

3. Even more profoundly, in Western societies our outlook and lifestyles have come to be dominated by consumerism (indeed, 'lifestyle' is a consumerist term). The consumer is the antithesis of the ascetic, disciplined, industrious, rational Puritan (see Puritan Ethics*) who supposedly gave birth to modernity. Consumers are concerned above all about comfort and convenience; virtue and joy lie in spending. Social status, personal success and well-being may be found in buying and owning goods. Consumerism is a meaning-system of great power, if also great banality. Its signs and symbols relate to fashions and trends, grocery coupons and cash dispensers. The T-shirt tells all. The 'new' must be sampled, non-stop fun is both ethic and goal. As we saw, consumerism is also a means of maintaining social order.

All of this makes it hard to present any alternative, just because consumerism is so thoroughly out of kilter with Christian commitment - or should be. Needless to say, consumerism has infected the church, which turns to marketing strategies to promote its unique product, and thus, for example, encourages its members to shop around for the congregation in which they feel most comfortable. At base, consumerism derives its power from a systematic and flagrant denial of the commandment prohibiting covetousness.* Its consequences are thus predictably and universally bad. Following Christ entails a sharp break with consumerism, that emphasizes, on a personal level, contentment (and a grateful enjoyment of creation's good things). On the political-economic plane, it emphasizes restraint and a commitment to fairness, and careful stewardship* with regard to created resources.

Bibliography

Z. Bauman, Freedom (Milton Keynes, 1988); M. Featherstone, Consumer Culture and Postmodernism (London and Newbury Park, CA, 1991); M. Starkey, Born to Shop (Eastbourne, 1989); J. White, Money isn't God (Downers Grove, IL, and Leicester, 1993).

D.A.L.

CONTEXTUAL ETHICS refers broadly to that class of ethical theories which emphasizes moral context as a most critical element in the determination of moral responsibility. There are, however, a number of different types of contextual ethical theories, so the identification of a moral theory as a contextual ethic may be less illuminating than at first appears.

1. The most straightforward form of contextual ethics is the 'situation ethics'* of Joseph Fletcher.* Abjuring moral 'legalism' and 'rule-worship', Fletcher identifies love (see †) as the only moral principle binding at all times and in all places. Our obligation is always to bring about the most loving consequences for all involved in a particular situation. Exactly what love requires will, of course, vary from one moral context or situation to the next.

2. A more complicated form of contextual ethics is the moral theory of H. Richard Niebuhr.* Although it is seldom obvious, God is at work in the world, creating, governing and redeeming it. The Christian's moral calling is to respond appropriately to the particular activity of God in a given context. In order to respond in a fitting way one must first discern how God is present in that context, and what type of activity God is engaged in at that place and at that time. Then, drawing upon a variety of moral sources and moral norms, the moral agent attempts to identify the particular response which is appropriate to God's activity in that moral context.

3. Closely related to Niebuhr's contextual ethic is the koinonia (see Fellowship*) ethic of Paul Lehmann (1906-). Lehmann insists upon the importance of the context in which 'ethical insights and practices are nourished', identifying the relevant context for Christians as the koinonia or community established by Jesus Christ. In this koinonia, we see most clearly God's activity in the world; here we discover that God is acting in the world to 'keep human life human'. God is 'humanizing' our world, bringing about wholeness and maturity for all persons through the Messianic activity of Jesus. What actions will best contribute to human maturity cannot be specified in advance, for God values humanization more than consistency; God is free to act and free to call Christians to act in whatever way the immediate context requires. Christians, mindful of God's aims in history and of God's final victory, are able imaginatively to engage in moral situations and to discern in them God's specific humanizing will.

4. Another type of contextual ethic is developed within and alongside contemporary 'contextual theologies'. This type of contextual theological ethic emphasizes the location or context from which one speaks about God and God's actions in the world. The differing experiences people have in the world may lead to differing theological insights and emphases. The experience of being female differs from the experience of being male. There is, therefore, a feminist* or 'womanist' contextual theology and theological ethic. Likewise, the experience of the African, the Asian or the Latino (see Liberation Theology*), differs from the experience of the white male, so there may be African contextual ethics, Asian contextual ethics, etc. This type of contextual ethics refers not to the particular moral context to which some response is required, but rather to the moral context from which one deliberates and articulates one's moral and theological beliefs.

5. A final type of contextual ethic, sometimes referred to as moral particularism, is prominent in some contemporary neo-Aristotelian moral philosophy. As in the situation ethics of Joseph Fletcher, moral particularism rejects the construction of a significant body of moral rules or principles. In fact, moral particularists believe that the moral properties of each particular context differ so much as to rule out the possibility of even one universal moral principle such as love. The correct moral response requires not moral principles but moral discernment. Moral discernment is analogous to aesthetic discernment. Just as there are good judges of beauty - people who have (or who have developed) an ear for music or an eye for visual art - so there are excellent judges of the morally good. These individuals are disposed to consider carefully the moral context and, upon moral consideration, they perceive the moral properties of the context and what a fitting feeling or action would be in that particular context.

What unifies these quite diverse types of contextual ethics is their agreement that context is critical for the identification of the articulation of what is morally required. Because moral context is so important a factor in the moral life, excellence in the moral discernment of the context plays a most visible and significant role in these theories.

In light of the diversity of contextual ethics, apt critical generalizations of them all are few. The greatest weakness of these contextual ethics is, in fact, their particularism, their reluctance to generalize. In their emphasis upon moral contexts they minimize the general moral knowledge we have of God's will. While we cannot move without reflection from biblical injunctions to moral decisions, we are able to glean from Scripture general moral principles which should inform our decisions, whatever the moral context. We enter each new moral context with more moral knowledge than contextual ethics recognize. A failure to recognize this fact leads to a more parsimonious ethic than Christian revelation warrants.

Bibliography

J. M. Gustafson, 'Context Versus Principles: A Misplaced Debate in Christian Ethics', in M. E. Marty and D. G. Peerman (eds.), New Theology, vol. 3 (New York, 1966); P. Lehmann, Ethics in a Christian Context (New York, 1963; London, 1979); H. R. Niebuhr, The Responsible Self (London and New York, 1963); P. Ramsey, Deeds and Rules in Christian Ethics (London and Edinburgh, 1965; New York, 1967); C. West, Prophesy Deliverance: An Afro-American Revolutionary Christianity (Philadelphia, 1982).

T.D.K.

CONTRACEPTION, see BIRTH CONTROL.

CONTRACTS IN THERAPY. A contract is an indispensable tool in any working arrangement. It defines what is expected, what can be delivered, the terms on which delivery can take place, and the conditions necessary to facilitate the operation. This contract is binding on both parties who engage in the work.

In a professionally therapeutic situation, the overt contract refers to the place, duration and regularity of the meeting, the time of day, fees and confidentiality.* Both therapist and client are expected in such a situation to give these commitments priority over other demands in their life. The contract also includes the degree of professionalism which the client may expect, and it may specify areas for concentrated work or a particular period of time. The relationship excludes mutuality and reciprocity on a functional level, though, of course, not on a feeling level. It is important that the professional therapist and client do not meet socially outside the therapeutic situation, because that would blur the therapeutic boundaries of the relationship. The therapist and the client/patient both need to be protected from dynamics other than those which operate within the working relationship.

The purpose of these conditions is to make a safe ambience for both client and therapist. The client begins to feel secure and to experience reliability, continuity and dependence without being suffocated by too much closeness and intimacy. Clients can use this space however they wish, and this is not possible in an ordinary social situation. At times they may feel frustrated by the limitations imposed by the clock, the payment, the regularity and the restricted social contact. Frustration,* dependence, love (see †), anger,* envy,* greed (see Covetousness*) and other dangerous and powerful feelings are typical of the constraints of ordinary life and, within this therapeutic relationship, there is a safe place in which to explore unsatisfactory and hurtful situations of the past in a healing and protected environment. The boundaries protect the therapist from being unduly 'invaded' by the demands, dependencies and pains of the client/patient. Thus the therapist will be able to be more genuinely available to the person with whom he or she is working.

The expectation of professional therapists is that they must also have their own personal therapy and that their current work must be supervised.* Thus, the standard of work is maintained, and the therapists ensure that they are not working out some of their own problems, unconsciously, on their clients/patients. A contract as binding as this is required only when the work is of professional standard. Christian professionals in this field are very dependent on the Holy Spirit to use their training and expertise. This is very costly incarnational work, which gives some damaged people a first-time experience of agape.

Many pastors and others engaged in the ministry of encouragement, helping and counselling also need a contract, though it may be much more flexible. Many a sincere helper has become exhausted by or inappropriately entangled emotionally with a person in need, because there have been no protective contractual boundaries. It is vital for both parties to know what is appropriate to give or expect in terms of the time and quality of contact or relationship which is available, and to adhere to these terms fairly conscientiously. Helpers need to know how to respond to their own difficulty in saying 'no' on occasions, and not to confuse this difficulty with some false sense of guilt* about not being endlessly available (consider Mk. 6:30-32). Helpers must be aware of their own emotional needs, which must be met outside the helping relationship, so that they are not feeding their own egos on the gratitude, love or neediness of the person they are trying to help. They also need to be able to handle constructively the outraged reactions that legitimate non-availability sometimes produces. By observing these boundaries and caring for themselves, helpers are more genuinely able to care for others and thus, both benefit.

Helpers are wise to limit the one-to-one social contact during the counselling period as much as possible, so that a dispassionate attitude can be maintained. It is also very beneficial for pastors to have some person or group with whom they can share some of their pastoral problems (with suitable confidentiality safeguards). This acts as a personal support as well as a check, and could usefully be included in their employment contract.

See also: PROFESSIONAL ETHICS.

Bibliography

M. Jacobs, Psychodynamic Counselling in Action (London, 1990).

M.C.-J.

CONTRITION, see REPENTANCE.

CONVERSION. In the West today, non-Christian religions and cults within the Christian religion have an increasing impact. Consequently stories of conversion become commonplace. A student is captivated by the teaching of an Eastern guru, a young person joins a cult, there is a dramatic change of allegiance from one political party to another. All may, with some justification, be called a 'conversion'. In each there has been a dramatic change of belief, allegiance, outlook and, frequently, way of life. But they are not Christian conversions. Christ is not their cause or their centre, nor is his service their outcome. There has been no decisive turning from and turning to within the Christian context.

The necessity for conversion

In the NT, the Thessalonians 'turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God' (1 Thes. 1:9). The Lycaonians were exhorted to 'turn from these worthless things to the living God' (Acts 14:15). The apostle Paul's mission to the Gentiles was summed up as 'to open their eyes and turn them from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God, so that they may receive forgiveness of sins and a place among those who are sanctified by faith in me [Jesus]' (Acts 26:18). These passages highlight two distinct elements in conversion: conversion is from an old way of life, and to a new and different allegiance. In Scripture, the fundamental nature of the transaction between humankind and God is basic to the notion of conversion. Interest in any mechanisms that are at work in that transaction are ignored or totally secondary. As David F. Wells (1939-) wrote recently, 'Christianity without conversion is no longer Christian, because conversion means turning to God' (Turning to God, p. 27). And it is not only within the NT that the concept of conversion applies. Within the OT, people were called upon time and again to a fresh understanding of what it meant to be a person in covenant with God. Those outside the covenant needed to discover a filial relationship with God for which all humankind was created. That relationship, destroyed by sin, has been re-established in the new covenant. There will therefore be differences in the process of turning to God, depending upon whether the turning is as an outsider or as an insider.

The diversity of biblical accounts

Within the span of a few chapters of the Acts of the Apostles we meet people with vastly different backgrounds who come to faith in Christ in different ways and under different circumstances and yet all of them share a common faith. An Ethiopian leader eager to learn (Acts 8:26-40); Saul of Tarsus, already deeply immersed in Judaism and the Jewish Scriptures, and doubtless knowledgeable about the beliefs of those he was persecuting (Acts 9:1-30); a religious army officer, worshipping God as best he knew (Acts 10:1-48); a prison keeper, subject to acute stress, making a sudden profession (Acts 16:16-34). The people all differ, the circumstances differ widely, but all come to faith in Christ.

Noting these five episodes within a short span of the NT, it is very difficult to see how one can maintain that there is only one stereotyped form which every Christian conversion must fit if it is to be accepted as genuine. But in every case the outcome was the same: belief in God and faith in Christ. As we study the text carefully, it is important to note that it is made absolutely clear that the conversion was the work of God. The Protestant Reformation was precipitated by the conviction that God's saving grace* could be neither triggered nor augmented by anything that we do. God did not merely accomplish part of our salvation and leave us to complete the rest through obedience and good works. The Reformers were clear that God's salvation in Christ is free, perfectly complete, and to be accepted by faith* alone.

A diversity of psychological mechanisms

The diversity of conversions recorded in Scripture is paralleled by the diversity of mechanisms of conversion proposed by psychologists, sociologists and physiologists. As new psychological theories are put forward, it is not long before someone applies them to understanding the process of conversion. Some accounts gain wide currency and much publicity. For example, with the holding of large evangelistic crusades it was an easy move to apply the psychophysiological theories of brainwashing* current in the 1950s and 60s to the events occurring at such gatherings. The psychiatrist William Sargant (1907-88) did so with insight and, at times, provocatively. He linked psychological accounts of brainwashing with similar processes supposedly at work in some religious conversions (see also *Psychology of Religion).

Today it seems that Sargant's particular psychophysiology was insecurely based and his theories probably wrong. Nevertheless, others will be proposed which bring us a little nearer to understanding the neural substrate of conversion. Recently, some neuropsychologists have attempted to link particular brain events with religious conversion.

Other putative mechanisms have been proposed to underlie conversion. Social psychologists, for example, have explored the configuration of social circumstances within the family and larger social groups which combine, as they would put it, to facilitate conversion. Psychologists interested in personality theories study whether some personality types, e.g. the more extroverted or the more introverted, are more likely to be converted in large evangelistic crusades.

Experimental psychologists have confirmed that when information is presented repeatedly, spaced over time, it is seen as more credible. Speakers, including preachers, and especially evangelists, capitalize on this, finding that spaced repetition makes messages more memorable and appealing.

In so far as conversion involves radical changes of attitude, it should be noted that social psychologists find that passive exposure to information affects people's attitudes less than active participation in group discussion. This is a finding perhaps unknowingly put to good effect by some religious cults, with their concentration on small-group sharing of experiences. Something learned passively is unlikely to change attitudes very much. William James* made this point: 'No reception without reaction, no impression without correlative expression - this is the great maxim which the teacher ought never to forget' (Talks to Teachers on Psychology; and to Students on Some of Life's Ideals, New York, 1922, p. 33). He thus anticipated how active listening facilitates attitude change.

Social-psychological research has also established convincingly that our actions influence our attitudes. It seems that we are as likely to believe in what we have stood up for as to stand up for what we believe. Thus, effective evangelism* that leads to conversion will not leave the hearer wondering what to do about what has been said.

Evaluating psychological accounts of conversion

There are many different explanations of conversion in psychological and physiological terms to choose from. Each tells us something of the mechanisms that may be at work when a person is converted. This gives us a deeper insight into the ways in which God brings about his divine purposes in the lives of men and women. Nothing in the psychological or physiological accounts can, however, help us to decide one way or the other the truth or falsehood of the beliefs that are acquired by the person being converted. We shall not decide whether there was a man called Jesus Christ who lived, died and rose again, by understanding the psychology of conversion. Neither shall we understand the historicity or the significance of the great salvation events of history, such as the crossing of the Red Sea and the giving of the Ten Commandments, by a little more psychology.

Scripture illustrates the diverse paths by which people come to faith in God and in Christ. Such diversity is paralleled by the possible scientific mechanisms, psychological and physiological, at work when conversions occur. The outcome of conversion in terms of beliefs held and personal relationships formed is not to be judged by the mechanisms at work in arriving at that destination. The contemporary danger is of trivializing the whole process of conversion by presenting it in slick media-motivated forms aimed at achieving 'results', but this has little to do with the Bible's account. Psychologizing about what is happening in conversion can divert attention from the great events of salvation history, which demand a response, a turning from and a turning to.

Christianity is not primarily about gaining inner contentment or freedom from stress,* though these are often advocated by TV evangelists as the primary reason for accepting Christ. The early disciples knew much inner anguish as they strove to spread the gospel. They certainly knew no freedom from stress as they sought faithfully to follow the One in whom they had put their trust. The apostle Paul was concerned with objective truth and with historical events, not with subjective needs. Ultimately, the test of true conversion is the evidence of a life of convertedness.

Bibliography

C. B. Johnson and H. N. Malony, Christian Conversions: Biblical and Psychological Perspectives (Grand Rapids, 1982); D. F. Wells, Turning to God (Grand Rapids, 1989).

M.A.J.

COPYRIGHT. Not until printing technology made literary plagiarism a viable enterprise did governments begin to guarantee to authors and publishers the rights of property that other fungible goods had enjoyed for centuries. Copyright protections have sought to guarantee to their creators the fruits of literary and artistic labour, and through economic incentive to stimulate creative work for the enrichment of the public.

Copyright protections originated in Venice in 1469 with the grant of a five-year monopoly on printing and a prohibition on imports. In Germany the privilege existed in 1501, in France in 1503, and in England by 1518. In 1556 the Stationers' Company, a guild of London printers, was given monopoly rights on book publishing. Unauthorized printing and failure to register were punishable by the Court of Star Chamber. Thus the protection of intellectual property and government censorship found common purpose in copyright.

While England overthrew and then reinstated monarchy in the 17th century, printing acts were allowed to expire. Immediate relief from censorship accompanied a rapid growth in pirated books. Finally Parliament enacted, in 1709, a remarkable law which gave rights to authors rather than publishers, extended protection through two terms of fourteen years, and set the stage for American copyright, guaranteed in Article 1 Section 8 of the US Constitution.

The first US Congress (1790) enacted a parallel statute, but limited protection to US citizens and required published notice in newspapers. Several changes in the 19th century led to the 1909 extension of protection to 56 years (two terms of 28 years), and finally to the Copyright Act of 1976 (effective 1 January 1978). Current US law, like that in the UK, bases protection on life of the author (lifespan plus 50 years) rather than date of publication. Anything fixed in tangible form is protected (pantomimes, sound, sculpture, etc.), though registration is required for successful suit for infringement (but this is not the case in the UK).

Unpublished works were brought under Federal protection, and the distinction between 'idea' (not protected) and 'expression' was established. The controversial 'fair use' doctrine (Section 107) provides exceptions to the 'exclusive use' provisions of Section 106.

Fair use in US law permits reviewers, scholars, teachers and researchers limited rights to quote without permission. Without specifying quantitative ranges of this right, Section 107 sets four criteria by which to judge an infringement, the most important of which is impact on the original's market. Extensive litigation has followed the use of direct quotations in a review published in advance of the book's publication (Harper & Row v. Nation, 471 US 539, 1985); use of quotations and paraphrases of unpublished material in a biography (Salinger v. Random House, 13 Med L Rptr 1954, 1987); a motion picture's use of the ideas contained in published research (Hoehling v. Universal City Studios, 618 F.2d 972, 1980); use of historically unique yet protected material (the 8mm film of John Kennedy's motorcade in Dallas); home video recording of copyrighted broadcast material (Sony v. Universal City, 464 US 417, 1984); and cases involving parody and trademark infringement (marks are protected under the Lanham Act of 1946).

In the UK, copyright law is at present governed by the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act of 1988. This Act, among other matters, defines the types of work protected by copyright, specifies things which can or cannot be done without the copyright owner's permission, and introduces new legislation relating to the rental of sound recordings and films. Overall the Act seeks to take account of developments in technology. These undoubtedly pose an increasing problem for the upholding of copyright law, especially with respect to multimedia products. For example, a purchaser can, by exploiting digital technology, run off perfect copies of a product without further payment to the producer.

Regarding copyright royalties, it can be argued that, if a wage is regarded in a narrow sense as a previously agreed sum to be paid for so many hours of work done, then the payment of copyright royalties does not seem to constitute a wage. However, in the wider sense of a return on effort expended, royalties can be regarded as a wage. To deprive authors of royalties by infringing copyright therefore in effect amounts to theft* (cf. Mal. 3:5; Lk. 10:7).

Some argue that certain articles, such as translations of the Bible, ought to be regarded as gifts of God on which copyright charges are immoral. The premise on which the argument is based, however, is open to question. Water is a gift of God, yet charges are imposed for its supply to homes without any suggestion that they are immoral.

Churches are seldom litigants in copyright actions, since market impact of churchly infringements rarely warrants a suit. Yet religious organizations confront copyright regularly: copying popular religious art in church publications; using texts of closely guarded Bible translations (the NIV especially); showing in church meetings rented video material which carries a 'For Home Use Only' implied contract; photocopying music and other materials for choirs or their teaching curricula. In the UK, a licensing arrangement permits the photocopying of choruses and songs, or their use by means of an overhead projector, on the payment of an annual fee. Churches and Christian organizations which profess to uphold the Ten Commandments need to be particularly sensitive to infringing copyright.

An increasing problem is the printing of pirated editions of books (especially textbooks) in various developing countries. For the sales of these, authors receive no royalties and the original publishers no rights income. Such a practice would seem to be outright theft, depriving both authors and publishers of income justifiably earned, though it could be argued that the high cost of importing books helps to create pressure to produce pirated editions. It is often difficult to enforce copyright in such situations, and frequently an attempt to do so would not justify the expense involved.

Another problem is the photocopying of sections (often considerable) of books for study purposes, thus avoiding the purchase of actual copies of the book. Again, authors are deprived of income by what amounts, in some cases, to theft.

Themes of justice, creativity and national development are engaged in international copyright law, where two competing theories of protection have now found their synthesis. The International Copyright Union (ICU) was born at Berne in 1886. It required member nations to protect foreign authors to the same degree that it protected its own citizens. The US declined membership in the Berne Convention, insisting on its own registration formalities and a term based on first publication. That position, coupled with needs of developing nations for access to protected materials, set the stage in 1952 for a second international treaty, the Universal Copyright Convention, adopted in Geneva. Under its provisions, foreign works are protected by the symbol © with name of copyright owner and year of publication, other formalities notwithstanding. In 1967, India led Berne members to adjust regulations in favour of developing countries; from that conference the United Nations' World Intellectual Property Organization was born.

As technology advances, copyright protections are certain to fall behind. The rise of computer-aided graphics has already raised conundrums for the 1976 Act. What degree of change constitutes an original product in text or visuals? Answers will depend on a comprehensive social ethic, a field where Christian scholarship will never exhaust the need for great wisdom.

Bibliography

J. M. Cavendish and K. Pool, Handbook of Copyright in British Publishing Practice (London, ³1993); V. M. Helm, What Educators Should Know about Copyright (Bloomington, IN, 1986); A. Kohn, The Art of Music Licensing (Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 1992); J. S. Lawrence and B. Timberg (eds.), Fair Use and Free Inquiry: Copyright Law and the New Media (Norwood, NJ, 1980); J. K. Miller, US Copyright Documents: An Annotated Collection for Use by Educators and Librarians (Littleton, CO, 1981); F. S. Siebert, Freedom of the Press in England, 1476-1776 (Urbana, IL, 1965).

P.M.F.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT, see PUNISHMENT.

CORPORATE PERSONALITY is the view that the basic units in society are groups, not individuals. H. Wheeler Robinson (1872-1945) applied the idea to the OT, finding in it an explanation of instances in which the guilt of individuals led to the punishment of whole groups, as in the cases of Achan (Jos. 7) and the sons of Saul (2 Sa. 21:1-6; see The Religious Ideas of the Old Testament, pp. 87-89). In his understanding (based on the anthropological theories of L. Levy-Bruhl, (1857-1939), the idea was more than the basis of legal process, but a primitive mentality, according to which people did not distinguish clearly between themselves as individuals and the group to which they belonged.

Corporate personality, however, gave way under the influence of the prophets to the rise of individual consciousness in religion, and therefore of individual moral responsibility (op. cit., pp. 89f.; idem, The Christian Doctrine of Man, p. 11). Yet in Robinson's view, the older way of thinking retained a certain influence, so that it even affected NT Christology.

In reality, the idea that the Hebrews had a 'primitive mentality' is highly suspect. Instances which an older generation might attribute to 'corporate personality' are explicable on other grounds. In particular the idea that the OT exhibits a transition from the primitive idea to individualism* in religion and morality fails to notice either that OT laws (and punishments) are typically addressed to individuals (see Ex. 21 - 23), or that the prophets understood the social dimension of life (Jeremiah's vision of the future is still a covenant, * albeit a new one, Je. 31:31; contrast Robinson, Religious Ideas, pp. 89-90).

The OT can reflect on the relation between an individual's sin and its effect on others (e.g. David and his family, 2 Sa. 11: lff.). Yet if guilt can be extensive in its effects (cf. Ex. 20:5-6), this idea is always tempered by the call to each individual and generation to repent (Ezk. 18).

Bibliography

H. W. Robinson, The Christian Doctrine of Man (Edinburgh, 1911); idem, The Religious Ideas of the Old Testament (London, 1913); J. W. Rogerson, 'The Hebrew Conception of Corporate Personality: A Re-examination', JTS, n.s., 21, 1970, pp. 1-16; idem, Anthropology and the Old Testament (Sheffield, 1984).

J.G.McC.

COSMETIC SURGERY. Ever since primitive surgeons in India reconstructed noses using forehead skin around 600 BC, the art of surgery has been used to improve appearance as well as to save life and ameliorate the more physical consequences of disease. Surgery for appearance covers a wide spectrum, from the repair of very obvious bodily anomalies such as cleft lips and improving burn scars, to the use of surgery to enhance beauty in bodies which do not deviate from the 'norm' in any medically definable sense. Between these two extremes lies a range of conditions which includes visible body parts of a size outside the range which society accepts as 'normal' (e.g. very large or small noses, breasts, 'bat' ears and the like); lesser deformities which still affect the patient in some significant way or other; unacceptable sequelae of pregnancy, surgery, trauma, weight loss; and the signs of ageing which a person might desire to have removed in the quest for eternal youth.

To date, there has been no rational approach to the use of surgery for these conditions in any society. Rather, the availability and acceptability of treatment at any given time has depended more upon a complex and vague web of social values. The shifting sands upon which such judgments are based becomes obvious when one sees how rapidly they change from decade to decade, and across different cultures.

What cosmetic surgery, then, if any, is justifiable from a Christian ethical viewpoint? A Christian perspective must take into account Christ's approach to the whole person, one of enormous care for all aspects of well-being, from physical health to feelings and emotions. He also approached each person as an individual, and in maintaining this attitude in our medical care, we should refuse the inexorable contemporary trend to categorize conditions for treatment with standardized methods. Thus, two patients with a hooked nose might have wholly differing psychological responses to that condition. One might be utterly socially disabled by the inhibitions that the condition imposes, becoming reclusive and depressed, whilst the other is able to integrate fully into society. By far the best 'cure' for the former patient is to remove the hook from the nose.

It may be that the social pressure to appear 'normal' is a manifestation of evil in this world; it is certainly becoming more difficult year by year for the individual with features which are unusual to achieve worldly success, other than as a freak. It is therefore manifestly unjust for the majority of society, who are blessed with appearances which fall within the 'norm' (by definition), to judge the corrective surgery sought by the few to be unjustified, frivolous, or even morally unacceptable.

The doctor faced with such requests should attempt to determine whether the root of the problem is a physically correctable deformity which, when corrected, would lead to restored wholeness of the body and greater integration of the individual into society in order to fulfil his or her functions more fully. The fine line between patients who request cosmetic correction of 'abnormal' appearance and those who request 'beautification' is sometimes thin, requiring wisdom in discernment. In this area, the Christlike attitudes of responsible stewardship, wisdom, care, and an overriding love for the total needs of the whole person are critical elements in making judgments on use of precious resources. It is not within the scope of this article to discuss the Christian ethic of the use of cosmetics for adornment, but the debate on cosmetic surgery for beautification hinges on precisely the same ground; those who use any form of cosmetic should be careful about being the first to cast stones at cosmetic surgery.

If the value of such surgery is accepted, where does it rank in the scale of values for resource allocation? This difficult area can be looked at from various scales of 'quality of life improvement', and it scores remarkably high compared with many surgical procedures for the seriously ill, which might be heroic but have poor overall outcomes. Many patients seeking cosmetic surgery will be young and have many years ahead in which to experience the improved quality of life that the surgery might give them.

It is unlikely that any society will ever possess adequate resources (see Health and Health Care*) to provide all the appearance-restoring operations that might be requested by all its population at any one time. Therefore an equitable distribution of what can be provided to the most needy (for improved appearance) must be considered by those in a position to ensure it.

T.E.E.G.

COUNSELLING, see PASTORAL CARE, COUNSELLING AND PSYCHOTHERAPY.†

COURAGE belongs to a class of virtues* that we might call the virtues of will-power or strength. They equip us to resist desires, emotions, urges and impulses that are, in some circumstances if not in all, adverse to the moral and spiritual life. Self-control, for example, is the ability to manage the urges of sex and palate, as well as emotions like anger, envy and contempt. Patience and perseverance* enable us to act, think and feel properly, despite the adversities of boredom and discouragement. Courage enables us not to be derailed by fear.*

The virtues of will-power seem to be instruments of the moral and spiritual life, rather than its very substance. In this way they differ from justice (see Justice and Peace†) and love (see †). Justice would still be a virtue in a world without psychological adversities (though it would certainly be less noticed in such a world), but courage loses its point if nothing evokes fear. Furthermore, courage does not seem to be, in itself, a specifically moral trait. Mentioning courage along with some other traits of character, Kant* says 'they can also be extremely bad and harmful ... if the will is not good'. Courage renders a thief or tyrant or seducer even more effective in his or her perversity. Thus the virtues of will-power become morally good only if enlisted in the service of the moral and spiritual life - used in the interest of holiness,* love, justice and obedience to God. Another way to see this is to note that the virtues of will-power do not by themselves supply any motivation: one acts with courage and self-control, but not out of courage and self-control. In contrast, one does act out of - i.e. with the motive of - generosity, compassion* and honesty.* In acting courageously, one needs to be motivated from elsewhere, e.g. by a concern to defend one's family or save one's life or further God's kingdom or line one's pocketbook.

Courage differs from rashness and daredevilry. The rash person rushes into danger without fully counting the cost and perceiving the danger; but to the extent that a person does not reckon with the danger, courage, which is the ability to manage one's fear, is not even called into play. Daredevilry seems to be the positive enjoyment of dangers, or perhaps the enjoyment of displaying oneself to others as confronting and overcoming dangers. If it is the former, it seems to involve, like rashness, a failure to reckon with the dangerousness of the danger; in any case, the enjoyment of danger is certainly no criterion of courage. If the enjoyment of self-display is taken to be essential, this is, again, a feature not characteristic of courage.

If courage is an ability to manage fears, the question arises: how does the courageous person do it? What kind of ability is this? It seems to be something like a skill, but this is not superficial 'technique' or self-management, because the resources that the skill calls upon are quite deeply involved in one's sense of identity and one's view of the world. The courageous Christian, faced with the danger of persecution and even death, will manage his or her justified fear of these things by reminding himself or herself who he or she is - a child of God, a recipient of God's unspeakable grace* - and by considering the danger of losing his or her life in the larger context of the losses and gains associated with unfaithfulness or faithfulness. This person will also reckon with the presence of God with him or her in the danger, and so will find strength in prayer, and in meditation on God's presence and power. Since these resources are not to be acquired in the course of a weekend retreat, we can see how dependent the development of Christian courage is on the general development of the Christian personality (see Character†). There is a reciprocity between the development of a sense of self and the exercise of courage: in exercising courage, one trades on the sense of self; but the sense of self is tested and deepened and confirmed as one faces dangers in the distinctively Christian ways. Traditions other than the Christian one also have virtues of courage - i.e. they involve a different sense of self and thus partial differences in the skills by which fear is managed. Thus Christian courage differs from other courage in two ways: in the strategies of fear-control that it employs, and in the ends that it serves as an instrument.

Bibliography

P. T. Geach, 'Courage', in The Virtues (Cambridge, 1977), ch. 8; R. C. Roberts, The Strengths of a Christian (Philadelphia, 1984); Thomas Aquinas, STh 2a2ae 123; P. Tillich, The Courage to Be (New Haven, CT, and London, 1952).

R.C.R.

COVENANT. The biblical notion of covenant is first introduced by God at Gn. 6:18, a passage which Gn. 9:9-13 takes up and develops. The use of the word 'covenant' (Heb. berzt.) in the OT refers to steps taken to affirm a set of relationships already in being by further quasi-legal arrangements (D. J. McCarthy, 'Berit and Covenant in the Deuteronomistic History'). The covenant thus confirms existing relationships and does not call them into being. Thus the reference to 'my covenant' at Gn. 6:18 implies an existing set of relationships divinely established. It is significant then that after the Flood Noah is called upon to reinaugurate the relationship of dominion established initially in Gn. 1:26-28. The Flood represented the general undoing of creation (cf. Gn. 7:11, and the structure of the narrative) so that after it, in Gn. 9:9-13, the divine covenant is re-established with humankind, animals and the whole earth. It can be argued, then, that the covenant of Gn. 6:18 refers to a specific set of relationships with humankind and creation that God had pledged himself to by the very fact of creation* itself.

Because the Abrahamic covenant, through which the whole world was to find blessing, was a reply to Gn. 1 - 11 and the problem of the Fall,* this movement of redemption though Abraham presumably had in mind the work of finally re-establishing the relationship of God to humankind and creation. It is to be noted that the relationship with Abraham begins in Gn. 12:1-3 but that the covenant itself which confirms it does not come into existence until Gn. 15:18. At that point the Heb. idiom 'cut a covenant', which refers to contractual obligations between two parties, is used as it could not be used at Gn. 6:18, since that reference had concerned a divine undertaking independent of human participation.

A further series of biblical covenants divinely imposed is made between God and Israel. By them the theology of redemption (see Sin and Salvation†) intended through Abraham is specified. The Sinai covenant is a further movement whereby: 1. the Abrahamic covenant is now to operate through Israel; and 2. the creation mandate given to Adam now devolves upon Israel (W. J. Dumbrell, Covenant and Creation, pp. 84-90). The reason given for the conclusion of the Sinai covenant with Israel is because 'the whole earth is mine' (Ex. 19:5). Through this particular covenant with Israel, Abraham's descendant, God's concern for the whole world was expressed. The political model given to Israel (as a 'kingdom of priests and a holy nation') is thus a model of the kingdom-of-God* government that was to come for all humankind. Though access to Israel by neighbouring peoples was always theoretically available, the OT emphasis on Israel's world mission to be the Israel of God and her failure at that level meant a certain national exclusivity arose, a situation which the NT would redress.

The purpose of the Davidic covenant (2 Sa. 7, though the actual word 'covenant' is missing in that chapter; cf. 2 Sa. 23:5 and Ps. 89:3) is to add Messiahship to the Sinai covenant with Christ in view. Jeremiah's new covenant has in mind the renewal of the people of God and the great interior blessing of conformity to God's will by its members by putting the law* in the hearts of his people. It envisages a time when this will be possible, when sin will have been removed as a factor in human experience. This removal constitutes the 'newness' of the new covenant. This new covenant presupposes the work of the cross* but looks beyond it to the final gathering of the people of God, and to the erection of the kingdom of God. Jesus inaugurates this new covenant at his last supper with the disciples.

The covenant relationship formed the basis of Israel's ethic (see Old Testament Ethics†), which was at all times responsory as prophetic preaching always presupposes. Given the set of relationships with God in which Israel existed, the prophets required conduct appropriate to the relationship. The demand the prophets made was a demand for a proper reaction within a context of grace, an appeal to an indicative state in which an imperative could be imposed. Israel was called upon to demonstrate her response to the grace of her Exodus redemption by freely conforming to the covenant expectations. Her keeping of the covenant was the proper response to what God had done in redemption. Moral and social faults which characterized the Israel of Amos' day were not criticized for their own sake merely, but as manifestations which would not have otherwise occurred had covenant relationships been correctly exhibited. The final failure of Israel to rise to covenant expectations meant that Jesus, as the embodiment of Israel, assumed Israel's necessary servant role.

Biblically, humankind stands with a more generalized covenant relationship, that which was instituted by creation itself, and implicit within this relationship is a morality which may be expected to demonstrate it. This moral demand later found concentrated expression in the Ten Commandments (see Decalogue*), all of which, however, were in existence as general demands before Sinai. Correspondingly, where social aberrations and injustices or social inequalities appear, they are continuing manifestations of the broken set of relationships between God and humankind and are to be addressed by Christians as such.

Bibliography

W. J. Dumbrell, Covenant and Creation (Exeter, 1984); E. Kutsch, Verheissung und Gesetz: Untersuchungen zum sogenannten 'Bund' im Alten Testament (Berlin, 1973); D. J. McCarthy, 'Berit and Covenant in the Deuteronomistic History', VTSupp 23, 1972, pp. 65-85; idem, 'Covenant Relationships', in C. Brekelmans (ed.), Questions Disputées d'Ancien Testament; E. W. Nicholson, God and His People: Covenant and Theology in the Old Testament (Oxford and New York, 1986).

W.J.D.

COVETOUSNESS is a form of distorted, misplaced or unlawful desire focused on another's possessions or property, or even on another person (Ex. 20:17; Dt. 5:21).

In the OT there are three different Heb. words which can be translated 'covet', each having a different emphasis in meaning:

1. bamad is inappropriate desire (Ex. 20:17) which can lead to the taking of another's possessions (Jos. 7:21), or social injustice in the plotting and seizing of another's house or lands (Mi. 2:2).
2. 'awa, to desire for oneself (Dt. 5:21; Pr. 21:26), expresses the personal greed or craving which is present, so the REB translates Dt. 5:21 as 'lust' in relation to a neighbour's wife.
3. basa' emphasizes distorted or misplaced desire which issues in dishonest gain, or the greed for more which has become a common social disposition (Je. 6:13; 8:10; 22:17). This can lead to a deeper distortion at the centre of a person's being (Ezk. 33:31). Such unlawful gain occurred especially in the aftermath of war (Hab. 2) or in periods of substantial social injustice, and attracted prophetic denunciation (Is. 57:17).

A cycle can develop whereby a person's distorted desires lead to a greed which will unlawfully dispossess another in order to satisfy cravings and in turn these can become more insistent, compounding the initial desire.

In the NT there is a variety of examples of coveting, including positive and well-channelled expressions of desire. The key words are as follows:

1. Epithymeo, to fix the mind on, identifying the intense focus of a person's attention rather than the disordered cravings that can be experienced. Paul recognized this danger in himself when he cited the command not to covet as stirring in him 'every kind of covetous desire' (Rom. 7:7-8). This may be one reason why he chose to support himself, as a protection against desiring the possessions of those he sought to serve (Acts 20:33). When summarizing the law (Rom. 13:9), Paul includes not coveting as an expression of loving one's neighbour as oneself. To covet is to maltreat one's neighbour. By implication, not to covet is a form of respectful care (Rom. 13:10).

2. Zeloo, to be zealous for, or eagerly desire (Av, 'covet'). This is used very positively by Paul to encourage the seeking for the spiritual gifts, especially prophecy (1 Cor. 12:31; 14:1, 39).

3. Oregomai and philargyros, two words used to convey covetousness in relation to money.*

Oregomai, lit. 'a hankering after', means to extend the arms for anything (1 Tim. 6:10). The NIV translates it 'love'; RSV is stronger, 'craving'; REB, 'pursuit'. These highlight the strength of the orientation.

Philargyros, a lover of silver, is used to describe the Pharisees (Lk. 16:14) and is a danger into which people can be enticed through a lack of personal discipline leading to a highly disordered personal life and antisocial behaviour (2 Tim. 3:2-5). For this reason the counsel for Christians is very direct: 'Keep your lives free from the love of money' (aphilargyros, Heb. 13:5). The positive virtue to cultivate is contentment (1 Tim. 6:6; Heb. 13:5).

4. Pleonexia, the wish to have more, is associated with the excesses resulting from covetousness, a greediness and preoccupation with possessing which Jesus warned could take a variety of forms (Lk. 12:15), and was evidence of evil desires in a person's interior life (Mk. 7:22). Such covetousness is also linked with a variety of forms of sexual immorality, swindling and possibly prostitution. Identifying covetousness as idolatry indicates a ruthless form of greed, intent to get whatever one desires without regard for the rights, feelings or welfare of others: a disposition that can come to dominate a person's life, till satisfying one's own needs becomes a god. 'Hearts trained in greed' (RSV, 2 Pet. 2:14) can prevent people from sharing in the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 5:10-11; 6:10; Eph. 5:3-5). Covetousness is descriptive, not diagnostic, of human behaviour, evidence of disordered desires or primary needs which have not been appropriately met or personally integrated.

See also: JEALOUSY AND ENVY.

G.J.P.

CREATION. The doctrine of creation is one of the major theological themes that informs a Christian ethic. That God repeatedly declared his creation to be good, that it is purposely ordered to attest the perfections of its maker and to contribute to the development of faith and righteousness in human beings created in his image, and that they are entrusted with responsibilities in and for the creation - all of this has far-reaching ethical implications.

Biblical evidence

Some of these implications are indicated by Scripture itself. Genesis 1 records the mandate to 'be fruitful and increase in number; fill the earth and subdue it' (Gn. 1:28), while Genesis 2 places limits on human autonomy in those tasks and sets them in context of an instituted marriage* relationship. The narrative that immediately builds on this account tells of the Fall* of Adam and Eve and the piling up of moral failure on moral failure by their posterity. When murder is denounced, it is because God created human beings in his own image, entrusting to them the care of his creation. Yet the promise of salvation also runs throughout the narrative, so that from the outset the concepts of creation, sin and redemption (see Sin and Salvation†) underlie everything the Bible says or implies about ethics.

The OT Wisdom literature ponders the meaning of life's vicissitudes in God's creation: the book of Proverbs spells out sage advice about friendships, marriage and work,* about resisting temptation and taking advice, about controlling the tongue and avoiding foolishness of various kinds: all of this is the responsibility of God's creatures living in the presence of their maker and Lord. The book of Ecclesiastes, contrasting the lifestyle of a self-absorbed secularist with that of a God-fearing person, urges readers to remember their creator before their years relentlessly bring senility and they finally must face God.

Jesus himself based some of his moral teachings on the creation. What is the point of our anxiety about earthly goods when God so lavishly provides for birds and flowers (Mt. 6:19-34)? And when asked about di-voice, Jesus referred to God's original intention for marriage at its creation, attributing Moses' allowance for divorce to human sin (Mt. 19:3-12). To those with the Gnostic tendency to regard physical things as evil, who advocated celibacy and rigid asceticism,* Paul responded that everything God created is good (1 Tim. 4:1-5).

The most significant NT passage is Rom. 1:18 - 2:16, where Paul argues that those without the Mosaic law are morally responsible to God because the moral law is engrained into human nature. While he refers to a wide range of sins which result from worshipping created things while ignoring the creator, he specifically calls homosexual behavior 'unnatural'. He plainly regards the male/female physical and emotional nature with which God originally endowed us as still in evidence, and as good.

Advantages of a creation ethic

These biblical passages have throughout church history encouraged Christians to draw ethical implications from the doctrine of creation, a procedure which also has practical value in a relativist* and pluralist* context. Just as Paul argued that all people of whatever cultural or religious background are accountable for the witness of creation to God and his moral law, so it may still be asserted that since all people are equally his creatures, made in his image (see Image of God*), human nature bears the imprint of his purposes. Whatever the individual and cultural differences, generic human characteristics of a biological, psychological and rational sort persist. The good which God purposed is to that extent the same for all, and appeal can accordingly be made to universal moral law evidenced in universal human needs and potentials, despite cultural or religious pluralism. Likewise Christian and non-Christian can often support a common cause, even though on different ultimate bases.

By the same token a creation ethic stands against any ethical subjectivism* that reduces moral beliefs to subjective feelings or attitudes devoid of objective basis. The immediate basis for moral values (in contrast to its ultimate basis in God's character and will) is in the created nature of things that is as it is independently of whether we recognize it or not. Ethical discussion can therefore be a rational debate of the ethical implications of objective features in human nature and societal relationships, rather than a pitting of purely subjective feelings one against the other.

The universal and objective grounds of a creation ethic also explain why historically Christian ethicists developed versions of ethical theories that began in the Gk. or Rom. world. Plato* initiated a tradition that it is possible to gain an intuitive knowledge of universal moral ideals, something which has had ongoing appeal. Eighteenth-century 'moral sense' philosophers, for example, claimed that we all have a natural capacity for making intuitive moral judgments, a capacity which Bishop Joseph Butler* identified as 'conscience'. Twentieth-century intuitionist theories, like that of W. D. Ross (1877-1940), continue to attract others. Analogously the Rom. Stoics developed a natural-law* ethic based on their belief that all of nature is orderly and law-governed. Thomas Aquinas* adapted this to his more Aristotelian philosophy, so that natural law is the revelation in the natural order of God's eternal law, and natural tendencies and potentials indicate good ends that God purposed for his creation: the drive to survive indicates a natural moral law of self-preservation; the sexual drive has reproduction as its natural purpose, its good; human rationality points to the good of an ordered society and of coming to the knowledge of God. Natural-law ethics understandably attracted both Catholic and Protestant ethicists, although it is more common in the former tradition.

Among contemporary Protestant ethicists, Lewis Smedes (1921-) speaks of morality woven into the fabric of our humanness, in that God sets us in broad channels where we are free but must respect the boundaries (Mere Morality, pp. vii, 7; also pp. 250-251, note 18). Oliver O'Donovan (1945-) distinguishes two concepts of order, as 'end' (teleological order) and as 'kind' (generic order) (Resurrection and Moral Order, ch. 2). Both are discernible within the overall created order, but the only pure teleological relation is between creature and creator: creation is for God, for his purposes and honour. He is the only purely intrinsic good, and his will commands. A Christian ethic therefore finds its source of obligation* in God, and it conceives what is good in terms of God's perfect will (Rom. 12:2). While it finds indications in what God has made of what ought to be, it is not merely a deontological* ethic, stressing duty* for duty's sake, but rather also a teleological* ethic affirming a purpose that embraces yet transcends all the lesser ends we properly seek in God's creation.

Practical implications

What ethical implications then can be drawn from the doctrine of creation?

1. There are implications for moral knowledge: if nature somehow bears witness to our responsibility to the creator, then some natural moral knowledge is to that extent possible. Ethical intuitionism* and natural-law theories may be overly optimistic in this epistemological regard, in underestimating the effects of human sinfulness on moral vision and ethical sensitivity, but they are on the right track in asserting that natural moral knowledge is at least to some degree possible by virtue both of God-given human capacities and of the good possibilities inherent in our God-given abilities and tasks.

2. There are implications of a substantive sort. John Calvin,* for example, regarded the Ten Commandments (see Decalogue*) as a repromulgation of the natural moral law (see Institutes II.viii.2), a view reiterated by Presbyterian theologian Charles Hodge (1797-1878): 'The law is revealed in the constitution of our nature, and more fully and clearly in the written Word of God' (Systematic Theology, vol. 3, Grand Rapids, 1960, p. 266). Hodge's reference is to Rom. 2, while he is introducing the Ten Commandments. More recently John Murray (1898-1975) finds creation ordinances regarding marriage and procreation,* replenishing and subduing the earth, labour and the sabbath* referred to in Scripture and reaffirmed in the Decalogue and its application. These ordinances relate to human instincts and interests and to all that engages human thought and action. They are not abrogated or modified after the Fall, but are more expressly enunciated in Principles of Conduct, chs. 1 and 2. On the other hand, some Lutheran theologians such as Helmut Thielicke* claim that the command of God in creation is modified after the Fall, as in Moses' allowance for divorce. But Thielicke joins Reformed theologians in regarding marriage, work and government as 'spheres' (others call them 'orders') inherent in the nature of things (TE 1, ch. 9).

3. The goodness of creation is also significant. As Baptist theologian A. H. Strong (1836-1921) states it: 'At the first creation, the world was good in two senses; first as free from moral evil ... ; secondly as adapted to beneficent ends, - for example, the revelation of God's perfection, and the probation and happiness of intelligent and obedient creatures' (Systematic Theology, Philadelphia, 1907, p. 402).

Plainly also it means that God loves and appreciates his creation, and that it was as he intended. Consequently as his creatures we too should love and respect what he made and what he intended, and this has broad implications regarding ecology and environmental ethics (see Environment*), respect for future generations, the identification of priority goals for society and for individual life, and the basis for self-respect and personal worth.

Karl Barth* develops this more fully and in doing so sums up much previous ethical thinking of the church (Ethics, ch. 2). By creating human beings, God commands them to live, for they exist distinct from God, specific individuals with freedom,* experiencing both the continuity and the change which time brings. God called this kind of life good, and it is to be lived in obedience to the creator. We must therefore affirm life, resist death, reject suicide.* To affirm life means to attend to such necessities as food and rest, to accept our sexuality (see †), enjoy life's pleasures, respect the distinctiveness of individual human beings and other living things as well. It implies that we may appropriate creation's resources to meet our needs, but it places limits on competition and acquisitiveness.

In addition to these general ways of affirming life, creation gives individuals more particularized callings as sexual beings, and in friendships, family relationships and nations, callings related to one's age, gifts, particular guidance and even to dying. Each person has particular callings to fulfil in God's creation, and needs the kind of regulation provided in the orders of creation, work, marriage and the body politic, as well as in the church itself. In sum, then, by his act of creation God commands us to affirm life, fulfilling individual callings within the orders he has chosen for governing human freedom.

But if a creation ethic is a teleological ethic, then duties are not the whole story. If redemption's purpose is to bring about God's purpose for creation, then it means an ethic of virtues,* character (see †) and social justice (see Social Ethics*) amid a creation blossoming in every way that glorifies its maker.

Finally, by affirming as it does the goodness of what God made, creation promises his continued care and offers hope in the face of moral evils that tear apart both human lives and society as a whole.

Restoration or re-creation?

Theologians differ on whether God will finally restore his creation to its original perfection or whether he will transform it into something far better, but in either case the biblical story is of a good creation twisted and marred by sin, yet to be redeemed by God's grace and power when his kingdom (see Kingdom of God*) is fully realized (Rom. 8:18-25). Creation, sin, grace and kingdom are inseparably joined in God's purposes. The eschatological vision in the OT prophets and the book of Revelation is of a creation in which God's good purposes for creation are brought finally to fulfilment. For individuals struggling with evils of various sorts, and for human society as a whole, this hope inspires courage and effort, knowing that our labours are 'not in vain' (1 Cor. 15:58).

See also: CHRISTIAN MORAL REASONING.†

Bibliography

K. Barth, Ethics (ET, Edinburgh and New York, 1981), ch. 2; J. Murray, Principles of Conduct (London and Grand Rapids, 1957), chs. 1 and 2; O. O'Donovan, Resurrection and Moral Order (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 1994), ch. 2; L. Smedes, Mere Morality (Grand Rapids, 1981; Tring, 1983); H. Thielicke, TE 1, ch. 9.

A.F.H.

CREATION ETHICS, see CREATION; COMMUNITY ETHICS;† POLITICS.

CREATIVITY. The emphasis on creativity as a core concept for artistic production is essentially a romantic concept. The artist is seen as an especially gifted visionary of spiritual truth: the creative genius. The roots of this concept as related to producing art* can be traced back to the 17th and 18th centuries, when humankind sought to emancipate itself from a created cosmos governed by divine law and replace it with the creative power of the human mind.

This desire found its philosophical expression in the writings of Immanuel Kant,* who said that 'man', as an autonomous centre of consciousness, should no longer derive laws from nature but rather prescribe them to nature. Before that time, any comparison between God's creatio ex nihilo and the work done by artists would have sounded irreverent and preposterous. To the Greek, the artist imitated an already perfect world. Only the poet (Gk. poieo means 'to make') was free to produce his own (fictional) world. It was also in connection with poetry that, in the 16th century, the first connections with creativity were being made.

In the second half of the 20th century, the word 'creativity' acquired a wider scope of reference so that it now includes, for example, creative thinking, creative cooking or creative management. Instead of focusing on art, the emphasis is on the use of imagination in any possible field.

Throughout the 20th century, Christians have tried to christianize the concept of artistic creativity by interpreting it in the light of Gn. 1:26: humankind being made in the image of God* means that humankind too is bestowed with the gift of creativity. The best-known exponent of this view is Dorothy L. Sayers (1893-1957), who elaborates on the analogy between artistic and divine creation by referring to the way God expresses himself in his Son, the visible image of himself as (invisible) divine Idea. This she applies to the artistic process. As well as having Hegelian overtones, Sayers' aesthetics are thus largely based on the concept of art as self-expression.

The argument that humankind is creative because God is creative is a form of analogical reasoning which has its origin in Thomistic scholasticism (see Thomas Aquinas*). A similar form of arguing is frequently employed to identify other distinctive human capacities such as 'rationality', 'morality' or 'personality'. In Gn. 1:26, however, the emphasis is put on God's delegation of responsible stewardship* in general rather than on any particular capacity with which to fulfil this task, a theme which recurs in Ps. 8:4-6.

One weakness of an aesthetic theory based on the concept of creativity is that it singles out what one takes to be an aspect of image-bearing and relates this to one particular form of human action, i.e. artistic production. This risks giving the false impression that artists resemble God more closely than people involved in more mundane or routine professions.

The idea of image-bearing in the Bible is both more universal and more religiously oriented than the mere singling out of one (or more) human capacities.

Another weakness of the romantic concept of creativity is its inherent leanings towards idolatry, i.e. the worship of what is created instead of the creator himself (Rom. 1:25). Even if the artworks themselves are not idols in the narrow sense (see e.g. Is. 44:9-20), a cult of creativity can still turn them and their human makers into objects of idolatry.

A more rounded biblical approach to the question of creativity would be to see it in the context of the cultural mandate and of stewardship. Whereas we are all called to develop the potential inherent in God's creation, artists - in distinction from, e.g. scientists, agriculturalists or homemakers - unfold the specifically aesthetic dimension of this world. They use their artistically creative talents to that end.

Bibliography

D. L. Sayers, The Mind of the Maker (London, 1941); idem, 'Towards a Christian Aesthetic', in Unpopular Opinions (London, 1946); W. Tatarkiewicz, A History of Six Ideas (The Hague, 1980); N. Wolterstorff, Art in Action (Grand Rapids, 1980).

A.C.

CREDIT is the sum of the money value the supplier has extended, or will extend, to the borrower or buyer. Personal credit is extended to people in many forms, such as the aggregate amount they may charge up on their credit cards, the mortgages they have on their homes, or the monthly payments they agree to when they purchase a car. Businesses borrow money from banks by negotiating and drawing against what is called 'lines of credit'; they sell bonds to institutions and individuals whose purchases extend them credit; and their suppliers offer them 'terms of credit' (e.g. you may take a 2% cash discount if you pay your bill in ten days, but regardless of whether you take the discount or not, the full balance is due within thirty days).

When credit is offered and used, it results in the creation of a loan or debt* which in turn bears an interest cost that the borrower must pay. The OT offers a number of warnings to those who would accept and use credit (e.g. Pr. 22:7; Hab. 2:6-8). It also provides many instructions to those who extend credit (e.g. Lv. 25:35-38; Dt. 15:1-11).

Credit, as offered in the Western hemisphere by banks and retailers in the last fifty years, has taken a form that was unheard of in earlier days. Those who extended credit to those of prior generations were deeply concerned with: 1. the character of the person to whom credit was extended; 2. the capacity of the borrower to repay the credit balance; and 3. the collateral available to repay the debt balance should it be necessary. Much credit has been offered in the past half-century, however, on what is called the 'law of large numbers' - the 'faith' premise that the vast majority of people are honest and will repay their debts. Little attention has therefore been paid recently to matters of character or people's capacity to repay. The wide distribution of credit cards by financial and retail businesses illustrates this new impersonal form of granting credit. Obtaining credit has become quite easy, and this has encouraged many people, who otherwise would probably have forgone the purchase, to purchase on credit. This has led to an explosion of personal debt over the past half-century, and more and more of people's income is being spent to service their debt. It is hard to believe that those extending such credit really have the best interests of the ordinary consumer in mind. And those who take advantage of this easy credit are not following the clear admonition to 'let no debt remain outstanding, except the continuing debt to love one another' (Rom. 13:8). The practical outcome of this is that many families have reached for a standard of living that is years ahead of their income and savings. They have thereby become, in some real financial and psychological ways, servants of their possessions and slaves to their creditors.

R.C.C.

See also: INTEREST; MONEY.

CREMATION, see BURIAL AND CREMATION.

CRIME. A crime is an act committed or omitted in violation of a law, but this rather simplistic definition needs to be qualified in the light of the distinction between criminal and other law.*

Criminal law is derived from the protection of a person's or group's natural rights,* e.g. the right to life, to property, to be free from assault and to be at liberty. Rules of conduct in any society, be it primitive or sophisticated, are agreed either formally or informally by prohibiting actions which might harm another person; it is from these rules that clearly defined law has been derived.

Of the laws for humanity's benefit contained in the Ten Commandments, only two are seen today as concerned with crime: 'Do not murder,' and 'Do not steal.' Adultery,* in some jurisdictions still regarded as a criminal act, has been transferred generally to the civil code in many countries.

Much debate has taken place as to whether acts of immorality, in the widest sense, are in themselves crimes. Criminal acts are generally restricted to the domain of public wrong; as Sir Carleton Allen (1887-1966) writes, 'Crime is crime because it consists in wrongdoing which directly and in serious degree threatens insecurity or well-being of society' ('The Nature of a Crime', Journal of Comparative Legislation, Feb 1931). However, some have argued that a criminal act also defies public morality (see Devlin-Hart Debate*). In the case of Shaw v. Director of Public Prosecutions, Lord Simmonds (1881-1971) asserted that 'there remains in Courts of Law a residual power to enforce the supreme and fundamental purpose of the law, to conserve not only the safety and order but also the moral welfare of the state' (see (1962) A.C. 220 (1961) 2 All ER 446). On the other hand, H. L. A. Hart (1907-92) maintains that 'it is not proper for the state to enforce the general morality' (The Listener, 30 July 1959, p. 162).

Range of crime

Some crimes are common to all nations and societies. Perhaps the most common is theft,* or stealing in its many facets. Dishonesty and deceit damage community life, and have led to 'white-collar crimes' - fraud,* tax evasion, insider dealing,* etc.

Assaults, ranging in severity from slight injuries to manslaughter and murder, are also a feature of most societies. They are frequently committed in the home as well as in public places. Research shows that much violence* follows abuse of alcohol.*

The use of prohibited drugs* inflates crime figures, not only because of the offence itself, but also because of the means often used to obtain money to purchase the drugs, e.g. robbery and blackmail. The use of offensive weapons (knives, firearms, etc.) in the furtherance of crime has increased significantly, as has the employment of explosives in connection with the international crime of terrorism.*

Sexual offences, both within the home and elsewhere, especially indecent assaults on children and women, including rape,* have shown alarming increases in recent years, and are perhaps a reflection of the permissive society which now conditions the Western world.

Proof of crime

When a crime has been committed, it must be proved beyond reasonable doubt that not only has the person charged been involved in the event which is against the criminal law (the actus reus) but also that that person either intended the act or that the result of his or her actions could be reasonably expected (the mens rea). Both elements are essential to conviction in court.

Defence of the accused

A person accused of crime, provided the elements of actus reus and mens rea are present, has general defences available to him or her to plead that the * was not possible.

Generally, a child under the age of ten is assumed to be incapable of committing a crime and, although many such infants are used as accomplices (e.g. in shoplifting with a parent), the child may not be charged.

A defendant may plead that his or her actions were justified (e.g. in assaulting a burglar), and therefore that the result is not criminal.

Another may plead insanity at the time the offence was committed or even at the time of trial. A plea of diminished responsibility* may also result in the reduction of a murder indictment to one of manslaughter.

Though many defendants claim to have been under the influence of alcohol or drugs at the time an offence was committed, courts are wary of such defences, especially if the alcohol or drug was self-administered.

Occasionally, a defendant may assert that his or her actions were attributable to orders from a superior, either in a military or disciplined service context or even in civilian life. This is not normally regarded as a valid excuse although, in a similar vein, a person committing criminal actions under duress* or coercion (see Force*) may be acquitted, depending on the seriousness of the threat or the crime.

Reasons for crime

While the range of crimes given above is by no means exhaustive, it will be seen that much crime represents a wrongful desire for something which another has. Some children are raised in an environment where pressure from either family or peers induces the youngster to commit crime. It is thought that poverty* and deprivation are the catalysts for some basic crimes, but this view does not explain why the majority of impoverished people live honest and law-abiding lives despite their needs.

Crime is often committed when reason and rationality have been suspended (due, perhaps, to the influence of alcohol and other drugs). Criminal damage or vandalism is said to be the culmination of boredom or an expression of jealousy, although that does not explain every instance which could simply be described as mindless.

Prevention

Crime prevention is the primary objective of any police force, and it is normally a high priority and essential ingredient of both short- and long-term policy. Some crimes defy prevention (e.g. crimes of passion, fraud, sexual abuse in homes, etc.), although a good detection rate and subsequent punishment* may in itself be a deterrent. Such prevention as is possible mainly comprises home, vehicle and personal security; anti-drink and anti-drug campaigns; and systems of Vehicle and Home (or Neighbourhood) Watch, where residents assist each other and local police by vigilance and reporting.

Bibliography

P. Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals (Oxford, 1965); C. S. Kenny, Outlines of Criminal Law (Cambridge, 1936); J. C. Smith and B. Hogan, Criminal Law (London, 1988).

R.E.N.O.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE is both the procedure by which a person is convicted of a crime* and the subsequent process through which the official organs of civil society work out that form of justice, the outcome of which is the infliction of punishment upon someone found guilty of the commission of a crime. The element of punishment* distinguishes criminal justice from civil justice.

In civil justice the authorities seek to restore civil relationships to what they were before they were broken, or, in cases where restoration is impossible, they seek to ensure that an injured party is compensated for the injury done to him (e.g. by the award of damages). In other civil cases (e.g. divorce*) new legal relationships may be established and the old altered.

In criminal justice the infliction of its hallmark, punishment, is authorized by official organs of the State and may be carried out either by some official generally authorized or by someone particularly authorized in the given instance. The OT 'avenger of blood' is not now found in most civilized societies (cf. Dt. 19:4-7, 11-13).

In Christian thinking about the organization of civil society, the doing of justice in criminal cases is lawful. 'The authorities that exist have been established by God' (Rom. 13:1). The civil authority within a State* 'does not bear the sword for nothing. He is God's servant, an agent of wrath to bring punishment on the wrongdoer' (Rom. 13:4). The purpose is that 'we may live peaceful and quiet lives in all godliness and holiness' (1 Tim. 2:2). Although Paul wrote before the days of the modern company, few would dispute the application of the criminal law to modern legal entities, or that they may generally invoke the legal protections available to individuals.

In most civil societies a crime is defined as the wilful commission of an offence. What constitutes an offence is a matter for the legal system involved. Whatever disturbs the ability of the citizenry to 'live peaceful and quiet lives in all godliness and holiness' clearly comes within consideration. But the precise parameters of 'crime' remain a matter for definition in any legal system. This is open both to variance and to abuse. While all States consider murder, which is prohibited by the Ten Commandments, as criminal, few (some Muslim societies excepted) now hold adultery as criminal, although that also is prohibited by the Ten Commandments. Some States use their criminal law to impose through sanction religious requirements, to ban religions of which they disapprove, and otherwise to mould their societies in ways approved of by those holding power for the time. 'Christian' potentates have used the law to encourage 'Christian' behaviour and discourage conduct of which they disapprove.

All legal systems consider it criminal for a citizen to attempt their displacement by force (treason) and many hold it criminal to encourage others to do so (sedition). None the less, the duty of citizens to oppose by all necessary means a civil authority which has forfeited its position by failing properly to discharge its divine function has been argued by some theologians, e.g. in Scotland by John Knox (History, 1560-71), George Buchanan (De Iure Regni apud Scotos, 1579) and Samuel Rutherford (Lex Rex, 1644). (Cf. John Calvin, Institutes, 1536 ed., VI.35-36; 1559 ed., IV.xx.1-2.) In modern times and following such reasoning, some have considered that a law prohibiting the preaching of the gospel is not a true 'law' requiring obedience by Christians. Short of that, questions arise as to the obedience owed to a regime that seeks to suppress civil liberties, dissent or opposition (see Civil Disobedience;* Rebellion;* Tyrannicide*).

That a criminal offence shall be 'wilfully' committed is another common general requirement. All modern societies have found it expedient in certain instances to dispense with the element of volition, and make simply the occurrence of a prohibited action (or inaction) criminally punishable. The connection between the event and the 'criminal' is held to be sufficient to justify the imposition of the criminal sanction. For example, a company may be held criminally liable for committing an environmental offence, although it would be impossible to prove that the artificial legal 'person' had any intention at all in the matter. (Similarly a company may be held civilly liable in damages, say, for loss caused by 'its negligence'.)

Again, while most societies have adopted the Mosaic requirement of two witnesses (Dt. 17:6), all societies have made exemptions from that general principle in cases where the finding of two witnesses may be difficult or unnecessarily expensive (e.g. in the UK certain traffic offences may be proved by the evidence of a single police officer). This is sensible, although if one surveys the legislation of States round the world such reasoning can be abused.

Punishment has a variety of functions, which vary in their balance in different instances: it is retribution for wrong; marks society's disapproval; allows the wrongdoer to expiate his or her crime; can assist in his or her reformation; and deters others from committing similar crimes.

See also: JUSTICE AND PEACE.†

F.L.

CROSS, THE. As the central symbol of Christianity, the cross has played a unique role in Christian spirituality* (see Forgiveness*) and ethics. It has often played a major role in discussions concerning suffering.* The need to 'bear one's cross' in imitation of Christ, an idea which can be traced back to the NT (Mt. 16:24), has played an important role in monastic* spirituality. It has also loomed large in the concept of spiritual warfare, as can be seen in the signing with the cross in baptism. The Crusades too manifested this idea, albeit in a somewhat secularized and debased form. In the spirituality of the individual, bearing the cross is clearly connected with the principle of self-denial, though the traditional interpretation, which is that Christians should bear their sufferings patiently, is not always accepted today.

From the time of the Reformation, it is possible to trace the existence of the theologia crucis ('theology of the cross'), which understands suffering and persecution as central to Christian experience on earth, and contrasts them with the triumph and bliss of heaven (theologia gloriae). In recent years, these two theologies have often separated from each other and taken extreme forms. On the one hand is the belief, born of the experience of mass persecution, that only the doctrine of a crucified God is adequate to make Christianity credible today. According to this way of thinking, there is a cross at the heart of God, which alone gives meaning to the sufferings of the universe. At the other extreme is a prosperity gospel which tries to eliminate suffering from authentic Christian experience, and regards it as a sign of lingering sin and disobedience.

The former view may be criticized for its failure to appreciate fully the reality of Christ's victory, and for glorifying suffering as an end in itself. But the latter view is a much more serious distortion of the gospel, since it denies a fundamental aspect of the Christian life, and attributes what belongs to God to the devil.

See also: ATONEMENT.

Bibliography

J. Moltmann, The Way of Jesus Christ (ET, London and San Francisco, 1990); J. R. W. Stott, The Cross of Christ (Leicester and Downers Grove, IL, 1986).

G.L.B.

CROSS-CULTURAL CONFLICT MEDIATION. Conflict,* a universal, a cultural and an individual process, is essential to, ineradicable from, and inevitable in human life. It is a universal phenomenon, with cultural pathways and patterns which shape the behaviours of individuals in dispute. Mediation practised within a culture* must be contextually congruent with that culture's views and values; mediation between persons of two cultures must honour expectations from both and recognize the third culture that is formed at the boundary by mediating persons who act as a bridge.

The variations and contrasts in understanding of conflict from culture to culture challenge virtually all basic beliefs about conflict. Traditional cultures see conflict as a communal concern; the group has ownership of the conflict and context; whereas urbanized (Westernized) cultures focus on individual issues and insist on personal and private ownership. Traditional cultures deal with conflict in preferred patterns of third-party mediation which achieve resolution in indirect, lateral and systemic ways; urbanized cultures prefer direct, one-to-one encounter between disputants drawing in third parties only in legal processes which are more often adversarial than mediating. Traditional cultures follow conflict patterns embedded in the mores and customs of the group (high context); urbanized cultures see the patterns for conflict as situational (low context), pragmatic and open to wide variation of choice and strategy. Women tend to utilize the more private styles, men the more public; women tend to utilize relational networks, men tend to own the dominant power structures of the society.

The common pool of cultural assumptions which come into play in our negotiation of disputes expresses the cultures' preferred paths for conflicts. In strongly individualistic cultures, the conflict belongs to the disputants, and advocates are involved by invitation; in more traditional societies the conflict does not belong to the disputants but to the community, and third parties are participants from the outset. In every culture conflict is triangular in origin (two persons and an issue or a problem person) and is best resolved triangularly with mediation or adjudication. A go-between person (traditional), a process (urban-Western), or a combination of the two is needed.

Key variations in conflict patterns also include: high context, in which relationships are primary, versus low context, in which issue is predominant; honour and face as a significant factor versus dignity and satisfaction; anger* as an instrumental process for community; activation versus anger as an agent-focused emotion; forgiveness* as an individual process of forgetting and forgoing versus forgiveness as a responsible, mutually repentant process of reconciliation.*

Culturally sensitive and culturally congruent processes are of crucial importance and maximum effectiveness.

Bibliography

D. W. Augsburger, Conflict Mediation Across Cultures (Louisville, OH, 1992); P. H. Gulliver, Disputes and Negotiations (New York, 1979).

D.W.A.

CROSS-CULTURAL COUNSELLING. Therapeutic effectiveness is dependent on its contextual congruence, so counselling and culture* have an intimate relationship and an intricate dialectic. The counsellor must be sensitive to what is universal - true of all humans; to what is cultural - true of some humans; and to what is individual - true only of this particular human. The universal includes the biological and general elements of social and psychological dimensions, but these are filtered through cultural values and views so that the culturally aware therapist sees universals as shaped by and selected by cultural processes. The cultural includes all these processes of human behaviour, association, institutions and traditions which provide both context and content for much of the counselling agenda. The individual includes the personality* formation, its developmental journey, and the unique configuration of traits, abilities and preferences that define the person (see Character†). The realm of the individual is also shaped by the cultural, thus all counselling is a cultural experience and exploration. When the counsellor and counsellee come from different primary cultures, the task of building a cultural bridge falls primarily to the therapist, and, as the relationship progresses, is gradually shared by both.

1. Sympathy, empathy, interpathy. Three processes of understanding the other person mark the movement to cultural competence. Sympathy is the spontaneous affective reaction to another's feelings based on perceived similarity between observer and observed; empathy is an intentional affective response to another's feelings based on perceived differences between the observer and the observed; interpathy is an intentional cognitive and affective envisioning of another's thoughts and feelings from another culture, world-view and epistemology. Cultural competence is marked by the counsellor's developing ability to seek to learn a foreign belief, take an alternative perspective, base thought on another assumption, and feel the resultant feelings and their consequences in a foreign context. Interpathic understanding seeks to experience a separate other without common cultural assumptions, values and views.

2. World-view, values and life patterns. The cross-cultural counsellor holds several assumptions which equip the person to be self-critical of the therapeutic process. These include the following. a. Cultural assumptions shape all clinical applications. b. Clinical practice is grounded in cultural depths of family history, communal tradition, social history, ethos and values. c. All claims to 'know' must be justified; all theories must be seen as tools, not ultimate truths. d. All therapy must be contextually grounded, all healing processes culturally connected, and all reconciliation processes congruent with the world of the client. e. We must hold all our assumptions tentatively, provisionally, heuristically, and remain open to challenge and changes. f. We must learn to move rhythmically between universal assumptions and cultural translations, between our own meanings and the client's world of meanings, in a constant dialectic. g. We must confess that for every perspective on doing therapy there are colleagues within our own cultures who hold an equally supported and opposite position. Other cultures possess equal variation to our own diversity, and a willingness to respect this wide spectrum can inform our work in assisting the counsellee to sort out views, values and life choices.

3. Individualism, collectivism and community* (see Community Ethics†). The commitment of Western psychology and psychotherapy to the understanding and treatment of the individual must be balanced by awareness of collective personality processes in cultures which place solidarity and community in an equal value with personal destiny and choice. Promotion of Western individualism at the expense of familial and social accountability violates both person and community in many traditional settings. A balance between inner and outer controls and a union of internal and external responsibility in relationships is characteristic of more collective cultures, as well as desirable in Western contexts of individualism and of privacy in decision and self-definition.

4. Training of cross-cultural counsellors. Two central issues in training intercultural counsellors are: a. the paradigmatic primacy of seeing all individual development as embedded in and inseparable from its social and cultural context; and b. the development of counselling models and training programmes which appreciate the validity of 'the second culture' equally with that of the dominant culture of the training or care delivery context. In a multicultural world, such priorities and such skills are invaluable and essential.

See also: PASTORAL CARE, COUNSELLING AND PSYCHOTHERAPY.†

Bibliography

D. W. Augsburger, Pastoral Counseling Across Cultures (Philadelphia, 1986); D. W. Sue, Counseling the Culturally Different (Boston, MA, 1965); P. Pederson, Counseling Across Cultures (Honolulu, HI, 1981).

D.W.A.

CRUELTY is the wilful infliction of suffering. It may operate or be perceived within many human activities; those practised for political, scientific or economic purposes will not be considered here.

Conduct which imposes suffering on children (including child neglect, which does not readily fit the element of intent in cruelty) is now described as child abuse (see Abuse*) rather than cruelty. This is probably to allow for the complexity of motives, such as the role of the unconscious, the victim as an agent (even in infancy), the agent as a victim of his own circumstances, two-way interaction patterns and family and societal systems. Recognition of such factors may engender compassion* towards perpetrators of cruelty in general. The danger is that, with diminishing use of the word, responsibility* and culpability are disregarded.

‘Being cruel to be kind’ introduces the idea that some forms of cruelty may be less harmful than abuse, since abuse can never be seen objectively as having a good (loving) purpose. A measure of pain or distress, e.g. in discipline or surgery, can be justifiable as a means to a good end.

Cruelty within marriage is no longer a ground for divorce* in the UK but may be used as evidence of irretrievable breakdown of marriage. Cruelty is clearly condemned in Scripture, both within the covenant people of Israel (Pr. 12:10) and in other peoples (e.g. Am. 1:13). It is regarded as particularly reprehensible when visited upon weak and defenceless members of society (e.g. Ex. 22:22; Lv. 19:14).

R.M.H.

CRUSADES. The Crusades, which took their name from the cross which the Crusaders had emblazoned on their clothing, captured the imagination of many European people from 1100-1300. Although the Council of Clermont (1076) is usually regarded as the initiation of the Crusades, there were many long-standing factors of papal policy, theology, politics and social expansion that contributed to their development. These notions survived afterwards as political and ecclesiastical leaders used them to motivate people for a variety of causes.

The Crusades sought to reconquer the Holy Land from Islam after the capture of Jerusalem by the Seljukian Turks (1071). The First Crusade (1096-99), in spite of diversions, was the most successful. A territorial base, including Jerusalem, was established. Although the Holy City was lost in 1144, some territories on the mainland remained in Christian hands until 1291 when Acre fell.

The undergirding concept of crusade was commitment to God and the church under the papacy, and this was regarded by medieval Christians as their premier ethic. It is ironic that such a lofty ideal was twisted to justify excessive violence as recorded in the accounts of the capture of Jerusalem in 1099, to motivate Christian against Christian as in the sack of Constantinople in 1204, and to encourage the use of violence against pagans and heretics in Europe.

The enmity established by Holy War between Muslims and Christians continues to endure. Sensitive evangelism among Muslims thus avoids the term ‘crusade’ because of its associations. However, this is not the only legacy of the Crusades. The ideal of commitment to a cause, spiritual or temporal, remains in evangelistic crusades, social enterprises, and even the ‘Crusade for Europe’ which focused the efforts of the Allies in the Second World War.

Bibliography

P. M. Holt, The Age of the Crusades (New York and London, 1986); H. Mayer, The Crusades (New York and Oxford, 1988); J. Riley-Smith, The Crusades (New Haven, CT, and London, 1987); S. Runciman, A History of the Crusades (Cambridge, 1951-54); K. M. Setton (ed.), A History of the Crusades (Philadelphia, 1955-; Madison, WI, 1967-).

T.O.K.

CULTURE consists of the institutions, technology,* art,* customs and social patterns that a society evolves. Culture is the context within which every person inevitably lives his or her daily life.

The problem of 'Christ and culture' is ordinarily taken to mean the relationship between Christians and the prevailing culture in which they live. But this obscures an important point: even when Christians reject their surrounding culture, culture itself remains the medium of their existence as they create a Christian subculture. There is no such thing as a cultureless Christianity.

The historic positions

H. Richard Niebuhr's* classic book Christ and Culture outlines the five attitudes that Christians have historically taken to the question of culture. Both in history and in a Christian's individual life, there is no single response to culture.

The radical position is that Christ is against culture. Here culture is viewed as being hostile to Christianity in principle as well as practice. Regardless of the society in which Christians find themselves, they are called to oppose the customs and achievements of society. Commitment to Christ requires an either/or decision.

A second position is the Christ-of-culture attitude, which avows a fundamental harmony between Christ and culture. Christ himself is viewed as a supreme hero of culture. His life and teachings are the highest human achievement. Followers of Christ can accordingly trust culture to be essentially congruent with their own ideals, and they need not renounce their surrounding culture.

A third possibility is that Christ is above culture. This synthesist position affirms both Christ and culture while keeping them distinct. Christ is more than simply the hero of culture. He is higher and greater than culture and worthy of a greater allegiance. But culture also demands a Christian's participation. As citizens of two realms, Christians can live with a clear conscience in both worlds, even as Jesus, the God-man, did.

Fourthly, theologians like the apostle Paul and Luther* have held Christ and culture in paradox. This position is based on a duality that accepts the authority of both Christ and culture. Christians accordingly live in uneasy tension, trying to meet the demands of both authorities and longing for an eventual trans-historical salvation that will resolve the tension.

Finally, Christ can be viewed as the transformer of culture. The tradition of Augustine* and Calvin* has claimed that despite the fallenness of human culture, commitment to Christ allows a person to transform culture into a godly pursuit. Because Christ converts people and social institutions, Christians can carry on the work of God through their ordinary cultural activities.

Doctrinal underpinnings

A Christian endorsement of culture begins with the doctrine of creation.* This obligates Christians to claim the world for God and feeds their outrage over the degree to which God's world has been counterclaimed by Satan and evil. Christians have a cultural mandate as well as a creation mandate and missionary mandate.

A second key doctrine is the Fall* and the consequent evil for human nature and social institutions. For a Christian, culture is always on trial. It tends toward depravity (though more so in some times and places than in others). Like everything else in a fallen world, culture possesses a permanent tendency to cross the line from being good to being evil.

The Bible, however, does not locate evil in external forms per se. The world and human culture are capable of being turned to good use or bad use. The abuse of something does not invalidate the thing itself. The result is the need for moral responsibility in the pursuit of culture.

Christ's aphorism enjoining his followers to 'render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's' (Mt. 22:21, RSV) sums up the biblical theme that the institutions of society are part of God's design of human living and as such are worthy of their legitimate allegiance. But at the heart of Christianity is the conviction that 'the things of God' have a higher claim than the things of Caesar. Culture is always a secondary good.

The doctrine of vocation* - the belief that God calls people to specific tasks and gives them the abilities required to perform them - likewise feeds a Christian affirmation of culture. The Bible takes for granted (e.g. Gn. 4:20-22) that God calls some people to be farmers, others to be musicians, others to be homemakers - all of them callings with cultural connections.

The Christian conviction that for a redeemed person all of life is God's is summed up in the NT injunction that 'whether you eat or drink or whatever you do, do it all for the glory of God' (1 Cor. 10:31). For a Christian, even the most ordinary cultural pursuit can be part of living the God-centred life.

Bibliography

C. H. Kraft, Christianity in Culture (New York, 1979); H. R. Niebuhr, Christ and Culture (New York, 1951; London, 1952); L. Ryken, Culture in Christian Perspective (Portland, OR, 1986); J. R. W. Stott and R. T. Coote (eds.), Down to Earth: Studies in Christianity and Culture (Grand Rapids, 1980; London, 1981).

L.R.

CURSING, see BLESSING AND CURSING; OATHS.

D

DARWIN, CHARLES (1809-82). Darwin's great work On the Origin of Species by means of Natural Selection, or the Preservation of Favoured Races in the Struggle for Life (1859) was a landmark in the relationship between science* and the Christian faith. His theory was the first theory of organic evolution to give a plausible explanation, in terms of purely natural processes, of how living creatures had diversified into highly complex and beautiful forms by gradual changes over immense periods of time. In so doing it challenged at once the argument from design (that design implies a Designer), and also the idea (very widely held to represent the biblical teaching) that all species of plants and animals had been individually created as such, and at a time not more than a few thousand years ago. This was especially upsetting to many in the case of the human species, whom it seemed to deprive of the 'image of God'* and to reduce to purely animal status. The biblical concepts of sin (see Sin and Salvation†) and the Fall* seemed to lose their validity, as did any idea of a pre-ordained goal for human life. God had apparently been replaced by chance and necessity.

Darwinism has had a considerable impact on private morality, and also, in league with Herbert Spencer's (1820-1903) dictum of the 'survival of the fittest', on the spheres of business (see Economic Ethics;† e.g. ruthless competition) and of political* ethics (e.g. racism). The issues raised by Darwin's theory are still very live, and the biblical doctrine of creation* is far from having succumbed to its challenge. In fact, in many ways the theory has been forced on the defensive, even if it has succeeded in causing interpreters to think again (as also did Copernicus' heliocentric theory) about some time-honoured but superficial understandings of the biblical text.

Bibliography

A. Desmond and J. Moore, Darwin (London, 1991); R. Forster and P. Marston, Reason and Faith (Eastbourne, 1989).

D.C.S.

DATA PROTECTION. Information which has been prepared so that it can be processed automatically by equipment (e.g. a computer), in response to instructions given for that purpose, is called 'data'. When data relates to an individual who can be identified from the data, or from the data in conjunction with other information in the possession of the data user, it is termed 'personal data'.

'Data protection' (or 'information privacy') involves persons and organizations which use and maintain personal data in accordance with ethical practices which promote the privacy* of individuals ('data subjects').

Personal privacy

In the days before personal computers had been invented, the British Government recognized that data held on powerful computers was becoming increasingly open to abuse in ways that posed threats to individual privacy. It appointed a committee, chaired by Sir Kenneth Younger (1941-), 'To consider whether legislation is needed to give further protection to the individual citizen and to commercial and industrial interests against intrusions into privacy by private persons and organizations or by companies and to make recommendations'. The committee's investigations were explicitly limited to the private sector (The Report of the Committee on Privacy, London, 1972).

Three years later, a Government White Paper was issued on Computers and Privacy (London, 1975), together with the supplement Computers: Safeguards for Privacy (London, 1975). These papers responded to the Younger Report relative to the private sector, and provided evidence that a parallel, but unpublished, study of confidentiality* in State computer installations had also taken place. In the White Paper, the Government proposed legislation, both to set standards governing the use of computers that handle personal information, and also to establish a permanent statutory agency to oversee the use of computers in both the public and private sectors, in order to ensure that they are operated with proper regard to privacy, and with the necessary safeguards for the personal information which they contain.

A further committee, chaired by Sir Norman Lindop (1921-), was set up in 1976. Its terms of reference focused upon the narrower concern of computers and data processing. This committee reported in 1978, recommending various measures including the establishment of a Data Protection Authority (Report of the Committee on Data Protection, London, 1978).

The adoption by the British Government of the Council of Europe's 'Convention for the Protection of Individuals with Regard to Automatic Processing of Personal Data' (1981) led directly to the passing of the Data Protection Act (1984). A White Paper in 1982 had endorsed the Council of Europe's principles and proposed the establishment of the Data Protection Registrar. A Bill was brought before Parliament, and received the Royal Assent on 12 July 1984.

Concern over personal privacy, however, was probably not the only consideration in the minds of the legislators. Greville Janner (1927-) described the main object of introducing the UK's Data Protection Act as 'to ensure that the UK is not excluded from various trade deals which involve the transport or transmission of personal data' ('Data Protection', in Chemistry and Industry 22, 18 November 1985, p. 747). This fear of losing contracts for lack of data protection legislation possibly played a decisive role in the Bill's progress: some Third World countries are now using such legislation to create non-tariff barriers around indigenous data processing companies. Such actions suggest that the main driving factor behind legislation is creation of corporate wealth, rather than protection of the individual citizen.

The Data Protection Act

The Council of Europe's 1981 Convention had two objectives: 1. to protect individuals in circumstances where information about them is processed automatically; and 2. to facilitate a common international standard of protection for individuals, such that the free flow of information across international boundaries can proceed properly. The Data Protection Act is therefore concerned with information about individuals which is processed by computer (personal data). It introduced significant new rights for data subjects. Such individuals generally have the right to: claim compensation for damage and any associated distress arising from the loss or unauthorized destruction or disclosure of personal data relating to him or herself, or arising from the inaccuracy of such data; have a copy of the information about himself or herself which is held on computer (the 'subject access' right); and challenge the information if he or she believes it to be wrong and, where appropriate, have it corrected or erased.

The Act obliges data users to be open about their practices (through the Data Protection Register) and to follow sound and proper practices (the Data Protection Principles). Computer bureaux have more limited obligations, mainly concerned with maintaining security around personal data. The Act established the Data Protection Registrar in a position of independence, reporting directly to Parliament. The Registrar is charged with administering the Act and supervising its operation.

Principles

The Act was designed to ensure that 'personal data' are used only in accordance with eight general principles, which are themselves intended to accord with the Council of Europe's Convention. All eight principles apply to data users, and the eighth applies only to data bureaux.

1. The information to be contained in personal data shall be obtained, and personal data shall be processed, fairly and lawfully.
2. Personal data shall be held only for one or more specified and lawful purposes.
3. Personal data held for any purpose or purposes shall not be used or disclosed in any manner incompatible with that purpose or those purposes.
4. Personal data held for any purpose or purposes shall be adequate, relevant and not excessive in relation to that purpose or purposes.
5. Personal data shall be accurate and, where necessary, kept up to date.
6. Personal data held for any purpose or purposes shall not be kept longer than is necessary for that purpose or those purposes.
7. An individual shall be entitled:
 - a. at reasonable intervals and without undue delay or expense:
 - i. to be informed by any data user whether he holds personal data of which that individual is subject, and
 - ii. to access to any such data held by a data user; and
 - b. where appropriate, to have such data corrected or erased.
8. Appropriate security measures shall be taken against unauthorized access to, or alteration, disclosure or destruction of, personal data and against accidental loss or destruction of personal data.

(For a more detailed discussion see D. Campbell and S. Connor, On The Record: Surveillance, Computers and Privacy - The Inside Story, London, 1986, p. 32.)

Proposals for a new European law of privacy

In 1992, the European Commission published an amended proposal for a Council Directive, to strengthen individuals' rights of information privacy and self-determination (Amended Proposal for a Data Protection Directive, 15 October 1992).

Changes from the current UK position are being proposed, principally widening the definitions of what constitutes 'personal data' and 'processing' so as to remove many existing restrictions, and requiring that the data subject's consent* must normally be obtained to his or her information being processed. The aim is to achieve a link between securing free flows of personal data within the European Union, and acknowledging the potential for abuse of personal information, both in the private and public sector, by unrestricted data flows.

Challenges in the information age

The ubiquitous 'chip' has now become an integral part of our daily lives, enhancing the storage and communication of data and information in many ways, e.g. personal computers, fax machines, wireless digital networks, cellular phones, cable TV, direct mail, telephone calling line identity (CLI) and credit cards. These and other cultural changes are now moving us towards a global economy. For example, information-gathering for taxation purposes which previously required whole populations to move across countries (e.g. Lk. 2:1-4), can now be accomplished by electronically harvesting individual data records from disparate sources (e.g. Inland Revenue records, bank and credit-card account data, supermarket EPOS [electronic point-of-sale] systems, immigration records, telephone call-billing systems, petrol-station sales records, credit reference agency data banks), and by using 'fuzzy logic' techniques to identify matching data items, thus building up a composite record of an individual's lifestyle. Never before has it been possible to undertake such wholesale monitoring of people's activity using multiple data records which, although not ordinarily sensitive on their own, become so in combination. Some have argued (e.g. see L. Ellis, ed., Privacy and the Computer: Steps to Practicality, London, 1972) that if each type of data is protected against deliberate theft and careless disclosure, regardless of whether held on computer or other files, the extent of extra precautions necessary to prevent combinations would be minimized.

Problems arise, however, when attempting to link records which have been collected at different times and for different purposes. Credit-card companies need to have very fast access to account details using the card number alone, but nevertheless want to be able to know which cards have been issued to an individual. They might allocate a unique code which, although it may suffice for a small credit-card company, could result in a number of individuals sharing the same code. To avoid such problems, most data users key their data on existing codes (e.g. employees' National Insurance numbers), which they hope will reduce the likelihood of duplications. Various government attempts at uniquely numbering individuals (e.g. the 'Australia card') have met with stoic resistance. Current initiatives are therefore carried out in a more covert manner, and have even been marketed as beneficial (e.g. the proposed UK NHS number, which will allow any doctor in the country to gain 'immediate access to a patient's computerized medical history').

This revolution in electronic digital communication brings with it a disturbing erosion of privacy. In the past, if the government wanted to violate the privacy of ordinary citizens, it had to expend a certain amount of effort to intercept letters and monitor spoken telephone conversations. Philip R. Zimmermann (1954-), in his evidence to the US House of Representatives Subcommittee for Economic Policy, Trade, and the Environment in October 1993 (reported in the electronic publication Computer Underground Digest 6.30, 1994), likened this approach to catching fish with a hook and a line, one fish at a time. He contrasted it with the process of gathering information from electronic mail: 'Today, electronic mail is gradually replacing conventional paper mail ... Unlike paper mail, E mail messages are just too easy to intercept and scan for interesting keywords. This can be done easily, routinely, automatically, and undetectably on a grand scale. This is analogous to drift-net fishing - making a quantitative and qualitative Orwellian difference to the health of democracy.'

What can be done to limit further large-scale abuses? One of the most effective strategies seems to be the swift and massive expression of public disapproval. In 1991, 30,000 complaints were received by Lotus Development Corporation against its proposed Lotus Marketplace: Households database, resulting in its demise (see T. Forester and P. Morrison, Computer Ethics). This product was to have contained a vast amount of data on 120 million N. Americans, including their names, addresses, estimated incomes, consumer preferences and other personal details. In effect, anyone with a suitable personal computer could purchase a copy for $750 and use the information to his or her own ends (e.g. searching for the names and addresses of all single women over seventy years of age would be useful for aspiring burglars).

To create a greater awareness of the dangers inherent in computer use, there is much to be said for ensuring that discussion of the broader ethical issues forms an integral part of all professional computing courses (D. B. Paradise, 'Ethical Attitudes of Entry-level MIS Personnel', Information and Management 18, March 1990, pp. 143-151). It seems all too easy to limit such discussions to the issues of virus propagation and software copyright protection. However, it needs to be appreciated that there are much weightier ethical matters, which need ongoing consideration as the technology evolves.

Clearly the information age has taken us by surprise: standards of personal privacy that had become enshrined in law and tradition are seen to be inadequate to meet the challenges that technological change is forcing upon us. Everyone who is involved with processing personal data has a responsibility to become involved in shaping the way that data can be used. It is not enough simply to leave the setting of limits to our legislators. As Zimmermann says: 'When making public policy decisions about new technologies for the Government, I think one should ask oneself which technologies would best strengthen the hand of a police state. Then, do not allow the Government to deploy those technologies. This is simply a matter of good civic hygiene' (Computer Underground Digest 6.30, 1994).

Bibliography

J. E. Ettinger (ed.), Information Security: An Integrated Approach (London, 1993); T. Forester and P. Morrison, Computer Ethics: Cautionary Tales and Dilemmas in Computing (London, 1994); W. Madsen, Handbook of Personal Data Protection (Basingstoke, 1992); R. A. J. Middleton (ed.) Guidelines on Good Security Practice (Swindon, 1990).

G.K.S.

DEACONS, see MINISTRY.

DEADLY SINS. Originating probably among the Egyptian Desert Fathers of the 4th century, lists of central or leading ('capital') sins were, throughout the Middle Ages and beyond, a much-used device for organizing reflection about spiritual psychology and ordering the life of the confessional. Although the lists vary in content and length, the following catalogue of seven is fairly standard: pride,* envy (see Jealousy and Envy*), anger,* sloth, greed (see Covetousness*), gluttony and lust.*

These sins are thought to be grounds, or types, of a number of other sins, so that in its elaboration the list of seven can cover quite a wide variety of wayward attitudes, motives and deeds, and help to identify diagnostically interesting connections between sins. Although the seven are popularly called 'deadly sins', not all instances of sins going by these names would count as mortal, rather than venial, among theologians who countenance this distinction. A sin is mortal only if the agent treats some creature as an end more glorious than God, thus dishonouring and disobeying God and alienating himself or herself from God, the source of his or her life. Venial sins, by contrast, do not involve inordinate exaltation of created things. For example, a sin of gluttony might be committed through weakness of will, rather than through considering pate de fois gras as more glorious than God. Or a person might love riches more than he or she ought to, yet without loving them so much that they compete with God for his or her allegiance. Roman Catholic and early Lutheran theologians accept the distinction between mortal and venial sins, but Reformed thinkers reject it, holding that all sins alienate the sinner from God, and thus are mortal.

Whether or not all sins are mortal, it seems that the kind of careful and detailed psychological description of them and their consequences, that is occasioned by pastoral preoccupation with the lists, can deepen the life of faith and our appreciation of Christ's grace in overcoming our sins and restoring us to fellowship with God. It can heighten our understanding of the Christian virtues* and our zeal for cultivating them, as well as our understanding of how to cultivate them, through co-operation with the indwelling Holy Spirit.*

Pride is a perverted attitude towards one's own excellence. As defined with God in view, it is a perception of oneself as self-sufficient with respect to one's life and righteousness.* As defined with other humans in view, pride is a perception of oneself as having special personal worth because of one's superiority, in some respect, to others. Humility* is the counterpart virtue, namely the perception of oneself as dependent on God for righteousness and life, and as equal before God (and thus equal in personal value) with one's human brothers and sisters.

Envy is a disposition to be displeased at another person's excellence because it seems to demean one. Thus, in the struggle for selfworth (see Self-esteem*) the envious person wishes to 'put down' others who seem to be doing well. The perverted logic of envy is that others' doing less well means that I am worth more, since personal worth is an essentially competitive prize. Envy is usually largely unacknowledged by the envier, as it constitutes an admission of being the loser in this important competition. As a form of hostility to the alienation from my brother and sister, envy is a violation of my created nature as bonded to him or her in love, and a rejection of the God who created me so. In its competitive logic, envy is closely related to pride, and its counterpart virtue, like pride's, is humility: the heartfelt acknowledgment that, whatever differences of excellence may exist between us, this brother and I are equally glorious before God, being his beloved children.

Anger, unlike envy, is not an essentially perverse type of emotion. It is the concerned perception that another person has culpably offended in some way and deserves punishment, and such a perception may very well be true and just. It is, however, 'judgmental': the angry person 'judges' the other to be in the wrong, and takes himself or herself to be occupying the moral high ground. Such an attitude, in a sinner, must always be a provisional, passing state of mind. When it is heightened into contempt for the offender, or hardened into grudge-bearing against him or her, or permitted to issue in significant vengeful behaviour, it is a denial of one's place in God's economy - namely, the place of a forgiven sinner and brother or sister to the offender. Forgiveness* is the most obvious counterpart virtue.

Sloth is a lack of enthusiasm for God and his kingdom. It is a spiritual torpor, a faintheartedness for the life of faith (see Accidie*), an unwillingness to venture much if anything for God. It is a carelessness about one's duties of worship and service, a willingness to settle for spiritual mediocrity, triviality and banality. It is not the same as ordinary laziness or boredom; one can be slothful and yet quite enthusiastic about one's art, career, wealth, fame and health. The ill effects of sloth can, however, be expected to manifest themselves in a despair that is detectable by spiritual directors and that may lead to more publicly observable symptoms. The virtue counterpart of sloth is full-hearted love for God.

Greed is inordinate love of possessions. This is an especially clear case of 'capital' sin, since it so obviously begets other sins such as stinginess, injustice, treachery, fraud, lying, restlessness, violence and callousness to the needs of others. The chief counterpart virtue is perhaps generosity.

Gluttony and lust, unlike the other sins in the list, are carnal, i.e. perversions of physical appetites. But it is in our attitude to these appetites, and in the appetites as affected by our attitudes, and in our voluntary behavioural response to the appetites - rather than in the simple physical appetites themselves - that the sin may reside. Our appetites can be shaped, to some extent, by our 'view' of them and of their objects. For example, we can see the sexual appetite as a gift by which God bonds us to our spouses and encourages us to beget children - or we may see it just as a source of pleasure for ourselves as individuals. And we may see persons to whom we are not married as children of God who to us are sexual aliens, or we may fantasize about them as 'fair game'. The assimilation of such alternative views into our appetites and our habitual behavioural responses to our appetites make the difference between sin - alienation from God's order and thus from God - and the life of growing holiness in Jesus Christ.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CDIV/2, pp. 403-483 (on sloth); Thomas Aquinas, STh 1a2ae 84 (the list of capital sins), 1a2ae88 (venial and mortal sin), 2a2ae 118 (greed), 2a2ae 153-4 (lust), 2a2ae 162 (pride), 2a2ae36 (envy), 2a2ae 158 (anger), 2a2ae 35 (sloth).

R.C.R.

DEATH AND DYING. The Christian view of death and dying is so at variance with a secular view, and indeed that of most other faiths, that conflicts often arise about this within individuals and families, and both within and between societies. To the secular mind, death is an ultimate disaster, to be averted or postponed as far as possible. The Christian view is that death happens to all (Rom. 5:12), and is to be accepted where the dying process makes it inevitable (2 Pet. 1:13-14), but averted where this is not the case (Lk. 10:30-37). For the Christian, death is not the ultimate disintegration, though it is in a sense a 'sacrament' or outward sign of universal sinfulness (Rom. 5:12b). The endowment of a new body of a kind foreign to this present age (1 Cor. 15:35-54) renders death an essential preparation for resurrection* in Christ (1 Cor. 15:49). So, what matters most is not death, but a person's union with Christ (2 Cor. 5:17).

Further, secular views are strangely contradictory. On the one hand, death is seen as the ultimate terror to be avoided or postponed, even by exaggerated medical means which are doomed to fail (cf. the technological prolongation of the life of General Franco). On the other hand, a life can be regarded as so broken, disabled or fading as to be not worthwhile, or of no social value, and hence it may be neglected or even extinguished by voluntary or involuntary euthanasia.*

The Christian view is that exaggerated medical means ought not to be employed to prolong life unnecessarily, especially when used out of consideration for a dying person's wealth or status. Furthermore, to neglect the needs of the poor, the disabled or the disadvantaged is evil, even if it is 'economical'; life is not ours to extinguish, since it belongs to God (see Sanctity of Human Life*). These arguments relate to all kinds of human life, whether it be the unborn child (see Abortion*), the infant (see Infanticide*), the disabled or the dying. To relieve the suffering of the dying is, however, a Christian aim.

Global ethical (see †) issues of resource allocation (see Health and Health Care*) abound. Christian mission has been in the forefront of medical aid and famine relief to refugees, the underprivileged, epidemic victims and prisoners, for the kinds of spiritual and ethical reasons just given; health care always accompanies the gospel as a matter of Christian integrity (e.g. Mt. 11:4-6).

Death and dying are the ends of a process which begins in everyone from conception; even our bodily form is shaped in part by the death of some of its proliferations before birth. Ageing* is a part of dying, and leads to death whether by accident or disease. Hence the Christian church has never sought to disguise or feign the absence of this normal process, but rather to look forward to the vital nature of the life beyond (Mt. 16:25-28).

It is inevitable that stress* within and between individuals and families will occur in relation to death; this is reflected in medical choice, in cosmetic activities, and in the types and styles of funerals. It is essential and right to allow sorrow for separation from loved ones, and for a normal bereavement* reaction. This usually takes from six to nine months or more, and may begin after the period of brave bearing (or even denial) is over, some time after a death has occurred. Equally, before death, it is essential to understand and allow for natural reactions of denial, anger,* acquiescence or distress, as these occur successively in a terminal illness. It is also important to remember how an illness may itself modify even normal reactions, or a person's habitual temperament, to face death. Even so, a Christian reaction to these sad events is changed qualitatively by the hope of the resurrection (e.g. Jn. 11:21-27; 1 Thes. 4:13).

The discussion of spiritual topics with the dying is a vital pastoral concern; many dying people are too confused or toxic to grasp abstract or new ideas, though lucid intervals often occur. It is best to approach such topics through the sufferers' own immediate concerns, through what is at the top of their agenda. This may be fear,* pain* or concern for those who will remain. Often it is simplest to encourage prayer,* and assure them of its being made for them; then to point to the worthiness of the one to whom the prayer is made, and the special characteristics which fit him uniquely to be the Saviour, ours and theirs. Many dying people need only to be reminded of a trust* which they have ceased to exercise, or of which they have never seen their need to use before. No-one can help a dying person, or their near and dear ones, who has not faced and come to terms with his or her own dying, for pretence is no comfort. Particular problems which may arise include when and if attempts at spiritual healing* are sought, the disposition of the patient's property* and wills,* and the need for reconciliation* with alienated friends or family.

A time of dying evokes many reactions within relatives and friends, not all of them helpful. Some evince guilt* about past events, or what they might have done to help; often this takes the form of exaggerated blame for others, even for the dying. Others distance themselves, because they do not know what to do or say, or because their own distress is their chief concern. So pastors find themselves caring not only for the dying, but for their circle as well. It is essential to be able to listen, and to find time for this; to decide who to meet together or separately, and how far to go with each.

In general, as in the hospice* movement, it is essential to move so as to lessen fear and isolation, to aid people to meet rather than to remain apart, to encourage, explain and interpret the numerous small incidents which may cause needless fear or distress. Medical help should aim for care and comfort, not cure; to be open in its reasons rather than secretive; to respect the wishes of the sufferer the most wherever it seems right and reasonable so to do, rather than to impose traditional approaches as to 'what we do'.

It is essential for pastor and medical carers to collaborate in 'shared care', not to compete or to deny others their proper place in caring; carers must aim to treat problems in the interests of the dying person and their relatives, not to serve themselves. Perhaps the greatest element of Christian care is love (see †), which is not replaceable by even the most otherwise-competent medicine or care. The Good Samaritan is the Lord's example of loving competence; as 'purchaser' he channelled the 'provider' function of the innkeeper, monitoring its performance (Lk. 10:33-36); this seems to be the best model for a Christian view of resource allocation for the seriously ill. The things that happen when someone dies, or nearly dies, shape the emotions and living of those about them who must live on with those memories.

See also: ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE;† LIFE, HEALTH AND DEATH.†

Bibliography

E. Kübler-Ross, On Death and Dying (New York, 1969; London, 1970); S. E. Lammers and A. Verhey (eds.), On Moral Medicine (Grand Rapids, 1987); C. M. Parkes, 'Bereavement', MI 94, 1991, pp. 3928-3929; P. Ramsey, Ethics at the Edges of Life (New Haven, CT, 1978).

D.W.V.

DEATH, DEFINITION OF, see BRAIN DEATH; LIFE, HEALTH AND DEATH;† TRANSPLANT SURGERY.

DEBT is an obligation to pay for prior receipts of goods, services or money. The assumption of personal debt (not commercial debt) is clearly discouraged in Scripture, though not forbidden. Most of the biblical references to debt focus on the relationship between prosperous creditors and financially weak debtors, but Scripture also warns against the practice of using 'borrowed' funds to enhance one's standard of living (Hab. 2:6-8). Just as God desires people to be free from sin (1 Jn. 2:1-6), he also wants his people to be unencumbered by debt (Dt. 15:1-2). Both sin and debt are enslaving and destructive if they are not covered and eliminated. The more important concerns regarding debt are:

1. Duration of debt. When personal debt is deemed necessary, how long should the loan remain outstanding? The law placed a sevenyear limit on debt (Dt. 15:1-11; 31:10-11). In fact, specific 'seventh years' were to be designated throughout the land as the time for cancelling debts. Cancellation was to take place during the Feast of Tabernacles (Dt. 31:10). This was to provide a time for community-wide celebration when everybody was to be released from their debt burdens (see Jubilee*). These instructions regarding debt were given to limit the lenders, not the borrowers, for they were in the positions of financial power. In this arrangement, the lender knew that if he loaned a sum of money that could not reasonably be repaid by the year of release, then the balance of the obligation was to be forgiven. This required the lender to care for the long-term best interest of those who were financially distressed. This principle of the prosperous and powerful being under obligation to care for the long-term best interest of the weak and needy overflows into every area of the Bible's teaching, not just creditor/borrower relationships (Pr. 29:7; 31:8-9; Je. 5:28).

Are these OT financial principles (a sevenyear limit on debt; forgiving all debts not repaid in seven years; the financially strong being obligated to act in the best financial interest of the financially weak) practical or useful in modern society? They are clearly ignored today, and our debt burdens and the percentage of our income used to service our debts would be much less if God's wisdom were heeded. It is ignored to our own harm.

2. Commands to give and lend. We are called upon by God to both 'give' and 'lend' to our neighbours (Mt. 5:42; Lk. 6:30-35). When are we to give, and when should we lend? We give to those who have legitimate authority to ask for our money. For example, taxing authorities have this right (Rom. 13:5-7). We are to give to those who have immediate, acute needs - the hungry, naked and cold (1 Jn. 3:16-18). There are times, however, when lending and not giving is the loving response to a genuine need (Dt. 15:7-8; Lk. 6:30-35). It is in everyone's best long-term interest for individuals to assume the full responsibility, and its accompanying obligations, for the well-being of themselves and their dependents. Lending to the needy, when there is no real chance of repayment, positions the act of lending (without expecting to get it back) as one of true charity. By this act, though, the recipients are enabled both to maintain their self-respect and to acknowledge the basic truth that they should, if at all possible, care for themselves. It allows the borrowers to affirm their desire and hope to be able to meet their obligations. It allows the lender to emulate God who forgives our debts, as we are expected to forgive our debtors (Mt. 6:12-14; 18:21-35).

3. Guaranteeing another's debt repayment. We are on occasions asked by friends or acquaintances to help them secure loans. Should a person endorse or co-sign a debt obligation for the benefit of another person? Scripture provides strenuous and explicit warnings against doing this, e.g. 'Do not ... pledge ... if you lack the means to pay' or else you will find yourself suffering unaffordable losses (Pr. 22:26-27; see also 11:15). The reasons for caution are deeper than a potential financial loss, though. The relationship between a borrower and the endorser or co-signer is altered when such a financial arrangement is entered into. An adverse outcome can easily damage the theretofore friendly association. And, finally, the inability of the primary borrower to be able to secure the loan as an independent party is clear evidence that he or she is not yet in a position to assume such a financial risk independently. The borrowers are trying to reach beyond their current financial ability in such situations.

4. Obligation to repay debts. Is there a moral defence for a debtor declaring bankruptcy? There is no such defence if the borrower has a cavalier attitude from the time the money was borrowed, reasoning that, if things turn financially sour, the money will not need to be repaid because the obligation is avoidable in bankruptcy court. Seeking voluntary bankruptcy under the civil law is not prescribed in Scripture. However, the Bible instructs us to seek release directly from those for whom we have entered into guarantees if we need to do so (Pr. 6:1-5). The righteous also give their word and honour it, even when doing so creates personal hurt (Ps. 15:4). Scripture defines borrowing and not paying back as wickedness (Ps. 37:21). Suppose, however, the creditors force the borrower into involuntary bankruptcy, and the court, after distributing all assets, declares the debtor absolved from the unpaid balances. Is a Christian in such a case still morally obligated to pay? In such a situation, continuing to repay a legally excused debt is a powerful testimony to the unbelieving world of the integrity of the debtor, and in doing this the Christian emulates the unchanging character of God who honours his word in all circumstances (Nu. 23:19; Tit. 1:2; Heb. 6:13-20). Are we not called to be like our heavenly Father?

5. Speculative borrowing. The world tells us that borrowing is good, especially if we hope to profit by it. But is it morally defensible: a. to borrow money that is not needed, for the purpose of using it in the hope that it can be repaid later in cheaper monetary units (currency that is devalued through inflation); or b. to plan on selling assets purchased with the loan money at a hoped-for higher price in the future in order to make a profit and repay the loan (e.g. buy stock with borrowed money and hope it will appreciate)? Scripture warns us against such speculation which may fail and cause us to lose more than the value of the assets we acquired (Pr. 22:7; Hab. 2:6-7). Why does one desire to speculate with borrowed money in the first place? Scripture calls us to examine our hearts to see if greed and covetousness* are present. Beware of them (Pr. 11:6; Is. 56:11; Lk. 12:15; Rom. 1:29; 2 Pet. 2:14)!

6. National debt. Biblically, a nation that maintains a creditor (lending) position, rather than a debtor (borrowing) position, is seen as bearing the mark of God's special blessings (Dt. 15:6; 28:12-13). This is so, for nations that borrow must accept controls on their economic policies and thereby become subject to the restraints imposed by the creditors. And a portion of their wealth is soon transferred out of the nation to one's foreign creditors. This eliminates the opportunity to use the wealth (interest and principal repayment) in one's own nation. Thus the capital used to repay the borrowings, both interest and principal, must be less than the returns earned on the borrowed funds, or else the borrowing nation will be weakened financially. Nations, as individuals, should avoid debt whenever possible.

7. Other topics related to debt. In addition to the aforementioned topics there are others in which God expresses an interest, such as: a. the differences to be observed when lending to 'believers' and 'non-believers' (Dt. 15:3); b. questions of usury (Lv. 25:35-38); c. special external hardships (e.g. famine) that force borrowing (Ne. 5:1-13); d. restoring borrowed collateral (Lv. 25:35-38; Dt. 24:10-13); e. choosing servitude as a means of avoiding welfare (Lv. 25:47-48); and f. the issues surrounding banking* and commercial lending (Mt. 21:12; 25:27; Lk. 19:23).

See also: INTEREST.

R.C.C.

DECALOGUE. The Ten Commandments (or the Decalogue) have been widely observed throughout church history as a summary but comprehensive exposition of God's requirements for right behavior (sometimes called the 'moral law'). Tertullian* declared that they were written on human hearts long before they were engraved on stone. Thomas Aquinas* called them God's reminders to human beings of duties which sin has obscured. And John Calvin* described the process of sanctification* as 'ever more complete obedience to the Ten Commandments'.

Old Testament scholars debate the origin and literary history of the Decalogue (which is recorded twice, with minor differences, in Ex. 20 and Dt. 5), but do not dispute its centrality. It forms the basis of the Pentateuch's civil and criminal law codes (see Law, Civil and Criminal*), together with their penology.

The Decalogue's place in Christian decision-making is subject to all the hermeneutical considerations which arise whenever the relevance of OT law* is considered (see Old Testament Ethics†). Apart from the culture gap which is exposed in the wording of the second, fourth and tenth commandments, most of the Decalogue is cast in a negative form and addressed to the individual - thus obscuring (some would say) the roles of positive values and social morality. Moreover, the emphasis on actions and words in all but the tenth commandment needs supplementing by Jesus' stress on attitudes and motives.*

The Decalogue does, however, display continuity with Jesus' ethical teaching. Both are theocentric, rooted in the related concepts of covenant* and kingdom*, and their demands are presented as right human responses to God's prior acts of grace. When read in this light, with its principles exposed, the Decalogue still retains its Christian ethical bite.

D.H.F.

DECEPTION, see FRAUD; TRUTH.

DECLARATION OF GENEVA, see HIPPOCRATIC OATH.

DEFENCE MECHANISMS, PSYCHOLOGICAL. The literature contains many different definitions. Charles Morris defines defence mechanisms as ‘the way people react to frustration and conflict by deceiving themselves about their real desires and goals in an effort to maintain their self-esteem and avoid anxiety’ (Psychology, p. 439). Others say that defence mechanisms are essential to help cope with failure and are a way of maintaining a positive self-image. However, in some situations the defence mechanism may stop a person from doing the appropriate thing.

Sigmund Freud,* the first person to focus on defence mechanisms, studied the subtle ways that people try to deceive themselves and others. His work was developed by Anna Freud (1895-1982). The classic studies of egodefence mechanisms are rooted in the Freudian tradition. Defence mechanisms protect from anxiety,* which occurs when individuals’ desires clash with the image they have of themselves. Behavioural psychology views defence mechanisms as psychological and verbal activities which protect people from unpleasant experiences. These occur when a person’s actual behaviour clashes with the way in which he or she has learned to behave from ‘significant’ people.

There are at least forty different types of defence mechanisms, the main ones being:

Denial. Personal responsibility is rejected for actions. Reality is denied. The person may deny things that are known to be true, e.g. refusing to believe that a loved one has just died.

Distortion. A person reshapes the external reality to suit his or her inner needs. This can frequently involve some grand delusion; it may even involve ‘hearing’ voices from God.

Repression. Feelings, impulses or motives that are unacceptable are pushed into the unconscious and prevented from becoming conscious, e.g. a memory of being attacked, which is too painful to deal with, is ‘forgotten.’ This mechanism is often seen as the primary defence mechanism upon which all the others are based.

Regression. The person faced with conflict returns to an earlier stage of emotional immaturity at which he or she felt safer and protected, e.g. a child of six may regress to infancy and start bed-wetting.

Rationalization. A person justifies unacceptable attitudes, beliefs and behaviour by trying to explain his or her actions or blaming other people for the problems.

Projection. A person will not come to terms with his or her own attributes, and so instead accuses someone else of that attribute. Angry people do not see their own anger but accuse someone else of being angry.

Displacement. An individual transfers an emotion from its original object to something which may seem less threatening, e.g. a man who cannot be angry with his boss takes his anger out on his wife.

Suppression (similar to repression). People postpone dealing with conscious conflict. They fool themselves into thinking that they will deal with the conflict later, but never do.

Intellectualization. This can look very like rationalization. A person avoids difficult feelings, such as severe feelings of inferiority, by use of intellectual language, discussions and philosophizing.

Attribution of blame. People shift the blame away from themselves. The fault is said always to lie with someone else, with circumstances or with God.

D. Powlison challenges the traditional view of defence mechanisms. He argues that to view them as a set of intrapsychic mechanisms totally misses out the interpersonal component. A person’s defence mechanisms can affect the people with whom he or she is in contact. How one views defence mechanisms is important. If one holds the view that they are thought to be unconscious and therefore people cannot be held accountable for them, then there is the danger of Pelagianism (refusing responsibility before God for whatever the person is not in complete control of). In reality, unconscious and conscious behaviour are not easy to distinguish. In Scripture people are held accountable for their actions whether they are aware of them or not. So even if a defence mechanism is unconscious, the person is accountable for it and for its effect upon other people.

Scripture illustrates certain defence mechanisms, e.g. Saul projects his own hostility on to David (1 Sa. 19:9-10). Defence mechanisms are basically a form of deceit and therefore sinful. This is addressed in Pr. 14:8, 'The folly of fools is deception.' Jeremiah, too, avers that 'The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it?' (Je. 17:9, AV). Since defence mechanisms involve people in being deceitful to themselves and to others there is often a need gently to peel them away and replace them with truth: this is often part of the task of therapy or counselling.

Bibliography

A. Freud, The Ego and Mechanisms of Defence (London, 1937); C. Morris, Psychology: An Introduction (Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 1973); D. Powlison, 'Human Defensiveness: The Third Way', JPP 8.1, 1985.

H.C.H.

DEFENCE: MILITARY AND CIVIL. 'Military defence' is the deployment of armed forces to protect a nation against attack, or the threat of attack, by another nation. 'Civil defence' means the non-military precautions taken to reduce loss of life and property in the event of attack.

1. In military defence, no hard-and-fast line can be drawn between preparation for defence and for attack. In order to defend oneself, it may be the best policy to attack enemy forces. Defence includes not only measures to meet attack, but measures to prevent attack by attacking first. The need for deterrence* is also included in defence.

The system of military defence comprises not only the armed forces and their weapons, but also a large infrastructure of research, communications, supply, administration, etc. The maintenance of a defence force that is appropriate to a nation's political situation is an important obligation if it be allowed that one of its functions is to restrain evil-doers (Rom. 13:3-4). In a world of armed nation-states, each nation has a duty to maintain forces that are adequate in order to deter and prevent the possibility of armed conflict, by so ensuring that there is little or nothing to be gained from initiating it. However, this is not to justify any and all defence measures.

It is also a nation's political duty to act so as to build international trust and to reduce the chances of war. It is important to maintain only forces which are appropriate, neither too weak nor too large. Inadequate forces may give the wrong signals (as, for instance, British naval reductions before the Argentine invasion of the Falkland Islands). Excessive forces may be maintained out of anxiety or a misplaced concern for total security, in ways that do little to build international peace and security.

Christian attitudes to participation in military defence obviously depend on the individual's attitude to war.* Pacifists* who see no Christian justification for participating in war will not be able to participate in good conscience in the majority of defence preparations. There may be exceptions, e.g. in areas of preserving life and civil society, such as researching and preparing antidotes for new weapons. Those who accept the just-war theory* will be ready to be employed in the work of defence. But they too will wish to consider the nature of their involvement with care. Some, for instance, might question the justification for nuclear deterrence (see Deterrence, Nuclear*) and with it work on nuclear weapons. The same could be said about chemical and biological warfare, while recognizing that one has to understand the nature of the offensive weapons in order to be able to take adequate precautions against them.

2. The need for civil defence is a response chiefly to aerial warfare. The idea is to take precautions to protect populations against bombs and rockets, whether carrying conventional explosives, nuclear bombs, or chemical or biological weapons. It dates back effectively to the Second World War. Since then, attempts have been made in some countries to take precautions against nuclear bombs. These include the USA and the UK, but the most systematic work appears to have been carried out in the former Soviet Union.

There are a number of measures characteristic of civil defence. They include: blackouts; provision of shelters, gas masks and first aid; evacuation of cities; the provision of warning and communication systems; firefighting measures, including the reduction of fire hazards and designing firebreaks; strengthening buildings; and providing duplicate and emergency services. The need for, and extent of, civil defence provision obviously varies with the international political climate; but many physical aspects, such as design of cities or building underground shelters, require longterm planning.

Some pacifist groups have opposed civil defence, arguing that defence against nuclear attack is futile and that such defence encourages the acceptance of war as inevitable. These arguments do not seem compelling, and to some extent they run in opposing directions. It is widely agreed that large-scale nuclear war would be destructive on an unprecedented scale. But more limited kinds of war may take place, and there seems no good reason not to take some reasonable precautions to save life and property in such an eventuality if we can. It is hard to believe that civil defence could encourage anyone to go to war, or in any way make war more likely. Of course, a nation determined on war would very likely take civil defence more seriously, but the logic does not run the other way.

D.J.E.A.

DEFORESTATION may be defined as clearance of forest or woodland for another land use. Such clearance is now occurring in most tropical countries at an even faster rate than in recent years. In 1990 deforestation in the tropics was estimated to average 16.8 million hectares per year or rather more than 1% per year of the whole tropical forest resource (Dembner, 'Provisional Data from the Forest Resources Assessment 1990 Project'). In temperate regions forest clearance and forest creation are more or less in balance, with most countries now promoting policies leading to net increase in forest cover.

Consequences

Deforestation in the tropics has three serious consequences: 1. destruction of some of the richest ecosystems in the world and the inevitable extinction of some plant and animal species; 2. release of huge amounts of carbon dioxide, from the carbon stored in wood and organic matter, which is an important 'greenhouse' gas contributing to global warming; and, most importantly, 3. displacement of many tribal peoples, shifting cultivators and other forest dwellers and users. Lesser, but still locally significant, consequences of clearance are increased risk of soil erosion and flash floods, desertification, and changed microclimate. Taking together these consequences and the scale at which deforestation is occurring, the resultant, continuing destruction is a calamity.

Over the centuries some deforestation has been necessary to provide land for farming as populations have risen, but today the great bulk of remaining forest is on land ill-suited to settled agriculture. Indeed, all the richest volcanic and sedimentary soils of the tropics have long been cleared of their natural vegetation for cultivation. However, timber and other forest products are valuable commodities, the realization of which cannot be wholly denied a nation or country. The challenge is to devise ways of sustainable management that will make forests a genuinely renewable resource: experience has shown the exceeding difficulty of this in the tropics (M. E. D. Poore, No Timber without Trees).

Causes

Tropical deforestation is a complex phenomenon. The immediate causes may be listed as shifting cultivation, clearance for agriculture, logging, developing mineral exploitation and other industries, wars, transmigration and urbanization, wildfires and, especially in the drier tropics, overgrazing and overcutting of woodland and savanna for firewood, poles and fodder. However, the pressures which precipitate these quintessentially human activities mostly flow from economic dictates, such as North-South* trade flows and excessive Western consumption, corruption and nepotism realizing forest wealth for personal gain, and from land laws and land policies that are environmentally bad, such as transmigration in Brazil and Indonesia, and villagization in Tanzania and Ethiopia.

Increasing population is largely not to blame. Although population growth rates in tropical countries are rising, unavailability of food, fuel and other needs, leading to pressure on dwindling forests, has more to do with enormous inequity in land ownership, inadequate means of distribution of food and other resources, and selfish profiteering and environmental disregard. The earth is so blessed that it is easily able to feed its present population, as agricultural surpluses testify.

Responses

Deforestation issues are high on political agendas owing, in large part, to pressure from environmental groups. This increased awareness grew in the 1980s and, as far as it goes, is to be applauded. The international response has been less encouraging, with the main initiative being the Tropical Forestry Action Plan of the Food and Agriculture Organization. This programme has brought donors and other agencies together and further focused attention, but has not yet seriously addressed the prime causes of deforestation. Under consideration is a proposal for an international forestry instrument to regulate forest use world-wide, but any agreement is remote. All these inadequacies are not surprising, since the causes of deforestation are overwhelmingly the product of human nature. Addressing this fundamental issue of sin, greed and selfishness is, of course, what the gospel of Christ confronts and is where, ultimately, the only solution lies.

On a practical level increased tree-planting can help deflect pressures from natural forest, but can never substitute all the values of such forest or, so far, produce the high-quality timbers sought from tropical forests, with the important exception of teak (J. Evans, Plantation Forestry in the Tropics). Planting does offer ways of alleviating domestic needs for fuel and building materials through programmes of social forestry, and can aid food production through agroforestry. It is not a panacea, but is undoubtedly a legitimate development objective.

Relief of poverty* is the broader aim which will most ease deforestation pressures, but this can be achieved only once bad policies and laws and other inequities are themselves tackled.

Ultimately deforestation is a matter of stewardship* of an important but fragile resource. Biblical stewardship is care, and involves husbandry that conserves and makes forests productive for humankind. It does not permit wanton destruction, even if for apparently legitimate ends (e.g. even when laying siege, the Jews were enjoined not to fell trees because they are useful, Dt. 20:19).

The imagery of trees as figures of beauty (Gn. 2:9), strength and certainty of faith (Ps. 1:1-3), and of healing of the nations (Rev. 22:2) is not merely poetic reflection, but points to a living reality essential to our environmental well-being.

Bibliography

S. Dembner, 'Provisional Data from the Forest Resources Assessment 1990 Project', in Unasylva 164, 1991, pp. 40-44; J. Evans, Plantation Forestry in the Tropics (Oxford, 1992); Food and Agriculture Organization, Tropical Forestry Action Plan (Rome, 1985); M. E. D. Poore, No Timber without Trees (London, 1989).

J.E.

DEFORMITY, see DISABILITY AND HANDICAP.

DEHUMANIZATION refers to the loss or suppression of characteristically human traits such as dignity, freedom,* spontaneity, creativity,* love (see †) and the capacity to worship. There are many forces at work that oppress and destroy human personality.* Contemporary existence in the urban, industrial environment has been said to be dehumanizing, since it so often can lack opportunities for significant attachments, creative work and meaningful involvements. Particularly in the post-Second World War period, writers have called attention to the effects of conformist, regimented society and its consumerism* which suppresses individual integrity in the process of providing a remarkably high standard of material comfort.

An aspect of contemporary Western society that is singled out for criticism is its overriding involvement with technology.* The technological servant has become the master, moulding human beings in subtle ways. Automation* threatens to make people expendable in many occupations, while television supplants conversation, reading and imagination with lowest-common-denominator entertainment. The automobile has shaped the modern city to its service while increasing both our isolation and our physical lethargy, while the computer has multiplied our capacity for information beyond that of wise control. Technological medicine, while providing dramatic remedies for many illnesses and injuries, has created for many the spectre of longterm existence in a diminished, dehumanized state, prompting the call for 'death with dignity' (see Euthanasia*).

With our modern technological society come pollution (see Environment*), abject poverty,* global malnutrition and other ills that have perhaps a mixture of human and natural causes. Many millions in the Third World suffer the disastrous effect of such phenomena, which make it impossible to have even a semblance of fulfilled, truly human, lives.

Totalitarian societies have dehumanized their members by suppressing their free activity in the interests of State ideologies. The comprehensive oppression of Jews and other groups by Adolf Hitler (1889-1945) began with public harassment and humiliation, and resulted in the ultimate dehumanization of the mass extermination camps with their efficient means of gassing and cremating millions. The Stalinist persecution of political opponents included the gross misuse of psychiatric hospitals and therapies and appalling work camps and prisons, the 'Gulag'.

C. S. Lewis* believed that dehumanizing tendencies exist in modern cultural life. Current philosophical and educational views, which he finds even in a seemingly innocuous school textbook, have helped shape modern people into 'men without chests', by severing the essential link between the rational head, the feeling, emotional chest, and the appetitive bowels, so that only the intellect and appetites remain and full human existence as an integrated whole becomes impossible. Such truncated individuals are ripe for manipulation* by a controlling elite, using the latest manipulative methods of the social sciences.

For the Christian, the source of our truly human characteristics and capacities is the God (see †) who created us in his image* and acted in his Son to redeem and reconcile us to himself (Gn. 1:27; Rom. 5:10-11). God wishes his creatures to live in fulfilment of their divinely imaged human potential, enjoying work,* social life and cultural involvements. Dehumanization is a consequence to be expected when people reject God and his revealed will. While dehumanizing forces have always been at work, the immensity of 20th-century dehumanization in the forms mentioned above seems not unrelated to our living in a post Christian era in which the theological basis for respect for human individuals in all of their particularity has been undercut (Rom. 1:21-32). Christians must discern the times and identify and resist any dehumanizing tendencies they find in their immediate circumstances. This may well involve them in political activity, relief work for the needy at home and abroad, as well as in looking at their own lives to locate and remove any aspect of their interpersonal relationships that distorts or denies the full human dignity of others.

See also: RIGHTS, HUMAN.

Bibliography

J. Ellul, The Technological Society (1954; ET, New York, 1964, and London, 1965); C. S. Lewis, The Abolition of Man (London, 1943); J. Macquarrie, In Search of Humanity (London, 1983); H. Marcuse, OneDimensional Man (Boston and London, 1964).

D.B.F.

DELIBERATION, see CHOICE.

DELINQUENCY, JUVENILE, see JUVENILE DELINQUENCY.

DELIVERANCE MINISTRY is a term currently used to describe the ministry of exorcism, which was practised by Jesus and his followers, and which has been exercised within the discipline and life of the church since apostolic times. Exorcism is a ministry of binding and releasing, performed on a person or place believed to be demonized.

Whilst the ministry of deliverance embraces exorcism, it covers a much wider field and is used for acts of minor deliverance from any form of satanic bondage. Whereas in most branches of the Christian church there are clear rules for conducting an exorcism, which must be observed, deliverance ministry is often a matter of simple prayer by one Christian or a group of Christians, for a troubled person seeking deliverance from affliction. In this sense it can be part of a wider ministry of prayer,* counselling and healing.*

Inner healing*

Deliverance ministry is often a significant factor in helping needy people to wholeness of body, mind and spirit, whether or not they have been involved with the occult or with demonic powers. There can be inward hurt and damage of character (see †) and personality* due to painful childhood experiences or traumatic instances of bereavement,* rejection or breakdown, which blight a person's being and open the door to satanic attack. When Jesus was led by the Spirit to be tempted by Satan* in the desert, his enemy chose the time immediately after his baptism, with its assurance of his sonship and the time of hunger following fasting* to launch his severest temptations at Jesus. Similarly, Satan, 'the accuser of our brothers' (Rev. 12:10), will choose key moments and elements in human experience to bring people into personality bondage and fear through his temptation to doubt and to believe lies about themselves. The prayer of deliverance, ministered in love, frequently frees people from a false view of themselves which is due to Satan, 'the father of lies' (Jn. 8:44), seizing on to some negative aspect of life and using it to a person's disadvantage and sometimes destruction.

Occult involvement

A more specific deliverance ministry is required for someone who has engaged in occult* practice. This may be at an apparently light-hearted level of playing with a Ouija board or being fascinated with horoscopes or occult literature, or it may be at a serious level of commitment to black magic, witchcraft or satanism.

In such cases careful counselling (see Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy†) is required from those who, if possible, have had some experience in deliverance ministry. It is important not to induce fear through a wrong sensationalizing of the issue, and it is vital that the counsellor should not impose his or her categories of thought on the one seeking help. The task is to listen, discuss, give wise scriptural counsel and to pray for deliverance as the person repents and believes in Jesus Christ. Counselling in the course of deliverance ministry will affirm that 'the one who is in you [i.e. in the child of God] is greater than the one who is in the world' (1 Jn. 4:4). All such ministry that sets people free from the power of Satan affirms the power of victory of Jesus Christ over sin and evil through his life, ministry, death and resurrection.

Christian exorcism

The casting out of demons is the work of God through his church, and is a sign of the coming of God's kingdom.* As part of the overall healing ministry, exorcism is best undertaken, if the demonized person is willing, in consultation with the appropriate medical practitioners. If the case demands more than a prayer of blessing or a low-key prayer for deliverance, it is important to observe the discipline of the church and seek help from those authorized in the ministry of exorcism. Although it is rare to find people completely 'possessed' by evil spirits, it is clear from the NT that such cases occur.

If a person has been deeply involved in an occult group they must: 1. renounce membership; and 2. confess past sin and receive forgiveness in Christ as they repent.

A battle with the evil forces gripping such a person's life will then ensue. The exorcist will: 1. bind in Jesus' name (Mt. 12:29; Lk. 11:17-26; Acts 16:18); 2. command the spirit or spirits to leave that person and harm no others (Lk. 8:29a); and 3. command the spirit to go, under the authority of Jesus, to the place of God's appointing (Lk. 8:29, 31; Rev. 20:10).

A person from whom evil is cast out must be encouraged in worship, prayer, Bible study and public teaching of God's Word, and must be helped to sustain a life of sacramental fellowship as he or she grows in the life of the Spirit in the company of God's believing people.

Bibliography

M. Harper, Spiritual Warfare (London, 1970); K. E. Koch, Demonology Past and Present (Karlsruhe, 1973); M. Perry (ed.), Deliverance (London 1987); J. Richards, But Deliver us from Evil (London and New York, 1974); idem, Exorcism, Deliverance and Healing (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1976); G. H. Twelftree, Christ Triumphant: Exorcism Then and Now (London, 1985).

T.O.W.

DEMENTIA. The Lat. word demens ('being out of one's mind') was historically a general term for insanity. Dementia is now defined as 'an acquired global impairment of intellect, memory and personality' (A. Lishman, Organic Psychiatry). Thus, marked forgetfulness occurs, followed by increasing difficulties with reasoning, judgment, communication and daily living skills, along with a change in temperament. It has a number of causes, of which Alzheimer's disease, a condition of unknown origin, is the commonest. The incidence of dementia is approximately 5% of all those above retirement age, but 20% of those aged over 80. However, AIDS frequently involves the brain, so that an increase in dementia in younger people is also anticipated.

The practical care of people with dementia is informed by the same compassion* which motivates Christian care in any illness. The prejudice of ageism (see Ageing*), loss of autonomy* and neglected spiritual needs are special difficulties encountered by those with dementia. Given the profound difficulties of empathizing with people with advanced dementia, a theological perspective becomes essential in determining attitudes, ethics and practical care.

A theology of dementia must encompass both an understanding of the unchanging relationship of God towards humanity, and of the demented person's relationship to others. An important theological concept is the imago Dei (see Image of God*). In this respect contemporary Christianity often ascribes particular importance to rationality and activity. W. H. Vanstone argues in The Stature of Waiting that the image of God may be manifest as much in passivity as in activity, and that Jesus' later ministry was characterized by divinely ordained passivity. Thus, Vanstone argues, the word for 'betrayal' (paradidomi) used by Jesus in Gethsemane (Lk. 22:48) can also be understood as 'handing over', i.e. a voluntary submission to the activity of others. This passivity or 'waiting' suggests a way of understanding the predicament of people with dementia. H. M. D. Petzsch believes this to be an inadequate model for dementia, as this kind of 'waiting' still depends on an intact intellect (see 'Does he know how frightening he is ...?'). He proposes a model based on Jesus' ministry which he calls 'dominical acceptance without condition': an active, unconditional reaching out to the dementia sufferer. A related concept is diminishment. Thus Teilhard de Chardin reflects that 'God must in some way or other make room for Himself, hollowing us and emptying himself if He is finally to penetrate us' (Le Milieu Divin, p. 89) - a situation not dissimilar to those in the later stages of dementia. A development of this is the paradox of creativity which may arise from diminishment, as when a sufferer's helplessness becomes a catalyst which draws out the best in those around them.

The ethics of caring for those with dementia are closely linked to the value of life. The life of one who is made in God's image is always to be respected and is independent of intellectual awareness or personal usefulness. The Nazi programme of genocide was founded on the premise that some lives are not worthy to be lived, and the inroads into this value system were through attitudes to the sick and the disabled (L. Alexander, 'Medical Science under Dictatorship').

The value of the individual informs discussion of quality of life, upon which arguments for euthanasia* often rest. Relevant themes include a respect for individuality, choice and meaningful activity (A. Norman, Severe Dementia). Proponents of assisted suicide argue on the grounds of maintaining autonomy in the face of serious disease, which makes it an especially dubious notion in relation to dementia. Related issues are 'living wills' and 'advance directives' (see Age Concern's publication, The Living Will). They are advocated when 'mental competence' is lost, and so may be suggested in cases of dementia. However, dementia does not produce a uniform or wholly predictable degree of mental incompetence, nor is a precise prognosis, which is also required, usually possible in dementia.

The spiritual needs of people with dementia are unfortunately largely ignored (Petzsch). Sufferers vary in their awareness of God. The sacrament of the present moment is particularly important, for happenings will soon be forgotten. Thus, birdsong, a happy conversation or well-loved music may be very poignant. Services must be kept short, using words and liturgy familiar to the person. Non-verbal cues can be especially important in ministry - touch, smell and vision. If using music, familiar hymns should be chosen. For the carer the question 'why?' will be important, but also guilt* and a bereavement* reaction ahead of actual death are common feelings which must be acknowledged.

Bibliography

Age Concern, Institute of Gerontology and the Centre of Medical Law and Ethics Working Party, The Living Will (London, 1988); L. Alexander, 'Medical Science under Dictatorship', NEJM 241, 1949, pp. 39-47; W. A. Lishman, Organic Psychiatry (Oxford, 1987); A. Norman, Severe Dementia: The Provision of Longstay Care (London, 1987); H. M. D. Petzsch, 'Does he know how frightening he is in his strangeness?': A study of attitudes to dementing people (Edinburgh, 1984); P. Teilhard de Chardin, Le Milieu Divin (ET London, 1960); H. Vanstone, The Stature of Waiting (London, 1982).

R.C.B.

DEMOCRACY. The idea that power rests with the people in any given society, and that it is they who delegate or entrust power* to those who govern, goes back at least as far as classical thought in the Gk. tradition. In the Athenian form of democracy, citizens of the Republic (which did not include slaves) possessed power. Where there is division of opinion among the people, systems of voting determine the wishes of the majority. Democratic traditions are, therefore, made up of a concept of power which gives predominance to the people and to systems of political life which enable the wishes of the people to be carried out. It is in contrast to dictatorships, oligarchies and those monarchies which exercise real political power.

It is important to realize that the Christian religion is not the parent of democracy. Democratic ideals and systems are not necessarily Christian. Down the centuries the church has encouraged support for a variety of political systems. The NT recognizes the necessity for the exercise of power but provides no blueprint for any one political system. The submission of the church to those who rule is genuine but not uncritical. Both governments and governed have duties under God.

The spread of democratic ideals and systems in the modern era has encouraged the church to see connections between Christian faith and democratic life. In practice, churches in the 20th century have been involved in movements opposing tyranny and the exclusion of people from power. There has been a growing and deepening attachment in the church to the importance of democracy as a bulwark against the abuse of power. The classic 20th-century definition of this is to be found in the work of Reinhold Niebuhr.* His book Children of Light and Children of Darkness (New York, 1944; London, 1945) offers a principled Christian apology for democracy: 'Man's capacity for justice makes democracy possible; but man's inclination to injustice makes democracy necessary.' Though we know no other system which is better fitted to keep a check on power and offer the hope that we may be protected from a propensity to injustice and even to tyranny, it needs to be recognized that democracy can sometimes marginalize groups which can command only a minority vote. There are three crucial elements to democracy:

1. The exercise of power. In all democratic thought, those who exercise power in the political forum do so as trustees on behalf of the people. Governments* do not have either a divine, or any other, right to the unrestricted use of the power they possess. Power belongs not to governments but to the people.

In practice, there is a clear recognition that the possession of power contains within it the temptation to corrupt and abuse.

The dilemma of democracy is to be found in its need for a commitment to fundamental social values of justice (see Justice and Peace†) and equality.* If power is to rest with the people, the people need a sense of corporate identity and responsibility.

2. Accountability. Democratic ideas affirm the importance of the people's ability to call to account those who exercise power. The notion of accountability is vital to democracy. It is the lack of effective accountability by the people in other systems of political life which has led many to see democracy as basic to a principled political order. In democratic societies the people have mechanisms for removing from power those whom they have put there. In every truly democratic society, every government has to account to the people for its stewardship of the trust the people have placed in them.

3. Representation. The old political slogan 'No taxation without representation' sums up an important element in democratic practice. If the people are to submit to the government to whom they entrust their power, then that government must be representative of their interest. Thus democracy has become a way in which the multiple interests which make up any society find representation at the heart of power. Usually this means that governments are formed from parliaments made up of elected representatives of the people. Only when there is this representative element are people prepared to submit themselves to the demands made by governments upon them. Especially does this concern the right of governments to tax the people.

How far democracy extends has been a subject for discussion over a very long period. Some see democracy as concerned only with political systems. Others want to include every form of power to which people are subject. This latter group would include economic order, recognizing the great importance to the lives of people of the forces of economic life, be they agrarian or industrial. Questions about control and distribution of land and of corporate economic power are included in the demand for democratic reform of the structures of society.

For some in the Christian church there has been a concern for democracy. Some Christians lay great stress on the belief that the church should be governed by the will of its members. Anabaptist* traditions are often committed to such methods of church government and ministry.

If we accept the fundamental equality of all human beings as both created by God in God's image (see Image of God*) and as being the object of his love in Christ, there is much to be said in favour of church support for systems of social and political life rooted in this perception. A truly democratic society affirms and upholds the equality of all, both before the law and in the responsibility for the exercise of power.

J.W.G.

DEMONIC, THE. In Christian theology, this term is generally used to describe the evil* which is neither the direct responsibility of God nor under immediate human control. It is understood to be in coherent, mutually conflicting and selfassertive, especially against God and his creation, yet self-concealing to guard its identity so that there is not always clear evidence to identify the presence of the demonic. Occasionally collective human evil is referred to as demonic.

1. Background

The OT expresses relatively little interest in the demonic, for both good and evil were seen as the responsibility of Yahweh (1 Sa. 16:14-23). Probably under Eastern influence, belief developed in evil spiritual beings independent of God, and Satan* became the chief of an army of demons opposed to God and his angels (1 QS 3:13 - 4:26). For Greeks in the NT period, the distinction between a good and an evil demon (daimonion) was determined by its activity (Josephus, Antiquities 13.415; 16.210). For NT writers, the demonic, which was not limited to demon possession (Acts 10:38), was the responsibility of Satan or the devil and his messengers who could speak through those they possessed; cause suffering (Mk. 5:1-20; 2 Cor. 12:7); become objects of worship (1 Cor. 10:20-21), and therefore needed to be withstood (1 Pet. 5:8-9). The most obvious meaning of Paul's phrase 'principalities and powers' (e.g. Col. 2:15) is that behind the pagan world order stood supernatural motivating powers (Dn. 10:13, 20). Potentially, these powers were also able to separate people from the love of God (Rom. 8:38-39). Jesus' ministry of exorcism (Mt. 12:28) and the crucifixion (Jn. 12:31; Col. 2:14-15) were seen as the first stage of the defeat of the demonic, to be completed in the end time (1 Cor. 15:24).

2. The demonic and the contemporary world

Increasing and often bizarre speculation about the demonic was checked by the rationalism of the Enlightenment* so that with a few exceptions (notably Barth, CD III/3, pp. 519-531), most contemporary theologians have ignored or demythologized the biblical notion of the demonic. Paul Tillich (1886-1965) said the demonic participates in a distorted way in the divine, and is experienced in the claim to divinity or infinity, and in a state of mind when elements of the self aspire to be the whole mind and destroy it (Systematic Theology 3, Chicago, 1963; London, 1964). For psychotherapist Rollo May,* the 'daimonic', which he equates with psychosis,* is any natural function, such as sex, hunger, anger and craving for power, which becomes evil when it takes over the whole person (Love and Will, New York, 1969; London, 1970). However, human experience of evil requires the biblical categories of good and evil to be remythologized rather than demythologized.

3. Sickness and the demonic

Freud* considered that what were thought to be evil spirits are repressed evil wishes originating in the inner life of a person (Collected Psychological Works 19, London, 1961, p. 71). And, in Jungian* thought possession is the control of the total personality by a particular state of mind (C. G. Jung, Collected Works 18, London and Princeton, NJ, 1977, p. 648). Thus, 'cacodemonomania' is used for those considered as having the delusion of being possessed by demons.

Despite advances in medical science there is a continuing debate on the demonic as an albeit rare explanation for some sickness. In recent years the debate has focused on the place of the demonic in the rare dissociative and Multiple Personality Disorders (MPD) in which complex behaviour takes place outside the awareness of one's predominate consciousness. Symptoms include anxiety* dizziness, trances, blackouts, auditory hallucinations and self-mutilation in severe cases. Depression* is the most common symptom, and amnesia is considered the pathogenic sign of MPD. In almost all cases, there is a history of physical or sexual abuse in childhood, about half being through satanic ritual abuse. Some clinicians maintain psychiatric models for MPD in which treatment involves the integration of alter, or secondary, personalities, while others list distinctions between MPD and demon possession. (In the latter case exorcism is required.) For example:

1. spirits are arrogant and devious, and there is no sense of relationship with them; alters can evoke empathy; 2. the patient does not experience spirits as part of the self; 3. spirits stir up confusion; 4. a spirit pushes its way to dominance, performs its evil task, then blames the person; alters usually conform to their surroundings; 5. a spirit is experienced only as a voice; and 6. bickering alters give the feeling of internal sibling rivalry, but demonic voices provoke intense fear and hatred (J. Friesen, JCH 11.3, 1989, pp. 4-16).

The Gospel writers considered demonic possession to be involved in sickness when: 1. a sufferer exhibited physical symptoms such as changes in character and behaviour (Mk. 1:23; 9:22), preternatural strength and indifference to pain (Mk. 5:3-5); 2. the sufferer initially responded adversely to a confrontation with Jesus (Mk. 3:11; 5:6-7; 9:20); and 3. there was a change in the sufferer's voice (Mk. 1:26; 5:8). An increasing number of psychologists and therapists employ a multiple-causation approach, recognizing that mental illness and the demonic are not mutually exclusive but that either, both or neither may be the cause of illness. However, there are those represented by John White (1924-), who consider that science is helpless in diagnosing the presence of the demonic: 'I can conceive of no demonic state which cannot be "explained" by a nondemonic hypothesis. I can likewise conceive of no experiment to give conclusive support to demonic rather than parapsychological hypotheses' (in J. W. Montgomery, ed., Demon Possession, p. 253). Therefore, because of the subtle, incoherent and devious nature of the demonic, the pastor or healer requires a Godgiven facility to discern the possible demonic dimensions of an illness. Among those who practise exorcism it is generally agreed, and some churches require, that exorcism should be conducted in association with the medical profession, with the patient's consent and in the context of a team ministry (see Deliverance Ministry*).

See also: OCCULT.

Bibliography

American Psychiatric Association, Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (Washington, DC, 1980); D. N. Augsburger, Pastoral Counseling Across Cultures (Philadelphia, 1986); R. K. Bufford, Counseling and the Demonic (Dallas, TX, 1988); F. S. MacNutt, Healing (New York and London, 1990); J. W. Montgomery (ed.), Demon Possession (Minneapolis, MN, 1976); S. Peck, People of the Lie (London, 1983); M. Perry (ed.), Deliverance (London, 1987); J. Richards, But Deliver Us From Evil (London and New York, 1974); L. Sperry, 'Dissociation, Multiple Personality, and the Phenomenon of Evil', JPCo 25, 1990, pp. 90-100; G. H. Twelftree, Christ Triumphant: Exorcism Then and Now (London, 1985); idem, Jesus the Exorcist (Tübingen, 1992); idem, 'The Place of Exorcism in Contemporary Ministry', Anv 5, 1988, pp. 133-150.

G.H.T.

DENIAL, see BEREAVEMENT; DEATH AND DYING; DEFENCE MECHANISMS.

DEONTOLOGY (from Gk. deon, that which is obligatory) is in general the study of moral obligation,* and in particular a specific kind of theory of obligation. In contrast to consequentialist* theories of obligation, deontological theories hold that actions are not right or wrong simply because of their good or bad consequences. Rather, actions are right or wrong to the extent that they are, or are not, fulfilments of duty,* where duty is not determined wholly in terms of consequences.

Deontological theories differ over what are the grounds of duty: for some, it is the will of God; for others, it is rationality as such; for still others, duties are groundless, brute facts. Theories also differ over how far obligation is independent of consequences. Immanuel Kant* held that consequences were irrelevant to obligation - 'Do your duty though the heavens may fall!' - while W. D. Ross (1877-1940) held that consequences were just one factor among many relevant to obligation. Deontological theories have been praised for their congruity with the moral intuitions of ordinary persons, including the intuition that 'the ends do not always justify the means'. They have been criticized for making moral obligation appear arbitrary or inexplicable, and for vitiating incentive to act morally.

See also: CHRISTIAN MORAL REASONING.

Bibliography

B. Blanshard, Reason and Goodness (London, 1961); A. Donagan, The Theory of Morality (Chicago, 1977); I. Kant, Foundations of the Metaphysics of Morals (1785; ET, Indianapolis, IN, 1959); W. D. Ross, The Right and the Good (Oxford, 1930).

M.T.N.

DEPENDENCE. The term 'dependence' means behaviour focused by craving for a substrate (e.g. drug, alcohol, nicotine, food) upon gaining it in harmful ways. The harm can be personal or social, or both; it disrupts social relationships.

'Addiction' is dependence behaviour contrary to law; the substrate may be unobtainable legally, or illegal acts are used to obtain it.

Dependence, and therefore addiction, can be physical or psychological or both. In physical dependence, drug withdrawal makes someone ill. In psychological dependence, withdrawal worsens craving. In both, a person returns to the substrate to relieve his or her symptoms.

In dependence, complex changes occur in behaviour which pose many pastoral problems. The central features are: 1. loss of self-esteem* and self-worth ('There's no point', 'I deserve punishment' or 'harm'); 2. denial: evading or avoiding what is true because it evokes fear and is denied at the conscious level; 3. hence deceit, evasion, lies and misrepresentation, often very plausible, lead to a world of image and fantasy; 4. blame of others; 5. damage to persons and property, through neglect, denigration, or sale to gain drugs.* This often involves theft or violence even to relatives and friends. Abusive, disinhibited behaviour is frequent; 6. rejection of social norms; identification with alternative society; and 7. in some cases association with (but not necessarily causation of, or by) mental disorders or deviations of other kinds: psychoneurosis, depression,* schizophrenia, personality disorder, or loss of sexual identity and libido.

Behaviour swings are frequent, sometimes deeply disordered, and at other times making a promising struggle towards the positive, even as if two persons were within one. 'I must try again' alternates with 'What's the point of trying?'

It is a common belief that the central problem in dependence is the substrate. That this is at the least too simple is shown by the following factors. 1. When a substrate is not to hand, conversion to another occurs readily. 2. When newly released into a society, substrate use grows rapidly at first, but soon levels off; only a proportion of those exposed use it. 3. Patterns of use for almost all drugs of dependence are similar. 4. A stronger desire can displace addiction - the 'expulsive power of a higher affection' - in a non-specific way. 5. Dependence is often linked to psychological damage (e.g. past hurts or rejection). 6. Decisions made in open society are often painful for the dependent person. Behaviour is much easier to control in an institution, whether hospital, prison or managed hostel (the 'four walls effect'). Dependent persons in institutions often complain that others are deciding for them, but outside they complain that they cannot bear the pain of taking decisions for themselves. 7. Many dependent persons eventually come to an end of themselves and abandon their habit (getting 'round the corner'). 8. Effects relate closely to the social context, and the expected effects of drug-taking. 9. Slow drug withdrawal may not evoke symptoms, but removal of the social contexts of drug use (e.g. injection, tobacco-pipe rituals, or drinking routines) can evoke severe effects. 10. Other compulsive behaviours (e.g. gambling, emotional overeating) strongly resemble drugdependence behaviour.

The family impact of dependence affects everyone, though the numbers of dependent persons within a family may be several or one. Antecedent factors often seem to be rejection, actual or perceived, or some wounding experience so deep that it cannot be admitted to self or to others (see Inner Healing*). But the problem often presents to outsiders as some new and critical incident, when in fact there is a long, hidden story of years of increasing dependence, often with episodes of hostel, detoxification unit, or prison life. Families are often forced into tragic distortions in their efforts to cope with this problem: the hardest decision is often whether to let someone remain in the home, or to send them away.

The outlook for lasting relief is not good, even in cases with the most favourable features: five-year abstinence* is found in some 5% to 15%. Yet the aims of care* must remain as abstinence, talking out to a counsellor every wounding experience, and the practical steps needed to improve self-esteem, so proving that other satisfactions exist than the self-destructive drives of dependence. Unless the behavioural drives to dependence can be opened up and dealt with, abstinence is merely followed by re-addiction, conversion to another substrate or deception.

Other key aspects are that carers must be constant, despite repeated relapse. Addictive behaviour recurs readily, with returning sorrowful memories and social contexts. Dissociation and denial lead to behaviour swings which seem inexplicable and tax a carer's patience to the limit. Families and friends need support, as well as the index sufferer. Selfharm can amount to actual mutilation; hence warnings about the harmful effects of addiction can be counter-productive, even attractive. Blame of others is only a part of demanding manipulative and bargaining behaviour, usually at a blatantly self-contradictory level.

It is important to know some of the care agencies to which referrals can be made at helpful times and places. The stages of care are: 1. detoxification: a heavily drug-affected person cannot accept or understand counsel; and 2. voluntary institutional rehabilitation: this must have a carefully worked out and informed programme of activity and counseling with means of social reorientation. Siting this can be difficult: it is best within the dependent person's general culture, but away from unhelpful contacts; many promise, yet default.

Addiction and dependence are evils for the following reasons. 1. Men and women are meant to relate to God; to become subject to another controlling influence cannot be good (1 Cor. 6:12). 2. People need to relate to one another in families (Ps. 68:6) and by marriage (Gn. 2:18, 24; Mt. 19:8-9) in trustworthy social bonds. The community is built and strengthened by honourable dealings and love (Ex. 18:21; 2 Cor. 8:21; Eph. 6:1-4), whereas drug dependence is above all else focused upon self. 3. Body and mind are not ours to use as we please, to damage or to destroy (Pr. 23:19-21; 1 Cor. 6:19-20); they are the vehicles of God's work on earth (Eph. 5:18). 4. Loss of self-respect is evil, and addiction leads to contempt of persons (Joel 3:3). Humankind has a place of unique dignity and privilege amongst creatures (Gn. 1:26; Ps. 8:4-9; Lk. 12:7); humans forgiven, as children of God, recover their lost worth (Rom. 8:11-17; 1 Jn. 3:1-3), but worthless feelings are a sign of depression or of alienation from God, from his plan and purpose. 5. The 'satisfaction' gained through dependence is illusory (Pr. 20:1; 21:17). 6. Denial is an unreal escape (Pr. 14:12-13; cf. Rom. 1:21).

The use of drugs to bring repressed fears to consciousness ('abreaction') is dangerous and has been abandoned. Counselling is more helpful: sometimes repressed material can be dealt with by asking, 'Suppose the most feared threat were to happen, what then?' Training is desirable for carers, but these problems are so prevalent that every pastor and carer is likely to encounter them many times. Many parents painfully encounter them first in their own child. For all these reasons, it is important for knowledge about these problems to be diffused.

See also: ALCOHOLISM; PASTORAL CARE, COUNSELLING AND PSYCHOTHERAPY;† EATING DISORDERS; MENTAL HEALTH.

D.W.V.

DEPENDENCY THEORY, see GLOBAL ETHICS.†

DEPRESSION covers a wide spectrum of experience, from short-lived gloom to a deep, prolonged immobility of spirit and body (or a feeling of being pressed down).

Adults, adolescents* and children, both Christian and non-Christian* are all susceptible to depression, because it is part of the general atmosphere of emotional pollution in which everyone lives in this world. It can be a painful emotional* illness in which the sufferer feels hopeless and in despair, isolated, preoccupied with the depression, worthless and unable to make even small decisions, and full of anxiety.* In this case, it is accompanied by such features as constant and prolonged weeping, diminished sexual interest, under- or overeating (see Eating Disorders*) and disturbed sleep patterns. The mood is particularly black on waking, but this often lightens as the day wears on. The depressed person may have murderous feelings towards others and/or entertain suicidal* thoughts. Children show their depression in listlessness, inability to do school work properly and other physical symptoms, because they do not have the verbal skills with which to articulate their distress. Adolescents also express themselves in listless purposelessness, and their depression is often the result of their search for identity and sometimes the pressure of expectations put upon them.

Depression arises from several main causes, though they are always interrelated. They are chiefly:

1. Heredity. It may be useful to some people to realize that depression can be a handicap which is traceable along the family line.
2. Chemical imbalance. Sometimes this is a result of an illness, childbirth, menopause, etc.
3. The after-effect of a prolonged period of emotional or physical stress* can cause depression. This will right itself after appropriate rest.
4. Reaction to a major change in life experience is another cause, e.g. loss or change of job, bereavement,* divorce,* change of house, retirement* especially when it involves loss of status and friends, loss of a limb or faculty, etc. In fact, change of any sort, even though it is not a disaster, may precipitate a depression, because change represents a loss of the familiar in which a part of the self has been invested. There is anxiety lest the reduced self will not be able to meet the demands of the new situation and it therefore tries to withdraw. It is a well established fact that a person who has lost a parent, for whatever reason, before the age of about seventeen, is liable to depression in adult life.
5. Cause unidentifiable, known as 'endogenous depression'. This is the hardest to tolerate because, in addition to the pain of the depression, there is the apparent irrationality of it. Endogenous depression is the result of some deep life-long anger* which the sufferer has turned in on himself or herself because it is not safe to direct it against the people whom he or she feels may have caused it. This anger is usually buried too deeply to be easily accessible to comfort or exhortation. It is often associated with a sense of insecure dependence on some significant person and the persistent yearning for that person's approval, without which there is a feeling of self-doubt and guilt.* A depressed person has often experienced a marked degree of maternal/parental deprivation, hence the consistently low self-esteem* and intense need for affirmation. People sometimes regard depression as a spiritual attack. It may be, but, obviously, a person's vulnerable area is likely to be the first that collapses under strain.

Manic depression is a condition in which there are periodic mood swings between depression and euphoria. A severely depressed person is in need of medical help, particularly if there is risk of self-injury (see Hospitalization, Involuntary*). There are therapeutic drugs* which can be of great benefit. However, in endogenous depression, anti-depressants will only help to moderate the symptoms; they cannot alter the underlying cause. In this case, treatment is required. This may be from a professionally qualified therapist, who will be able to accept the patient's feelings of worthlessness without necessarily sharing them; and will be able to explore with him or her the fearful, buried experiences of the past and enable them to be held in the present within a trustful relationship, thus diffusing the anger and enabling the patient to move into a more constructive attitude to himself or herself. Treatment may include different forms of spiritual ministry.

The pastoral care of depressed people is important and demanding. It is necessary to remember that depression is infectious. The carer (see Care, Caring*) may pick up the submerged anger and become impatient, wanting the patient to 'pull himself together' or 'snap out of it'. Alternatively, carers themselves may become depressed. The most useful way of helping is just to be there, quietly undeterred by the difficulties in communication; not giving exhortations or verbal reassurances which may sound hollow to the sufferer; not being offended by overt indifference or hopelessness and resisting the temptation to give little homilies, but just quietly and consistently waiting for it to pass. This is no easy task.

Depression, for a Christian person, is particularly difficult to endure because, in the generalized sense of isolation, it seems as though God has forgotten or deserted him or her. The sufferer's own Christian faith comes into question; he (or she) feels a failure; he has not managed to secure God's much-needed approval in spite of conscientious efforts, and the supports on which he relied previously seem to have given way. (He may forget, temporarily, that he is in the company of Job, David of the many depressed psalms, Elijah, and others.) This accentuates the already-depressed sense of being unloved and unlovable. A sense of guilt also compounds the misery. Thus prayer becomes impossible and Bible reading meaningless by the very nature of the illness, not necessarily because of any spiritual failure. The sufferer needs people to be the go-between for him until he rediscovers his ability to make personal relationships and sense of worth. The carer may offer very short prayers or read short Bible verses, e.g. Rom. 8:39 - '... nor anything else [not even my depression] will be able to separate us from the love of God ...' - which is a statement about God holding on to us, not about us trying unsuccessfully to hold on to God (i.e. justification* by faith, not by good works and effort to win approbation). Like most other pain,* depression is giving a clear message that something is amiss and needs attention. It is important to try to discover what this depression is saying for this person, and what adjustments need to be made in his or her lifestyle and relationships, and not simply to wait until the pain has passed, imagining that when the pain ceases the illness is necessarily cured. Depression is cyclical in nature, especially when it is treated only by drugs with no attempt to search for the root cause. Some people think that seeking professional help is 'lack of faith', and that makes them guilty, so the cycle continues.

See also: PASTORAL CARE, COUNSELLING AND PSYCHOTHERAPY.†

Bibliography

S. Atkinson, Climbing out of Depression (Oxford, 1993); J. Bowlby, Attachment and Loss, 3 vols. (London, 1969-80); M. Chave-Jones, Coping with Depression (Tring and Batavia, IL, 1981); J. Dominian, Depression (London, 1976); J. White, The Masks of Melancholy: A Christian Psychiatrist Looks at Depression and Suicide (Leicester and Downers Grove, IL, 1982).

M.C.-J.

DESCRIPTIVISM is the position which holds that the meaning of a term can be given by specifying when descriptions using that term are true and when they are false. For example, we can give the meaning of 'red' by specifying when a description of something as 'red' is true and when it is false.

J. L. Austin (1911-60) used the phrase 'the descriptive fallacy' for the view that the meaning of all words can be given this way. Descriptivism about moral words holds that the meaning of 'good' is like the meaning of 'red' in this respect. Prescriptivism is the position that the meaning of ethical terms is unlike the meaning of purely descriptive terms in that it contains a prescriptive component. To give the meaning of 'good', for instance, requires specifying that the term is used to commend. To commend something is not merely, according to a prescriptivist, to attribute to it certain descriptive properties; it is to express a preference of some kind for it. One natural linguistic form for such expression is the prescription, in the imperative mood rather than the indicative. For a prescriptivist, if we assent orally to the judgment that we should do something in some situation, and then we do not do it, we logically must be assenting insincerely.

Prescriptivists do not, however, claim that the meaning of all moral words is exhausted by their prescriptive component; and even moral words whose prescriptive meaning is dominant may have descriptively specified criteria for their application.

See also: PHILOSOPHICAL ETHICS.

Bibliography

R. M. Hare, Moral Thinking (Oxford, 1981), ch. 4.

J.E.H.

DESERT, see PUNISHMENT.

DESERTION is the act of abandoning those closest to us. It commonly refers to a husband's or wife's withdrawal from their marriage or, increasingly, to one live-in partner pulling out of the relationship. It is used of a parent leaving a child and of children abandoning their parents. By its very nature, such an action implies a sudden and often irrevocable breaking-off of a relationship and cannot fail to be the cause of considerable distress to those left behind. In the past, desertion has been grounds for divorce,* and a deserting parent is still likely to be regarded unfavourably by the courts when there is a question of custody of children.

Desertion seems to spring primarily from an inability or unwillingness either to cope with responsibilities or to withdraw from them by using normal channels of communication. Sometimes a deserting person may be suffering from a depressive illness; in other cases a simple lack of maturity may render that person incapable of handling tensions or crises in a responsible way. These may range from falling in love with someone outside the marriage or outside of the cohabiting partnership to being unable to handle the normal stresses and strains of family life: the upheaval of a new baby, the problems of teenagers or the demands of an elderly relative. Whatever the obvious or immediate cause of desertion, some breakdown in normal communication is likely to lie behind it.

People who are deserted not unnaturally fall prey to some very strong emotions. Foremost among these may be anxiety* or fear,* particularly if there has been no advance warning of trouble or if a young person is involved. Pastorally there may be a real need for reassurance that God cares for all those involved in the situation: 'Cast all your anxiety on him because he cares for you' (1 Pet. 5:7); such reassurance may be greatly helped by simple expressions of love from Christian friends.

Then, as in bereavement,* anger* is likely to be present whatever the circumstances. 'Why has this happened to me?' is a cry that needs to be expressed if those abandoned are eventually to make a healthy recovery from their experience. If there have been communication problems within the past relationship, people may need help in articulating this. It is not wrong to ask 'why?' or 'how?': it is simply to echo the despairing cry of Job, 'Why did I not perish at birth?' (3:11), and the anguish of Jesus quoting Ps. 22, 'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' We need to cry out for God to help us because, as the psalmist says to him: 'You hear ... the desire of the afflicted; you encourage them, and you listen to their cry, defending the fatherless and the oppressed' (Ps. 10:17-18).

Other feelings which need to be handled may include guilt* (often unfounded, but very real to those who seek an explanation and end up blaming themselves), loneliness* and depression* - feeling that no-one understands. Yet Jesus himself knew what it was like to be deserted by those closest to him (Mt. 26:56). The Bible's insistence on God's care for people who lose an important family relationship is remarkable, e.g. 'Leave your orphans; I will protect their lives. Your widows too can trust in me' (Je. 49:11), and Jesus' promise: 'I will not leave you as orphans; I will come to you' (Jn. 14:18). Similarly, God's faithfulness whatever disasters may occur is borne out by the whole story of the OT and its record of his promises to his people: 'I will never leave you nor forsake you' (Jos. 1:5).

Pastoral care in cases of desertion may also need to extend to the practical step of seeking police help if the person's whereabouts are unknown. Every disappearance is treated very seriously and the police can be contacted as soon as there is cause for concern. Once a missing adult is found, the police have no authority to tell the family or partner where he or she is, but they will convey the message back that the person is alive and well. While it is hard to come to terms with the news that a loved one is refusing all contact, there is at least the reassurance that the person is unharmed and even a glimmer of hope for the future. Like the police, the Salvation Army is committed to confidentiality* if a missing person contacts them, but they too will reassure the family that he or she is safe, and can convey back to that person the message that those left behind still care.

P.M.C.

DESERTIONS, SPIRITUAL. 'Desertion' or 'spiritual desertions' were terms commonly given by the Eng. Puritan pastors to describe times when the believer's spiritual life seems to be dying, God seems far away, joy in the Lord gives way to aridity, and the soul even doubts its salvation. Mystics of a previous age called it 'the dark night of the soul'. Puritan 'practical' writers diagnosed it closely and treated it superbly in such treatises as A Child of Light Walking in Darkness by Thomas Goodwin (1600-80), and A Lifting Up for the Downcast by William Bridge (1600-70). (See P. Lewis, The Genius of Puritanism.)

These Puritans recognized that sin unconfessed and not dealt with could be a major reason for the experience. However, they also realized that the best of Christians could be taken through such times by God to prove their utter dependence on him: to develop such graces as faith, humility, assurance and prayer; to weaken the attraction and hold of sin; or to qualify them to help others in such a condition. They recognized as well the effect of 'false reasonings' and strong emotions unregulated by Scripture, as well as the distinct but often confusing effects of 'melancholy' (depression) which was wisely seen as a medical rather than a spiritual condition. They saw too how Satan can make devastating use of times of desertion.

Their 'remedies' included directions to 'fly to God' (tell your Father everything - he knows and understands and cares); trust in God (in his Son, in his providence, in his promises, and in nothing else); put convictions of sin into balanced perspective; seek to live for God's praise more than spiritual experiences; value holiness, more even than happiness; and appreciate that 'times of refreshing' will return in God's time.

Bibliography

W. Bridge, A Lifting Up for the Downcast (1649; Edinburgh, 1990); P. Lewis, The Genius of Puritanism (Haywards Heath, 1979); M. Lloyd-Jones, Spiritual Depression (London, 1965).

P.H.L.

DESIRE, see ALTRUISM; LUST.

DETERMINISM, see FREE WILL AND DETERMINISM.

DETERRENCE, NON-NUCLEAR. To deter a person, group or nation from some wrong or aggressive action is to restrain them from such action by a clear threat of punishment.* The hope is to make potential wrongdoers aware of the likely consequences of their behaviour, and so prevent them from carrying through their plans. Deterrence is the system of punishment, or maintenance of armed force, which embodies this concern to protect society against those who threaten its well-being.

There are two main aspects to deterrence. Internally, it takes the form of law enforcement and judicial punishment, to deter criminal activity; externally, it involves the maintenance of standing armies to deter military aggression (or the threat of it; see Defence*).

Deterrence is one of the justifications for punishment. Many studies make clear that both the prospect of being caught and the prospect of punishment are needed in order effectively to deter the would-be criminal. The particular punishment prescribed for a crime seems of less importance for purposes of deterrence. Effective deterrence also presupposes a certain type of rationality on the part of the criminal, and it should be noted that the emotional roots of some crimes in fact display a different kind of rationality.

It is important to note that deterrence alone cannot provide sufficient grounds either for penal policy or for specific punishments. Punishment must always be in some way appropriate to the offence; that is, it needs to contain some element of retribution. Failure to recognize this can result in unjust sentences for purposes of deterrence or treatment. In particular, judges are sometimes under pressure to pass deterrent sentences, for the social good, but which exceed the appropriate retribution for the actual offence committed.

Deterrence is one of the main reasons for maintaining armies in times of peace. Here also much depends on convincing a potential wrongdoer or aggressor that the likely response will be both forthcoming and effective.

See also: CRIME; DETERRENCE, NUCLEAR; PUNISHMENT.

D.J.E.A.

DETERRENCE, NUCLEAR. Deterrence in general aims to prevent war by the maintenance of a military force sufficient to dissuade potential enemies from hostile action (see Defence*). Defined like this, deterrence is a perennial feature of the history of nations, which always need to defend their security and prevent warfare. If this were a definition which adequately covered all that goes under the name deterrence, there would be little need for specific moral analysis (as distinct from the morality of warfare). However, there are features of nuclear deterrence in the present age which do demand a distinctive moral analysis. Nuclear deterrence involves both the arsenals of weapons, and the patterns of strategic thought which require and design those arsenals. Some of the moral approaches to nuclear deterrence are outlined below.

The complexity and technicality of some of the moral debates spring from the difficulties inherent in theories of nuclear deterrence. Any moral analysis first requires an understanding of the strategic theories. The various paradoxes at the heart of such deterrence make this a complex business, quite apart from the technologies involved. For instance, nuclear deterrence insists that the more dangerous the deterrent, the more effective it is, and the less likely it will ever be used. The more dangerous, the safer. This and other paradoxes have convinced some theologians that the theory of deterrence is fundamentally flawed. On the other hand, others have been convinced by the view that deterrence is effective in practice, and sufficiently stable. They have argued that nuclear deterrence is justified by its results. We can select only a few representative approaches of the differing moral analyses of nuclear deterrence. Just-war theory* relates to several of these approaches.

1. One approach accepts the claim that nuclear deterrence is the best and only practical way of preserving peace and security. The argument cuts in two directions. On the one hand, it is claimed that the threats of nuclear war are so devastating that the chances of it actually happening are vanishingly small: the fear of nuclear destruction will effectively maintain peace. On the other hand, to disarm would be highly unsettling politically, and at the worst might even risk war itself. The best that can be hoped for is arms control - the maintenance of a 'nuclear balance' at reasonable and mutually agreed levels. By arguing that deterrence will thus prevent war, this approach aims to avoid having to handle the tests of just-war theory as they apply to the just means of war (jus in bello). All that needs to be said is that the dangers involved in deterrence are outweighed by the benefits it confers.

2. Another approach seeks to correct this view by drawing attention to the moral importance of threats. It is argued that what is threatened must be justifiable, just as much as what is actually done. In particular, nuclear deterrence makes huge threats of destruction. These threats must be truly intended in some real sense, however remote or conditional they may appear. (If they were merely bluff, and not really intended, that would soon become clear to potential enemies.) These threats themselves must therefore meet the tests of just-war theory, of jus in bello: a. nuclear weapons may be targeted only on military forces, not on civilian populations (the test of discrimination, i.e. that there should be no direct attack on non-combatants); and b. any use of nuclear weapons could be justified only if there were a reasonable prospect that to use them would do more good than harm (the test of proportion). This approach considers that there could be circumstances, albeit extreme, in which the use of nuclear weapons could meet these moral requirements. Given that, it is reasonable to design and possess such weapons in the belief (as in the first approach) that the weapons will effectively deter war. But (proponents of this approach would usually say) only a much lower capability than that currently possessed by the superpowers could be justified along these lines.

3. A third type of approach makes the point that it would be highly desirable to move away from nuclear deterrence, because nuclear war itself could never be justified. Typically, this type of analysis denies that there can be any morally legitimate use of nuclear weapons, and also draws attention to their inherent dangers. Nevertheless, it accepts that at present nuclear deterrence in practice maintains a certain balance and stability. While urging continuing moves towards disarmament,* this approach considers that deterrence is for the time being morally acceptable. Arguments along these lines are often urged by Roman Catholic leaders (e.g. Pope John Paul II [1978- ; b. 1920] in his Message to the UN in 1982, or the US Catholic bishops in The Challenge of Peace).

4. Yet another approach also depends on just-war theory. This approach considers that just-war principles forbid all use of nuclear weapons, and also their possession and use. The question is raised against the second approach: can there ever really be any discriminate use of nuclear weapons? Further, given the dangers of escalation, can there ever be any reasonable prospect that using nuclear weapons could ever do more good than harm? Neither of these questions can be answered satisfactorily. There is therefore no moral alternative to disarmament. Advocates of this approach do not always say that disarmament must necessarily follow immediately and unilaterally. The key moral point is that there should be a clear unequivocal commitment to seeking and finding better ways of ensuring peace. Given such a commitment, it is imperative to disarm in ways that are not themselves politically dangerous and unsettling.

Apart from those who work from just-war principles, there are also many who would condemn nuclear deterrence on pacifist grounds. This is obvious enough, but an important rider can be added here: the abhorrence of nuclear weapons has undoubtedly been a key factor in the rise of pacifism in our times.

The commitment to nuclear deterrence has had unseen effects upon political morality, which should not be overlooked. It is impossible to know what the effects may have been of living in the knowledge that the destruction of the inhabited world is technically possible in all-out war. Apart from that, deterrence has done much to make us all moral cynics. For living with deterrence has appeared to leave us with an unanswerable moral dilemma. It has seemed that we must either be ready to will the deaths of many millions of enemy citizens, or give up the concern to preserve world security and peace. Neither alternative seems morally acceptable, and consequently many have become convinced that whatever we do, we must do wrong. Nuclear deterrence has thus played its part for many in the loss of confidence in the reality, and objective rightness, of moral truth itself.

See also: WAR.

Bibliography

Church of England Board for Social Responsibility, The Church and the Bomb: Nuclear Weapons and Christian Conscience (London, 1982); J. M. Finnis et al., Nuclear Deterrence, Morality and Realism (Oxford, 1987); National Conference of Catholic Bishops, The Challenge of Peace: God's Promise and Our Response (London and Washington, DC, 1983); Oliver O'Donovan, Peace and Certainty: A Theological Essay on Deterrence (Oxford, 1989); H. Thielicke, TE 2.

D.J.E.A.

DEVELOPMENT, ECONOMIC, see ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT, ETHICS OF.

DEVIANCE, see SEXUAL DEVIATION.

DEVIL, see SATAN.

DEVLIN-HART DEBATE. The protracted controversy between Lord Devlin (1905-92, latterly Lord of Appeal in Ordinary) and H. L. A. Hart (1907-92, latterly Emeritus Professor of Jurisprudence in the University of Oxford) provides the outstanding example of a recent debate about the problem of whether, and in what circumstances, morality may properly be imposed by criminal sanctions (see Criminal Justice*).

The starting-point of the controversy was the second Maccabean Lecture on Jurisprudence of the British Academy, given in 1959 by Mr Justice Devlin (as he then was) on 'The Enforcement of Morals'. Though he had largely agreed with the 1957 report of the Wolfenden Committee on Homosexual Offences and Prostitution (before which he had given evidence), he challenged its basic assumption that there is a sphere of private morality which should lie altogether outside the purview of the criminal law (see Law, Civil and Criminal*). Instead, he argued that a society is held together not only by its political structure but also by a shared morality, so, just as every community has the right to protect its political integrity by the law of treason, so it has the right, in suitable circumstances, to safeguard its ideological integrity by criminal sanctions. But 'Nothing should be punished by the law that does not lie beyond the limits of tolerance ... ; there must be a real feeling of reprobation ... No society', he insisted, 'can do without intolerance, indignation, and disgust; they are the forces behind the moral law, and indeed it can be argued that if they or something like them are not present, the feelings of society cannot be weighty enough to deprive the individual of freedom of choice' (cf. The Enforcement of Morals, pp. 16f.; and see p. viii for Devlin's defence of the phrase 'intolerance, indignation, and disgust').

This thesis, and the detailed arguments by which Devlin had supported it, was almost immediately challenged by Hart in an article in The Listener (30 July 1959) on 'Immorality and Treason' (reprinted in L. Blom-Cooper, ed., The Law as Literature). He strongly supported the contention of the Wolfenden Committee that there 'must remain a realm of private morality and immorality which in brief and crude terms is not the law's business' (p. 201) - largely on the basis of John Stuart Mill's* famous words in his essay On Liberty:

‘The only purpose for which power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a civilized community, against his will, is to prevent harm to others. His own good, either physical or moral, is not a sufficient warrant. He cannot rightfully be compelled to do or forbear ... because, in the opinion of others, to do so would be wise, or even right’ (p. 73). While ‘most previous thinkers’ who had repudiated this classic formula of liberalism had ‘done so because they thought that morality consisted either of divine commands or of rational principles of human conduct discoverable by human reason,’ Devlin had based his definition of those breaches of morality which could rightly be punished by law not on ‘the mere adverse judgement of society,’ but ‘one which is inspired by feeling raised to the concert pitch of intolerance, indignation, and disgust’ (The Law as Literature, p. 222). Hart did, however, concede that Mill’s formula ‘may well be too simple. The grounds for interfering with human liberty are more various than the single criterion of “harm to others” suggests: cruelty to animals or organizing prostitution for gain do not, as Mill himself saw, fall easily under the description of harm to others’ (p. 224). It would be dangerous, on the other hand, to ‘mount the man in the street on the top of the Clapham omnibus’ (these words pick up expressions used by Devlin to describe a typical member of a jury) ‘and to tell him that if only he feels sick enough about what other people do in private to demand its suppression by law no theoretical criticism can be made of his demand’ (p. 227).

In 1963 Hart expanded his views in three lectures published under the title Law, Liberty and Morality. Mill’s doctrine, he insisted, was ‘to apply to human beings only “in the maturity of their faculties”: it is not to apply to children or to backward societies’ (pp. 4f.); but, apart from these two examples, Mill was utterly opposed to legal ‘paternalism’. He had even cited ‘the example of restrictions on the sale of drugs, and criticises them as interferences with the liberty of the would-be purchaser rather than with that of the seller’. Today, however, we have ‘an increased awareness of a great range of factors which diminish the significance to be attached to an apparently free choice or to consent ... Underlying Mill’s extreme fear of paternalism there perhaps is a conception of what a normal human being is like which now seems not to correspond to the facts’ (pp. 32f.). But Hart still insisted on making a sharp distinction between paternalism and what he terms ‘legal moralism’ (pp. 33f.), particularly in the sphere of sexual morals. Examples of the latter which he cites include ‘bestiality, incest, living on the earnings of prostitution, keeping a house for prostitution, and also, since the decision in Shaw’s case [1961], a conspiracy to corrupt public morals, interpreted to mean in substance, leading others (in the opinion of a jury) “morally astray”’ (p. 25). It is significant, however, that Hart considers it perfectly consistent to ‘insist on the one hand that the only justification for having a system of punishment is to prevent harm and only harmful conduct should be punished, and, on the other, agree that when the quantum of punishment for such conduct is raised, we should defer to principles which make relative moral wickedness of different offenders a partial determinant of the severity of punishment’ (p. 37).

Two years later Devlin replied in his book The Enforcement of Morals, a collection of lectures and addresses on the subject of law and morality. In these he comments on morality and the law of tort, of contract and of marriage, respectively, together with its relationship to democracy and contemporary social reality. In his address on ‘Democracy and Morality’ (pp. 86-101) he focuses on, and discusses the implications of, Shaw v. Director of Public Prosecutions (1962) A.C. 220, in which the House of Lords found Shaw guilty, in publishing a magazine called The Ladies’ Directory, of three offences: 1. publishing an obscene article; 2. living on the earnings of the prostitutes who paid for the insertion of their advertisements in The Ladies’ Directory; and 3. conspiring to corrupt public morals by means of The Ladies’ Directory.

The first two of these charges were straightforward, under the Obscene Publications Act, 1959, and the Sexual Offences Act, 1956, respectively. The charge of ‘conspiring to corrupt public morals’ was much more controversial, and the defence insisted that there was, currently, no such offence known to English law. But Lord Simmonds (1881-1971) asserted that there ‘remains in the courts of law a residual power ... to conserve not only the safety and order but also the moral welfare of the State,’ and that Lord Mansfield’s (1705-93) statement, two centuries before, that ‘the Court of King’s Bench was the custos morum [keeper of morals] of the people and had the superintendency of offences contra bonos mores [against good morals]’ was still valid. Only Lord Reid (1890-1975) dissented from the contention that a conspiracy to corrupt public morals was still an offence. Professor Hart was, of course, horrified (Law, Liberty and Morality, pp. 6-10), and Lord Devlin observed that ‘one of the most interesting features in Shaw’s case is that (in cases of uncategorized immorality contrary to common law as distinct from offences defined by statute) it ... makes the jury a constitutional organ for determining what amounts to immorality and when the law should be enforced’ (loc. cit., p. 91).

In the past what was regarded as ‘divine law’ was the arbiter. Today, in Hart’s view, ‘rationalist morality’ should assume that role, while Devlin argues, in effect, that in a democracy* it is what the majority of its duly appointed representatives shall enact as its statute law and what its courts shall duly embed in its case-law.

See also: PUNISHMENT.

Bibliography

P. Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals (Oxford, 1965); H. L. A. Hart, ‘Immorality and Treason’, in L. Blom-Cooper (ed.), The Law as Literature (London, 1961); idem, Law, Liberty and Morality (London, 1963).

J.N.D.A.

DICTATORSHIP is the concentration of power* in a single ruler or small group and the often arbitrary use of that power by those who rule, including the reduction of civil liberties, and aggressive control of all social and political institutions by the State.

Dictatorship entails both a particular structure of government* and a special orientation to power. As a structure of government, dictatorship is defined often as the domination and control of the State by a single individual or a small group of individuals. It is immediately apparent, however, that that definition is far too inclusive. Contemporary scholars do not regard as dictatorships all governments dominated and controlled by a single individual or small group of individuals.

In The Politics, Aristotle* helps to clarify the nature of contemporary dictatorships. Aristotle defined a constitution as the arrangement of offices in a polis (city) and in particular the office which was thought of as sovereign. He argued further that right constitutions are ones in which those who rule do so out of a concern for the common interest. Bad constitutions are ones in which those who govern do so with the purpose of advancing personal or group interest, often at the expense of the common good.

Following Aristotle, contemporary political theorists view dictatorship as more than a form of government. The motives and style of those who govern are as important as structure. A more comprehensive definition of dictatorship is that it is the domination of the State by a single individual or group of individuals who use the State’s coercive power to advance their self-interest without any effective constitutional limitations on their exercise of power.

Carl J. Friedrich (1901-84) and Zbigniew K. Brzezinski (1928-) refined further our understanding of dictatorship. They distinguished the new form of twentieth-century dictatorship, which they called totalitarian dictatorship, from earlier forms of tyranny, monarchy and autocracy.*

Although totalitarian dictatorships share some characteristics with earlier forms of centralized political power, modern totalitarian dictatorships also consciously create an ideology, means of political coercion, and carefully controlled structures of mass political participation as instruments by which the rulers control the ruled.

If dictatorship is singularly thought of as a structure of government, little in it concerns Christians. Clearly, Christians can live, and have lived, under the authority of diverse structures of government. Scripture neither condemns nor condones any particular structural arrangement of political authority.*

Scripture, however, is not silent about the ruler’s orientation to power or his proper use of political authority. Political authority used primarily for the personal enhancement of the ruler, which denies or seriously denigrates human rights (see Rights, Human*) and which is so centralized that it inhibits human interaction and creativity, is contrary to the biblical mandate.

In Rom. 13, Paul teaches that government, while established by God, is given specific tasks as well as specific tools - the sword, for example - by which to fulfil its role within the created order. The authority and power of rulers are limited by their tasks (Rom. 13:1-7).

Furthermore, the OT makes clear that when God consented to a monarchy for Israel, he established a limited monarchy, not one of unlimited power as existed in the pagan societies surrounding Israel. Saul and David, the first two kings of Israel, covenanted with the people, and each understood his rights, duties and responsibilities to the people as well as the limits God placed on his authority (1 Sa. 10:25 and 2 Sa. 5:3).

When David's adulterous relationship with Bathsheba went beyond those limitations, God punished David not only because he was immoral, but because David violated his agreement with the people. His indirect murder of Uriah is further evidence of one of those traits Aristotle highlights, namely that rulers ought not to be self-seeking (2 Sa. 11).

Even after the division of the kingdom, many of the apostate kings of Israel understood the limited nature of their rule. Ahab, for example, would not, on his own, seize Naboth's garden because he knew that he, Ahab, had no right to do so (1 Ki. 21).

In his book, Democracy and Its Critics, the American political scientist, Robert A. Dahl (1915-), distinguished democracy from two other forms of authority, anarchy and guardianship. Anarchy,* the absence of any form of political authority, is clearly contrary to the created order. That does not mean, however, that the Bible mandates democracy. Guardianship, the belief that government ought to be left to a minority which possesses special knowledge, virtue or social attributes, has existed far longer as a form of authority than has democracy.

Christians can live obediently under, and even advocate, some form of guardianship as long as it respects basic human rights and seeks the common good. When guardianship, in whatever form, violates human rights and sacrifices the common interest for those of the rulers, it moves closer to totalitarian dictatorship. And the latter is clearly contrary to biblical prescription.

See also: COMMUNITY ETHICS.†

Bibliography

H. Arendt, The Origins of Totalitarianism, new ed. (New York, 1966); E. Baker, The Politics of Aristotle (New York, 1962); R. Dahl, Democracy and Its Critics (New Haven, CT, and London, 1989); C. J. Friedrich and Z. K. Brzezinski, Totalitarian Dictatorship and Autocracy (Cambridge, MA, and London, 1956).

R.P.L.

DISABILITY AND HANDICAP. In common usage the two terms 'disability' and 'handicap' are often used interchangeably. Dictionary definitions often suggest equivalent meanings, as something that hampers or hinders, or as an inability to perform a task because of a mental or physical impairment.

In contemporary medical terminology, there is a logical link between the three related concepts of impairment, disability and handicap. An impairment is any stable and persisting defect at the organic level. It may or may not lead to a disability, which is the stable and persisting loss of an ability to perform an activity, such as feeding oneself. Then, most importantly, the extent to which a disability leads to a handicap is influenced by, on the one hand, social and material resources (see Health and Health Care*), such as the availability of helping relatives or a prosthetic aid, and on the other hand, personal resources, such as appropriate coping strategies. Handicap is then a social role assumed by the impaired and disabled person that is assigned from the expectations of society. This sequence is now enshrined in the 1980 World Health Organization's International Classification of Impairment, Disability and Handicap (ICIDH). A number of estimates suggest that 10% of the adult population have a significant handicap.

Disability and handicap are primarily associated with chronic diseases (which may be congenital), or with traumatic injury. By definition, chronic diseases are those which do not remit, and hence individuals' ability to cope with the disease, their emotional reactions to the disease, their ability to adapt to their condition and to control further threats to their health, are all important. The impact of a disease will vary according to the nature of the disease, e.g. whether it involves complete sensory loss, or loss of voluntary movement.

Different causes of disability have different ages of onset, and may thus have different developmental implications; cerebral palsy, with early onset, will have implications for development of the child, while cerebrovascular accidents tend to occur in older people, and have their main impact on the ability to function independently. World-wide estimates of numbers of disabled people suggest that malnutrition and non-communicable somatic diseases are now the two most common medical causes of handicap. The probability of disability is thus related to access to basic health care: many disabling conditions in developing countries (e.g. trachoma and leprosy) are easily treated in their early stages.

Disabling conditions were clearly recognized in Egyptian and Babylonian texts as well as in Hebrew sources. In the OT, lameness is referred to on several occasions, as in the case of the lameness in both feet of Mephibosheth (2 Sa. 4:4; 9:3, 13). While on the one hand the lame were recognized as helpless (2 Sa. 5:6-8) and thus deserving of mercy and social justice, the deformed were precluded from the priesthood (Lv. 21:18-20; but note the prophetic expectation, Is. 56:3-5), as their defect would detract from the wholeness (holiness) of God. Physical deformity is referred to in the NT, e.g. the woman 'bent over' for eighteen years (Lk. 13:10-17). Blindness was common, as a consequence both of disease and of old age (Gn. 48:10).

Leprosy is probably the chronic condition most frequently mentioned in the Bible (e.g. 2 Ch. 26:19-21; Lk. 17:11-19). The conditions referred to as leprosy refer to several different medical conditions, but it is significant that Jesus on several occasions superseded Mosaic prohibitions about touching not only the leprous, but the dead (Mt. 9:25), and his example towards the leprous has been a major contributor to Christian concern for leprosy sufferers.

A key NT passage with reference to handicap is Jn. 9:1-7, where Jesus heals the man blind from birth. This passage includes the denial that sin has anything to do with the handicap; and that God uses people in specific ways to fulfil his intention for the world. The parable of the householder (Lk. 14:11-14) illustrates how the kingdom of God is not complete without the blind and the maimed. To the extent that we safeguard an image of ourselves as healthy and free from all defect, we may minimize the part the handicapped have to play within the membership of the church.

There are many pastoral implications of concern for those with disabilities. Because of the duration of the disabling condition, helpers may grow lax, patients may continue to comply with prescribed medical regimes, pain and weakness may persist. The role of the pastor is clear in acute illness and injury, where shared Christian assumptions can enable the resources of faith to be brought to bear on the healing process. Where the duration of disorder is both lengthy and uncertain, there is a recurring challenge to faith. The simple issue of the physical and psychological accessibility of public worship to the physically limited and the mentally limited is a challenge to many congregations. The two main elements of the pastoral challenge of disability are the affirmation and congregational acceptance of disabled people within the mainstream of congregational life, and the ability of a congregation to translate into contemporary practice the challenge of response to the needy and the confined (Mt. 25:34-45).

See also: LEARNING DISABILITIES.

Bibliography

G. Muller-Fahrenholz, Partners in Life: The Handicapped and the Church (Geneva, 1979); B. Palmer (ed.), Medicine and the Bible (Exeter, 1986); World Health Organization, International Classification of Impairments, Disabilities and Handicaps (Geneva, 1980).

J.N.H.

DISARMAMENT. The term 'disarmament' refers to: 1. the reduction of armaments of a defeated nation, such as Germany under the Versailles Treaty of 1919; 2. bilateral understandings, such as the Rush-Bagot agreement which since 1817 has kept the border between Canada and the US demilitarized; 3. the attempts in the 20th century through the League of Nations and the United Nations to limit and reduce arms by general international agreement; and 4. the complete abolition of all weapons as taught by certain pacifist* and utopian groups.

The Christian revelation and the teaching of many churches, such as the Friends (Quakers*), the Mennonites* and the Church of the Brethren, emphasize the need for a peaceful life. These groups have stressed NT texts such as the Sermon on the Mount (Mt. 5:39, 44) which seem to forbid the use of armed force by Christians. They point out that Jesus taught that the cause of God was never to be advanced by physical force (Jn. 18:36), and that he condemned Peter for using a weapon to defend him (Mt. 26:51-54; Jn. 18:10-11). This testimony was continued by the early church, but during the 4th and 5th centuries the Germanic invasions and the legalization of Christianity by Constantine* led to the acceptance of violence.* During the Middle Ages, this was carried out to such an extreme that the church even authorized the Crusades to rid Europe of heretics and to conquer the Holy Land.

The Reformation accepted the use of arms, and new developments such as gunpowder, when combined with religious zeal, led to the bloody wars of religion (c. 1550-1648). However, even in that brutal and coarse age the Christian humanist, Erasmus (c. 1469-1536), and many of the Anabaptists* opposed a resort to arms. With the growth of modern States and the technological advances of the Industrial Revolution, total or absolute war became possible. The horrors of such campaigns caused Christians who accepted the idea of a just war* to encourage attempts to limit arms on an international scale.

These individuals, and many who took a more secular approach, supported attempts at humanitarian co-operation among the nations. A series of international gatherings, such as those held at the Hague in 1899 and 1907, agreed that certain weapons (including poison gas and dumdum bullets) would not be used, and that projectiles ought not to be thrown on the enemy from balloons. These decisions, although negligible, were important because they came from the first general meetings of nations to deal with armament problems.

Despite these hopeful signs, total or absolute war was waged by both sides in the First World War (1914-18). Conflict became three-dimensional for the first time and struck at civilian population in an inhumane way. Modern artillery, extensive use of mines, machine guns, poison gas, submarine warfare and aerial bombardment broke the spirit of the pre-war peace conferences. After the conflict it was decided by many that there was a causal link between armaments and war.* The goal of disarmament 'to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety' was among the Fourteen Points proclaimed by the President of the US, Woodrow Wilson (1856-1924), as the basis of the peace treaties.

The armistice stripped Germany of its armaments, and it was expected that the League of Nations (1920) would inaugurate the principle of universal collective security. Despite the pacifist attitudes of the victors in the war and peace assemblies such as the Washington Conference of 1921 and a worldwide disarmament meeting in 1932, this did not happen, and the forces of totalitarianism in Germany, Italy, and Japan rearmed. The result was the Second World War (1939-45) and the development of even more frightful weapons. Out of this maelstrom came the UN (United Nations), organized in 1945 to replace the defunct League of Nations. One of its basic goals was to establish 'a system for the regulation of armament'.

New characteristics of weaponry in the field of rocketry, nuclear, chemical and biological warfare have stimulated a fresh concern for disarmament in the post-war decades. The state of technology* has given the advantage to the offensive power. The fear of so-called 'firststrike capability' has encouraged continuous peace discussions at the UN and, in addition, the superpowers have negotiated the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) of the 1970s and the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks (START) of the 1980s and 1990s.

Despite these achievements, many conservative Christians remain sceptical and support 'peace through strength'. They believe that the Western democracies could be tricked into giving up too many armaments and that some neo-totalitarian powers would attack them. Then the very thing feared by those who advocate disarmament would come about.

Bibliography

R. H. Bainton, Christian Attitudes toward War and Peace (Nashville, TN, 1960) = Christian Attitudes to War and Peace (London, 1961); R. G. Clouse (ed.), War: Four Christian Views (Downers Grove, IL, 1991); Department for Disarmament Affairs, Disarmament: A Periodic Review by the United Nations (1978-); A. Geyer, The Idea of Disarmament!: Rethinking the Unthinkable (Elgin, IL, 1982); E. Regehr, Militarism and the World Military Order (Geneva, 1980).

R.G.C.

DISCIPLINE. The noun 'discipline' has various meanings: 1. a branch of instruction (e.g. physics); 2. the enforcement of order; and 3. the sanctions associated with keeping order (e.g. being under church* discipline). The verb, which has the meaning of 'to train to obedience', suggests that discipline is as much a process as a set of sanctions or a particular state.

In Christian spirituality,* various disciplines are seen as means of aiding spiritual growth in a life of committed discipleship (see Asceticism* Disciplines, Spiritual*). In ecclesiology, discipline, particularly in the Reformed tradition, has embraced a range of concerns generally subsumed under the term 'polity': issues of church order, including church courts, and the moulding of a Christian society in which the laws and social order reflected, and were sustained by, Christian principles. A notable expression of the latter concern is the First Book of Discipline (1560) and the Second Book of Discipline (1578) of the Reformed Church of Scotland. These dealt not only with the polity of the church, the responsibilities of ministers and the enforcement of morals, but also with the establishment of schools and the reform of the universities. Discipline in this sense is thus intimately connected with the vision of a Christian society.

Biblical teaching

In the OT, the verb ysr can range in meaning from 'admonish' (e.g. Ps. 94:10; Pr. 9:7), and 'discipline' (e.g. Dt. 4:36; Pr. 3:11), to 'chastise' (e.g. Lv. 26:18, 28; Pr. 19:18). The associated noun musar is used of correction ('instruction', Pr. 15:33, NASB) which leads to wisdom, and of education or instruction (Ps. 50:17). The disciplining of his son by a father provides an analogy for God's disciplining of his covenant people (Dt. 8:5; Pr. 3:11-12; cf. Heb. 12:4-11).

In the Wisdom teaching the educative function of discipline is prominent. Thus to heed discipline is to gain understanding (Pr. 15:32); indeed wisdom and discipline are inseparably linked (Pr. 1:2-3). According to Proverbs, education cannot dispense with corporal punishment (13:24; cf. 29:15). Such correction when necessary gives hope of amendment (19:18), drives out folly (22:15), and gives life to those who receive it (4:13). But it must be done in love (13:24), not anger.

In the NT, the verb paideuo and noun paideia have a similar range of meaning to ysr and musar. Thus Moses was 'educated in all the wisdom of the Egyptians' (Acts 7:22) and children are 'disciplined' by their parents (Heb. 12:8). The word paideuo is also used of divine discipline (Heb. 12:6), exercised in love that we may share in God's holiness (Heb. 12:10).

Pastoral perspectives

The fact that, biblically, discipline is educative as well as punitive has important pastoral implications. God's education or training of his people involves much more than punishing them for their wrongdoing, as the story of Job shows. The suffering that Job endured by God's permission brought him to a deeper trust in God (Jb. 13:15) and a greater humility before him (40:3-5). It was Job's friends who wanted to read his sufferings as punitive - not Job, or indeed God! It is therefore pastorally wise to work with this distinction in mind, otherwise those who suffer may easily conclude that suffering* is always due to sin.

In Christian families the upbringing (paideia) of children (Eph. 6:4) is to reflect God's fatherly dealings with his people. It is to be 'of the Lord', i.e. the education which God gives through the father (taking kyriou as a subjective genitive). Though firm, it is not to be harsh or unbalanced, not thundering wrath to the neglect of encouragement, otherwise children will be made angry and resentful (cf. 'exasperate', NIV). Great wisdom is needed as children grow to maturity lest prohibitions appropriate to early childhood are still insisted upon in early adulthood.

In the West in the last two generations, the pendulum has swung from authoritarianism to permissiveness in the upbringing of children. Neither is a valid option for Christian parents if their nurturing (as indeed all Christian nurture) is to be 'training in righteousness' (2 Tim. 3:16). For righteousness is not permissive, since it is in antithesis to self-centredness and sin. Nor is it purely authoritarian, since newcovenant righteousness is brought about not by the thunderings of the law, but through the internal work of the Spirit (Rom. 8:1-4).

From a biblical perspective, the whole of the Christian life is to be seen as training for eternity under the fatherly discipline of God. In this the Scriptures (2 Tim. 3:16-17), person-to person exhortation (Eph. 4:25), and the corporate life and sanctions of the church (cf. 1 Cor. 5:1-5), each have important parts to play.

D.P.K.

DISCIPLINES, SPIRITUAL, have been practised in religions from the beginning of human history, and are found in Judaism and Christianity. Christians are called 'disciples' and embrace 'disciplines' in order to 'Offer your bodies as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God - this is your spiritual service of worship' (Rom. 12:1). These disciplines are called your righteousness, (Mt. 6:1) and are to be distinguished from God's righteousness, which is a gift (Rom. 5:17) and in which a believer seeks to be found right with God and living in right obedience (Phil. 3:9; Rom. 6:16).

Disciplines are the believer's activities in sowing to the Spirit (Gal. 6:8). They are not in themselves the harvest of the Spirit, which is Christ's life being brought forth as fruit (Gal. 5:22), but are our provision of right conditions for its growth. John Wesley* said, 'It was a common saying among the Christians of the primitive church, the soul and the body make a man, the Spirit and discipline make a Christian, implying that none could be real Christians without the help of Christian discipline. But if this be so, is it any wonder that we find so few Christians, for where is Christian discipline?' ('Causes of the Inefficacy of Christianity', in Sermons on Several Occasions, vol. 1, London, 1836, p. 437). Richard Foster's (1942-) more recent advocacy of spiritual disciplines says that they are 'classical', but 'not classical merely because they are ancient, although they have been practiced by sincere people over the centuries. The disciplines are classical because they are central to experiential Christianity.' (See Celebration of Discipline, London, 1980, p. 1.)

Jesus accepts the three most important disciplines of Judaism (giving, prayer and fasting, Mt. 6:2, 5 and 16), and purifies them from self-display and self-righteous Pharisaism. The following further sixteen disciplines at least are affirmed in the Scriptures, and appear throughout the history of the church. These are not, as sometimes has been misunderstood, meritorious works; neither are they acts of penance to pay for the soul's misdoings, but rather a means for hungering after God (Ps. 42:1).

Individual disciplines

1. Meditation is where the objective is not monistic oblivion, but the object is Christ himself and his works, or indeed whatever is true, noble, right, pure, lovely, admirable, excellent or praiseworthy (Phil. 4:8). 2. Closely aligned to this is study, which is primarily of the Scriptures and God's work in creation (Ps. 19), but also of the works and lives of men and women of God. 3. Simplicity, 4. frugality and 5. sacrifice all serve to build a life-style free from materialism, the heart of which is the discipline of 'giving' mentioned above, but they add the dimension of freedom for the disciple to be available to God. 6. Jesus often practised solitude (Mk. 1:35), giving an example to follow, and 7. silence, which takes one further into isolation and tongue-control, that we might be 'slow to speak' (Jas. 1:19). 8. Secrecy involves taking steps to prevent our good deeds being known; Thomas a Kempis (c. 1380-1471) in The Imitation of Christ speaks of the great tranquillity of heart that comes by rising above praising and blaming. 9. Chastity is not just the discipline of celibacy (see Singleness) to which some give themselves with the enabling of the Holy Spirit, but also mutual abstention to give oneself to prayer (1 Cor. 7:5-7).

Corporate disciplines

10. Service includes being salt and light in society, so that our good works glorify our heavenly Father (Mt. 5:16), and it also means doing our work well, 'with all your heart, as working for the Lord, not for men' (Col. 3:22-24). 11. Celebration is the enjoyment of life, following the example of Jesus who enjoyed another's wedding, though he himself would never marry, and was accused of being a glutton and a drunkard (Mt. 11:19). Francis of Assisi* taught his followers that they must always be happy, so cultivating the habit of happiness. This too is a discipline, as indeed is 12. worship, which has been described as the art of love-making with God. 13. *Fellowship is the essential benefit which comes from the mingling and sharing of our lives together in many of the activities that have already been spelled out. There is a negative side to this particular discipline, namely the loss of fellowship's privileges where church discipline is administered (Mt. 18:15-20). 14. Submission (Heb. 13:7, 17) demands a high degree of fellowship and loyalty, and also involves 15. *Confession (Jas. 5:16), and 16. guidance, not only the daily concerns of an individual's Spirit-led life, but a submission to the corporate mind (Acts 13:1-3; 15:28).

Leo Tolstoy* said, 'Everyone thinks of changing humanity and nobody thinks of changing himself.' The aim, however, of all disciplines, whether we classify them as inward or outward, or individual and corporate (see R. Foster's Celebration of Discipline), or whether we see them as abstaining from certain things and engaging in others (see D. Willard, The Spirit of the Disciplines, p. 158) is that we might succeed in guarding our heart, 'the wellspring of life' (Pr. 4:23), so that from it might flow a pure, unadulterated stream of God's life (Jn. 7:38).

Bibliography

R. Foster, Celebration of Discipline (San Francisco, 1988; London, 1989); J. Owen, 'Of the Mortification of Sin in Believers,' Works, vol. 6 (1656; repr. London, 1966), pp. 5-86; Thomas à Kempis, The Imitation of Christ (1418; many eds.); D. Willard, The Spirit of the Disciplines (San Francisco, 1988).

R.T.F.

DISCRIMINATION. The 1968 UK Race Relations Act (amended in 1976) and the 1975 Sex Discrimination Act (amended in 1986) define 'discrimination' as treating one person 'less favourably than s/he treats or would treat other persons'. The Race Relations Act also has a separate subsection which includes segregation. The focus of the legal definition of 'discrimination' is therefore on behaviour rather than attitude. Discrimination can be either a deliberate wrong perpetrated by one individual against a specific victim, or the result of the inaction of an individual or organization. In either case it is the action or inaction, irrespective of motive, e.g. malice, fear or dislike, which has a 'disproportional adverse impact' on a certain individual/group/community. Through time, discrimination creates substantial inequality and unequal life chances between groups in the areas of education, employment, housing, health, access to various services, and socioeconomic status. Examples of this 'substantial inequality' and unequal life chance are prevalent, if one chooses to see and hear them. Even with an equal level of education, women still earn only two thirds of what their male colleagues earn on both sides of the Atlantic. Blacks suffer worse housing and an unemployment* rate three times higher than whites, and only 31% of disabled (see Disability and Handicap*) people of working age are in employment.

As a result, in the UK, the State, taking full recognition of the nation-wide problem in discrimination, took on the responsibility for setting the legislative framework for employers, local authorities, service providers and public statutory bodies. The Race Relations Act (1968) outlined the legal responsibilities of these agencies to ensure nondiscrimination. It made direct and indirect discrimination and victimization on the grounds of race,* colour, ethnic origin, nationality and national origin to be illegal. The Race Relations Act was followed by the Sex Discrimination Act in 1975, which forbids discrimination on the grounds of gender and marital status. Both Acts have since been amended, and there are now certain statutory regulations that all organizations have to observe. They cover virtually all employment practices including recruitment, promotion, transfer and training, as well as access to benefits, facilities and services. They also cover dismissal.

These, together with other items of legislation (e.g. regarding equal pay and the employment of disabled persons) have set a legislative requirement by which all who employ staff and provide services must abide. Other countries, e.g. the USA, have also provided a legislative framework which goes beyond forbidding discrimination and actually allows reverse discrimination (i.e. affirmative action) whereas other European countries are also beginning to consider tackling societal discrimination via the legal route.

The legislation testifies to the reality of discrimination among many groups and communities who are denied the basic civil rights (see Rights, Human*) to which they are entitled. Discrimination, especially institutional discrimination, does not affirm that differences between people are simply differences, something to be reckoned with, accepted and celebrated. Instead these differences are seen as a tool for stratification - degradation or elevation depending on the groups to which one belongs. Features of the differences become signs and symbols for marking out those who are 'acceptable' and those who are 'unacceptable'.

Such destructive discrimination does not reflect the kind of distinction that the Sermon on the Mount draws (i.e. between good and bad attitudes and behaviour, between the narrow and wide gates for life's journey, Mt. 7:6, 13-16). Instead, Jesus firmly rebukes discrimination when we judge others in a censorious way and set ourselves up over them on some standard of goodness or acceptability. Of course there are differences between people. The Christian church, as the body of Christ, includes the rich variety of different personalities, different gifts, different races, different genders. The task of the body is mutual ministry and mutual acceptance (Eph. 4) so that there can be growth in all the diversity towards harmony in Christ.

The history of the human race, and all too often of the Christian church, is a history of the sort of discrimination that either judges in a censorious way, or makes discrimination between people on the basis of human preferences or human fears, and fails to acknowledge that all of us are creatures of the same God, and bear his image (see Image of God*). The church as an institution has often failed to be salt and light in the area of fighting against inequality. Either it all too frequently participates in the history of various forms of discrimination, or it lifts no hands in correcting the wrongs of injustice, despite brave individuals such as Lord Shaftesbury* and Martin Luther King.*

In the creation account in Gn. 1, male and female together are made in the divine image, and in Gn. 2 the gender complementarity reflects something of God's purpose for human sexuality. However, the story of sin from Gn. 3 onwards is the story all too often of male dominance and female subservience - a story which is rectified in the NT, not only by Jesus' affirmative attitude towards women, but also by Paul's affirmation that in Christ 'there is neither ... male nor female' in terms of difference of human status (Gal. 3:28).

Racial discrimination, whether in a subtle form or the extreme form of apartheid,* is also a denial of God's creative purposes for humanity. There are real difficulties in using the discrimination between Israelite and foreigner in the OT as a basis for contemporary Christian action. The loose and irresponsible use of the doctrine of election to imply that certain races are superior to others in the purposes of God fails to acknowledge that 'from one man God made every nation of men, that they should inhabit the whole earth' (Acts 17:26), and it fails to recognize that discrimination based on race is also subverted by the gospel, together with the prejudice that feeds it. The early church had to come to terms with the inclusion of the Gentiles within the people of God (see Acts 15:1-21), and Paul's letters to the Romans and Galatians in particular discuss the practical decisions required by the gospel statement that in Christ 'there is neither Jew nor Greek' (Gal. 3:28).

It is clear from the total message of Scripture that one cannot speak of God's love for us and Christ's sacrifice on the cross without speaking of his righteousness and justice. God's love for his people is never sentimental. It is always practical and concrete. As Allan Boesak (1946-) puts it: 'Yahweh takes the side of his people against the oppressor, the pharaoh ... Yahweh comes openly to the aid of his downtrodden people for all the world to see and know that ... he is the liberator of the oppressed and the One who uprightly defends the poorest, who saves the children of those in need and crushes their oppressors' (see Ps. 72:4; Black Theology, Black Power, p. 19). As people redeemed by this only true God, our moral and ethical response to discrimination is not just 'feeling' how terrible it is that precious lives and talents are wasted because certain members of society are branded less acceptable than others. The minimum duty of Christian people is to take a clear moral and ethical stand in the church, workplace and any other institution - be it political, educational, economic or voluntary - that discrimination is unacceptable and that Christians are ready to work with others towards a fairer and more just world.

At the institutional level, questions could be asked about workforce statistics, implications of past practices that affect the 'access' of those people who have been discriminated against in the institution; meaningful and implementable 'equal opportunities' policy and practice could be suggested; the ethics and value of treating everyone fairly, in accordance to equal values, needs to be modelled in roles and relationships.

And at the societal level, demands could be made of political representatives, in the name of social justice, about equality issues in the political arena; individuals can join or get involved in local communities to understand how deprivation affects individuals and learn from them what programmes of action are desirable.

Bibliography

L. Abdela, Breaking through the Glass Ceilings (Solihull, 1991); A. A. Boesak, Black Theology, Black Power (London and Maryknoll, NY, 1978); M. Davidson and J. Earnshaw, Vulnerable Workers: Psychosocial and Legal Issues (Chichester, 1991); R. Jenkins, Racism and Recruitment (Cambridge, 1986); L. Lustgarten, Legal Control of Racial Discrimination (London, 1980); idem, Women Managers: The Untapped Resource (London, 1990).

L.M.-Y.C.-J.

DISHONESTY, see FRAUD.

DISINVESTMENT, see ECONOMIC SANCTIONS.

DISPENSATIONALISM. A system of scriptural interpretation, which teaches that God has dealt with humans in unique ways during the different eras of biblical history. As C. I. Scofield (1843-1921), one of its leading exponents, explained: 'A dispensation is a period of time during which man is tested in respect of obedience to some specific revelation of the will of God' (Scofield Reference Bible, note 4, at Gn. 1:28 - 3:13).

Although many claim that the movement started much earlier, modern dispensationalism began with the ministry of J. N. Darby (1800-82) and the Plymouth Brethren. Their work inspired a series of interdenominational Bible teachers and evangelists, including D. L. Moody (1837-99), H. A. Ironside (1876-1951) and Scofield. The Scofield Reference Bible (1909) was especially important because the notes made dispensationalism an integral part of the interpretative scheme. Within fifty years, three million copies of this Bible were printed in the US. In more recent times, works such as The Late Great Planet Earth (Grand Rapids, 1970; London, 1971) by Hal Lindsey (1930-) have sold tens of millions of copies and served to popularize the view to an even greater extent.

There are differences among dispensationalists, and many do not agree with Scofield's outline of seven ages. However, they all make distinctions between the OT period of the law,* the NT age of grace,* and the coming era of the millennial kingdom (see Kingdom of God*). They also distinguish between Israel and the church* and the Bible passages which apply to each of them. Because of a literalist emphasis on most parts of Scripture and a penchant for applying troublesome verses to future or past dispensations, it is difficult to find a carefully articulated ethical theory among them. Certain characteristics of this belief do have moral implications. One of the more obvious is a pessimistic attitude towards society.* Dispensationalists believe in a supernatural social theory which limits God's ability to affect change in society in the present age. Christians who follow this theology tend to feel that it is useless to support social programmes that try to ameliorate the conditions of the poor, despite clear statements such as those found in Mt. 25 and Rom. 12:20. They narrow the task of the church to 'saving souls' rather than working for the moral betterment of humankind.

The church, rather than being central to the cause of God, is thought to be no better than Israel, and its main purpose is to be a promotional or sales organization for the gospel. High-pressure tactics are used to foster an emphasis on 'winning the last soul to Christ', so that he will return and 'rapture' the church.

Dispensationalists also take a very negative view of culture.* They encourage Bible colleges and seminaries to train individuals for 'full-time' Christian service. A thorough knowledge of the liberal arts and an understanding of the history of Christian thought are not considered important. This pessimistic view extends to the arts* and entertainment* media as well, and consequently they ignore and condemn these aspects of expression. Rather than encouraging meaningful participation by Christians in such activities, they develop their own counter-culture. Because of this, their preaching seems irrelevant to those who have not been initiated into dispensationalism.

Another aspect of this theology that has ethical implications is the effort to identify the signs of the times. Such occurrences as wars, the rise of authoritarian political leaders, technological advances, natural disasters and apostasy in the churches are cited as proof that the end of the age is near and that the second coming of Christ is about to take place. Attention is focused on the Zionist establishment of the State of Israel as the focus for these signs. This not only encourages attempts to set the dates for the return of Christ but it also leads to an uncritical support of Israel in the Middle East. Accepting a belligerent foreign policy in that area could lead to wider international conflicts. In fact, many such as Hal Lindsey identify nuclear warfare with biblical statements describing the second coming.

These positions would not characterize all dispensationalists, however, because their social ethic is extremely individualistic. The OT law in its civil, ceremonial and moral function, they claim, belongs to another age. The principles of the Sermon on the Mount* apply primarily to the millennial kingdom and any application to the present is purely secondary. Thus one is left with moral and ethical statements drawn from the letters of the apostles in the NT.

There is one sense in which dispensationalism is quite helpful. Many Christians tend to ignore the eschatological passages of the Bible. They tacitly accept the view that the world will continue as it is forever. Those who concentrate on the second coming constantly remind the church that the gospel is a message of hope and openness to the future. The end is coming and, however one interprets Scripture, 'the blessed hope' that Christians will live and reign with their Lord forever must never be absent from Christian preaching.

Bibliography

R. G. Clouse (ed.), The Meaning of the Millennium: Four Views (Downers Grove, IL, 1977); C. C. Ryrie, Dispensationalism Today (Chicago, 1965); E. R. Sandeen, The Roots of Fundamentalism (Chicago, 1970).

R.G.C.

DIVORCE. The OT, like the rest of the ancient Orient, presupposes the right of divorce, but it never explains under exactly what circumstances it may be exercised. So here, as in other areas of family* life, the OT picture must be supplemented by data from surrounding cultures.

Though divorce was allowed, it was discouraged by social convention, law and financial penalty. Both Gn. 2:24 ('a man will ... be united [lit. "stick"] to his wife'), and the wedding vow ('I am her husband ... for ever'), and the elaborateness of the wedding ceremony itself all express the hope that marriage* will be for life. To be divorced was to fall in social esteem (Pr. 30:23; see William McKane, Proverbs, London, 1970, p. 666), and to be debarred from marrying a priest (Lv. 21:7). However Mal. 2:16 ('I hate divorce') should be translated, it certainly expresses the prophet's antipathy to divorce.

In practice divorce must have been rare because it was expensive. On marriage the bride was presented with a large dowry by her father, often equivalent to several years' wages. The dowry was jointly owned by husband and wife, but if she was divorced for anything less than grave misbehaviour, she took the dowry with her. This must have made divorce exceptional.

There are few laws about divorce. It is prohibited in two situations (Dt. 22:19, 29), perhaps because the young man has shown himself hot-headed and liable to behave rashly. Other rules limit remarriage* after divorce. The rules in Lv. 18:6-18 covering the choice of marriage partners would particularly affect divorcees and widow(er)s.

Deuteronomy 24:1-4 is primarily concerned with remarriage. A twice-married woman is forbidden after the death or divorce of her second husband to return to her first husband. The reason for this prohibition is obscure. But this law mentions two different grounds for divorce: the first husband divorces her because of 'something indecent', the second because he 'dislikes' her. 'Something indecent' suggests sexual misconduct. Though adultery,* if caught in the act, could be punished by death, this was not mandatory (cf. Pr. 6:29-35), so 'something indecent' may cover adultery as well as other sexual acts.

In the prophets, Israel's idolatry is often compared to spiritual adultery. The Lord therefore punishes her with divorce, i.e. exile, but he longs for her to repent and return to himself (Hos. 14:1-3).

The NT shares the OT's aversion to divorce. Asked to adjudicate between the liberal Hillelite Pharisees, who held that trivial grounds (e.g. bad cooking) warranted divorce, and the strict Shammaites, who allowed divorce only for 'indecency', Jesus pointed to God's original intention for marriage: 'the two ... become one flesh. So they are no longer two, but one. Therefore what God has joined together, let man not separate' (Mt. 19:5-6). In other words, Jesus regards divorce as wrong. Furthermore he states that the OT permitted divorce only as a concession to human sinfulness: 'Moses permitted you to divorce your wives because your hearts were hard' (Mt. 19:8).

Thus far the teaching of Jesus is similar to that of the OT and the stricter Pharisaic party. But, according to Mark, Luke and Paul, Jesus went further than the OT in forbidding remarriage after divorce. In Mk. 10:11-12 and Lk. 16:18 he calls it adultery, and Paul paraphrases Jesus' teaching: 'A wife must not separate from her husband. But if she does, she must remain unmarried or else be reconciled to her husband. And a husband must not divorce his wife' (1 Cor. 7:10-11). Paul evidently understands Jesus to tolerate separation from one's spouse but not remarriage to someone else. This underlies the traditional Catholic view that the only kind of divorce allowable by the church is a mensa et thoro (i.e. from table to bed), not a vinculo (i.e. from the bond of marriage).

But according to Mt. 5:32 and 19:9, Jesus did allow divorce for porneia (NIV 'marital unfaithfulness'; RSV, REB 'unchastity'). The normal meaning of porneia and its present context demand that it is understood in a broad way of any sexual offences that are prohibited in the OT law: adultery, incest,* homosexuality,* etc.; anything that Dt. 24:1 might term 'something indecent'. It should not be understood to refer here just to premarital unchastity, or marriage within the forbidden degrees. A wider range of sexual misconduct is in view. This exception, allowing divorce for porneia, was probably a concession to the law of the day, since both Roman and Jewish law required that adulterous wives be divorced, though it may be seen as another concession to hard-heartedness.

However, it is unlikely that Jesus or Matthew allowed such divorcees to remarry. Grammatically it is possible to read Mt. 19:9 as permitting remarriage, but it is not required. In fact the context is against it. To suppose that Jesus allowed innocent divorcees to remarry would make him agree with the Shammaite Pharisees, whom he had just condemned. It also fails to explain the disciples' astonishment at his harsh novel teaching, 'If this is the situation ... it is better not to marry' (Mt. 19:10), or the fact that Jesus goes on to speak of eunuchs who have renounced marriage (19:12). To suppose Jesus allowed divorcees to remarry also conflicts with the understanding of his teaching by Mark, Luke and Paul, and the early church, which for the first five centuries regarded remarriage after divorce as contrary to Christ's teaching.

On any reading, the NT poses great problems for an age where divorce and remarriage are commonplace. How is the church to bear witness to the permanency of marriage on the one hand and the forgiveness* of sins on the other? To move from exegesis to pastoral practice in this area is very difficult. Whatever stance is adopted to remarriage, all can agree that loyalty to biblical principles demands that all Christians, both individually and corporately, should work to maintain existing marriages and offer support and encouragement to those who are divorced.

In society as a whole Christians need to press for legislation and taxation policies that encourage partners to reconcile their differences rather than seek divorce. Modern British law, which allows divorce on trivial grounds within a year of marriage, is clearly contrary to biblical teaching. Lawyers should explore the possibility of reconciliation* before advising clients about divorce.

But once divorce has occurred and reconciliation is out of the question, the pastoral perspective alters. Now the Christian response is to bind up the broken-hearted and comfort those who mourn. Psychologically and financially, the trauma of divorce is often worse than bereavement, so that the divorcee will need all the support and encouragement that the Christian community can provide. All divorcees need open ears to listen to their griefs and hopes. Single parents* need to share their burdens with other families, especially when there are no grandparents nearby. For them the church family should provide an alternative network of care and support.

Spiritually, too, divorcees need complete assurance that God forgives them even when they cannot forgive themselves, and that the single are able to serve God with less distraction than married people and thus their ministry is particularly valued by Scripture (Mt. 19:11-12; 1 Cor. 7:32-38) and the contemporary church (see Singleness*). In all these ways, the church can bear witness to the love and forgiveness of Christ to those who are often most conscious of their need for it.

See also: SEXUALITY.†

Bibliography

D. J. Atkinson, To Have and to Hold (London, 1979); A. J. C. Carnes, Divorce and Remarriage (London, 1993); W. A. Heth and G. J. Wenham, Jesus and Divorce (London, 1984); D. Phypers, Christian Marriage in Crisis (London, 1985).

G.J.W.

DONATION, ORGAN, see TRANSPLANT SURGERY.

DOOYEWEERD, HERMAN (1894-1977), an outstanding Dutch Christian scholar, founder of the philosophy of the 'cosmonomic idea' or 'law idea', often referred to as the Amsterdam philosophy or reformational philosophy. He had a lifelong involvement with the (Reformed) Free University of Amsterdam, first as a student and finally as Professor of Jurisprudence (1926-65). The Free University had been founded in 1880 by Abraham Kuyper* as a Christian university in which all subjects were to be researched and taught from the perspective of a Christian worldview. Sharing in this vision, Dooyeweerd showed in detail the ways in which religious allegiances - pagan, Christian and humanist - had undergirded all human activity, including science, scholarship and education in the West. His seminal publication De Wijsbegeerte der wetsidee (1935-36) was revised and translated into Eng. as A New Critique of Theoretical Thought (4 vols., 1953-58).

In this encyclopedic work, Dooyeweerd sought to expose what he called 'the dogma of the autonomy of theoretical thought'. He argued that science and scholarship were religiously neutral not only in practice but also in principle. Every discipline was of necessity constituted by philosophical conceptions (ontological and epistemological) and behind these lay religious allegiances - ultimately for or against the kingdom of Christ. This formed the basis of Dooyeweerd's advocacy of the possibility and necessity of Christian scholarship as a strategic part of the obedience and renewal demanded by the gospel of the kingdom.

At first, English-speaking evangelical scholars displayed considerable hostility to such a viewpoint. The only Christian scholarship they were prepared to acknowledge was that of academic theology. Other disciplines were regarded as 'secular' rather than 'sacred' and therefore as religiously neutral. But the tide has now turned. Dualistic evangelicalism is now on the defensive, and mainline (humanist) philosophy itself has long since abandoned positivistic and objectivistic theories of knowledge. There is no doubt that the leaven of reformational philosophy has been a potent factor in the scholarly and cultural renaissance that is beginning in the evangelical world.

A number of works by Dooyeweerd are available in English. These include In the Twilight of Western Thought (Philadelphia, 1960); Roots of Western Culture (Toronto, 1979); A Christian Theory of Social Institutions (Ontario, 1986); and A New Critique of Theoretical Thought (Ontario, 1984). A vigorous programme of translation is now under way. The best introductions to Dooyeweerd available in English are L. Kalsbeek, Contours of a Christian Philosophy (Toronto, 1975), and R. A. Clouser, The Myth of Religious Neutrality (Notre Dame, IN, and London, 1991).

R.A.R.

DOUBLE EFFECT. In carrying out a particular action or series of actions, a person may also be aware that such actions have side-effects, which, though they may be foreseen, may not be directly intended. If that person is aware of such side-effects, does he (or she), in virtue of that knowledge, actually intend to cause these side-effects? If so, may he therefore be said to be responsible for their occurrence even though he may not want them to happen and may even abhor and detest their occurrence? To take a typical example, a Second World War bomber pilot, in dropping bombs on a munitions factory, may be aware that some of the bombs will go astray and cause casualties among civilians not involved in munitions manufacture. He may not want these casualties to occur, but since he foresees them as the side-effect of the bombing, is he not also responsible for the deaths of the civilians? Or a drug may be given to a patient, with the intention of reducing pain but in the knowledge that administering it will shorten the patient's life. Is the physician responsible for killing the patient?

Many moralists would answer this question in the negative, and would cite 'the principle of double effect' as the reason. For them, the morally significant factor is the intention* of the agent, the precise effect that he intends by his action, and not the side-effect which, though he may be aware of it, he does not intend.

Those who uphold the principle of double effect do not endorse its use in every circumstance. If, for example, the action to be performed is an intrinsically wrong or immoral act, then the principle does not apply, since the action is forbidden in the first place. Further, the principle is not intended to allow an agent to 'get away with' what is otherwise to be regarded as immoral. Nor is it to be trivially applied; the good intended in the action must be of sufficient weight or strength to outweigh the evil of the side-effect which is foreseen and (allegedly) not intended. Finally, the principle is not to be confused with the view that it is permissible to do evil in order that good may come. The principle therefore does not maintain that the foreseen but not intended sideeffect causally contributes to the intended good.

The issue raised by this principle is of considerable importance in the debate between utilitarians (see Consequentialism*) and others about the ethical rightness of actions. For the principle of double effect attributes a moral significance to intention (or to the absence of intention) irrespective of the consequences of the action. The principle maintains that the way in which an action is performed contributes to its moral character. So, if the principle is upheld, it undermines the utilitarian claim that the morality of an action is a function solely of the consequences of that action. For this reason those who are in any case opposed to utilitarianism may be less disposed to question the principle.

Critics of the principle tend to focus on two of its features. The first of these is the distinction between intended acts and acts that are merely foreseen (the side-effect), i.e. the difference between direct and oblique intention. It is argued, for example, that it is impossible to foresee a consequence of an intended act and not at the same time to intend that consequence, for it is an inseparable effect of the central act, and the agent knows this.

The second feature to which critics pay attention is the view that a person is not necessarily responsible for an effect of his action which he foresees but does not intend. While there are clear cases of such responsibility, these cases may depend upon a particular causal relationship between the action and its unintended effect.

The principle has been frequently invoked by Roman Catholic and other moralists in the context of the debate about abortion.* It is argued that a surgeon whose only recourse, in order to save the life of an expectant mother, is to perform an operation which he knows will result in the death of the foetus, is not performing an abortion if, in doing so, he does not intend the death.

There appears to be no clear teaching or example in Scripture which would settle the moral status of the principle of double effect decisively. But in so far as Scripture does not adopt a utilitarian ethic, its teaching may be said not to rule out an application of the principle in certain cases.

See also: ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE.†

Bibliography

F.J. Connell, NCE 4, pp. 1020-1022; P. Foot, Virtues and Vices and Other Essays in Moral Philosophy (Oxford, 1978); J. Glover, Causing Death and Saving Lives (Harmondsworth, 1977).

P.H.

DREAMS. There are over 130 references to dreams in the Bible and almost 100 to visions, the bulk of them in the OT. This reflects the interest expressed in this subject in the ancient Near East.

The Heb. verb for dream is halam, and like its Aram. counterpart it means 'to be healthy or strong'. The verb used for seeing a vision, a parallel experience to dreaming, is haza and implies the ability to perceive with the inner eye. It is a word closely related to the term 'seer' (hoseh). The LXX and NT words for dream are onar, which refers to visions in sleep (cf. Mt. 1:20; 2:12; 27:19), and enypiazomai which indicates having visions in dreams (Joel 2:28 [LXX 3:1]; Acts 2:17; Jude 8). There is also a range of words for 'vision', all implying an ability to see, which are often used of dream messages as well: horama, whether asleep or awake (Acts 10:3); horasis (Acts 2:17; Rev. 9:17); optasia (Lk. 1:22; 24:23; 2 Cor. 12:1). Dreams and visions are brought close together by such expressions as 'vision of the night' (Gn. 46:2; Jb. 20:8; Is. 29:7) and 'visions of the head' (Dn. 2:28; 4:5; 10:14). It would appear that whereas dreams are generally the work and creation of the dreamer exploring his or her recent experiences, the vision is given directly by God and its content comes with authority and demands a response. It is clear from the Bible that God does communicate through dreams for a number of purposes.

According to Jb. 33:14-18 God uses dreams in various ways: 1. warnings: 'he may speak in their ears and terrify them with warnings' (33:16); 2. guidance: 'to turn man from wrongdoing' (33:17a); 3. discipline: 'and keep him from pride' (33:17b); and 4. deliverance: 'to preserve his soul from the pit, his life from perishing by the sword' (33:18).

Ability to understand dreams was regarded as evidence of God's favour and blessing (e.g. Gn. 41:16, 39). Understanding of dreams was regarded as a resource for spiritual wisdom* (Dn. 1:17), and it was in a dream that Solomon gained his extraordinary wisdom (1 Ki. 3:10-15). Knowledge of dreams was thought to give access to the word of God and this is principally demonstrated in the ability to prophesy.

The prophet was respectfully called a dreamer (Dt. 13:1-5) and dream messages are subjected to the same criteria as prophetic utterance. Jeremiah indicts the prophets of his day for claiming that their dreams came from God when in fact they were their own creations (Je. 23:25, 27). Though Nu. 12:6ff. compares how God speaks directly to Moses and via dreams to others, this in no way invalidates the dream as a means of revelation. Herman Riffel suggests that dreams in this context function like parables which contain picture clues to God's word (Voice of God, Wheaton, IL, 1978, pp. 73-74). The fact that dreams were acceptable as a vehicle for prophecy is tragically portrayed in the life of Saul who, on the eve of his last battle, finds that there is no word from God 'by dreams or Urim or prophets' (1 Sa. 28:6).

There are a number of examples of God speaking directly through dreams; the catalogues surrounding the nativity story are a case in point (Mt. 1:20; 2:12-13, 19, 22). In three of these accounts the term 'angel of the Lord' is used to convey the idea of direct encounter with the divine presence. Dreams are also used to bring the guidance of God whether directly or otherwise. Gideon received his final instalment of courage when he overheard a Midianite sentry share his dream of impending doom from the armies of Israel; he in fact based his use of fire and noise directly upon the symbols contained in the sentry's dream (Jdg. 7:13-21). We may conclude that the Bible, far from marginalizing the usefulness of dreams, in fact endorses them as a means to personal wholeness and a vehicle of divine guidance.

Dreams have been reappraised in 20th century research both from a functional and a psychotherapeutic standpoint. Nathaniel Kleitman has pinpointed dreaming to the rapid eye-movement phase of sleep (REM) when most dreamers can recall their dreams in greater detail, and William Dement has demonstrated that without REM sleep there is considerable dysfunction within the person's behaviour.

There have been many theories as to why we dream. Freud* pioneered the way with his theory of wish-fulfilment whereby we disguise our true feelings behind dream symbols. Calvin S. Hall (1909-) has argued that dreams are a basic letter written to ourselves giving comment upon how we view our recent circumstances. He suggested that dreams followed up thoughts and convictions in waking life upon which we had not properly acted. If it is true that we write our own dreams, then we must look at the whole issue of nightmares and disturbing dreams. On the whole such dreams are about unfinished material in our lives, either recent or related to unhealed memories which we are not yet ready to work through, and this explains why the nightmare is abruptly terminated before it concludes.

There is no absolute method of interpreting dreams, and we must be careful not to impose our own interpretation upon another's dream. A helpful approach to working with a dream could be: 1. write down the dream; 2. share it with a friend but be careful to tell it in the present tense; 3. make a special note of any extra details which occur in addition to the original remembering; 4. write down any particular feeling words which strike you; 5. see if there are any related events or memories which correspond to these feeling words; 6. make a note of any insights or thoughts you have gained from this; 7. determine what action you wish to take in the light of what you have learned; and 8. commit this action to prayer.

Bibliography

R. Parker, Dreams and Spirituality (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1985); idem, Healing Dreams (London, 1988).

R.E.P.

DRUG ABUSE, see DRUGS.

DRUGS. Many people have a simplistic and inaccurate view of what is appropriate drug use and what constitutes misuse. In part, this is because 'drug' is defined by them only as a harmful, dangerous, addictive or illegal substance. However, the World Health Organization (WHO, 1966) has defined a drug as 'any substance or product that is used or intended to be used to modify or explore physiological systems or pathological states for the benefit of the recipient'. Under this wider and more comprehensive definition, not only are illicit drugs included, but so also are medicines, solvents and other volatile chemicals (e.g. as used in 'glue-sniffing'), alcohol (see Alcoholism*), tobacco, and beverages such as coffee and tea which contain caffeine and related substances.

It is appropriate that Christians are concerned about the misuse of illicit drugs, and they will want to support government action to warn of the health risks of opiates, and to endorse the action of the Customs in seeking to reduce illicit drug imports. Yet, it should be recognized that numerically the problem of non-illicit drug misuse is far greater than illicit drug use and, inconsistently, may be indulged in by those who are most vocal in their opposition to illicit drug use. In 1985 the UK population was sedated or tranquillized by more than 39 million prescriptions for psychoactive drugs (i.e. substances that alter the emotions or mental state) whereas in the same year there were only 26,596 convictions or cautions for offences under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. At the same time there was an annual toll of an estimated 100,000 premature deaths due to tobacco smoking and over 200,000 convictions for drunkenness and drunk driving offences. In an average Health District in the UK there are some 22,000 alcohol misusers (750,000 in the UK) and nationally some 16,000 hospital admissions each year for alcohol dependence. It has been estimated that in 1986 the total cost of alcohol misuse in England and Wales was £1,908m. This cost was offset, though not morally justified, by the £5,700m that the UK government received from excise duty and value added tax (VAT) levied on alcohol.

Drug-use statistics are also grim in the US. For 1985, 317,144 deaths were attributed to smoking. For 1989, there were 164,912 alcohol-related deaths and 374,437 alcoholics in treatment. Total annual loss to the economy related to alcohol abuse is estimated at 85.8 billion dollars.

Contrary to popular misconception, most drug misusers are not young people with a criminal record; they are middle-aged and elderly 'respectable' citizens. Consequently, there are few individuals who do not have one or more drug misusers in their immediate circle of family and friends, and, equally, drug misuse will be observed at work and in church life.

Drug use and misuse

Drugs may be prescribed by a physician or selfadministered with a variety of intents, including the following: 1. to correct abnormalities, so that disease may be cured (e.g. the use of antibiotics to treat infection); 2. to relieve or suppress symptoms caused by disease which may or may not itself be curable currently (e.g. in the treatment of rheumatoid arthritis); 3. to relieve anxiety or mental distress caused by disease whether directly (e.g. depression) or indirectly (e.g. arising from the implications of a poor prognosis); 4. to prevent the onset of a disease that may be anticipated (e.g. the use of anti-malarials in an area where malaria is known to be endemic); 5. to interfere with normal physiological functions (e.g. to prevent pregnancy or to induce an abortion after conception); 6. for convenience (e.g. to delay menstruation and so permit swimming during a holiday; to lessen the harmful effects of sunbathing; to avoid a sleepless night in a noisy hotel); 7. as a prop to help an individual cope with life (e.g. 'pills for personal problems', such as psychoactive drugs, alcohol and tobacco); 8. as a substitute for self-control (e.g. drugs to control the appetite for food, nicotine or alcohol); 9. to produce a state of intoxication, to get 'high' with friends, to relax, to relieve 'pressure', to give ease in conversation, to give increased enjoyment while listening to music or dancing, to obtain temporary removal of inhibitions or to produce increased activity; 10. with intent to harm (e.g. the intentional administration of a drug by an individual either to himself or herself, i.e. suicide, or to another, i.e. murder); 11. to attempt to manipulate difficult and stressful personal and social circumstances by taking a drug overdose (para-suicide); and 12. to enhance performance either in sport or sexually. Some of these uses are appropriate both in a therapeutic sense and from a Christian perspective, but many suggest drug misuse and dependence.*

Regarding the sound, medical use of drugs, Duncan W. Vere (1971) has written that a doctor 'should, in general, offer treatment only when he has a precise diagnosis ... he will want the diagnosis to comprise physical, mental and spiritual aspects. He can then direct his drugs, if they are needed, like bullets towards defined targets. These targets will be: (a) to restore towards normality, for that person, physical and mental function so as (b) to permit, but not influence, the emergence and relief of his spiritual problems.' Whilst the drugs administered will not solve the patient's spiritual problems, there is no hope of meeting those problems so long as body and mind do not function so as to permit them to be expressed. For a Christian perspective, 'the aim is to subdue mental disorder so that a man's real self, and its spiritual problems, can emerge'. Treatments which 'cultivate false attitudes to life', such as assisting the patient to evade problems, will be avoided in the interests of a healing which encompasses body, mind and spirit. (See 'Psychopharmacology and Moral Responsibility', ISM 67, 1971, pp. 8-15.)

Results of drug misuse

The misuse of drugs may have various harmful consequences, including the following:

1. Actual harm to the individual. Drug misuse may lead to damaged physical or mental health, as is the case with the alcohol abuser who develops liver and neuropsychiatric damage, or the smoker who develops lung cancer. Ultimately, drug misuse may impair that person's social functioning, resulting in an inability to get or hold down a job, or to find a place to live, and thus maybe leading to crime, such as theft and prostitution, in order to finance the habit.

2. Potential harm to the individual. Even if overt harm does not occur, the user's health or social well-being is put at risk. When under the influence of a hallucinogenic drug (e.g. LSD) the risk of actual self-harm is great.

3. Actual or potential harm to others. Passive cigarette smoking is now known sometimes to result in harm similar to that experienced by those who actively smoke. An individual who is intoxicated with drugs and who assaults another person has misused drugs as much as a person who kills himself or herself (deliberately or accidentally) while in the same intoxicated condition. In addition, the tensions resulting from drug misuse may lead to the break-up of relationships and estrangement from families and friends.

4. Harm to the interests of the community or State. Drug misuse may render the misusers incapable of themselves contributing to the public purse, so increasing the financial burden on the rest of society. The cost of the medical treatment of these misusers then further consumes public resources. Moreover, as drug misuse may lead to criminal activity, this will also impinge on society, which must then bear the additional costs of law enforcement.

Use and misuse of psychoactive drugs

Although in certain circumstances (e.g. treatment of depression* and schizophrenia) it is appropriate for doctors to prescribe psychoactive drugs and for patients to take them, an increasing proportion of the population enjoying good physical health is now demanding that such drugs are prescribed for them on a long-term basis in the belief that they will help individuals come to terms with themselves and their environment. In addition, approximately 100,000 patients are admitted each year to hospitals in England and Wales as a result of a self-poisoning* episode, and many of these patients have ingested a psychoactive drug. The majority are not attempting suicide* but are indulging in a conscious, impulsive, manipulative act undertaken to secure redress of an intolerable situation which, for the particular individual in question, cannot be or has not been relieved by more rational means. Yet such problems are incurable by drug therapy alone.

Should 'soft' and 'hard' drugs be available legally?

The widespread use of 'soft' drugs raises the question whether or not such mind-altering agents should be more freely available. In addition, there are those who advocate that even 'hard' drugs should be decriminalized and be made freely available. Fundamentally, this is a matter of whether or not an individual has real freedom to do what he wants. In our society at present, freedom is rightly constrained in many ways both to protect the individual from unacceptable risk (e.g. heroin misuse) and to benefit the community (e.g. payment of taxes). Society, through the various agencies to which it delegates responsibility, decides the constraints on this freedom and imposes them by legislation. Some would argue that because many smoke 'pot' (cannabis) in spite of current legislation, the law should be relaxed. This does not, however, follow. Mass law-breaking (e.g. petty thieving, exceeding the speed limit and tax evasion) is in itself no good reason for changing the law. If 'pot' smoking was completely harmless to the individual and society, then the law would be unjust and unreasonable. However, any drug that is capable of producing a pleasurable state of mind is subject to considerable use, and therefore misuse, with resulting psychological and physical effects. Society has to decide whether the individual and collective benefits outweigh the risk. Many believe they do not.

Biblical perspectives

There are no explicit biblical statements regarding the use of drugs, other than alcohol. Alcohol was frequently consumed with meals in the ancient world, though often in diluted form, which may have had the additional advantage of making the water safer (and more palatable) to drink. There were occasions in the OT when the provision of wine was considered a sign of blessing and a source of joy (Ps. 104:15), and times when abstinence was practised as a discipline (Lv. 10:8-9). It was recognized that alcohol imbibing could lead to immodest behaviour (Gn. 9:21), anger (Is. 5:11) and a befuddled mind (Is. 28:7). In the NT we read that Jesus himself drank wine, and on one occasion miraculously produced more than 100 gallons of quality wine (Jn. 2:1-11). However, misuse is linked to sexual immorality (Eph. 5:18) and to weaker Christians being offended or harmed (Rom. 14:21). Church leaders were warned against drinking excessively, as this could make them unfit for their divine task (1 Tim. 3:8; Tit. 2:3).

Wine was also used for medicinal purposes, particularly when mixed with spices or oil. Wine and oil were used by the good Samaritan to dress the wounds of the beaten man (Lk. 10:34), and Timothy was advised to take alcohol to help his digestion (1 Tim. 5:23).

God is the author and giver of life and has given us our bodies; we are answerable to him in our use of them. Those who misuse drugs are often questioning the nature of reality, the true nature of humanity and the existence of an objective moral order. Many are unable to cope with guilt,* and lack the power to discontinue drug misuse even if they appreciate its inherent dangers. Pastorally, individuals who have suffered through drug misuse may need to be shown that God gives them worth (see Selfesteem*) and that they are of such value that Christ died for them. They will need to be helped to reorder their lives in the light of God's purposes for humanity - which are for the good both of individuals and of society. Such a realization can lead to a new understanding of truth, reality and forgiveness. This can open the way to spiritual factors in dealing with the problem of drug misuse. To point individuals towards harnessing the spiritual resources of grace* is ultimately more important than simply offering social support and advice, let alone condemnation.

J.A.V.

DRUGS, TESTING OF, see HUMAN DEVELOPMENT; RIGHTS, ANIMAL.

DUALISM. Ethical dualism should be distinguished from other dualisms, i.e. between mind and body, God and Satan, or time and eternity. While ethical dualism is sometimes related to these or similar dualities, it holds that good and evil are both eternal, grounded in the contrasting natures of two opposing realities.

A tendency to regard matter as evil, and reason or spirit as good, appeared in a variety of forms during the first five centuries of the church, and has occasionally recurred since. Plato's* depreciation of the body contributed, along with his assertion that matter was originally chaotic and the suggestion in his Laws that, in addition to the Demiurge who fashioned everything rationally for good, there may be another world soul, the Dyad, whose folly causes wild and irregular behaviour of physical things. Gnosticism developed this theme with the help of Eastern ideas so that a heavenly spirit, acting independently of the good God, formed the material world and trapped human spirits in material bodies. The moral life must therefore be one of asceticism,* denying the body and its desires. The classic form of dualism was in the 4th- and 5th-century Manichaeism, with its realms of light and darkness in eternal conflict with each other. Humans have two living souls, one rational, a fragment of light that came from the good God, and the other irrational, springing from the intercourse of demons in the kingdom of darkness. Matter is evil, a foul and misshapen mass devoid of reason or form, while spirit or reason is good. Bodily desires should therefore be denied; yet the common tendency according to Augustine* was to abandon that relentless struggle and give in to bodily indulgence.

Augustine was attracted to the Manichaeans before his conversion, but became disillusioned and later wrote extensively against them. He recognized that dualism undermined the positive implications of the doctrine of creation,* especially the eventual triumph of good and all hope for the future. Gnosticism had led to a denial of the incarnation, for if matter is evil then an incarnate God would have become evil: that would be impossible. Augustine, on the other hand, argued that the darkness was either made by God or not made by him. If made by God, then it is good and not evil. If made by another, then there are two eternal camps; we are but pawns in their battle and have no real will of our own. The moral life then becomes an empty charade.

The OT, on the other hand, displays a positive appreciation of the goodness of the physical creation with its worlds of sight and sound, food, drink and sex; it celebrates them as good gifts of God, while recognizing our sinful abuse of God's goodness. The NT explicitly rejects dualism. Paul's letter to the Colossians is the outstanding case, for the 'Colossian heresy' which he denounces apparently questioned the divine creation of earthly things and advocated a stringent asceticism. Paul therefore starts by praying that the Colossian Christians will gain the wisdom and strength they need, having already been delivered from the kingdom of darkness and transferred to the kingdom of God's Son (Col. 1:9-14). The Son is then presented as creator, sustainer and Lord of everything in heaven and on earth (Col. 1:15-19). The contrast with the tradition which is troubling Colosse becomes plain: selfabasement before supposed spirits and an ascetic denial of the body are useless in checking sinful desires. It is the living Christ who empowers the moral life (Col. 2:8 - 3:17).

Elsewhere similar themes emerge. Responding to advocates of asceticism and celibacy (see Singleness*), Paul affirms the goodness and acceptability of everything God created (1 Tim. 4:3-4). John's first epistle warns against those who deny the reality of Christ's incarnation. The epistle therefore begins by affirming that the eternal Son has been 'seen with our eyes ... and our hands have touched' him (1 Jn. 1:1-3). He must really have come in the flesh. Fellowship with the Father and Son requires keeping his commandments, as summed up in Christ's command to love as he loved us, rather than indulging 'the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life' (1 Jn. 2:7-16, AV).

Both Paul and John speak of light and darkness, of spirit and flesh; it reads like the language of dualism, yet, in the context of the above passages which plainly reject dualism, the language is converted to a distinctively Christian use. 'Darkness' and 'flesh' sometimes still connote evil, but not in the sense of another eternal realm of being. Rather, they speak of sin ('sinful man', NIV) that transgresses against God's law and the kind of love he enjoins, an evil that perverts the good but which Christ has overcome. 'Light' and 'spirit' connote the good by which we should live. But 'spirit' is not the power of reason over against 'flesh' or body. God created the body, and it is his good gift of life to be received, enjoyed and employed out of love for him and our neighbours. Nor is human spirit inherently good, for sinfulness extends into every area of the person. It too needs to be enlightened and renewed in loving fellowship with God and his people.

Bibliography

R. M. Grant, Gnosticism and Early Christianity (New York, 1966); G. Quispell, ER 5, pp. 566-574.

A.F.H.

DURESS as a word is derived from the Lat. duritia, meaning hardness or harsh treatment. In law, the word used is 'durance', implying forced confinement, imprisonment or constraint. Duress is thus constraint illegally exercised to force a person to do something. A person is said to be 'under duress' when he or she is acting not voluntarily but by constraint imposed by force.

There are a number of examples in Scripture of persons acting under duress. The Jews rebuilding Jerusalem after their return from exile in Babylon were 'compelled ... by force to stop' (Ezr. 4:23). The apostle Paul was 'compelled to appeal' to Caesar because he would not have received a fair trial in Jerusalem (Acts 28:19). He himself, before his conversion, was prepared to sanction the use of force against Christians (Acts 26:11).

Though resorting to duress is not explicitly forbidden to Christians, there are a number of indications that clearly rule it out. Conversion* is to result from persuasion (Acts 18:4), not brainwashing.* Discipleship is to be freely and voluntarily embraced (Mt. 16:24). Giving is to be done willingly out of gratitude for God's grace, not under psychological pressure, for God loves cheerful givers (2 Cor. 9:5, 7).

In Eng. law, an act of duress is the commission of, or a threat to commit, a wrong. A wrongful act may include a threatened breach of contract, breach of trust, breach of statutory duty, a tort (e.g. inviting another to breach his or her contract) or a crime (e.g. blackmail). Therefore, actual or threatened violence to the person constitutes duress. This is generally directed against the plaintiff, but can also be employed against one's spouse or child as well as other relatives. Any deed, contract or transaction entered into under duress of this kind is voidable by the person concerned. Duress to the person constitutes both a crime and a tort, in which case the plaintiff will have other remedies for the recovery of things entered into under duress. So, in law, duress is the compulsion under which a person acts through fear of personal suffering, as from injury to the body or from confinement, actual or threatened.

The proper use of the legal process does not constitute duress. Everyone is free to invoke the aid of the law in a proper case: civil and criminal cases properly filed do not constitute duress. For example, a threat to commence bankruptcy proceedings, made in good faith, does not amount to duress, nor does a bona-fide threat to institute criminal proceedings. This rule also applies to lawful arrest, imprisonment and the threat thereof. In each of these cases, the aid of the law is being invoked to bring pressure to bear on a person; provided the proceedings are regular, lawful and invoked in good faith, and not abused or calculated to cause error, then duress cannot be said to be exercised on the person against whom they have been brought.

However, where pressure has been brought to bear by the improper application of a legal process, this does amount to duress. The coerced party is not in pari delicto, i.e. it acted under duress (R. Goff and G. Jones, The Law of Restitution, London, ²1978, pp. 163-164). The effect of duress upon a marriage is the same as upon a contract, i.e. it renders it not voidable but void, for the right to a free choice of a partner is axiomatic. That is why, as in a contract, if there is no consent but one partner has acted under duress, the marriage is void (J. Jackson, The Formation and Annulment of Marriage, London, ²1969, pp. 282-289). If, therefore, owing to fear or threat, one of the parties is induced to enter into that which, in the absence of compulsion, he would never have contracted, the marriage will be void (P. M. Bromley and N. V. Lowe, Bromley's Family Law, London, ⁷1987, pp. 89-92).

Under criminal law, duress provides a defence to a charge of any offence other than murder and some forms of treason (Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. II (i), London, ⁴1990, p. 32, para. 24). Duress is regarded as a defence because it postulates the existence of threats of imminent death or serious personal violence so great as to overbear the ordinary power of human resistance to the doing of acts which would otherwise be criminal (e.g. as in a threat made by the accused to a woman living with him as his wife). A threat of such harm to another may suffice as a defence, but a threat to property is not sufficient to constitute a defence of duress. The defence is available only where the threat was operative and effective at the time of the act or omission alleged to constitute the offence.

The test of duress is not purely subjective but includes the objective test of whether a sober man (or woman) of reasonable firmness, having the accused's character, would have responded to whatever he reasonably believed was said or done by the other person taking part in the crime. Did that person voluntarily put himself under the duress of another, or could he have voluntarily withdrawn? Did he place himself under dominance of another? (Halsbury's Laws of England, ibid.)

J.M.S.

DURKHEIM, EMILE (1858-1917). Born in Epinal in north-eastern France into a Jewish rabbinical family, and early recognized as a promising scholar, Durkheim studied at the elite Ecole Normale Supérieure in Paris, where he received his doctorate of philosophy. His initial teaching position was at Bordeaux in 1887 where he established his first sociology class. In 1902 he took a position at the Sorbonne in Paris, where he taught philosophy and sociology until his death. His writing included over 500 articles on subjects ranging from social change and sociological method to the sociologies of religion* and knowledge plus several books of continuing influence. Together with Karl Marx* and Max Weber (1864-1920), Durkheim is acknowledged as a key figure in classical sociological thought, and as the one who established both the methodology and theoretical bases for early sociology as an intellectual field.

Influenced by the French intellectual thought of Henri de Saint-Simon (1760-1825) and Auguste Comte (1798-1857), as well as by British utilitarianism (see Consequentialism*) and German idealism, Durkheim developed a sociology that was both eclectic and reductionistic.* He espoused the existence of irreducible social facts and the existence of society as a sui generis reality. He believed that shared values and beliefs form a collective consciousness which supersedes individual consciousness and which socializes persons into society by proscribing their actions. Historically, social cohesion evolves from the mechanical, unifying solidarity of simple societies to an organic, diversifying solidarity resulting from the increasing division of labour in complex societies (cf. The Division of Labor in Society).

In his famous work Suicide, Durkheim refined his ideas on anomie, a societal condition resulting from the inadequate integrative power of socially approved norms. Such norms operate differently among groups - Protestants versus Roman Catholics or singles versus marrieds. Then in The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life, Durkheim built on his familiarity with the Australian Arunta to argue that religion performs an essential integrative function for society by binding its members together. Society is god-like, and its members elevate to sacred significance the previously profane beliefs, rituals and totemic representations that have united them. Thus, in adhering to its beliefs and rituals, a society worships itself - an idea that has greatly influenced modern thinking about civil religions and their functions.

Bibliography

The Division of Labor in Society (ET, New York, 1933; Basingstoke, 1984); The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life (ET, London and New York, 1915); The Rules of Sociological Method (ET, Chicago, 1938; ⁸1964); Suicide: A Study in Sociology (ET, Glencoe, IL, 1951; London, 1952, ²1976). S. G. Mestrovic, Emile Durkheim and the Reformation of Sociology (Totowa, NJ, 1988); W. S. F. Pickering, Durkheim's Sociology of Religion: Themes and Theories (London, 1984).

J.A.M.

DUTY. The concept of duty in its most important modern sense, that given it by Immanuel Kant,* plays little role in the biblical writings. The Stoics* are often considered the first philosophers to make duty a central moral concept, and Stoic conceptions of duty (what is fitting because in accord with nature) may have influenced the apostle Paul. Philosophers have sometimes distinguished between duty and obligation* - understanding duties as arising out of our station or role in life, and obligations as arising out of relations (e.g. contracts) into which we have voluntarily entered. This sort of distinction is unknown in the Bible; however, whereas moderns have found obligations easier to accept and understand than duties, biblical thought takes seriously duties that are not simply obligations (that are not the result of our own promises or contractual agreements). Thus, the duty of children to honour and obey their parents is affirmed in the Bible, even though no child has voluntarily undertaken such a duty from birth. Instead, the duty is understood to be embedded within a certain role. More fundamentally still, the duty to honour and obey God is assumed in the Bible, but it is not thought to depend for its binding quality on our own assent of will; the author of our being is presumed to have authority over us. Our ordinary sense of particular duties and obligations as actions we are obligated to undertake is present in the Bible, though without any systematic theoretical development. Biblical writers have a concept of 'owing' something to someone, or 'being indebted' to someone (the word group opheilo). The best known is probably the image of 'indebtedness' used in the Lord's Prayer (Mt. 6:12).

Because duties are grounded in our roles and relations (whether voluntarily undertaken or not), and because we may stand in a variety of roles at one time, duties may sometimes seem to conflict. Since W. D. Ross's (1877-1940) The Right and the Good, philosophers have used the language of 'prima facie duties' to describe these various, possibly conflicting, claims upon us. Little agreement exists about how we ought to decide what our actual obligation is when prima facie duties conflict. The Bible offers no hierarchy of duties to help us decide - except the assumption that duty to God is overriding (Acts 5:29) and that otherregard should take priority over self-regard (Mt. 5:38-42). The Christian life is, finally, less dedicated to drawing up a hierarchical code to solve conflicts of duties than to creating sanctified and virtuous people who will begin to have the capacity to discern what ought to be done when duties conflict or when there is no action possible that clearly recommends itself as our duty. Thus, Martin Luther* could view the place of 'works' in the Christian life as similar to that which 'models and plans have among builders and artisans. They are prepared not as a permanent structure, but because without them nothing could be built or made. When the structure is complete the models and plans are laid aside. You see, they are not despised, rather they are greatly sought after; but what we despise is the false estimate of them since no one holds them to be the real and permanent structure' (Luther, 'The Freedom of a Christian', Luther's Works, vol. 31 [ET, Philadelphia, 1957], pp. 375-376). Hence, although it is surely better to act in accord with duty than to fall short of what ought to be done, for Christians duty is not the centre of the moral life. In relation to God, fulfillment of one's duty gives one no claim (Lk. 17:10). And in relation to others, duty is finally transcended in love (see †), as the pun in Rom. 13:8 indicates: 'Let no debt remain outstanding, except the continuing debt to love one another, for he who loves his fellow-man has fulfilled the law.'

In his Foundations of the Metaphysics of Morals, Kant developed a very distinctive and influential theory that treats duty as the central concept of morality (see Christian Moral Reasoning†). For Kant 'duty' refers not so much to particular actions we are obligated to undertake as to the one morally acceptable motive for action. His programmatic statement is justly famous: 'Nothing in the world - indeed nothing even beyond the world - can possibly be conceived which could be called good without qualification except a good will' (p. 9). The good will* is good precisely in that it has no motive for acting other than respect for moral law. That is, to act from duty is not simply to do what we are inclined to do. It is not merely to aim at a worthwhile result, nor does the goodness of action depend in any way on whether a desirable result is attained. Moral goodness resides only in that 'principle of will' which acts from respect for law. This means that we act not simply in accord with the moral law but for the sake of the law. Only such action springs from the motive of duty.

Kant also has a concept of a holy will - a perfectly good will that would never experience any inclination contrary to the moral law's dictates. Such a will could feel no constraint in the face of duty, and Kant holds that it is inappropriate to apply 'ought' language to it. 'Thus, no imperatives hold for the divine will or, more generally, for a holy will. The "ought" is here out of place, for the volition of itself is necessarily in unison with the law' (p. 31). Hence, to act from duty seems to imply that one acts while also feeling the pull of contrary inclinations.

We can understand such a claim. There are, for example, some activities - e.g. eating and drinking for nourishment - which are right to do and which we would not ordinarily term duties (because we have no inclination to do otherwise). Nevertheless, to delimit the moral sphere in terms of duty as Kant does can be unduly restrictive. Quite different is a theory like Aristotle's,* which makes moral growth and development in virtue central. For Aristotle our aim ought to be virtue: a state in which we habitually and effortlessly do as we ought, not a state in which we are constantly torn by contrary inclinations. Similarly, a Christian emphasis on growth in righteousness* - while recognizing the continued presence of sin in human life - may be less inclined to make the experience of contrary inclination a test for the presence of the good will. Moreover, Christian emphasis upon virtues such as love has been intended to encourage spontaneity and wholeheartedness in desiring what is good. But to act because one is moved by a spirit of love is not the same as acting from respect for the moral law - and, according to Kant's programmatic statement, must therefore manifest something other than the good will. Kant recognizes that some may 'find an inner satisfaction in spreading joy, and rejoice in the contentment of others ... But I say that, however dutiful [i.e. in accord with the moral law] and amiable it may be, that kind of action has no true moral worth' (p. 14), since the agent is moved to act by love and not by respect for the moral law.

This makes clear that, for Kant, even a motive of obedience* to God taints the moral quality of action. He is clear that morality cannot consist in obedience to God's commands. Such heteronomous action would undercut the autonomous human being who, out of respect for the moral law, prescribes for himself maxims to direct his action. 'Even the Holy One of the Gospel must be compared with our ideal of moral perfection before He is recognized as such ...' (p. 25). Human beings can act from respect for the moral law without losing their autonomy only because such action is grounded in reason, which always prescribes the law universally (for all rational beings). The moral agent does not bow to the commands of God; instead, in respecting the moral law, he or she legislates for all people in similar circumstances, i.e. legislates in a godlike manner.

This emphasis on universality will leave little space for a part of morality that is permitted rather than required, a realm in which love discerns what law cannot command. It will leave no place for a supererogatory deed (i.e. an act which is praiseworthy if done but not blameworthy if left undone). And it will have difficulty with the moral 'ought' one might use to characterize a special calling - as when the monk says, 'Although marriage is good, I ought to follow the life of celibacy to which God has called me.' Nor can this emphasis on universality make place for Søren Kierkegaard's* 'teleological suspension of the ethical' in which, having teleologically suspended the universal, one simply loves each neighbour in his or her particularity.

The Kantian concept of duty has been and continues to be an extremely powerful depiction of much that is deeply embedded in our understanding of the moral life. For Christian thought, however, the good will that acts solely out of respect for the moral law is finally to be transcended. If such holiness cannot be achieved entirely in this life, it is nevertheless the aim even here and now. The good will depicted by Kant is to be transcended and duty is to become delight.

Bibliography

I. Kant, The Foundations of the Metaphysics of Morals (ET, Indianapolis, IN, 1959); S. Kierkegaard, Fear and Trembling with The Sickness Unto Death (ET, Princeton, NJ, 1954); G. Meilaender, The Theory and Practice of Virtue (Notre Dame, IN, 1984); W. D. Ross, The Right and the Good (Oxford, 1930).

G.C.M.

DYING, see DEATH AND DYING.

DYNAMIC CYCLE, THE, is a central concept in clinical theology.* Dr Frank Lake* suggested that any true understanding of personhood (see Human Development*) is based on the relationship between God the Father and Jesus the Son. Jesus receives from his Father acceptance (Jn. 3:17) and sustenance (Jn. 14:11), which enables Jesus to have a sense of well-being marked by status (Jn. 1:14) and achievement (Jn. 4:34). As Jesus brings others into relationship with God the Father they experience this cycle of well-being. Lake's 'object-relations' background suggested that these categories evidenced in the adult life of Jesus were present in his infant life. Jesus therefore gives us a model for the healthy development of personhood, and any interruption in this cycle of acceptance, sustenance, status and achievement could result in poor physical, psychological or spiritual health.

The dynamic cycle has a number of weaknesses. 1. It is theologically questionable whether one can establish a retrospective psychological understanding of Jesus. 2. There is little theological co-relation between the dynamic cycle and the death of Christ, another central concept in Lake's work. 3. At times Lake's forcing of complex psychological problems into the cycle destroys its simplicity.

One of the dynamic cycle's strengths is its creative and pioneering attempt at relating psychoanalytic* and psychiatric theory to theology, thus becoming a vital catalyst in this theologically neglected area. Another is that its cyclical nature and simplicity have found considerable application in pastoral counselling in the church in Britain.

See also: PASTORAL CARE, COUNSELLING AND PSYCHOTHERAPY.†

Bibliography

C. Christian, In the Spirit of Truth: A Reader in the Work of Frank Lake (London, 1991); P. J. van de Kastele, The Dynamic Cycle, unpublished lecture available from the Clinical Theology Association (Oxford, 1986).

J.A.R.

E

EATING DISORDERS. 'Anorexia nervosa' and 'bulimia nervosa' are defined as disordered patterns of eating. Anorexia is characterized by startling weight loss, bulimia by recurrent eating binges and vomiting. They are commonly discussed as if they were separate and unrelated conditions. However, they are more usefully understood as two distinctive ways of expressing distress, sharing a common central feature - fear of fatness. Individuals often suffer from symptoms of both disorders, women being affected ten times as often as men.

1. Anorexia

Anorexia most often starts in the teenage years while the sufferer is still living at home, one fifteen-year-old girl in every 150 being affected. Girls from professional or managerial families are more at risk than girls from working-class backgrounds.

The symptoms are: under-eating/starvation; loss of weight to more than 15% below normal limits; fear of fatness, even when underweight; a self-perception of being fat, even when thin; absence of three or more consecutive menstrual periods; and vigorous exercising.

Anorexia typically starts with the everyday dieting that is so much a part of teenage life. However, the dieting and the loss of weight do not stop, but continue until the sufferer is well below the normal limit for her age and height. Paradoxically, sufferers with anorexia often take an avid interest in shopping and cooking for others. With time, the symptoms of bulimia may also appear.

2. Bulimia

This condition usually affects a slightly older age group, often women in their early to midtwenties who have been overweight as children. Three out of every 100 women will be affected at some time in their lives.

The symptoms are: fear of fatness, even when weight is within normal limits; recurrent episodes of binge-eating; regular vomiting and/or excessive use of laxatives; normal weight; and menstrual irregularity.

Like anorexics, bulimics diet assiduously. Unlike anorexics, their weight usually stays within normal limits. The calories lost by dieting, vomiting or taking laxatives are made up for by the food eaten during 'binges', i.e. episodes of massive, uncontrollable eating, usually followed by vomiting. The self-disgust after a binge provokes further excessive dieting, resulting in further binges.

3. Physical consequences

Starvation leads to broken sleep and constipation, accompanied by the growth of fine hair all over the body. Concentration becomes impaired, and muscle-wasting makes ordinary activities progressively more difficult. Bones become brittle and more likely to fracture.

Vomiting causes the enlargement of the salivary glands, which produces a puffy facial appearance, and tooth enamel is dissolved. Although some sufferers can vomit at will, others need to stick their fingers down their throat, and they thus develop callouses on their knuckles. Loss of potassium in the vomit may produce heart problems, muscle weakness, kidney damage and epileptic fits.

Laxative abuse may cause persistent abdominal pain, swelling of the fingers and longterm constipation.

4. Causes

A whole range of emotionally distressing circumstances can cause anorexia or bulimia. For around 50% of sufferers, their disorder seems to have been triggered by a distressing event or major change, such as leaving home or getting married. It has been suggested that a failure to mourn, and particularly guilt over an abortion, may have a specific role in precipitating anorexia. However, no hard evidence has yet emerged to suggest that this is any more significant than other painful experiences.

Emotional distress may be expressed by disturbances of eating for a variety of reasons:

1. Western culture places a high value on appearance and particularly on being thin. Around 30% of fifteen-year-old girls diet, and those who do diet are eight times more likely to develop an eating disorder. It is easy to see how this social pressure can provoke the dieting that may tip over into anorexia, or provoke the see-sawing of bulimia. In societies where plumpness rather than thinness is culturally valued, eating disorders are rare.
2. Dieting can be a very comforting activity because it is a concrete, if limited, way of exercising control over one's world. This can be an extremely important issue for girls in their teens, still living at home, who may often feel that it is the only way in which they can exercise any autonomy.
3. The weight loss of anorexia stops or reverses the physical changes of puberty, and sufferers often look very young for their age. It can therefore be seen as a way of avoiding the emerging demands of sexuality (see †). Unfortunately, it also makes it difficult for the adolescent to develop the maturity and selfawareness that come from facing problems and dealing with them.
4. Eating together is central to family life. It is therefore often the arena in which family difficulties surface, and a son or daughter may express difficulties by a refusal to eat.

5. Treatment

The earlier the problem is recognized, the easier it is to treat and the better the outlook. Help should usually be sought through a GP, but the treatment is mainly psychological and is carried out by psychiatrists and/or psychologists. It may involve family members (see Family Therapy*) as well as the individual affected and usually takes place on an outpatient basis, unless the weight loss of anorexia has become dangerous or has proved intractable. Some sufferers find self-help groups useful, and indeed for some this may be the only help that is needed.

Bibliography

Anorexic Family Aid, A to Z of Anorexia Nervosa (Norwich, 1986); M. Duker and R. Slade, Anorexia Nervosa and Bulimia (Milton Keynes, 1988); R. L. Palmer, Anorexia Nervosa (Harmondsworth, 1980).

P.W.T.

ECOLOGY, see ENVIRONMENT.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT. Economic developments are human changes in living and working environments, including especially the goods and services available to people. Responsibility for such changes is a primary duty of humankind according to the biblical point of view, and methods and goals need to be responsibly directed.

The very earliest explicit commands of God designated man and woman as stewards* in charge of his many creatures on earth, with the initial responsibility to 'dress and keep' the Garden of Eden. God himself set a profound example by working in creation* to develop our environment* to be full of 'goods' and potential services. Not coincidentally, 'economic' and 'ecological' have the same linguistic root (Gk. oikos); they both concern the living environment in which we engage in both work and leisure.

The term 'economic development' is generally reserved for changes involving some plan and purpose, e.g. bringing a new industry to a country or region, building new housing or office complexes, exploiting an area's natural resources for human use, inventing or expanding a technology, increasing trade between groups of people, and such like. Economies create and distribute wealth, and economic development adds new tools, buildings, resources, or methods for the purpose of enhancing that process. For this reason, it can be used as a form of missionary or national 'aid' for depressed peoples and economies.

Unfortunately, the term 'economic development' frequently connotes an unjustified positive evaluation. People often blindly assume that the plans and purposes guiding an economic development project are beneficial and fair for all the people involved. Also, uncritically declaring an area 'underdeveloped' suggests that it is of low value, crude, primitive, undesirable, unappealing, etc. However, human failings and finitude both distort the best development plans and activities, and they limit even the best-intentioned purposes and results, overt and covert selfishness and greediness aside.

For whom, where, to what purpose, by what means, and with what results will it be done? These are among the enduring ethical questions that must be raised in evaluating any planned or completed economic development project.

1. For whom? Since economic activity necessarily affects both the environment and other people's lives, the purposes and interests of many must be considered and understood: a. the creation itself; b. the planners, affected workers, potential customers and neighbouring people; c. future generations of planners, workers, customers and neighbours; and d. God.

a. The Bible teaches us to receive the creation as a gift to be enjoyed, used and even wisely exploited - and at the same time to revere it as God's priceless, irreplaceable handiwork. It can be utilized for human purposes because it is not divine, but it must not be abused or neglected either, because it is a masterpiece of God. Economic development must embrace both use and reverence.

b. The people who are affected all have interests and claims - as heirs of Adam and Eve, as citizens of nations, as images of God.* The only one with an absolute property* claim is God; all our other property claims must be negotiated through the guidance of biblical principles for accountability, justice (see Justice and Peace†) and care. Therefore, whenever an economic development project is proposed or defended, it is necessary to cut through the familiar rhetoric of what good will be produced for everyone, and to investigate whose interests are actually being satisfied. Will the whole community benefit? Who gains the most? - and who might suffer the most? Truly mutually beneficial economic development projects are possible (God commands us to pursue them), but they require skilled 'savvy', sensitive planning and meticulous monitoring.

c. The interests of future generations are intensely important but difficult to predict, plan and protect. How many future generations will there be? What alternative resources will they have available? How might present economic development benefit them?

d. Finally, how does this development serve God and his purposes? This question is all-encompassing. Responsibility to God should force even the most influential and powerful economic developers to examine the justice and real benefits of their projects.

2. Where will the development occur? Different sets of issues face different choices. Developments in other countries require deep comprehension of the culture* and people's real needs and wishes. Considerable losses can occur to the other country's residents or to the developer when comprehensive understanding is lacking. The destructive consequences of colonialism,* exploitive industrialization,* Third World debt, squandering of depletable resources, paternalism and suchlike are well known. Too often the foreigner, even under the pretence of Christian concern, has exploited the weaker and less informed and brought shame to the name of Christ.

Economic developers working within their own countries also must choose a location within the labyrinth of personal pressures, tax incentives, grants, zoning restrictions and concessions, and other community pressures. However, do these competing pressures produce fair site selections? For example, why are developments so frequently supported and encouraged in suburban areas, bypassing poorer regions of major cities where the employment needs are much higher? Why are new offices and factories built disproportionately in regions dominated by whites?

3. To what purpose? The distinction between greed and self-interest is especially significant. Probably nothing ever happens in an economy without strong self-interest motivations on all sides. God has created a world in which mutual benefit sustains economies. But greed always blinds: developers are blinded to their own best interest, and are also tempted to deceive others about their true interests. A biblical understanding of the purposes of creating wealth and producing goods and services helps counteract the distortions of greed.

4. By what means? The issues of justice, love (see †) and stewardship* are essential in the selection of development methods. Do agreement and support of the development involve deception, coercion, oppression? How are the benefits distributed? Do the development processes contribute to the availability and dignity of work? Will the environment be polluted or resources depleted? Too often economic development has increased mechanization while reducing job availability and wasting energy. Who is benefited when a robot displaces the jobs of three people?

5. With what results? Both the planned results and the actual results need to be fruitfully assessed and evaluated. Plans are changed before they are implemented; and the new industries, buildings, technologies, and trade can be altered. Economic development is a central human task that affects other people tremendously, for good or evil. It requires comprehensive, prayerful, and scrupulous moral attention.

P.H.deV.

ECONOMIC ISSUES, see ECONOMIC ETHICS.†

ECONOMIC SANCTIONS are a form of coercion (see Force*) which uses economic penalties. These penalties can be various and of differing severity. The two main groups are trade and financial sanctions. Examples of trade sanctions are the embargoes on exports and imports. Financial sanctions place penalties on loans and investment.*

As a form of coercion, the use of economic sanctions raises the standard questions: 1. When is it justifiable to use coercion? 2. What kind of coercion should be used?

Answers to these questions are best sought in the Christian tradition of the just war,* because, although there are differences in the form of coercion they use, war and economic sanctions are in many respects similar: to adapt some words from the great theoretician of war, Karl von Clausewitz (1780-1831), imposing economic sanctions is war carried on by other means. The advantage of adopting this approach is that it roots ethical reflection on economic sanctions in an ecumenical Christian tradition, which is itself based on the 'love of neighbour' principle of the Bible.

Accepting that the tests of a just war can be used, then the tests of just cause and proportionality are the relevant ones in deciding when to impose economic sanctions. In connection with just cause, it is important to recognize that the traditional Christian understanding is far wider than the non-ideological test in international law. The limitations of the latter, which allows war only against an external aggressor, were exposed in the Kurdish crisis of 1991, in which the principle of national sovereignty was set aside in the interests of a 'duty of intervention', a principle which is much closer to the spirit of the traditional Christian test of just cause.

The test of proportionality is complicated by the difficulty of predicting the consequences of economic sanctions. In this connection, not only must the prediction be informed by complex economic factors, but also by even more complex political factors. A good example is the case of the oil sanction imposed against South Africa because of that country's apartheid policy. Reliable predictions of the economic impact were rendered virtually impossible because statistics on illegal oil imports and the oil stockpile were made a closely guarded State secret, and few could have predicted the political response, which was to develop one of the world's most advanced and extensive programmes for converting coal into oil. Nevertheless, because the test gives a rough guide as to whether more good than harm will be caused by economic sanctions, it is a very necessary safeguard against 'zealotism', the attitude which thinks that because justice 'is on its side', economic sanctions must be imposed regardless of the consequences.

The test of discrimination or non-combatant immunity is sometimes held to pose an insurmountable moral obstacle in the way of using economic sanctions. The difficulty with this objection is that the just-war doctrine has long accepted that civilians may be killed 'in virtue of collateral circumstance', as no policing operation can ever totally ensure against the possibility of civilian deaths. Rather than view the test of discrimination as prohibiting their use, therefore, it is more consistent with traditional Christian morality to understand this test as insisting on the targeting of economic sanctions in a way that minimizes the suffering of civilians. Furthermore, this test could also be legitimately interpreted as requiring the selective economic relief of civilians made to suffer.

A grave weakness of economic sanctions is the immense effort and diplomatic skill needed to sustain the long-term political consensus on which their effectiveness depends. It may have been this weakness which led the Western powers, fearing a breakdown of the international coalition against Iraq, to abandon economic sanctions in favour of war in the Gulf crisis of 1990-91. The creation of a supranational sanctions authority, with the legal powers to impose and enforce economic sanctions for violations of international law, might be a way of overcoming this weakness.

Another serious weakness is the ease with which economic sanctions appear to be evaded. While a sanctions-monitoring and enforcement unit may find it impossible to stamp out low-level smuggling where borders are easily crossed, the technology to detect sanctions-breaking in international trade, such as satellite surveillance of shipping, is already advanced, and suggests that the deeper problem is a lack of political will to make trade sanctions effective. Much more problematical are financial sanctions, given the secrecy of the international banking system.

Until measures are found to overcome these weaknesses, despite the prohibitive cost of modern warfare in terms of lives, resources and damage to the environment, it may be premature to conclude that economic sanctions have replaced war as the only moral alternative to diplomacy for settling international disputes.

Bibliography

J. Hanlon (ed.), The Sanctions Handbook (Harmondsworth, 1987); J. T. Johnson, Ideology, Reason and the Limitation of War (Princeton, NJ, 1975); P. Ramsey, War and the Christian Conscience (Durham, NC, 1961); C. Yeats, Morality and Economic Sanctions (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1990).

C.Y.

ECUMENICAL ETHICS. At the end of the 20th century, Christian ethics, like Christian theology, is increasingly an ecumenical endeavour, as ethical discussion engages, almost indiscriminately, thinkers and writers of different ecclesiastical traditions. This is not to deny that particular churches or confessions continue to maintain distinctive ethical stances (e.g. the disapproval of contraception* and abortion* by Roman Catholicism) or that churches pursue their own independent ethical projects (cf. the series of denominational reports on sexual issues in the 1980s and 1990s). But co-operation in doing Christian ethics by people who belong to different churches is commonplace, and by no means confined to the activities of formal ecumenical bodies.

Within the ecumenical movement proper, stemming from the Edinburgh World Missionary Conference of 1910, and from 1948 focused in the World Council of Churches (WCC), ethical concerns have been mainly social, political and economic, although a wider range of issues, including the family,* women's roles (see Feminism*) and the environment,* has more recently enjoyed attention. One of the two main streams (the other was Faith and Order) whose confluence created the WCC at Amsterdam in 1948 was Life and Work, which had held important conferences at Stockholm (1925) and Oxford (1937). Stockholm's 'Message' declared that 'The mission of the church is above all to state principles, and to assert the ideal [in] applying [the] Gospel in all realms of human life - industrial, social, political and international'. Major themes at Stockholm were the Church and International Relations (the conference met while still in the shadow of the First World War) and the Church and Economic and Industrial Problems. The Oxford conference issued eight volumes of reports in a 'Church, Community and State' series, the first a basic study of The Church and its Function in Society (London, 1937), by W. A. Visser 't Hooft and J. H. Oldham. Experts and scholars aided understanding, and the result was a distinguished corpus of Protestant social ethics, aiming 'to define the points in the contemporary situation at which the specifically Christian understanding of life is crucially involved' (J. H. Oldham, ed., The Churches Survey Their Task: The Report of the Conference at Oxford ..., London, 1937, p. 26).

Behind much Life and Work activity, framed as it was by two World Wars, lay the sentiment that 'doctrine (or dogma) divides, service (or action) unites'. As a justification for refusing to make ethical reflection wait upon interchurch agreement on Faith and Order it was understandable, but it presaged a deep-seated weakness of much subsequent WCC comment on 'church and society' - its lack of firm theological consensus as foundation.

Life and Work was perpetuated in the WCC's Department on Church and Society. The founding Assembly at Amsterdam (delayed as well as sobered by the Second World War) issued a report on 'The Church and the Disorder of Society' (in The First Assembly ..., ed. Visser 't Hooft, Geneva, 1948, pp. 39-47), which identified two chief factors contributing to 'the crisis of our age': 'the vast concentrations of power - which are under capitalism mainly economic and under communism both economic and political', and the domination of society by 'technics'. It expounded the ideal of 'the responsible society' - a phrase which for a few decades summed up ecumenical ideals (cf. P. Bock, In Search of a Responsible World Society, Philadelphia, 1974). For Amsterdam it was a society 'where freedom is the freedom of men who acknowledge responsibility to justice and public order, and where those who hold political authority or economic power are responsible for its exercise to God and the people whose welfare is affected by it'. The church's social influence would take effect primarily through the conduct of its members in their occupations and political opportunities.

The second Assembly at Evanston, Illinois, in 1954 could assert that the 'responsible society is not an alternative social or political system . . . Christians are called to live responsibly ... in any society, even within the most unfavourable social structures' (The Evanston Report, ed. Visser 't Hooft, New York, 1955, p. 113). But the Assembly marked a turning of the tide. Hitherto, the East-West/capitalist-communist divide set the context for ecumenical social ethics. Now the 'rapid social change' of the underdeveloped countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America would increasingly fix the agenda (cf. P. Abrecht, The Churches and Rapid Social Change, London and New York, 1961). In 1961 the New Delhi Assembly was the first to meet in 'the South' (see North-South Divide*). The shift in the WCC's priorities and preoccupations was manifest at the third (after Stockholm and Oxford) conference on Church and Society held at Geneva in 1966.

The Geneva conference's four preparatory volumes (published 1966) were entitled: Christian Social Ethics in a Changing World (ed. J. C. Bennett), Economic Growth in World Perspective (ed. D. Munby), Responsible Government in a Revolutionary Age (ed. Z. K. Matthews) and Man in Community (ed. E. de Vries). Lay people predominated ('theology was not the integrating universe of discourse', C. C. West in DCE, p. 97), and the quest for 'a new international economic order' and revolutionary political programmes took over. The often authoritarian nationalism* of newly independent states was affirmed as a vehicle of social integration (unlike the 'aggressive nationalism' of the West), and revolutionary violence was sanctioned as a last resort to overturn the falsely legitimized violence of the present order.

The conference spelt out the implications of these convictions in considerable detail (e.g. on tariff barriers, commodity prices and the Vietnam war), provoking allegations that it confounded the spheres of church and State. Paul Ramsey's* Who Speaks for the Church? (Nashville, TN, 1967) was a response to the Geneva conference.

The 1968 WCC Assembly at Uppsala devoted four of its six main sections to 'rapid social change', adopting many of the 1966 conference's positions. It was unable to agree in commending birth control as a contribution to population control (the Orthodox churches, members of WCC since 1961, objected), but called for full equality for women in every sphere. The justification (see Justification, Moral*) of revolutionary violence against 'inhumane structures' was viewed as one of the Assembly's main resolutions, although different sections were not agreed on the issue. By now WCC thinking had become deeply impregnated by liberation theology,* and Uppsala authorized the controversial Program to Combat Racism. Its grants to liberation movements and resistance groups were defended, in the face of bitter criticism and resignations, as serving the radical transformation of economic, social and political structures demanded by God's kingdom (see Kingdom of God*).

The Nairobi Assembly of 1975, the first south of the equator, witnessed the radical politicization of the WCC at its height. 'In essence, Nairobi proclaimed that poverty, racism, violations of human rights, and militarism (excluding military action by "liberation" groups) the world over result from unjust systems foisted upon humanity by the white-dominated societies of the Northern Hemisphere. "Liberation" meant changing or overthrowing unjust structures and replacing them with systems that serve rather than exploit people' (E. W. Lefever, Amsterdam to Nairobi, p. 43). To some extent, the keynotes of Nairobi's strident message found an echo in the WCC's mission conference at Bangkok in 1973, where concepts of salvation and mission were drastically de-spiritualized.

The Assemblies at Uppsala and Nairobi evoked growing protests from evangelicals, and subsequent Assemblies at Vancouver (1983) and Canberra (1990), as well as the world conference on mission and evangelism at San Antonio, Texas (1989), were more careful to heed dissenting voices. Ecological issues have inevitably come to the fore, and 'justice, peace and the integrity of creation' (JPIC) now summarizes the WCC's 'church and society' commitment. The 'integrity of creation' has been defined as 'the value of all creatures in and for themselves, for one another, and for God, and their interconnectedness in a diverse whole that has unique value for God' (quoted in T. F. Best, ed., Vancouver to Canberra 1983-1990, Geneva, 1990, p. 121). JPIC (the WCC is inordinately fond of initials), which draws together different threats to survival and harmony on the planet, was the theme of a major conference at Seoul in 1990. The previous year the WCC issued an impressive statement on ethical problems of bio-technology (ibid., pp. 122-123).

Agencies of the WCC continue to be highly productive and stimulating in the ethical fields surveyed in this article. They have provoked evangelicals into recovering the conviction that socio-political action and reform are an essential part of Christian mission, and that biblical faith is concerned with the wholeness of human life (often expressed in the Heb. shalom). Nevertheless, valid criticisms may still be addressed to much of the World Council's ethical endeavours:

1. Scripture is too often neglected, or used selectively, or cited without regard for context, such that biblical realities like 'kingdom', 'salvation' and 'peace' are distorted.
2. Ethical engagement is frequently problem-led or campaign-led ('leapfrogging from one problem to another', to quote Paul Ramsey), without tarrying to lay solid theological and ethical foundations.
3. Fashionable 'secular ecumenicism' repeatedly confuses the distinctive roles, under God, of church and State, of Christian and citizen. Hence it presumes to speak on matters beyond the competence of the Christian faith as such. Robert McAfee Brown (1920-) commented that the Geneva 1966 conference 'was able to take it for granted that the place of the church is on the cutting edge of the major secular movements of the contemporary world.' 'The world sets the agenda for the church' may be a perilous half-truth, if the church's Lord is no longer allowed to set its agenda.
4. 'Selective indignation', justified on prudential or diplomatic grounds, has left the WCC silent on abuses and corruptions in socialist regimes that should, on its own terms, have attracted critique. The recent liberation movements in the former Soviet bloc owed little to WCC-led thinking, and have left it - and some of its member-churches in the region - somewhat flat-footed.

Bibliography

E. Duff, The Social Thought of the World Council of Churches (London, 1956); H. E. Fey (ed.), A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 2 (Geneva, 1986), esp. P. Abrecht, 'The Development of Ecumenical Social Thought and Action'; J. M. Gustafson, Protestant and Roman Catholic Ethics: Prospects for Rapprochement (Chicago, 1978; London, 1979); E. W. Lefever, Amsterdam to Nairobi: The World Council of Churches and the Third World (Washington, DC, 1979); R. Mehl, Catholic Ethics and Protestant Ethics (Philadelphia, 1917); R. J. Neuhaus, The World Council of Churches and Radical Chic (Washington, DC, 1977); A. J. Van der Bent, Major Studies and Themes in the Ecumenical Movement (Geneva, 1981); idem, Six Hundred Ecumenical Consultations 1948-1982 (Geneva, 1983); J. A. E. Vermaat, The World Council of Churches and Politics (New York, 1989).

D.F.W.

EDUCATION. The meaning of education is open to debate. For some, the focus is on 'rearing' or 'nourishing', perhaps by 'drawing out' potential and gifts. For others education is concerned with seeing children as empty vessels to be filled with knowledge. Others include any process by which a person of any age grows in knowledge, awareness and life skills.

In focusing on the formal education of the young, in the context mainly of Western culture, we may ask such questions as: What is education for? Is it to produce adequate factory-workers to perpetuate the materialist society? Is it to encourage thinking, to teach the values of a loving community, and to help individuals develop their own potential as valuable human beings?

Christians vary in their responses to the definitions and purposes contained in these questions. The concept of 'Christian education' is not straightforward, though many parents want 'moral' education for their children, however that is defined. The Hebrew-Christian tradition is committed to moral education to enable people to love and serve both God and neighbour. The family in the OT is the context in which God's law is taught (Dt. 6:1-7). The Wisdom literature illustrates moral education (Pr. 3:1ff.). According to Jewish tradition, local schools were first organized systematically in Palestine by Simeon ben Shetah in the 1st century BC. In the NT, teaching and learning are of great importance: Jesus teaches his disciples (Mt. 5:2); and in the early church, teaching was regarded as a gift (Eph. 4:11; 1 Tim. 4:11-14). Learning is an important part of Christian pilgrimage, and learning is perhaps best understood in the light of the model Jesus gives of apprentices learning from the master in an active and personal way.

Public education in the West grew from this Christian tradition of teaching within the home and the church. In Europe and the USA the earliest schools were founded by Christians. Historically the Judaeo-Christian ethic underpinned most Western education. The 20th century has seen a dramatic shift towards a more secular approach, presenting problems both for parents desiring a 'Christian' education for their children and for Christian educators.

Education takes place in many different contexts, and the crucial home influence on learning is widely acknowledged. The Judaeo-Christian model emphasizes the importance of a partnership between home and school, but in reality parents often abdicate responsibility to schools and there is an unhealthy denigration of the role of parents on the part of some teachers.

In recent years there has been a growth in 'modern methods' that give greater attention to the ways children learn, and a move from the child being a passive listener, to the child being active learner. To some Christians this change is regretted as the unwelcome influence of humanism,* whereas others see it as a positive move towards acknowledging respect for the child as someone made in the image of God.* Related to this is the question whether there should be compulsory education at all, particularly for the very young. Many Christians campaign for nursery education for all who want it, in the belief that this offers everyone equal opportunity.

The choice of school can be problematic for Christian parents. Should they send their children to the local State school, where values may not be Christian but where they would play their part in the local community? (Indeed, in a pluralist society, there is a question whether pro-Christian education is in any case morally acceptable.) Can parents justify school fees when millions are starving in the Third World? Do fee-paying schools contribute to elitism and class divisions in society? When it comes to the needs of their own child, what people believe in is sometimes overridden. For some parents the secularization of education, or the belief that there is too little discipline, or the fact that their child's teacher is not a Christian, has led them to remove their child to a 'Christian school' or to offer education at home. Home schooling is growing in Western cultures, with a consequent growth of curricula for these children, many of them being specifically Christian. There has also been a growth in Christian schools (i.e. fee-paying schools outside the State system in the UK, as distinct from 'State-aided' or 'State-controlled' Church of England schools), but some argue that such schools give a child too restricted an outlook and fail to prepare him or her adequately for life in the world.

Other difficult choices for parents include those between Christian discipline and freedom, a Christian school ethic and a more liberal or multicultural one, and how to react to the 'hidden' curriculum (i.e. the priorities given to some subjects, and the values and ideologies assumed). Questions also arise such as: Who controls the curriculum? Politicians? Parents? The State? The school board? Furthermore, however much schools claim to be value-free, and whatever the schools' stated intentions, children are very susceptible to the 'hidden' messages (e.g. from the products the school permits to be advertised on the premises). The message of a British school since the Education Act of 1988 is that 'market forces' dictate decisions: choices have to be made, e.g. shall we have smaller classes, or more books, or mend the roof? Does this economic priority teach children that they matter less than the financial well-being of the school, or that, in a materialistic society, such financial choices affect many aspects of life? Schools may not be able to budget for children with special needs, and what would any concept of 'payment by results' do to schools in deprived areas? Resources are often so scarce that parents are asked to contribute towards basic books, which again raises questions of national budget priorities.

The crucial relationship between teacher and child is under threat. In an increasingly stressed society the role of the teacher has had to change to include that of social worker. The headteacher has had to become a manager, and some believe that the quality of what is taught has consequently suffered. Demands on educators increase, yet their status in society decreases, and any perception that teachers have of their 'selves' will clearly influence how they teach. As the belief grows that teacher-efficiency can be measured by testing children, the importance of the relationship between teacher and child may become submerged. For some teachers, it is that relationship of personal respect and love for the child that is the crucial means by which the child learns personal value and what it means to be a member of the kingdom of God.*

Bibliography

M. Donaldson, Children's Minds (Glasgow, 1978); B. V. Hill, That They May Learn: Towards a Christian View of Education (Exeter, 1990); C. Martin, Schools Now: A Parents' Guide (Oxford, 1988); R. Pinder, Why Don't Teachers Teach Like They Used To? (London, 1987); M. Rogues, Curriculum Unmasked: Towards a Christian Understanding of Education (Eastbourne, 1989).

S.E.At.

EDWARDS, JONATHAN (1703-58), best known as a promoter of the 18th century Great Awakening and as a defender of traditional Calvinism. Edwards was also a profound moralist, whose ethical writings have become the subject of increasingly serious attention in recent decades.

The context for Edwards' ethics was twofold: his own effort to define morality in a biblical way; and the preoccupation of his age with the moral capacities of human nature. Though never summarized in one comprehensive statement, Edwards' most elaborate ethical writings constitute a subtle blending of scriptural themes and theocentric responses to the optimistic ethical views of the Enlightenment.* These works elaborate a cohesive ethical stance: a sermon series from 1738 on 1 Cor. 13, later published as Charity and Its Fruits; an analysis of genuine spirituality in Religious Affections (1746); the posthumous Two Dissertations (1765) that included Concerning the End for Which God created the World and The Nature of True Virtue; as well as extensive private notations.

Edwards felt, first, that moralists of the Enlightenment were partially correct. Because of God's benevolence in creation, all humans do have some reliable instincts about virtue.* But, secondly, these natural instincts do not constitute 'true virtue' since they are focused on the well-being of creatures. 'True virtue', by contrast, 'consists in benevolence to Being in general'. It 'must chiefly consist in love to God: the Being of beings, infinitely the greatest and best of beings' (Ethical Writings, ed. P. Ramsey, pp. 540, 550). Thirdly, a person oriented towards God as the source of all good is able to act benevolently to lesser beings because of the awareness that these lesser beings also depend upon God for existence and purpose.

Bibliography

N. Fiering, Jonathan Edwards's Moral Thought and Its British Context (Chapel Hill, NC, 1981); P. Ramsey (ed.), The Works of Jonathan Edwards, Vol. 8: Ethical Writings (New Haven, CT, 1989); J. E. Smith (ed.), The Works of Jonathan Edwards, Vol. 2: Religious Affections (New Haven, CT, 1959).

M.A.N.

EGO, see ANALYTICAL PSYCHOLOGY; PERSONALITY; PSYCHOANALYSIS; UNCONSCIOUS.

EGOISM. The word 'egoism' is derived from the Gk. egoo and Lat. ego, 'I'. Generally it means to centre in the self. Popularly, it is often used in the pejorative sense of being self-centred. Egoism is divided into theoretical and practical forms.

Theoretical egoism encompasses both subjective idealism and solipsism, which hold that one's own individual ego is the only one which can be known for sure to exist.

Practical egoism, such as that of Ayn Rand (1905-82; see For the New Intellectual, New York, 1961) believes that one's own good is the proper motive of human choice. On the opposite end of the spectrum is radical self-denial and asceticism* which debases the self,* especially in its material dimension. Asceticism is found in early Gnosticism, with shadows in certain forms of Christian mysticism.

By contrast to both extremes of egoism and asceticism, the Bible offers a balanced perspective on the self.* First, it affirms that each self (person) is made in God's image* and likeness and, hence, has God-given value (Gn. 1:27). Further, recognizing the self-centred propensity of fallen human nature, Paul warned against being 'lovers of self' (2 Tim. 3:2, RSV). Likewise, Jesus insisted one must 'deny himself' (Mt. 16:24) by sacrificing personal desires in order to become his disciple. None the less, there is a legitimate sense of self-love (see Self-esteem*) implied in Jesus' command to love one's neighbor* 'as [you love] yourself' (Mt. 19:19). Indeed, Paul declares that 'no-one ever hated his own body, but he feeds and cares for it ...' (Eph. 5:29). That is, we should cultivate an attitude of self-sacrifice and concern for our neighbour that will at least equal the natural love that we have for ourselves. However, the ultimate check on egoism is that, while we should love other humans as ourselves, we must love God pre-eminently with our whole self, heart and soul (Mt. 22:37).

N.L.G.

ELDERSHIP, see MINISTRY.

ELECTRA COMPLEX, see PSYCHOANALYSIS.

ELECTROCONVULSIVE THERAPY (ECT), see MENTAL HEALTH; PSYCHIATRIC CARE, ETHICS OF.

ELLIS, ALBERT (1913-), founder of rational-emotive therapy (RET), is a selfdescribed humanist* and atheist. Trained in the psychoanalytic* method, Ellis soon despaired of its inefficiency and ineffectiveness. He began to experiment with RET, called 'rational therapy' in its early stages.

The core postulate of RET is well summarized in the phrase of Epictetus (c. 55-135 AD), a Stoic philosopher, who said, 'Men are disturbed not by things, but by the views which they take of them' (quoted by Ellis and Whitely in Theoretical and Empirical Foundations of Rational-Emotive Therapy). RET is taught in an A-B-C format. People often assume that Activating Events (A) cause them to experience certain emotional Consequences (C): e.g. 'My wife left me and so I feel awful.' But Activating Events have Consequences only through the mediation of our Beliefs (B) about those events. Rational beliefs result in rational consequences; irrational beliefs result in irrational consequences. The main irrational beliefs that consistently trouble people are that others must approve of and accept one, and that the conditions of one's life should be in accord with one's wishes.

Counselling in the RET system consists of education in the basic premises of RET, understanding the irrational beliefs that are producing the subjective distress of the person, and assisting the person to change irrational beliefs through disputation of those beliefs. Ellis' therapeutic style is highly didactic and confrontational. Christian evaluation of RET (see S. L. Jones and R. E. Butman in Modern Psychotherapies) would note positively RET's high view of rationality and of client capacity for change, and its direct, problem-solving focus. Negatively: 1. RET has become a platform for the explicit promulgation of a humanistic, atheistic and hedonistic* life philosophy; 2. its definition of rationality is pragmatic (rational is whatever makes one feel good), and ultimately circular because it has no objective, external referent for truth; and 3. RET so overemphasizes rationality that all other facets of human life (e.g. spirituality, emotional experience, intuition) are minimized or ignored. The empirical support for the efficacy of the approach is modest at best.

See also: CHARACTER.†

Bibliography

A. Ellis and J. Whitely (eds.), Theoretical and Empirical Foundations of RationalEmotive Therapy (Monterey, CA, 1978); S. L. Jones and R. E. Butman, Modern Psychotherapies: A Comprehensive Christian Appraisal (Downers Grove, IL, 1991).

S.L.J.

ELLUL, JACQUES (1912-). A sociologist, historian and Christian ethicist, Ellul was born and raised in Bordeaux, France. During studies at the University of Bordeaux (Licence en Droit, 1931; Doctor of Law, 1936), he was first converted to Marxism, then to Christianity. He was dismissed from his Strasburg faculty post in 1940 because of his opposition to Pétain and the Vichy government. A participant in the Resistance during the Ger. occupation, he was appointed to the Bordeaux city government, in charge of public works projects, from 1944 to 46.

From 1944 until retirement in 1980, Ellul was Professor of the History and Sociology of Institutions in the Faculty of Law and Economic Sciences at Bordeaux and also taught regularly in the Institute of Political Studies. An active lay member of the Reformed Church of France, he served in local church leadership and from 1951 to 1970 on the National Council and its commissions; from 1947 to 1951 he participated in various commissions of the World Council of Churches.

Author of some fifty books and more than 700 published articles, Ellul is known best for The Technological Society (1954; ET, New York, 1964), The Political Illusion (1965; ET, New York, 1967) and other sociological and historical works in which he argues that 'technique' (the rule of rationalistic, quantitative analysis in search of measurably efficient means) is the increasingly dominant mode of thought and source of value not just in science* and technology* but in the politics, economics, pedagogy, art, religion, communications and popular culture of the modern world.

Parallel to this study of sociological reality, Ellul has produced many volumes of theological and biblical studies, such as The Meaning of the City (ET, Grand Rapids, 1970) and The Ethics of Freedom, 3 vols. (1973-84; ET, Grand Rapids, 1976), in which he promotes a radical Christian way of freedom, holiness and love for individuals who refuse to bow to the principalities and powers of our era, i.e. technique, rationalism, quantification and efficiency.

Bibliography

In Season, Out of Season (1981; ET, San Francisco, 1982); What I Believe (1987; ET, Grand Rapids, 1989).

D. W. Gill, The Word of God in the Ethics of Jacques Ellul (Metuchen, NJ, 1984); J. M. Hanks, Jacques Ellul: A Comprehensive Bibliography (Greenwich, CT, and London, 1984).

D.W.G.

EMBRYOLOGY is the study of development from fertilization until birth. In humans all the parts and organs are formed during the first three months of pregnancy* and during the remaining six months the embryo, usually known then as a foetus, simply grows and matures. Although the biological facts are relatively straightforward, their interpretation in a spiritual and philosophical sense is not, and opinions differ as to when 'life' begins.

Biological aspects

A new human being is initiated when egg and sperm fuse. The parents' body cells all contain twenty-three pairs of chromosomes, each of which contains thousands of genes or chemical messengers. When each egg or sperm is formed, it receives only one from each pair. In every generation, individuals inherit half their chromosomes from each of their parents, who in turn have inherited half their chromosomes from each of their parents, and so on. In this way the genetic material is continually passed from generation to generation. Errors in the genetic code (see below) give rise to inherited diseases which can sometimes be traced back through past centuries.

During the production of egg and sperm there is some mixing of the genetic information, and as there are about 100,000 items to be reshuffled during their formation, each egg and sperm, and therefore each individual, has a unique genetic make-up.

The genetic information itself is based on a simple code of four chemicals (bases): adenine (A), thymine (T), guanine (G) and cytosine (C), whose order determines the proteins to be formed. By varying the sequence of these four, the message received varies and different proteins and enzymes are produced. This code is virtually universal for the entire range of living organisms from viruses to elephants and humans. A lowly organism such as a virus can be characterized by its entire specific sequence of these bases, so that its genetic make-up would read GGATTAATTGC ... to 200,000 letters.

Humans have 3,000 million base pairs and at present the sequence is known for only a few portions, although by early next century it may well be that the order of all the bases will be known, and each person will be describable by his or her unique sequence.

At the time of conception, a sperm with its unique sequence fuses with an egg with its unique sequence and we have the genetic blueprint for a new person. During the next ten days, the single cell divides many times, forming two, four, eight cells, etc., and ultimately a round ball of cells which floats freely in the mother's womb. At this stage, the ball of cells may split into two and each cell clump continue to grow independently. The two individuals eventually born will be genetically identical and are identical twins.

Also during this time, it is possible to remove one cell and the remaining cells regulate themselves to develop into a healthy embryo. The one cell removed can be tested to find its sex or whether a disease gene is present, and the result indicates the make-up of the embryo from which it came. At this early stage, known as the pre-implantation stage, the embryo has great flexibility; some cells will form the extraembryonic membranes which will surround the growing foetus, and others will eventually become the embryo proper. It seems that many (perhaps 50%) of these embryos are imperfect and fail to develop.

After about ten days, a cavity appears in the ball of cells and some cells are seen to heap up in one area. From this time any attempt at division into two gives rise to conjoined or 'Siamese' twins. Individual cells can no longer be removed with impunity, as the different cells are becoming 'committed' to different functions. Soon a groove, the primitive streak, becomes visible, and it is cells around this which will give rise to the embryo itself. The remainder of the cells will provide the support system for the embryo, such as the placenta and membranes.

During this time, the embryo stops floating freely and becomes embedded in the lining of the womb. Now it can obtain nourishment from the mother for further development. A signal in the form of a hormone is released so that the mother's body is informed that implantation has occurred, and her next menstrual period is suppressed. It is only then that she becomes aware of the presence of the embryo.

Once implanted (by about day fourteen), the primitive streak continues to develop, and the different organs become differentiated. It is during these early weeks that normal development is particularly susceptible to disruption by harmful agents such as drugs or viruses. About 15% of conceptions which implant are lost as miscarriages during these next crucial few weeks.

Three weeks from the time of fertilization (which occurs about two weeks after the last menstrual period, and is the date usually used to age the pregnancy), the brain and nervous system begin to form; by four weeks the heart starts beating; by eight weeks the limbs, fingers and toes are all developed and the embryo is about 3cm long; and by ten weeks all organs are formed.

The embryo is now known as a foetus, and it continues to grow and mature in the shelter of the womb until about thirty-eight weeks after fertilization.

Theological aspects

The biological facts are straightforward and not disputed, but what is that status of this early embryo? Is the embryo, from the time of fusion of egg and sperm, my brother or sister for whom Christ died? Christians have differing views: some believe that as the unique blueprint is present from conception, the valued person is indeed there; others believe this comes later.

From such texts as Je. 1:5 and Gal. 1:15, Scripture teaches us that God knows and calls us from the womb, but Eph. 1:4 reminds us that God is outside time and knew us before the creation of the world. Ps. 139, often quoted to suggest that personhood is present from the moment of conception, is an exclamation of wonder at God's omniscience and allpervading care for us as individuals with individual histories. The psalm does not actually address questions raised by modern embryology. Luke's account of the miraculous conception of Jesus shows that he was indeed known and named from the start, but Christ's origins and parentage cannot be extrapolated to every conception.

Gn. 1:27 tells us that God made humankind in his own image. Should we see the image of God* in a genetic blueprint for which in twenty years time we may have an accurate computer printout? It is humankind's relationship with God that makes us special, so it could be that its relationships make the embryo special. During the first fourteen days, only God knows whether or not egg and sperm have fused. The embryo has no other relationships, and it floats freely in the mother's passages. It may pass on and out into the sewer unknown and unmourned. If, however, implantation occurs, the mother (usually) becomes increasingly aware of her pregnancy, and ending it is a disruptive event. As the pregnancy continues, the bond continues to develop, and culminates in the birth of the baby who is infinitely precious.

Could imagehood be similarly progressive and in some way be mediated through the embryo's relationship with its mother?

Applications

These considerations are not merely academic. For those Christians who believe the embryo to be sacrosanct from the moment of fusion of egg and sperm, any agents which hinder implantation are forbidden, including several particular forms of contraception.

Eggs and sperm can be fused in the laboratory, and infertile couples can achieve pregnancies by having such conceptions returned to the mother's uterus. But there may be more embryos available than needed. Returning them all to the womb could jeopardize the success of the procedure. Some Christians believe the excess can be discarded, while others maintain that Christians should not be involved in such procedures. For those struggling with the problem of infertility, these are crucial issues (see *Childlessness).

See also: EMBRYO TRANSFER; REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES.

Bibliography

A. C. Berry, Beginnings: Christian Views of the Early Embryo (London, 1993); N. M. Ford, When Did I Begin? Conception of the Human Individual in History, Philosophy and Science (Cambridge, 1988); T. Iglesias, 'What Kind of Being is the Human Embryo?', in N. M. de S. Cameron (ed.), Embryos and Ethics: The Warnock Report in Debate (Edinburgh, 1987).

A.C.B.

EMBRYO TRANSFER involves the production of an embryo, usually in the laboratory, and its transfer to the uterus (womb) of a recipient mother. Usually the embryo transferred has been made by bringing together the recipient woman's egg and her husband's sperm. The embryo may be transferred as soon as it is ready or, if there are more available than are needed (see *Embryology), some may be deep-frozen, and these may then be transferred many years later.

Where a couple are at high risk of having a child with a serious genetic disorder, it is theoretically possible to test the embryos to see if the disease gene is present or absent. Healthy embryos are transferred and the affected ones discarded. This type of pre-implantation testing is only just starting to become technically possible.

Christians disagree as to whether this type of embryo transfer is right or not. Those who believe that personhood starts when egg and sperm fuse could not discard embryos, while those who do not believe the pre-implantation embryo to be a person find it entirely legitimate.

Embryo transfer can, however, be more complex. It is possible for a couple to donate their spare embryos to another couple who are unable to produce their own. The recipient mother would then become pregnant and carry a child who was genetically unrelated to either her or her husband. Similarly embryos can be transferred which have either sperm or ovum donated while the other gamete comes from one member of the recipient couple. The issues here are similar to those considered under donor insemination, but more complex as there can be a genetic mother and father, a rearing mother and father and even a surrogate mother. The potential legal, social, emotional and moral problems are huge.

There are two other procedures used in the treatment of infertility which have some overlap with embryo transfer: 1. GIFT (gamete intra-Fallopian transfer): ova and sperm are together introduced into the woman's Fallopian tube, thus avoiding the problems of conception occurring in the laboratory and of the spare embryos; and 2. ZIFT (zygote intraFallopian transfer): fusion of egg and sperm is brought about with some external assistance, but the resulting zygote is then transferred to the woman's Fallopian tube.

The only moral concern that arises with these two techniques is that procreation has been separated from the sexual act. This is the reverse of contraception.

See also: REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES.

Bibliography

D. G. Jones, Manufacturing Humans: The Challenge of the New Reproductive Technologies (Leicester, 1987); O. O'Donovan, Begotten or Made? (Oxford, 1984).

A.C.B.

EMIGRATION. What makes emigration, leaving the land of one's domicile, a moral issue? The position of the Vietnamese 'economic refugees' in Hong Kong poses the dilemma. They have fled at great risk from what they see as an oppressive regime, yet no countries are willing to receive them. The position of the Hong Kong Chinese, many of whom have already fled Communist China, poses a similar dilemma. Should they be prevented from leaving when Hong Kong returns to being ruled from Peking in 1997? Should other countries be morally obliged to receive them?

Emigration - both voluntary and forced - has taken place throughout history. It forms part of the biblical record. Abraham is called to emigrate (Gn. 12:1-3); the children of Israel 'emigrate' from Egypt (Ex. 12:31-42), which for the people of the Exodus generation was their place of birth. Amos 9:7-8 records a number of 'emigrations' for which God was responsible.

The biblical vision of a new land has formed a powerful motivation for those seeking to escape from what they perceived as oppression. The Pilgrim Fathers emigrated from England seeking a new land; the Voortrekkers in South Africa emigrated from the Cape Colony in search of a place where they could have political independence.

People have emigrated to avoid persecution. The Mennonites emigrated across Europe after the Reformation; those Jews who could do so emigrated from Nazi Germany.

Emigration in contemporary situations presents a dilemma. On the one hand, those who can emigrate and are welcomed into other countries are people whose skills the host countries need. Such people are often the people with skills that their own poor 'motherlands' also need, in order to develop. Such emigration, while understandable in personal terms, is often a case of the wealthy countries reinforcing their strong positions by drawing off the best brains and people of those countries that could have become their competitors.

On the other hand, émigrés often see that there is no future in their own country. People of mixed British-Indian descent in India find themselves discriminated against in education and job prospects; people with wealth and skills in Vietnam find no future for themselves in their own motherland. Families who have emigrated to more prosperous countries have often provided economic support for their relatives left in their own countries. The economy of the Philippines took a severe jolt during the 1991 Gulf War, as many families no longer received income from their relatives working in Kuwait.

At the end of the 20th century, the concept of the nation-state, which is less than 400 years old, is being increasingly challenged. Within such States as (the former) Yugoslavia, ethnic groups call for their own political and economic autonomy. In the resultant conflict, large-scale involuntary emigration takes place, as elsewhere in the world.

The biblical injunction to remember the 'sojourner', the person who is an émigré, applies especially to those who have found a new home in a new land. It speaks to the very human tendency to decide that, even though their grandparents may have been refugees, and their presence in the particular country and its benefits is due to them being 'welcomed in', their own security and standard of living would be threatened if they accepted further emigrants.

The biblical teaching that members of the community who are unable to work must be assisted by the rest of the community means that any argument against emigration from 'poorer' countries must be accompanied by genuine practical and effective assistance to the people of those countries. This help might be given either individually, through churches and agencies, or by governments, to enable them to improve their economies and their records on human rights (see Rights, Human*).

The Christian understanding of human solidarity, that individual gifts are for the benefit of the community, means that any argument for emigration from such countries must be accompanied (as it often is) by genuine effective assistance for those left behind by the émigrés.

In those cases where there is substantial doubt of any improvement in the short term, especially for persecuted minorities, there must be effective and real assistance to those who are forced to emigrate. While it is clear now that assistance to the Jews in the 1930s was a moral imperative, it was not so clear at the time.

C.M.N.S. and V.K.S.

EMOTION. An emotion is an involuntary response of the personality to certain stimuli, either outside us or from within us, usually associated with bodily changes (in, for instance, facial expression, breathing, heartbeat, sweat), with more extreme feelings than usual, and sometimes with intense behavior of either aggression (see Violence*) or flight. In very intense emotion, rational control of behaviour may be lost, but usually we remain responsible for our actions. In day-to-day conversation, to experience emotion means to experience such feelings as anger,* happiness, sadness, fear,* disgust and surprise. It is not easy to find an agreed psychological definition, however.

Various factors probably contribute to the pattern of a person's emotional responses, e.g. parental modelling or early learning experiences. These often lead to cultural differences in the ways emotions are expressed. In one culture, grief may usually be expressed through silent withdrawal; in another through public, demonstrative behaviour.

Some Christians are very wary of emotion, finding that feelings can too easily get out of hand, and the loss of rational control over life is taken to be unhelpful if not sinful. 'Faith not feelings' may describe their approach to spirituality. Such Christians may deny certain emotions (such as anger) within themselves, or may repress (see Repression, Psychological*) their feelings in an attempt to 'be at peace'. Sometimes the failure to express emotion appropriately can lead to disorders in other areas of life, such as psychosomatic illness. At other times, Christians have been criticized for too much 'enthusiasm', and certain strands of Christian spirituality have concentrated too much on the experiential and emotional side of religion to the exclusion of theological evaluation. In worship there can be an appropriate expression of emotion. There can also be symptoms of pathology, such as when the 'suggestibility' of certain people is manipulatively enhanced through certain stimuli (lights, music, drumbeat, massed choirs; see Brainwashing,* Conversion,* and Psychology of Religion*). This has led critics of mass evangelism to reject many conversion testimonies from such settings as 'mere emotion'.

The Scriptures portray the full range of human emotions, however, and the various writers of the psalms, for instance, were less inhibited in emotional expression than are some Christian people. The psalms include lament (Ps. 137), exultation (Ps. 47), despair (Ps. 88), longing (Ps. 42), bitterness (Ps. 73) and contentment (Ps. 23), to name but a few emotions. The prophets feel anger at injustice (Amos), and anger at God (Habakkuk). The Wisdom literature shows us depression* and anguish (Job), and searching frustration (Ecclesiastes). In the Gospels, the portrait of Jesus Christ shows us a human being expressing a wide range of human emotions, but always appropriately and responsibly. In his paper 'On the Emotional Life of Our Lord', B. B. Warfield (1851-1921) illustrates how Jesus Christ felt compassion, love, indignation, anger, sorrow and joy. His soul was 'troubled' (Jn. 11:33); he was distressed and despondent (Mt. 26:37). He expressed wonder (Mt. 8:10) and desire (Lk. 22:15). Once he was conceivably the subject of 'shame' (Mk. 8:38). Jesus' emotions led to physical reactions. He was hungry (Mt. 4:2), thirsty (Jn. 19:28), and weary (Jn. 4:6). He wept (Jn. 11:35), wailed (Lk. 19:41), sighed (Mk. 7:34) and groaned (Mk. 8:12). We read of his angry glare (Mk. 3:5), annoyed speech (Mk. 10:14), rage (Jn. 11:33, 38), agitation (Jn. 11:35), exultation of joy (Lk. 10:21), the unrest of his movements in the face of anticipated evils (Mt. 26:37), and his loud cry in the moment of desolation (Mt. 27:46).

Christian maturing includes learning how to express emotion appropriately, how to recognize and name the feelings within oneself, and how to be able to use feelings creatively. Expression of emotion is one component of non-verbal interpersonal communication. A certain level of emotional arousal is essential for carrying out certain tasks: too little and there is insufficient motivation or energy; too much and the loss of control diminishes effectiveness.

Christian therapy, counselling and pastoral care (see Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy†) can all facilitate emotional maturity. Some approaches to therapy focus on the client's emotions, and work with the feelings in the client, and also with those generated in the 'transference' between client and therapist. The counsellor's own emotional response to the client can be used constructively in therapy, although in unskilled hands emotional 'involvement' between counsellor and client can be destructive. Psychodynamic approaches (such as that developed in a Christian context by Frank Lake*) and relational approaches (building on the client-centred work of Carl Rogers*), work with the client's emotions as a route towards personal healing. Other, more cognitive, approaches begin with the basic belief that much of our feeling derives from our thoughts, and that mistaken or irrational or ungodly thinking processes are at the root of much personal misery. Albert Ellis* argued, for example, that emotions arise in an A, B, C pattern: A = external or internal activating event; B = my beliefs about A; C = consequential emotion. While we naturally tend to think that A causes C, Ellis argued that it is in fact B (our fundamental pattern of thoughts) which causes C. Therapy, then, requires the isolation of irrational ideas which cause disturbances, and the deliberate development of new mental habits, if emotional healing is to be achieved. Archibald Hart developed Albert Ellis' 'rational-emotive therapy' in a Christian direction in Feeling Free; David Seamands also makes use of this approach in Healing for Damaged Emotions. Alongside such therapeutic approaches, there is a growing interest in and use of prayer for 'healing of memories', sometimes in the context of sacramental ministry, which are ways of casting our care on to God, for he cares for us (see 1 Pet. 5:7), by bringing painful memories into touch with the healing presence of the Holy Spirit.

See also: INNER HEALING.

Bibliography

M. Chave-Jones, Listening to your Feelings (Oxford, 1989); A. Hart, Feeling Free (Old Tappan, NJ, 1979); F. Lake, Tight Corners in Pastoral Counselling (London, 1981); R. C. Roberts, Spirituality and Human Emotion (Grand Rapids, 1983); D. Seamands, Healing for Damaged Emotions (Amersham, 1981); B. B. Warfield, 'On the Emotional Life of our Lord', in Samuel G. Craig (ed.), The Person and Work of Christ (Phillipsburg, NJ, 1950).

D.J.A.

EMOTIONAL PAIN, see CLINICAL THEOLOGY; INNER HEALING; PRIMAL THERAPY.

EMOTIVISM, see LOGICAL POSITIVISM.

EMPATHY is an important concept for counselling. Most people understand it to mean 'putting yourself in the other person's shoes' or 'seeing the world as they see it'. Though therapists such as Sigmund Freud,* Theodor Reik (1888-1969) and Harry S. Sullivan (1892-1949) have discussed empathy, it is with Carl Rogers* that it has been most closely linked, because it is a major concept within his counselling theory. Rogers defined empathy as the 'accurate perception of another's internal frame of reference'. He believed that the therapist's attitude of empathy, genuineness and positive regard for the client is necessary for the client's change and growth. Empathy helps the client in his or her self-exploration and resolution of conflicting feelings.

Most definitions of empathy show that it involves comprehending what the other person feels without actually experiencing it. No-one can ever know exactly what another person feels or thinks, as we are all unique individuals, but to some extent we can understand. Empathy is about entering the other person's internal frame of reference, understanding the person's world and knowing the person's self-perception. It means understanding not only what the person thinks and feels, but also what are his or her values and goals in life. It is possible to help people without fully understanding them, but a person who can empathize is likely to be more effective.

Empathy is not just about understanding a person but also about communicating that understanding. The counsellor needs to listen to the verbal and non-verbal messages and respond in a way that communicates understanding. The responses must be at a level that is appropriate and use suitable vocabulary (e.g. for a child). The responses should help people in their exploration of their feelings and thoughts. It may be that as a person talks, the counsellor picks up that he or she is angry, even though he or she does not say so. The response, 'It sounds as though that made you angry', can help people get in touch with their feelings and help in their self-understanding.

R. R. Carkhuff suggests five levels of empathic response. At level one the verbal and behavioural expressions of the counsellor do not detract significantly from the verbal and behavioural expressions of the client, nor do they add significantly to the counselling; at level five the counsellor's responses do add significantly to the feeling and meaning of the client. They accurately express feeling-levels beyond what clients have been able to express, or, in the event of continuing deep self-exploration on the clients' part, they share fully with them in their deepest moments.

Some people are naturally empathic, but for those who are not, empathy is a skill that can be learnt. Counsellor training generally includes training in empathy skills. A counsellor learns how to reflect, paraphrase, restate and focus on what has been communicated, either verbally or non-verbally. Gerard Egan (1930-) examines what makes empathy effective in his training manual. He looks at ways of improving empathic responses, such as giving time to think before responding, using short responses, and gearing responses to the person.

Research suggests that empathy is correlated with the client's self-exploration and the improvement of the client, but some of the research is not very reliable. The sufficiency of empathy, positive regard and genuineness for client improvements has not been consistently demonstrated. Therefore totally to focus the whole counselling approach on empathy would be foolish.

Christ knew what people were like; he could read their hearts and respond to them accordingly. We do not have that ability in the same way, but if we are to help people effectively we need to understand them, to see the world through their eyes and choose the best approach for them. In 1 Thes. 5:14 Paul urges the early Christians to 'warn those who are idle . . . encourage the timid ... help the weak'. Here one can see a variety of approaches to people with problems. A lack of understanding prevents the choice of the most effective approach. Elsewhere Paul tells us to rejoice with those who rejoice and weep with those who weep (Rom. 12:15). In order to be able to do so, we need to know what a person is feeling. Empathy is at the heart of Christian ministry.

Bibliography

R. R. Carkhuff, Helping and Human Relations: A Primer for Lay and Professional Helpers, vol. 1, 'Selection and Training' (New York, 1969); G. Egan, The Skilled Helper: A Systematic Approach to Effective Helping (Monterey, CA, 1982); C. Rogers, 'The necessary and sufficient conditions of therapeutic personality changes', JCP 21.2, 1957, pp. 95-103.

H.C.H.

EMPIRICISM is the view that the source of all knowledge is sense-experience. The main proponents were John Locke (1632-1704), G. Berkeley (1685-1753) and David Hume.* They rejected the mind as the basis of knowledge. Reason provided only what was known already by deduction and definition and was absolutely certain. In contrast, the sense provided genuinely new knowledge which was synthetic, contingent, a posteriori and open to doubt. In empiricist thinking, the mind is like a white sheet of paper or wax tablet on which the senses write and leave their marks. Most empiricists distinguished between direct impressions and ideas, which were copies of impressions, to explain the different elements of our mental life. This led to the search for basic units of experience, which were directly experienced, and about which we could not be mistaken. It was a means of finding certainty in human knowledge.

With the Vienna Circle and the school of logical positivism,* metaphysics, religion and ethics were held to have no objective basis, but to be purely subjective preferences and expressions of emotion. The notorious principle of verifiability was the means of excluding all kinds of statements which could not be founded on sense-experience.

The failure to find a basic unit of senseexperience, e.g. a sense datum, the need to redefine verifiability to avoid self-contradiction, and the inability to find an adequate mathematical language to express all human knowledge blunted the effects of empiricism and led to a more commonsense and descriptive approach to philosophy, language and meaning.

See also: AYER, A. J.; WITTGENSTEIN, L.

Bibliography

A. J. Ayer, Language, Truth and Logic (London, 1946); B. Russell, Human Knowledge (London, 1948).

E.D.C.

EMPLOYERS' CONFEDERATIONS. Employers' organizations, using the definition of J. J. Oechslein, are 'formal groups of employers set up to defend, represent or advise affiliated employers and to strengthen their position in society at large with respect to labour matters [i.e. relations with employees] as distinct from economic matters'. ('Employers' Organisations', in R. Blanpain, ed., Comparative Labour Law and Industrial Relations, p. 229.) They are composed of enterprises, not individual human beings. They may or may not conclude collective agreements in their own right. Their legal form varies considerably between different countries (employers' associations in the UK, the USA and several European countries are discussed by F. Schmidt in B. Aaron and K. W. Wedderburn, eds., Industrial Conflict, ch. 1).

The evolution of employers' organizations in anything like their modern form began after trade unions* of workers had been functioning for many years. In New Zealand, for example, the formation of employers' associations after the maritime strike in 1890 was essentially a defensive reaction to what employers regarded as a continuing threat from militant and increasingly international trade unionism. But even in the earliest years of the industrial revolutions of Western countries, Adam Smith (1723-90) warned that it would be 'ignorant' to imagine that 'masters rarely combine' (The Wealth of Nations, Harmondsworth, 1970, p. 169).

Membership of a federation is always voluntary, at least in theory. There is therefore no genuine employer counterpart to the issues which cluster around the closed or the 'union shop' or compulsory unionism, and which lead to the question whether it is a fundamental human right not to belong to a particular or any workers' trade union, and whether the law should admit conscientious objections. Many Christians over the years have exercised such a right, arguing that all unionism is wrong and (sometimes) that to join would mean an 'unequal yoking' with unbelievers (cf. 2 Cor. 6:14).

Another distinction is that, whereas trade unions are often linked, as in Britain, with political parties, employers' organizations do not have formal links with political parties. But they inevitably develop numerous personal contacts with politicians in power. In recent years most federations have been forced to move beyond their traditional roles of representing and advising employers into articulating coherent views of political and economic policy. Their comment is, for example, often sought when a government's budget is presented in Parliament.

The question whether it is morally right for a Christian employer to become a member of an employers' (con)federation is scarcely ever asked. The question itself is an unsatisfactory one if it is taken to imply that such federations always and everywhere share common objectives and perform essentially similar functions, regardless of the political system in which they operate. The federations are in fact enormously diverse. Any merely general answer to the question would therefore involve extremely superficial moral theorizing. Rather we must take account of the objectives and practices of each national federation, and must ask: 'Does this federation in practice seek to oppress the poor, or deny the equality of men and women, or seek to manipulate its own members?' For if it promotes a morally evil aim (often hard to decide), it may become comparatively easy for the Christian employer to decide that he or she or the company one controls must not encourage or assist such a federation by joining it and helping to finance it.

Unfortunately, in this field, as in many others where tough moral decisions have to be made, there is a difference between the Christian employer and the employer who is a Christian. This may seem an unduly slick distinction, but what these labels help us to see is that whereas the former has integrated his faith and his business practices, and has reflected at some depth on the relation between them, the latter has not done either but has lodged Christian faith and business practices in different compartments: one of the products of the secularization* which has invaded the church.

Christian employers' federations exist in a small handful of countries and are very active. No survey as to their effectiveness or as to the respects in which they incarnate Christian love seems to have been attempted. Whether it is right to splinter the employers in a particular industry by forming a Christian organization, and whether there is enough Christian consensus to enable such an organization to function in a thorough-going and principled way, are essentially the same problems that are faced by those contemplating the formation of a 'Christian' political party, especially in the context of a Westminster-type political system, which operates on the principle of confrontation rather than consensus.

Bibliography

B. Aaron and K. W. Wedderburn (eds.), Industrial Conflict: A Comparative Legal Survey (Harlow, 1972); R. Blanpain (ed.), Comparative Labour Law and Industrial Relations (Norwell, MA, 1981), ch. 12; J. J. Oechslein, 'Employers' Organisations: Current Trends and Social Responsibilities', ILR 121.5, 1982; R. M. Rudman, 'Employer Organisations: Their Development and Role in Industrial Relations', in J. M. Howells et al., Labour and Industrial Relations in New Zealand (Melbourne, 1974).

D.L.M.

EMPLOYMENT, see WORK.

ENDS AND MEANS. The word 'ends' refers to the results of actions and 'means' to the instruments by which the ends are attained. Ends are willed for their own sake, but means are willed only for the sake of ends. Ends have intrinsic value, whereas the moral significance of means is to be judged by their relation to ends. (So, for example, the desired end of procreating a child could not be justified in terms of Christian ethics by the means of fornication or adultery.) Persons are ends; things are means. Thus, in deontological* ethics, such as the Judaeo-Christian tradition, persons should be loved and things should be used. But one should never love things and use people.

'I' am an end, but 'it' is a means. In this connection, some scholars (e.g. Martin Buber, I and Thou; ET, New York, 1970; Edinburgh, 1971) believe it is wrong to have an 'I-it' relation to others, as opposed to an 'I-thou' relation. Others should never be treated as an 'it'. For this reason Immanuel Kant's* categorical imperative involved treating others as a kingdom of ends (Critique of Practical Reason, ET, London, '1909). Ultimately, this is based on Jesus' statement that we should love others as we love ourselves (Mt. 22:39). That is, others are ends, they should be treated as persons too.

Most ethical debates concern means rather than ends. Both disputants, for example, could believe in justice for all (the end) but disagree as to which social programme (the means) is the best means of fulfilling it. Likewise, two opposed political parties may each believe we ought to have the best government (the end), but may disagree as to whose candidate will be the best person (the means) to achieve it. Thus, for deontologists, ends are absolute, whereas means are relative.

There are immediate ends and an ultimate End. Finite persons are immediate ends. For Christians, God alone is the ultimate End. Humans are willed for their own sake finitely, but only God is willed for his own sake infinitely. To will finite persons as ultimate is idolatry. But to deny that humans are ends with God-given value in themselves is dehumanizing.

N.L.G.

ENERGY comes in many forms: heat, light, sound, mechanical, electrical, chemical and nuclear. It was one of the great achievements of 19th-century physics to show that all the forms of energy known at that time could be converted into each other in definite ratios. Energy is essential for our life. Our bodies convert chemical energy in the form of food into heat and motion. We need energy to heat our homes and to cook our food, to travel and to communicate by telephone and radio. Energy is the basis of our manufacturing industries, and of our transport by land, sea and air. Our standard of living is directly proportional to the energy available.

In ancient times wood was the main source of energy, as it still is in much of the Third World. As time went on the forests of the Mediterranean lands and later on of central Europe were cut down to satisfy the needs of the growing populations. More recently, coal replaced wood as the main fuel, and together with deposits of iron ore provided the motive power of the Industrial Revolution. In the last century oil was discovered, and since it is easier to extract and to transport, it has gradually replaced coal in a wide range of applications.

The world demand for energy is rapidly increasing, due partly to the increase in population and partly to the rising standards of living in many countries. At present the world population is doubling about every forty years, and energy consumption about every twenty years (see Population Policy*). Do we have enough energy to supply these needs?

There is almost limitless energy available in the motions of the winds, the waves and the tides, and in the rays of the sun. It is however very spread out and not easy to harness in useful form. To be useful, energy must be concentrated, and that is why wood, coal and oil are widely used. There is not enough wood to meet our needs, so we have first to consider coal and oil. There are still vast deposits of coal, so that remains a possibility, but estimates show that world oil production is likely to peak some time in the early decades of the next century, and thereafter to fall.

This combination of rising demands and dwindling resources is the basis of the energy crisis. Where is the energy needed by future generations to come from? We certainly need all the energy we can get, and so the possible sources must be evaluated for their capacity, cost, safety, reliability and effects on the environment.*

In addition to the energy sources mentioned, hydroelectric and nuclear power must be considered. Hydropower is very important, especially in mountainous countries like Switzerland and Norway. The number of suitable rivers is, however, limited, and it is unlikely to provide more than about 10% of world energy needs. Nuclear power certainly has the capacity to satisfy our needs, and already provides more electricity in Western Europe than coal does.

The renewable sources - wind, wave and solar - have important small-scale applications, but are unreliable, costly and bad for the environment. Apart from oil, which is fast running out, that leaves coal and nuclear power as the main sources of future energy supplies. The experience of many countries is that their costs are comparable, with nuclear rather cheaper in most cases.

No energy source is completely safe; the mining of coal, the construction of power stations, the transport of fuel and the distribution to the consumer are all more or less hazardous activities. Detailed studies by Edward Pochin and Herbert Inhaber show that the deaths involved in the generation of 1,000 megawatt years of electricity in various ways are approximately: coal 40, oil 10, nuclear 1, gas 0.5, hydroelectric 3, wind and solar 5.

Coal-power stations emit large quantities of carbon dioxide that contribute to the greenhouse effect, and oxides of nitrogen and sulphur and other poisonous chemicals that form acid rain. Some of these poisonous emissions can be prevented, but only at a great expense. In normal operation, nuclear power stations have practically no deleterious effects on the environment.

Despite these obvious advantages, nuclear power has encountered great opposition. The initial association with the atomic bomb, and accidents like those at Three Mile Island and Chernobyl, have undermined public confidence. The former accident was attributable to poor operating procedures, and the latter to a reactor design unacceptable in the West and to flagrant disregard of operating procedures.

There is also much concern about the disposal of nuclear waste. This consists of the highly radioactive fission products which remain in the fuel rods after the uranium has been burnt. The disposal of such waste is, however, a well-tried procedure. The radioactivity is first allowed to decay to a much lower level, and then the waste is fused into an insoluble ceramic, encased in stainless steel and buried deep in a stable geological formation where it can cause no harm. Radioactivity can easily be detected, and the whole process is carefully monitored. The radiation due to the nuclear industry is far lower than that due to natural sources.

Some studies have shown a small excess of leukaemia cases in the vicinity of nuclear plants, but many others have shown no excess. It is, however, unlikely that any excess could be due to nuclear radiation, because the amounts that escape from the plants are far lower than in the natural background. Further more, there are many leukaemia clusters in other places, and so it is likely that they are of viral or chemical origin. Recent work suggesting a link between paternal irradiation and leukaemic children is inconsistent with previous results, especially the absence of leukaemia among children of survivors of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, who received on average five times the dose of the Sellafield fathers. Studies of DNA instability show that a causal relationship is extremely unlikely.

Looking to the future, it is likely that the pollution due to coal power will be increasingly recognized, and that nuclear power will regain public confidence. When uranium supplies become depleted, fast reactors will enable the uranium 238 to be burnt, and this is about a hundred times as plentiful in natural uranium as the uranium 235 which is burnt at present. Still further ahead, we may hope that fusion power will eventually become available.

Energy in all its forms is a gift of the creator, to be harnessed and used responsibly. Many of the earth's resources are limited and should be used to satisfy real needs, and not irresponsibly squandered. Technology* provides the means to carry out more efficiently Christ's commands to feed the hungry and to clothe the naked and so it is good and indeed essential. It should, however, remain our servant and not become our master. In all its activities there is a duty to reduce its harmful effects, from inhuman working conditions to pollution of the environment.

See also: GLOBAL ETHICS;† STEWARDSHIP.

Bibliography

E. Boyes (ed.), Shaping Tomorrow (London, 1981); B. Cohen, Before It's Too Late (New York, 1983); P. E. Hodgson, Our Nuclear Future? (London, 1983); idem, World Energy Needs and Resources (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1981).

P.E.H.

ENLIGHTENMENT, THE (Ger. Aufklärung), is a historically ambiguous and politically contentious designation. In its most general sense, the term stands for new intellectual and social trends formulated in the late 17th century, expounded in the 18th and transformed in the 19th. At the end of the 20th century, the Enlightenment is regarded by some as a critical first step in the liberation of the human spirit, by others as a disastrous turn from God to idols, and by still others as a complex phenomenon understandable only through analysis of the most discriminating sort.

Because notions now associated with the Enlightenment developed over time, differed from country to country, and were capable of being used both to support and to attack Christianity, the Enlightenment is best defined first of all as generically as possible. The historian Henry May (1915-) has provided an excellent example of such a definition: 'Let us say that the Enlightenment consists of all those who believe two propositions: first, that the present age is more enlightened than the past; and second, that we understand nature and man best through the use of our natural faculties' (The Enlightenment in America, p. xiv). A second necessary step is to differentiate among types of Enlightenment. Again, Henry May's designation of four different Enlightenments is a model: 1. 'moderate', as exemplified in the work of Isaac Newton (1642-1727) and John Locke (1632-1704), with an emphasis on rational and scientific explanations for natural and human phenomena; 2. 'sceptical', as illustrated by the arguments of David Hume* against epistemological certainty and by Voltaire (1694-1778) against inherited traditions in State, church and universities; 3. 'revolutionary', as propounded by a number of energetic iconoclasts during the second half of the 18th century, including Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712-78), Thomas Paine (1737-1809), and William Godwin (1765-1836); and 4. 'didactic', developed most fully in Scotland and the US in a process where Scottish philosophers like Francis Hutcheson (1694-1746) and Thomas Reid (1710-96) pointed the way for several generations of American college presidents in restoring confidence and social cohesion to the ideals of the 'moderate' Enlightenment.

May's general definition, combined with his attention to the varieties of the Enlightenment, make it possible to explain some of the theological anomalies of the 18th century. Enlightenment themes - e.g. the epis-temic priority of reason* and experience as opposed to the deliverances of tradition - fuelled the anti-supernatural speculations of English deists like John Toland (1670-1722), supported the belief of G. E. Lessing (1729-81) that historical events could never constitute necessary truths of reason, underlay Rousseau's confidence in the natural moral capacities of uncorrupted children, and led some French philosophes to become atheists. But the same themes also could be exploited by those who desired to support the State church (as in the England of Sir Isaac Newton), who wanted to find new expressions for personal faith in Christ (as in the hymns of Charles Wesley, 1707-88), or who hoped to secure the faith through the use of natural theology (as in the apologetics of William Paley, 1743-1805, and numerous American imitators). Immanuel Kant* responded to the question 'What is Enlightenment?' with a justly famous answer that revealed a prejudice against traditional Christianity: 'Enlightenment is man's emergence from his self-imposed nonage. Nonage is the inability to use one's own understanding without another's guidance ... Sapere aude, "Have the courage to use your own understanding," is therefore the motto of the enlightenment' (P. Gay, ed., The Enlightenment: A Comprehensive Anthology, New York, 1973, p. 384). But equally characteristic of the Enlightenment was the affirmation by Kant's contemporary, the Presbyterian president of Princeton College, John Witherspoon (1723-94), that a Christian seeking to live a moral life would be greatly helped by 'treating moral philosophy as Newton and his successors have done natural [philosophy]. It is always safer in our reasonings to trace facts upwards than to reason downwards upon metaphysical principles' (John Witherspoon, Works, Philadelphia, 1802, 3:470).

Given these varied uses of intellectual themes from the 18th century, it is not surprising that the Enlightenment underlay several different (even contradictory) ethical movements. For example, Kantian idealism, with its response to the moral implications of Hume's scepticism, as well as Benthamite* utilitarianism (see Consequentialism*), with its technical calculus of this-worldly probabilities, were both descended from Enlightenment principles. The Enlightenment also serves as a shorthand designation for several general tendencies that influenced Christian ethics. Jonathan Edwards* wrestled with definitions of 'the moral sense' expounded by Hutcheson. John Wesley* exploited Lockean conceptions of human experience to define his doctrine of Christian perfection. The utilitarian ethics of Paley were both religiously conservative and rooted in Enlightenment conventions about human happiness. The Enlightenment, as a protean movement, had protean effects. Since the 18th century, all ethicists, both Christian and non-Christian, have been coming to terms with its multiform influences.

Bibliography

D. W. Bebbington, Evangelicalism in Modern Britain (London, 1989), pp. 20-74; P. Gay, The Enlightenment: An Interpretation, 2 vols. (New York, 1966, 1969); P. Hazard, European Thought in the Eighteenth Century, from Montesquieu to Lessing (ET, New Haven, CT, and London, 1954); M. C. Jacob, The Newtonians and the English Revolution, 1689-1720 (Ithaca, NY, 1976); A. Macintyre, After Virtue (Notre Dame, IN, 1984; London, 1985); H. May, The Enlightenment in America (New York, 1976); R. Porter and M. Teich (eds.), The Enlightenment in National Context (Cambridge, 1981); H. D. Rack, Reasonable Enthusiast: John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism (London and Philadelphia, 1989); R. B. Sher, Church and University in the Scottish Enlightenment (Princeton, NJ, 1985).

M.A.N.

ENVIRONMENT. The term 'environment' is an elusive one. It is most often used in contemporary society to indicate a whole range of issues which involve the relationships of humankind to the animate and inanimate world. Such issues raise problems which range from the largely individual, e.g. the effect of nuclear radiation or chemical pollution on the health of human beings, through the regional, e.g. the effects of overfishing in the North Sea or the rapid clearance of tropical rain forest (see Deforestation*), through to those embracing the whole planet, notably global warming and the breakdown of the ozone layer. The preservation of 'endangered' species, the conservation of habitats and ecosystems, and the fragility of highenergy farming are also major issues for debate.

The scientific dimensions of these problems are generally understood, at least in broad terms. It is generally acknowledged, however, that mere understanding is not enough, and that there is an ethical dimension to these problems which requires fuller exploration. The common view, based on dubious exegesis of Gn. 1:26-28, that the 'Judaean-Christian ethic of mankind's unfettered dominion over nature' is to blame, has now been generally refuted (see J. Passmore, Man's Responsibility For Nature; R. Attfield, The Ethics of Environmental Concern), but the search for an ethical basis is still seen as an urgent question (Church Information Office, Our Responsibility for the Living Environment). The new perspective on the natural world which has been provided by the science of ecology has often been advocated as a novel starting-point appropriate to modern thought. The scientific understanding so achieved is in itself, however, unable to bear the ethical burden, and is always, often implicitly, supported by the elevation of 'evolution' to the status of an ontological principle, or by the introduction of a mystical view of nature and its complexity.

Ethical perspectives

There are five broad ethical perspectives which are proposed or assumed.

1. Technological pragmatism. Relationships with elements in the environment, both animate and inanimate, are seen simply as aspects of management,* embracing both normal use and the solution of any problems which arise. The ethical questions are not faced explicitly; the solution to a problem consists in finding an appropriate technique to control or eliminate it. That technique may well involve legal prescriptions as well as technology* in the more restricted sense. This approach is common in much thinking in the developed world and underlies much contemporary political concern about environmental issues. It does not, however, face the questions as to whether or why the human species should be concerned about the environment in which it exists independently of any benefit or threat it may afford. Nor does it face the question why the human species itself should in any sense be 'worth' preserving, and it assumes an anthropocentric focus which considers human material advance as the paramount value.

2. Evolutionary humanism. The evolutionary humanist view attempts to answer these questions by positing some inherent value in 'evolution' itself. Evolution is seen as an overriding ontological principle, in that the human species is the most complex product of that process so far; by virtue of its intellectual development, it is now able to 'determine his own evolution', and by its technological ingenuity can also control the course of development of other species and indeed the planet as a whole. This is typified by many prominent writers, e.g. David Attenborough (1926-) and biologists such as Edward Wilson (1929-). (See A. L. Caplan, The Sociobiology Debate.)

A. N. Flew (1923-) has discussed the problems of deriving an ethical system from such biological premises in Evolutionary Ethics. The fundamental dilemma is the equation of the development of increasing complexity with 'progress', which is a value concept (see Evolutionary Ethics*). This step in the argument has no demonstrable logical justification, and depends upon arbitrarily assigning 'value' to a sequence of events. Ethical concepts are linked intuitively to evolutionary knowledge and research by writers such as Richard Dawkins (1941-), e.g. in The Blind Watchmaker.

3. Ecological mysticism. It is therefore not surprising that an element of 'nature mysticism' insinuates itself into the argument, often implicitly. Such ecological mysticism takes various forms. An appeal is sometimes made to the philosophy of oriental religions, such as Buddhism, which are seen as being more 'nature-friendly' than the transcendent monotheism of Islam, Judaism and Christianity (F. Fraser Darling, 'Man's Responsibility For the Environment'). Others take the apparent self-regulation of the planet as a whole, which

J. E. Lovelock (1919-) has advanced as an arguable scientific hypothesis in Gaia: A New Look at Life on Earth, and instil a mystical character into it so that it becomes a quasi-religious concept, termed the 'Gaia' hypothesis. This frequently leads to a deep reverence for nature, and even to the worship of the earth, sometimes as the Earth Mother. This underlying reverence and awe, even personification of nature itself, probably represents ancient beliefs whose origins are lost in the mists of prehistory. It now shows an active resurgence resulting from a developing dissatisfaction with the ecological consequences of 'scientism', i.e. naive trust in and reliance on the methods and findings of scientific study to solve all problems and to direct human behaviour. This trust in science* and technology is undoubtedly supported by many valuable technological achievements, and has held intellectual sway for well over a century in the industrialized world.

The most rapidly growing element in this contemporary resurgence is the New Age movement.* This is a broad spectrum of related outlooks. At one end is the relatively innocuous desire to return to a closer, more wholesome, relationship with nature, which is supposed to have existed universally in the past, and is seen still to exist in aboriginal societies in Australia and the remoter recesses of the Amazon forests. At the other end there is an overt involvement with the occult.* Much New Age thinking explicitly embraces an astrological evaluation which sees the year 2000 as a passage from the age of 'Pisces', equated with the Christian era, to the age of 'Aquarius', an era of universal harmony and brotherhood between human beings and between humankind and nature. That New Age is to be actively anticipated now by those who are properly enlightened. It also sometimes emphasizes that this change will be achieved by a new recognition of the Earth Mother and the according of proper reverence and worship to her. The attraction of the movement in an age of disillusion with 'science' is very clear; it combines a degree of scientific understanding with a deeply religious dimension which is not in any sense transcendent, and which therefore can make no absolute moral demands on the whole of life. It internalizes religious aspirations within the universe itself.

4. Liberal Christianity. The 'liberal' Christian perspective also embraces a range of somewhat dissimilar views. Most assign a primary role to evolutionary thinking, and therefore implicitly relegate the idea of a unique revelation to a subsidiary position. Those which are 'evolutionist' in a broad philosophical sense generally produce an overt syncretism (as in the case of Matthew Fox, Original Blessing: A Primer in Creation Spirituality). Other contemporary Roman Catholic writers acknowledge a primary debt to P. Teilhard de Chardin (1881-1955), and adopt a more orthodox stance (e.g. Sean McDonagh, To Care for the Earth and The Greening of the Church). In Protestant writing there is a tendency to minimize the effects of the Fall,* and to think in terms of a 'cosmic Christ' at the expense of the historical Jesus of Nazareth (e.g. I. Bradley, God is Green). This usually leads to a neglect of the explicit link of the redemption of nature to the redemption of individual men and women into a new creation in Christ, made by Paul in Rom. 8:18-25. This view of the ethic of the use of nature by humankind does emphasize the important point that ethics are intimately interwoven with theology.

5. Conservative Christianity. More 'conservative' Christian views have been put forward. C. Derrick (1921-), from the Roman Catholic Church, argued that present problems are brought about by the heresy of Manichaeism, which supposed that matter was inherently evil, subtly infiltrating Christian thinking about nature (see The Delicate Creation). Francis Schaeffer* had already set out the biblical view that creation is good, but misused and damaged by humankind in self-centred disobedience to God (Pollution and the Death of Man). Other theologically conservative Christians have also made a contribution, arguing that a comprehensive biblical approach provides a workable and justifiable ethic for the use of the resources of the environment, and care for the natural world in itself (R. Elsdon, Bent World; R. P. Moss, 'Environmental Problems and the Christian Ethic').

The basic concept underlying such an approach is that of 'stewardship'* (D. J. Hall, Imaging God; W. Granberg-Michaelson, ed., Tending the Garden). Humankind is directly responsible to God for the use of the earth and its resources. As stewards or tenants people are responsible for the use they make of property which is not their own. This concept is derived largely from OT sources, but the redemption of the whole cosmos together with humankind is seen as a central element in the work of Christ. There is a further corollary. Failure to recognize divine ownership is disobedience and sin, not simply ignorance, and thus repentance is a primary requirement in seeking to solve the problems with which humankind is now so evidently confronted.

Environment and world community

It may be asked why it is that environmental problems now occupy so central a place in political and religious concern. This is clearly the result of the fact that the consequences of misusing the earth and its resources now directly affect humankind in an increasingly acute way. The further question is therefore: Why should that be happening now? A book containing the texts of a series of lectures given at Darwin College, Cambridge, in 1986, gives an excellent scientific overview of the major global problems (L. Friday and R. C. Laskey, The Fragile Environment).

These issues, however, relate to society as a whole and are not purely scientific. The accentuation of these problems has been attributed to a number of factors: 1. There is the numerical growth of the population of the world, which creates an additional demand for resources. 2. The development and spread of technology in itself increases the environmental pressure. 3. The growing sophistication of technology also makes a greater impact on the environment as new resources are exploited, as in the case of nuclear energy* and, increasingly, by genetic engineering;* more importantly they create new possibilities for damage to nature itself when they are extensively used. 4. There is the growing affluence of the developing world, which creates a greater demand for goods and energy, which has to be met from the resources of the earth. 5. Environmental damage has been seen as the product of capitalism,* an economic system which depends upon the operation of market forces which encourage the minimization of costs, including those of the prevention of environmental damage. It would now seem that the Marxist-Leninist socialism of Eastern Europe has led to no less damage, but some would see that as a form of State capitalism.

These suggestions raise the further question whether there should be any limit to technological development. It would seem that the limits of human ingenuity have not yet been approached; questions remain concerning the availability of earth resources, but some would maintain that the only inevitable requirement for further development is an adequate energy supply, which is in practice potentially unlimited. The ethical dilemma posed by the question whether economic growth can continue without further significant environmental damage nevertheless remains. This leads into the debate whether environmental considerations should enter into economic and business decisions. It seems clear that practical environmental concern will involve increased costs, resulting in either higher prices or reduced profits, and that reduced consumption will lead to decreasing demand, which may in turn produce unemployment.*

Such ethical considerations inevitably raise the issues which surround the global economy, and the acute problems of famine and environmental degradation faced in the developing world which are closely linked to the operation of that economy. The poor, as individuals or communities or nations, have little environmental choice. The rich tend to make increasing environmental demands as greater affluence and an increase in material possessions are seen as overriding goods. This, in turn, leads on to the moral and practical problems of Third World aid* and investment.

The problems which relate to the relationship of humankind to the rest of creation thus pose many ethical questions. Furthermore, there are few other aspects of human behaviour individually or in society upon which such questions do not impinge. The formulation and justification of ethical norms in this area are therefore crucial, but the answers are not straightforward, either in theory or in their practical outworking.

See also: GLOBAL ETHICS;† POPULATION POLICY.

Bibliography

R. Attfield, The Ethics of Environmental Concern (Oxford, 1983); I. Bradley, God is Green: Christianity and the Environment (London, 1990); A. L. Caplan (ed.), The Sociobiology Debate: Readings on the Ethical Issues concerning Sociobiology (London, 1972; New York, 1978); Church Information Office, Our Responsibility for the Living Environment (London, 1986); F. F. Darling, 'Man's Responsibility for the Environment', in F. J. Ebling (ed.), Biology and Ethics (London, 1969); R. Dawkins, The Blind Watchmaker (London, 1986); C. Derrick, The Delicate Creation: Towards a Theology of the Environment (London, 1972); R. Elsdon, Bent World: Science, the Bible and the Environment (Leicester, 1981); A. N. Flew, Evolutionary Ethics (London, 1967; New York, 1968); M. Fox, Original Blessing: A Primer in Creation Spirituality, in Four Paths, Twenty-six Themes, and Two Questions (Santa Fe, NM, 1983; Cambridge, MA, 1990); L. Friday and R. C. Laskey (eds.), The Fragile Environment (Cambridge, 1989); W. Granberg-Michaelson (ed.), Tending the Garden: Essays on the Gospel and the Earth (Grand Rapids, 1987); D. J. Hall, Imaging God: Dominion as Stewardship (Grand Rapids, 1986); J. E. Lovelock, Gaia: A New Look at Life on Earth (Oxford, 1979); S. McDonagh, To Care for the Earth: A Call to a New Theology (Santa Fe, NM, and London, 1986); idem, The Greening of the Church (Maryknoll, NY, 1990); R. P. Moss, 'Environmental Problems and the Christian Ethic', in C. F. Henry (ed.), Horizons of Science: Christian Scholars Speak Out (New York, 1978); L. Osborn, Guardians of Creation (Leicester, 1993); J. Passmore, Man's Responsibility for Nature (London, 1980); F. A. Schaeffer, Pollution and the Death of Man: The Christian View of Ecology (London and Wheaton, IL, 1970).

R.P.M.

ENVY, see DEADLY SINS; JEALOUSY AND ENVY.

EQUALITY is a contested concept: that is to say its meaning is far from clear and it is difficult to arrive at an agreed definition. The most common use of equality is in the economic sphere.

Two main approaches to equality

The quasi-mathematical sense of the term 'equality' has led to the advocacy of two main approaches:

1. Equality of outcome. On this view, egalitarian policies should minimize or eradicate differentials in wealth between individuals or households. Taxation* and other mechanisms should be used to redistribute wealth from the richer to the poorer.

Critics of equality of outcome point out that: a. it is unrealistically utopian; b. human nature will always seek ways of restoring wealth differentials, whether overtly or covertly; c. history shows that all attempts to impose such equality have failed; d. equality of outcome could apply only to tangible forms of wealth (money, houses, goods, etc.), not to intangibles such as power,* which are just as important; e. the cost would be high in terms of freedom,* since equality could be achieved only by totalitarian means; f. the justice it seeks to achieve would be replaced by injustice; and g. the depressive effects upon economic incentive and initiative would reduce the total wealth available for redistribution and therefore would be counter-productive.

2. Equality of opportunity. Proponents of this view accept the criticisms outlined above, and argue instead that the purpose of egalitarian policies should not be to create equality of outcome, but to enable individuals and households to have fair access to the economic system and to be in a position to maximize their benefits from it. In the metaphor of an athletics race, the aim is not that all should finish in the same position but that all should be enabled to compete fairly.

Critics point out that, whilst avoiding some of the problems associated with equality of outcome, equality of opportunity presents its own difficulties: a. how far is it a theory of equality at all if it does not address the question of redistribution?; b. it is no less utopian since it assumes that all individuals can be enabled to gain access to the economic system; c. for those who remain unable to do so through disability, illness, lack of education, poverty, etc., the problem of redistribution remains, so it becomes necessary to narrow wealth differentials as in equality of outcome; and d. the metaphor of the race is inadequate, since not all can run the race, and some of those who can, have the ability to reap only minimum rewards.

Equality therefore cannot be discussed in isolation. Any viable theory of equality must also address concepts of freedom and justice (see Justice and Peace†) and present a coherent relationship between all three.

The most recent major attempt to do this has been that of the American philosopher John Rawls (1921-). In A Theory of Justice (Cambridge, MA, 1971; Oxford, 1972), he argued that inequalities of wealth were acceptable only under three conditions: a. that each person should have an equal right to the most extensive basic liberties compatible with a like liberty for all; b. that inequalities of wealth, power, income and status must result in the maximization of benefit to the most disadvantaged (the principle of 'maximin'); and c. such inequalities must go with positions or appointments open to all under fair conditions of equality of opportunity (see Discrimination*). From these principles it can be seen that Rawls attempts to bring together both approaches to equality cited earlier. Although criticized on a number of grounds, Rawls' theory has the virtues both of integrating ideas of freedom and justice with equality and of offering criteria by which these concepts may be evaluated. The notion of 'maximin' is especially useful (i.e. the choice of an action which has, as its worse outcome, a consequence which is better than the worst consequence of any alternative action).

Theological reflection

The concepts of equality, freedom and justice in the sense in which they appear in contemporary debate are distinctly modern. They are not to be found in the Bible or in early church writings. This does not invalidate them, but it does require that they be set in a critical theological context.

One approach would ground ideas of economic and political equality, freedom and justice in the Being of God (see †) as Trinity and then derivatively in the model this provides for human society. Theologically and historically the Trinity has been held to function as a model of persons-in-relationship. In this social model, Father, Son and Spirit are co-equal in status and exist in a relationship of dialogue, reciprocity, self-giving and mutual love. The persons of the Godhead do not exist as independent persons for themselves but, in the words of Leonardo Boff (1938-): 'the essential characteristic of each person is to be for the others, through the others, with the others and in the others' (Trinity and Society, ET, London and Maryknoll, NY, 1988, pp. 127-128).

The significance of this paradigm for human society can be traced through: 1. the image of God,* which is given to human beings in plural form in Gn. 1:26-27; 2. the incarnation; 3. the metaphor of the body of Christ; and 4. the kingdom of God.* In all these, the life of the Trinity is to be imaged and shared.

Alongside this must be emphasized the biblical notion of differentiation. Although equal in status, neither the members of the Godhead nor human beings as the recipients of the image of God should be viewed as identical. This rules out secular theories of equality of outcome since differing gifts will lead to differing outcomes.

The concept of freedom likewise derives from Trinitarian theology. The freedom of the Godhead is to be 'for the others'. Similarly, as Richard Bauckham (1946-) has pointed out, biblical ideas of freedom have to do not with individualistic freedom to self-fulfilment but with corporate freedom for the service of others: 'My neighbour is not simply a restraint on my freedom but one whom I am to love as myself' (The Bible in Politics, London and Philadelphia, KY, 1989, p. 107). Freedom is thus a positive good arising out of our service to God.

Further theological light is shed on the notion of equality by the pattern of economic life envisaged in the OT (see Old Testament Ethics†). The land* formed the fundamental resource which required to be shared according to three theological principles: 1. it belonged to God so that Israelites held it leasehold not freehold; 2. it was a grace-gift to the whole nation in which all had a stake; and 3. it was to be used fairly, i.e. all households must have access to it as an economic resource. For these reasons, unjust accumulation of land and unfair dealing were condemned by the prophets. Equality of outcome was not demanded but fair access was, along with compassion for those who became economically marginalized. Thus Israel's 'own brand . . . of economic egalitarianism ... did not obliterate differentials but attempted to confine them within the proper limits of functional necessity for the harmony and peace of society' (C.J. H. Wright, Living as the People of God, Leicester and Downers Grove, IL, 1983, p. 112).

A theologically-based theory of equality must therefore go further than that of any secular theorist, since it is grounded positively in the divine purpose for humanity. That purpose is to share in the life of the Trinity and thereby to create a community of reciprocal compassion and love. This is not dependent upon equality of outcome or opportunity but upon equal access to the grace* of God revealed in Christ.

Bibliography

R. Norman, Free and Equal (Oxford, 1983); J. D. Wagaman, Economics and Ethics (London and Philadelphia, 1986); B. Wren, Education for Justice (London, 1986).

F.W.B.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES, see EQUALITY.

ERIKSON, ERIK (1902-94). Born in Germany of a Jewish mother, Erikson fled to Boston in 1933, where he worked as the city's only child-analyst. He later taught at Harvard and at Yale, and also at one time had a private psychoanalytic practice in California.

Erikson's contact with sociologists and anthropologists, as well as psychologists, contributed to his classic study Childhood and Society (1950). In this, Erikson explores the links between society's values and individual development, and provides the groundwork for his reconstruction of psychoanalytic theory. He called this an 'epigenetic' approach to psycho-social development, and opened up ways of linking psychoanalytic theory with questions of moral and spiritual values, and with the development of faith. His work has formed the basis for much subsequent pastoral psychology and pastoral theology (see Practical and Pastoral Theology†), and for James Fowler's (1940-) theories regarding the stages of faith development.* Each phase of Erikson's eight-stage scheme is a psycho-social crisis, which needs to be resolved satisfactorily if individual maturity is to be achieved, and personal identity established. The crucial phases are described as: 1. the critical decision between trust versus mistrust; 2. autonomy* versus shame and doubt; 3. initiative versus guilt;* 4. industry versus inferiority; 5. identity versus role confusion; 6. intimacy versus isolation; 7. generativity versus stagnation; and 8. integrity versus despair. The dynamics of identity formation were also explored in Identity: Youth and Crisis (1968).

In addition, Erikson wrote studies of various significant historic figures, including Martin Luther* and Mohandas (Mahatma) Gandhi (1869-1948).

See also: PSYCHOANALYSIS.

Bibliography

Childhood and Society (New York, ¹1963; Harmondsworth, ²1965).

R. Coles, Erik H. Erikson: The Growth of his Work (London, 1973); M. Jacobs, Towards the Fullness of Christ: Pastoral Care and Christian Maturity (London, 1988); J. E. Wright, Erikson: Identity and Religion (New York, 1982).

D.J.A.

ESCHATOLOGY AND ETHICS. Neither 'eschatology' nor 'ethics' formed part of the vocabulary of the NT writers but both words are heavily used by modern scholars to sum up certain aspects of the NT's teaching. Strictly speaking, 'eschatology' is 'teaching about the last things', and its content is the coming of the Son of Man/Messiah at the end of the age accompanied by the full inauguration of the kingdom of God,* the last judgment* and the 'age to come'.

The teaching of Jesus was largely concerned with these events. The kingdom of God was the key concept in his teaching. He certainly looked forward to its future coming, and urged people to prepare themselves to enter it. He also spoke of its coming as something that could happen at any time, and therefore there was an urgency about his references to it. For some scholars that was all he said: that the kingdom was future, and indeed, very near, so that nothing remained for mankind but to prepare for its coming (see Interim Ethic*). For others, the decisive element in Jesus' message was that the kingdom had already come or was in process of coming - and again this introduces the note of urgency into his preaching.

The first followers of Jesus recognized that he was the Messiah, God's agent in the coming of his kingdom, who had already come and was now ruling from heaven, and they looked forward to his future coming - which again they thought of as capable of happening at any time. But if the Messiah had come, then it follows that what was traditionally thought of as the subject of 'eschatology' - the last things - was already taking place (hence the phrase 'realized eschatology' to signify that the final intervention of God into world history has already begun to happen, and that the so-called 'last days' have already begun).

All this means that the proclamation of Jesus and his followers was dominated by the belief in the presence and imminence of the rule of God and its agent, the Messiah. Inevitably, therefore, the teaching of Jesus and of the early Christians about how people should live was fundamentally shaped by this basic conviction.

The term 'ethics' is normally used to signify how people ought to behave in relation to one another (and towards the physical environment*). It thus covers the social aspects of conduct. As applied to the teaching of Jesus, it includes this area - note his teaching about love (see †) for one's neighbours and enemies - but it is even wider in scope, covering the relationship of people to God as well. Biblical ethics is thus concerned with faith* and love towards God, as well as with moral repentance.*

The early Christian belief in the coming of the kingdom of God influenced the motives for living ethically. One of the main sanctions of biblical morality lies in the intervention of God in the life of the world in and through Jesus both now and in the future; the future judgment is a powerful stimulus to live ethically, and the fact that the kingdom of God has come and that the followers of Jesus are part of it means that they are to live the kind of life appropriate to its members.

As regards the content of the ethics, it is true that some biblical teaching rests upon the nature of the order imposed by God as part of creation,* and some teaching is of such a general kind that it would be acceptable to people of any religion or none. Some theologians want to distinguish between 'creation ethics' and 'kingdom ethics', but, since God is one and unchanging, the ethics of the kingdom are the same as those of creation; God's way of life for his people comes to sharper focus and more concentrated expression in the teaching of Jesus and his followers. Jesus gives instruction for his followers who accept 'the yoke of the kingdom', and does not make the concessions 'because of the hardness of your hearts' that were made in the law of Moses, but in principle his teaching is intended for all humankind. His followers are to live out the life of the kingdom of God here and now in this world, thus fulfilling his original purpose for his creation.

See also: NEW TESTAMENT ETHICS;† OLD TESTAMENT ETHICS.†

Bibliography

G. E. Ladd, Jesus and the Kingdom (New York, 1964; London, 1966) = The Presence of the Future (Grand Rapids, 1974); W. Schrage, The Ethics of the New Testament (ET, Edinburgh and Philadelphia, 1988); A. N. Wilder, Eschatology and Ethics in the Teaching of Jesus (New York, 1950).

I.H.M.

ESPIONAGE. The use of clandestine methods for obtaining accurate knowledge about others, whether industrial competitors or foreign nations, has long been regarded as necessary to effective policyformation. Espionage is the covert side of the process of gathering and analysing secret information, which is itself one part of intelligence activity as a whole and should be distinguished from counter-intelligence (the protection of secrets from rival companies or hostile intelligence services) and covert political action (intervention by national intelligence agencies in the domestic affairs of other countries). Although this article concentrates on military, political and industrial information-gathering, analogous moral considerations apply in the case of undercover police work, investigative journalism, etc.

Espionage work is often portrayed as a morally distasteful but (in certain circumstances) necessary means to a good end, or, more radically, as a realm in which ethical norms do not apply. By contrast, a fully incarnational Christian ethic will reject the thought, whether prompted by high-mindedness or by cynicism, that morality and espionage occupy separate spheres of existence - though it will also accept that the task of discerning the right course of action may be difficult and at times demand exceptional courage and practical wisdom. Instead theological reflection starts from the keeping of secrets (see Secrecy*) as the context of espionage. While the promise in Mt. 10:26, that in the coming kingdom there is 'nothing concealed that will not be disclosed, or hidden that will not be made known', suggests that there should be a presumption in favour of openness and non-concealment, the world is nevertheless fallen, and some organizational secrecy may be justified for the sake of the common good. Some military secrets may be necessary for a nation's self-preservation; some administrative confidentiality* may be required to prevent premature disclosure of unformed policies; and without industrial secrecy companies may have reduced incentives to undertake creative research and development projects.

Such examples can be interpreted in terms of a limited right to secrecy, which may not be impugned without just cause. This notion of just cause forms the primary criterion for the morality of intelligence-gathering, making clear that the right to secrecy is not absolute but may be qualified by the requirements of the national and international common good which ground it. Thus satellite surveillance of a country trying to evade verification of its compliance with arms-control agreements might be justified by appeal to this principle, as might intelligence work against terrorist organizations, drugs cartels, and (within limits prescribed by an account of the morality of international relations) actual or potential enemies. In the case of industrial espionage, by contrast, although the rewards may be great (e.g. saving wasteful expenditure on research or new plant), it is not clear that they ordinarily amount to a just cause, though this depends in part on the nature of the business and the provisions made by the public authorities for the common good. It should be noted that even the bulk of routine intelligence work, which draws on published documents, the mass media and other overt sources, should be referred to this criterion, though the public availability of the information may be prima facie evidence that the right to secrecy has been waived.

Even if the goal of gathering secret information is on occasions justifiable through this principle, not all means of obtaining it are moral. Apart from clearly unacceptable practices (e.g. blackmail, extortion and torture), the most prominent moral questions surround intelligence activities which are not merely covert (e.g. eavesdropping or interception of communications) but also deceptive. Informants and undercover agents may need to fashion elaborate webs of lies to maintain their cover, yet without them many kinds of criminal or terrorist behaviour would be effectively immune. If deliberately telling an untruth is wrong, regardless of one's intention, such disguises would be categorically inadmissible. If, however, it is possible for a hearer to lose the 'right to know the truth', they might under certain circumstances be justified (cf. Jos. 2:1-7, and see Lying*); though even here the primacy of truthfulness implies that non-deceptive alternatives should be used where available.

This emphasis on a proper but limited role for espionage work has implications for the place of the intelligence services in a democracy. Aside from questions about whether in general they make an effective use of money, organizations whose activities are hidden from public view by blanket appeals to 'national security' or 'executive privilege' are liable to corruption; this danger is vastly magnified if their powers are not limited by law, or if their corporate ethos is dominated by pragmatic notions that whatever is necessary for the public good is honourable. To counter this, one important means of helping ensure that intelligence agencies remain sensitive to the requirements of democratic process lies in public scrutiny of their activities, based on statutory definition and limitation of their powers, together with the establishment of effective internal organizational checks. Such accountability need not be incompatible in practice with genuine security needs (to protect sources of information, etc.). But it is an important way of giving substance to the principle of open government, and thereby foreshadowing the future kingdom of God.*

R.J.S.

ETHICAL METHOD, see CHRISTIAN MORAL REASONING.†

EUDAEMONISM is an approach to ethics which sees happiness* as the greatest expression of good and the basis for moral obligation; whatever most promotes human happiness is right. Though the use of the term was largely limited to the 19th century, the concept underlies a good deal of contemporary ethical thinking. The rejection of the nature or the commands of God as a basis for morality makes it necessary to find an alternative basis in humanity or in the natural world. Happiness, whether individual or corporate (the greatest happiness of the greatest number) is an obvious possibility.

Much depends on the definition of happiness in this context. Aristotle* was able to use the word (Gk. eudaimonia) to include good deeds as well as the experience of happiness. Some forms of utilitarianism (see Consequentialism*), by contrast, have defined happiness simply in terms of what we desire.

Biblical ethical teaching certainly has a place for happiness; but happiness is seen as the fruit of goodness rather than its criterion. The Sermon on the Mount* starts with an exposition of happiness; but happiness here is seen as the outcome of holiness,* not the basis of morality. Most EVV therefore rightly, here and elsewhere, translate makarios, the standard NT word for happiness, as 'blessed', reflecting the fact that its origin is in God and not in us (Mt. 5:3-12).

P.A.H.

EUGENICS, see MANIPULATION.

EUTHANASIA is the intentional killing, by act or omission, of one whose life is deemed not worth living. Despite appearances, the word 'euthanasia' is originally Eng. and of relatively recent coinage (1646, according to OED), referring to a good or happy death. In its current sense (of such a death brought about by contrivance; so-called 'mercy-killing'), the first OED citation is as recent as 1869. Though in this latter sense the term is of such recent coinage, and though it has only lately been added to the agenda of serious ethical discussion in Western law and medicine, its practice was widespread in the ancient world and has been endemic in many primitive cultures. Most Christian ethicists have seen euthanasia as inimical to an understanding of the dignity of humanity and a trust in the providence of God (see also Vatican Statements*). Some, however, argue for it on grounds of compassion and autonomy. The emergence of medical and legal toleration of euthanasia in Holland during the 1980s is one of the most striking evidences of the development of the post-Christian society in contemporary Europe.

The question of euthanasia is complex. There are different ethical and practical permutations (active/passive; voluntary/non-voluntary/involuntary), and there are vital interfaces with a series of (mainly medical) debates (the nature of the so-called 'persistent vegetative state' [see Coma*]; definitions of brain-stem death [see Brain Death*]), and issues of patient autonomy (the 'living will' [see Consent*]), health economics and the allocation of scarce resources (see Health and Health Care*). Special questions have been raised in the case of handicapped new-borns (see Ethics of Medical Care†), where non-treatment decisions have become common and where the logic of euthanasia is scarcely distinguishable from that of abortion.*

Much popular support for euthanasia arises from two common misconceptions: that death is normally preceded by serious pain,* and that the application of modern medical technology is intended to draw out the dying process as long as possible (see Death and Dying*). Euthanasia is widely, and understandably, preferred. In fact, modern drug therapies free most terminal patients from serious discomfort, and good medicine, while rejecting euthanasia, has always also rejected futile treatment which merely prolongs the process of dying. In traditional Hippocratic medicine the priority in terminal care has always been the comfort of the patient, even if securing that comfort (by treating with pain-killing drugs) may also have the effect of shortening life. Treatment is not started or continued unless it is beneficial, i.e. likely to lead to a significant improvement in the patient's condition and life-expectancy, or if the discomfort it will cause is out of proportion to any such benefit. These and other such principles of good medicine are exemplified in the modern hospice* movement. In repudiating 'mercykilling', they focus on what has been called 'mercy-dying', that idea of death with dignity which lies at the heart of traditional approaches to the care of the terminally ill.

Customary distinctions have been made between euthanasia which is 'active' (the result of positive action on the part of the attendant), and that which is 'passive' (involving the omission or discontinuation of life-sustaining treatment). In each case the intention is the same: to bring about the patient's death. There is a growing tendency to enlarge definitions of 'treatment' so as to include feeding by tube as well as more obviously medical procedures (such as mechanical ventilation), and in a series of celebrated cases in the US courts permission has been sought to 'withdraw treatment' and thereby cause death by denial of nutrition and hydration. In such circumstances, the cessation or withholding of 'treatment' is ethically indistinguishable from positive action to bring about death, for the medical attendant and others responsible have a duty to the patient, know the likely implications of their action, and may indeed have engaged in this management option intending to bring about the patient's death.

There is a fundamental ethical and clinical distinction between such 'non-treatment' decisions and those made in the context of the final stages of terminal illness, when the criteria of proportionate benefit apply and when death does not occur as a result of the physician's intention to bring it about.

A more fundamental distinction appears to lie between euthanasia that is 'voluntary' (requested by the patient) and that which is 'involuntary' (determined by another, whether physician, relative or the State) or 'nonvoluntary' (in cases where the patient is incompetent, e.g. an infant [see Infanticide*]).

Most contemporary advocates of legalized euthanasia stress the voluntary character of their goal, and place considerable weight on the autonomy of the patient as the determining factor in the argument. The patient has the right to decide when to die. There are many difficulties with this superficially attractive view. For one thing, the 'voluntary' character of any decision for euthanasia is problematic: it will almost inevitably be taken either at a time of great distress or so far in advance (through an 'advance directive' or 'living will') that the decision is hypothetical; the patient may be suffering from clinical depression* (not uncommon in chronic or terminal illness); the influence of relatives and doctor may be great, though subtle (and their interests, emotional or financial, hard to disentangle). Again, if a request for euthanasia is to be distinguished from a desire for suicide,* some criteria of reasonableness must be applied, to give objective validity to the patient's assessment of his or her situation. All such criteria (whether referring to a level of pain, a degree of handicap or a particular prognosis) involve some conception of a life that is 'not worth living'; and that, in turn, has implications for euthanasia which is involuntary. If A has made a reasonable or justified request for euthanasia, what is the standing of B, whose circumstances are the same, yet who has not made such a request? Surely B is unreasonable and unjustified to refrain from requesting euthanasia. Moreover, once the essentially reasonable, objective character of such a decision is accepted, other factors come into play. B is using costly resources and placing considerable strains on relatives and medical and nursing staff. The 'non-voluntary' case adds to the problem of distinguishing between these two, since here some set of objective criteria must do duty for an expression of the patient's will; the judgment of someone other than the patient must be substituted, and that judgment must be supported by some kind of model of what it takes for a life 'not to be worth living'. The appeal of voluntary euthanasia as the final outcome of patient autonomy depends crucially upon its separability from euthanasia which is involuntary, and which represents the inversion of patient autonomy in a new and deadly paternalism. If this separation cannot be sustained, the case for voluntary euthanasia is fatally flawed.

The relation of (voluntary) euthanasia and suicide is often noted, as if euthanasia were essentially an act of assisted suicide. Yet euthanasia is not self-killing; it is the killing of the self by another. It may involve the will to self-destruction which characterizes the suicide, but it involves also the acquiescence in that will by another who then commits an act of homicide. The logic of patient autonomy would go further, and suggest that for the physician or nurse or relative there is a duty to kill, which raises further ethical and practical problems. Linguistic masking (the killing of the sick dressed up as 'aid-in-dying') fails to conceal the principle that is at issue and its extreme novelty in the Western medical tradition. If the idea that there are ascertainable criteria which can and should validate a euthanasia request is disowned, the idea of a life not worth living becomes entirely subjective ('I find my life intolerable at this point'). But if that subjective judgment places a duty to 'aid-in-dying' on others, what of the jilted teenager and the post-natal depressive? Unfettered patient autonomy leads straight into reductio ad absurdum.

A further complication is raised by the advance directive, the so-called 'living will', in which conditions are laid down for the refusal of future medical treatment in case of incompetence. Considered simply as an extension of the principle that patients must consent to treatment, these 'wills' seem unexceptionable - especially in a society such as the US, where they are widely used, and in which fear of litigation can lead to serious distortions in clinical management if patients' wishes are unclear. The 'living will' is problematic partly because of its origin, in that it was designed, as a Trojan horse, by lobbyists for legalized euthanasia. A major practical difficulty is that the general terms in which these 'wills' are couched can leave them open to abuse by relatives and others, and this draws attention to the fact that they are necessarily drawn up some time in advance of the situation in which they are intended to be applied; and may be signed in complete ignorance of the actual clinical circumstances in which they must be interpreted, i.e. by physician, relatives or the courts. The extent to which the 'consent' they purpose to give or withhold is truly 'informed' is plainly rather attenuated, so the claim that they carry the standard of patient autonomy requires qualification. At best they offer patients some choice in the kind of care they will receive after they can no longer give expression to their choices. In the process, they bear striking testimony to the break-up of the ethical consensus within which Western medicine has long been practised, which presupposed shared values in society and the profession. The 'living will' is the potent symbol of a medical culture in which every patient may, perhaps must, write his or her own ethical agenda; his or her own revision of the Hippocratic Oath,* which for so long guaranteed a particular ethical character for medicine.

The Christian understanding of human life takes as its point of departure the creation of humanity, male and female, in the image of God.* The special character of human life derives from its nature as God made it, a reflection in finite, creaturely form of his own nature. God has made us like him, and that is the ground of the Bible's insistence on the supreme value of life (see Sanctity of Human Life*). This basic biblical doctrine explains the congruence of Christian perspectives on medicine with the values of pagan Hippocratism which were early absorbed by the church and which formed the basis of the Western medical tradition. The Hippocratic refusal to prescribe lethal drugs for medically assisted suicide (evidently a common practice in the pre-Hippocratic medicine of Gk. antiquity) set the face of Western medicine against any variety of suicide or euthanasia.

Two exceptions may be noted in recent years. 1. In the years immediately before the outbreak of the Second World War, doctors in Nazi Germany consented to an extensive programme of State-directed and involuntary euthanasia which led to the deaths of hundreds of thousands of German civilians - handicapped children, First World War amputees, the mentally ill. Recent historical scholarship has revealed the extent of this horrific exercise, which pre-dated and helped prepare for the wartime extermination of Jews and others. The Declaration of Geneva, in which the substance of the Hippocratic values was reaffirmed by the world medical community in the aftermath of the War, commits post-war medicine to resist euthanasia afresh. 2. During the 1980s, the medical profession in Holland began to engage in an extensive programme of voluntary euthanasia. It has not been formally legalized, but its practice is with impunity since there is medical and general social acceptance. Campaigners for the legalization of ('voluntary') euthanasia point to Holland as their model and are embarrassed by the example of frankly eugenic and involuntary medical killing in Nazi Germany.

The example of Holland is unlikely to be followed in Great Britain, as an all-party committee of the House of Lords unanimously agreed, in February 1993, that there should be no change in the law to permit euthanasia. The committee argued: 'It would be next to impossible to ensure that all acts of euthanasia were truly voluntary and that any liberalization of the law was not abused.' It also rejected the suggestion that a new offence of 'mercykilling' should be created: 'To distinguish between murder and mercy-killing would be to cross the line which prohibits any intentional killing, a line which we think it essential to preserve' (Report of the Select Committee on Medical Ethics). However, the committee supported the right of doctors to withdraw medical treatment from patients, particularly those in a persistent vegetative state. Treatment need not be given if it will 'add nothing to the patient's well-being as a person'. The report calls on doctors to draw up an agreed definition of this state, which should include the condition that the patient has shown no mental, verbal or physical responses for at least twelve months.

See also: LIFE, HEALTH AND DEATH;† QUALITY OF LIFE.

Bibliography

H. Bouma III et al., Christian Faith, Health, and Medical Practice (Grand Rapids, 1989); N. M. de S. Cameron (ed.), Death without Dignity: Euthanasia in Perspective (Edinburgh, 1990); R. Proctor, Racial Hygiene: Medicine under the Nazis (Cambridge, MA, and London, 1988); J. Rachels, The End of Life: Euthanasia and Morality (Oxford and New York, 1986); Report of the Select Committee on Medical Ethics (London, 1994); R. Sherlock, Preserving Life: Public Policy and the Life Not Worth Living (Chicago, 1987); R. W. Wennberg, Terminal Choices (Grand Rapids, and Exeter, 1989).

N.M.deS.C.

EVANGELICAL WITNESS IN SOUTH AFRICA. In 1986, a statement by 133 'concerned evangelicals' was published under the title Evangelical Witness in South Africa: Evangelicals Critique their own Theology and Practice. The document (EWISA) was written as a response by a number of mainly black evangelical pastors and theologians who had reflected on The Kairos Document and decided that, instead of criticizing the more radical theological tradition which it expressed, they would rather determine their own response to the crisis situation in South Africa at that time. In their response they pointed out that the theology and practice of the evangelical churches, groups and organizations in South Africa were totally irrelevant to the struggle against the injustice of apartheid.

The EWISA document can be considered as a Third World statement which challenges the idea that evangelicalism is a Western form of understanding and expressing the Christian faith. It is a document expressing the reality of the experience of oppression by Black evangelicals in South Africa. The document therefore addresses the demands of a situation which called for a socially relevant form of faith. It criticizes the dualism* in evangelicalism which divorces spiritual experience from sociopolitical concerns. The basic character of the document reflects a holistic emphasis in evangelical theology which gives particular expression to the concerns, hopes and aspirations of Third World Christians where the experience of oppression calls for relevant answers from the Christian faith.

The EWISA document became a rallying point for a movement of Concerned Evangelicals (CE). After the publication of the document, CE organized themselves into a national movement which addresses the context from an evangelical perspective. One of its main projects is ETHOS (Evangelical Theological House of Studies). It is designed to provide formal theological education for progressive evangelicals. The movement also participates in an international network called INFEMIT (International Fellowship of Mission Theologians).

Bibliography

Evangelical Witness in South Africa: Evangelicals Critique their own Theology and Practice (Johannesburg and Oxford, 1986).

J. R. Cochrane et al., In Word and Deed (Pietermaritzburg, 1991); C. A. Lund, A Critical Examination of Evangelicalism in South Africa (with special reference to the EWISA document and Concerned Evangelicals; unpubl. MA dissert., Cape Town, 1988); D. S. Walker, Radical Evangelicalism and the Poor: A Challenge to Aspects of Evangelical Theology in the South African Context (Pietermaritzburg, 1990).

N.J.S.

EVANGELISM is neatly defined by the 1974 Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization (see Lausanne Covenant*); 'To evangelize is to spread the good news that Jesus Christ died for our sins and was raised from the dead according to the Scriptures, and that as the reigning Lord he now offers the forgiveness of sins and the liberating gift of the Spirit to all who repent and believe' (The Lausanne Covenant, para. 4).

While *proselytism is the recruiting activity of any religious group, and the word 'proselyte' could describe a convert to anything, evangelism is a uniquely Christian activity, communicating the story of Jesus and its implications for the world. Though all Christian traditions as well as the pseudo-Christian cults engage in evangelism, it is in the public mind one of the distinguishing features of the evangelical wing of the church, and most evangelism conveys a message rooted in evangelical theology.

Evangelism generates both enthusiasm and guilt in the churches. On the one hand, committed believers are highly motivated to share the good news, but many others feel guilty because their personality inhibits confident sharing. Others sense that to evangelize is wrong in a pluralistic* society. This last point prompts many outside the evangelical tradition to redefine evangelism as a quest for understanding rather than an attempt to convert others: i.e. an attempt 'to produce a climate conducive to open and free exchange of ideas, mutual respect, confidence in each other, and restraint in the divisive areas ... based on the firm confidence that no-one is seeking to convert or proselytize' (Neil Richardson, 'Evangelism's Diminishing Returns,' The Guardian, 14 August 1990).

The advance of existentialism and secular thought, coupled with the new diversity of religious ideas found in modern society, have created an atmosphere where to claim exclusive truth for the gospel seems contrary to common sense. In addition to this, many of our cities* have large ethnic populations with deep social, racial and religious differences between them. Here, evangelism could be a dangerous spark to an already dry bonfire. So some would caution that preaching the gospel is undesirable in a pluralistic society.

Yet it is clear that the Christians of the NT boldly proclaimed the gospel in societies where there was both diversity of religion and the potential for violent opposition (Acts 17:1-9; 19:23-41). They employed both proclamation and dialogue to achieve this end. There was bold proclamation in the first evangelists' preaching and teaching (Acts 2:14-41; 7:2-53), as well as careful dialogue with those who did not yet believe (Acts 18:4; 19:8-10). It is also clear that this dialogue was intended to convert people from other faiths to the faith of Christ.

Again, the Lausanne Covenant expresses this well in para. 4: 'Our Christian presence in the world is indispensable to evangelism, and so is that kind of dialogue whose purpose is to listen sensitively in order to understand. But evangelism itself is the proclamation of the historical, biblical Christ as Saviour and Lord, with a view to persuading people to come to him personally and so be reconciled to God.'

'Friendship evangelism' has always been at the core of Christian witness. The majority of people coming to Christian faith have done so because a Christian befriended them first. Recent trends in evangelism have emphasized both this and the need to find methods of communication that will touch the unchurched. The work of the Willow Creek Community Church in Chicago has been very influential in stimulating the development of 'seekerfriendly' church services. At the back of both of these important models is the understanding that people need time to learn and evaluate the gospel before making a decision: evangelism is a process.

The process should not stop once a commitment is made. William Abraham (1947-) in his influential book The Logic of Evangelism extends the definition of evangelism to include initiation into the local church, as well as the acquiring of spiritual gifts and demonstration of real change in lifestyle. Responsible evangelism is pastorally sensitive and provides for the development of the new Christian.

Wise pastors need to find ways of encouraging their embattled flock to continue the work of evangelism in a relativistic culture. The first thing people need is a clear understanding of the uniqueness of Jesus* Christ. He is not merely the founder of one of the world's great religions, but the one-and-only Son of the one-and-only God, who came to reconcile lost humankind to the Father. Only those convinced of the uniqueness of Christ, and who are personally involved with him, will have the motivation to go out and share the good news.

Combined with this we need an appreciation of Christ's character. Seeing his boldness in tackling the rich young ruler (Mk. 10:17-23), and his sensitivity in helping the woman caught in adultery back to her feet (Jn. 8:2-11), should influence the way we communicate the same good news. Healthy evangelism flows from an understanding of the uniqueness and the character of Jesus: his uniqueness gives us both the authority to evangelize and the content of our message; his character gives us the example of boldness with sensitivity that we ought to imitate in our methods.

See also: MISSION, MORALITY OF.

Bibliography

W. Abraham, The Logic of Evangelism (London, 1989); C. R. Padilla (ed.), The New Face of Evangelicalism (London, 1975; Downers Grove, IL, 1976); I. S. Rennie, NDT, pp. 239-240.

D.D.B.

EVIL. Like other primary notions, evil is most helpfully defined by context and by configuration. Evil is the antonym of 'good': what people 'wish not to happen' to those they love; what people feel they 'ought not to do'; the cause of fear, shame, remorse and indignation. Gottfried von Leibniz (1646-1716) distinguished between physical evil (mainly pain), moral evil (actions that entail guilt), and metaphysical evil (imperfections of finite beings). However, the distinction between 'evil done' (malignancy) and 'evil undergone' (wrongs) seems to be more basic and incontrovertible.

The topic of evil is a fertile field for symbolism. 'Evil' conjures up images of darkness, disease and destruction, and also of wanderings, twisting, filth, failure and conflict. The negative connotations are obvious, and use of language confirms them: the prefixes a- (e.g. amiss), dis- (e.g. disable), in- (e.g. inhuman), and un- (e.g. unjust) witness that evil is recognized in reference to the good, as the lack of it. Yet, it is also positive, not in the sense of value, but of effective reality. Humanity encounters evil as real in experience. The prefixes mis- (e.g. mischief, mishap) and dys- (e.g. dysfunction) may hint at both the 'reality' and the 'negative' affecting it, and even at the reality of the affection itself, a factor that brings about results; the metaphors of disfiguration and perversion lie near.

Biblical language differs little from ours in this respect. The negative slant is apparent (see Is. 41:29; Zc. 10:2; and words with privative a- in NT Gk., e.g. anomia, 'lawlessness', cf. 1 Jn. 3:4). No less so, the sense of the reality of evil is also apparent. Characteristic is the enormous space the topic occupies. The Bible relentlessly denounces evil and reinforces abhorrence of it: 'Hate what is evil' (Rom. 12:9); it would never blunt the antithesis: 'Woe to those who call evil good and good evil' (Is. 5:20). Biblical history revolves round the fact of sin, starting in Eden. Scripture also progressively unveils the activity of 'evil spirits' or 'powers' devoted to wickedness; their leader deserves the title 'the Evil One' and the name Belial (in the OT, 'worthlessness'). In relation to these spirits, the emphasis is on moral evil; Satan* is 'the accuser' (Rev. 12:10) and 'the tempter' (Mt. 4:3).

Human anguish asks about the origin of evil. The experience of horror bursts forth in the questions 'Whence?' and 'Why?' Augustine,* however, insisted that another question takes precedence: 'When one asks whence evil comes, one must ask first what it is' (The Nature of the Good, IV.4). Actually, the questions are interdependent.

What is evil?

The range of answers to this question extends from 'mere illusion' to 'ultimate reality'.

Monistic systems, in mystical/speculative passion for the purely One, tend to dissolve the reality of evil. So in India, but Albert Schweitzer (1875-1965) showed that, even there, ethical thinkers resisted the trend (Indian Thought and its Development, 1935; ET, 1936). Spinoza (1632-77) reduces evil to subjective status, showing a modern sense of the subject. Stoicism* emphasizes assessment: appreciating ills as goods; its motive is moral - adherence to the divine logos in everything, which requires Herculean self-mastery.

Neo-Platonism incorporated Stoic elements, but, after Plato,* attached evil to the metaphysical principle of matter. Such mitigated, asymmetrical, dualism* is common. Many Greeks interpreted matter as relative non-being (me on). Transition is then easy to evil as the privation of goodness, the key concept in Augustinian theory. Moderns (influencing liberal theologians) reinterpret matter within the evolutionary scheme: vestigia, inertia. Ethical consequences follow: Platonism leads to disparagement of bodily life, severity for desire and possession; evolutionism excuses traces of animal descent, and condemns what hampers progress.

Even Zoroastrian-Manichean dualism comes short of perfect symmetry: evil, an eternal substance equally with the good, shall be vanquished. But 'how?' is the unanswered question. Pessimism is rarest: Schopenhauer's malignant 'Will' as the essence of the universe, Albert Camus' (1913-60) and Jean-Paul Sartre's* denial of any coherence or meaning - though they did not live accordingly! None the less, the tragic suspicion that malevolence lodges with Ultimacy still smoulders.

The biblical understanding of evil does not fit into this spectrum. Evil is no first principle or substance. Even the Evil One and his troop fell from prior righteousness (Jude 6). God is goodness unmixed (1 Jn. 1:5). Yet, evil is a real foe, a horrible corruption of the good. It stems from sin, the misuse of freedom* and the breaking of God's law (anomia, 1 Jn. 3:4). Evil is included in God's will of decree (otherwise it would not happen), but opposed to God's will of precept and desire.

Whence and why?

While extreme answers suppress the question, moderate dualism (Neo-Platonic, Hegelian) explains evil as locally negative but globally useful: a dissonance contributing to total harmony. Stronger dualism appears to take its evilness seriously, but it consolidates evil as the metaphysical partner of the good; symmetry brings evil into harmony. Both deprive indignation of any point, make guilt insignificant, and confront God with a necessity that is independent of him. Nevertheless, the Augustinian-Thomist tradition and Hegelian theology (with which Barth* has been compared) accommodate similar thoughts to Christianity: evil as the ransom-price of redemption enables one to sing felix culpa!

Many espouse the 'free-will defence'. God could not create a free creature without taking the risk of disobedience. Evil as the constitutive possibility of freedom is thus the price of that higher good. Scripture does incriminate freedom: the Fall, being historical, as Paul Ricoeur (1913-) perceived, rules out a metaphysical source of evil. But is this a final answer? If God governs human choices (e.g. Pr. 21:1), why did he permit the Fall? The 'free-will' solution also imposes a necessity on God (i.e. God could not) and somehow roots evil in creation.

Job and Paul (Rom. 9:15ff.) call us to accept in faith the enigma, steadfastly believing the revealed truths of God's perfect goodness, God's total sovereignty, and the radical evilness of evil. We cannot bring evil, the alien, inexcusable, factor, into logical harmony with God's work.

Inability to comprehend means obligation to combat. Its reverse side is hope: only the sovereign God who hates evil assures us of evil ended (Rev. 21:4, 8), through the redemptive work of his Son (1 Cor. 15:24-28; Col. 2:15).

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD III/3; G. C. Berkouwer, Sin (ET, Grand Rapids, 1971); H. Blocher, Evil and the Cross (1990; ET, Leicester, 1994); E. Borne, Le Problème du mal (Paris, 1958); P. T. Geach, Providence and Evil (Cambridge and New York, 1977); J. Hick, Evil and the God of Love (London, 1977); C. Journet, The Meaning of Evil (ET, London, 1963); C. S. Lewis, The Problem of Pain (London, 1940); P. Ricoeur, The Symbolism of Evil (ET, Boston, 1967); K. Surin, Theology and the Problem of Evil (Oxford, 1986); J. W. Wenham, The Enigma of Evil (Leicester, 1985); C. Werner, Le Problème du mal dans la pensée humaine (Paris, 1944).

H.A.G.B.

EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. The work of Charles Darwin* forms the base for evolutionary ethics. His On the Origin of Species By Means of Natural Selection argued that the history and biology of living things showed that evolution had in fact occurred. There are variations in plants and animals, some of which are more beneficial than others. These beneficial traits give advantages to progeny and form the basis of evolutionary development. Thus characteristics which favour survival create a means of nature selecting which characteristics will be carried forward in the preservation and development of a species.

Darwinism applied and critiqued

This biological theory was soon applied to social, economic and political change and development. It offered one account of how the structures and patterns of behaviour are historically conditioned. This social Darwinism, of which the British philosopher Herbert Spencer (1820-1903) was an early proponent, was applied to ethical, economic and political problems by both the Right and the Left. Those of a capitalist turn of mind stressed that the ruthless, imaginative, frugal and industrious tend to do well. The survival of the fittest rests on inequality and liberty. There is, as Adam Smith (1723-90) held, an invisible hand at work in human history. This justified a *laissez-faire attitude towards social change and reform. The Left followed a Marxist account of social and economic development leading to a stage when the State itself would wither away and all humanity would be free.

There are many who argue that the theory of Darwin in biological terms has yet to be proved, and that any empirical and inductive account must be open to disproof and revision. At most it seems that Darwin showed that some natural selection is at work, but not that it was the only means of modification. Likewise, there is no evidence that all species are descended from other species; thus the uniqueness of humanity remains intact.

The most telling critique of the application of Darwinism to ethics is that evolutionary ethics commits the naturalistic fallacy.* It offers a neutral statement about the alleged nature of nature, as if this could itself entail a conclusion about what is to be commended or approved. For many this is the wrong-headed attempt to derive an 'ought' from an 'is' - a moral imperative from a descriptive account. The validity of such a step is hotly debated in moral philosophy, but there is no clear way that we can deduce what is desirable from what is actually desired. Ethically, Darwinism has led to such directly contradictory moral and political conclusions, claimed to be from the same natural facts, that it seems that there must be more to morality than simply a recounting of certain natural features.

Evolutionary ethics

Evolutionary ethics is not merely a morality based on the 'survival of the fittest'. That would simply offer a description of whatever survives as good, defining 'good' as what makes for survival. Most of us are not convinced that life in itself is ultimately the most important thing. The martyr is not bound by a law of self-preservation and survival. Choices and reasons for those choices are more part of our moral armoury than any absolute law which forces us to act in certain ways. Even if we know what people are like and are sure that they will act in particular ways, that is not inevitable, and they are not forced by natural forces.

Julian Huxley (1887-1975) claims that realizing ever-new possibilities in evolution, respecting human individuality and encouraging its fullest development, and constructing a mechanism for further social evolution in keeping with these aims, is right and good. Humanity is the business manager for the cosmic process of evolution and should be guiding that process in positive directions.

Philosophers, following Bertrand Russell (1872-1970), recognize that from evolution itself it is hard to see that moral behaviour is more advanced than immoral behaviour. Whatever happens to evolve would on that basis alone be regarded as good simply because it had evolved.

The Christian perspective

While process theologians may look for support from evolutionary ethics, the Christian should be wary of any purely naturalistic account which is cut off from God and his divine activity. The reductionism* of evolutionary ethics belittles human beings as well as God and makes morality a closed, deterministic matter. Modern scientific thinking calls in question such an evolutionist account in itself and in its application to ethics. For the Christian, morality rests on the nature of God and his dealings with humankind and cannot be explained by a purely naturalistic account.

Bibliography

A. N. Flew, Evolutionary Ethics (London, 1967; New York, 1968); T. H. and J. S. Huxley, Evolution and Ethics (London, 1947).

E.D.C.

EXECUTION, see CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

EXHIBITIONISM, see SEXUAL ADDICTION; SEXUAL DEVIATION.

EXISTENTIALIST ETHICS. For some commentators it seems a contradiction in terms to talk about ethics in connection with existentialism, since it is seen as being merely a philosophy of life or a way of doing philosophy. Indeed, existentialism does not accept, because of the contingency and absurdity of the world, the foundational nature of any moral rights and duties or recommended courses of conduct. They are seen as being often in conflict and unable to take full account of the subjectivity of the individual. But, although there are different emphases in different thinkers (some are Christian, some religious and some atheist), there is a profound moral concern in their thought and writings. However, their ethics are not detailed moral doctrines, but rather outline a basic moral stance which may be adopted in different situations.

Existentialist ethics involves the rejection of all illusions about reality and a fundamental honesty about what is. As a first step this entails a recognition and unmasking of the emptiness of moral and other conventions, of habit and of custom. The existentialist tends to experience a radical moral conversion. He (or she) discovers that to be is to be free, to live an authentic life - that is honestly and sincerely without recourse to external values.

The emphasis is on the individual's situation, on his 'being in the world' (Martin Heidegger, 1889-1976; Jean-Paul Sartre*). The individual must choose. Choices and decisions are made in angst, in fear and trembling because the individual alone has responsibility for them and for the guilt or remorse which may ensue. Aware of his finitude, and the contingency of his existence, circumscribed by death, and surrounded by paradoxes and uncertainties, he cannot rely on anything outside himself. For Søren Kierkegaard* this stage of religious seriousness, which is beyond the ethical stage, beyond the rules of conventional Christianity, is the highest stage. The individual is higher than universal and collective rules.

Sartre emphasizes the individual as authority and law-giver, not as libertine; the whole man is involved in the concreteness of decisions, which are relative to each situation. Moral choice is a personal activity, not a functional or abstract one. The individual is dynamic, projecting himself in action. Surrounded by his possibilities, he is what he makes himself on the basis of his moral decisions. No-one can show him which direction he should take, he must make his own way. In this sense man is, in Friedrich Nietzsche's* phrase, beyond good and evil.

Those who fail to live this authentic life are viewed as being, in Sartre's phrase, in bad and faith, trying to escape the full consequences of their freedom.* This implies that freedom is a moral imperative as well as an ontological reality, and avoiding it is an existentialist sin. For Sartre freedom is absolute; and the individual is reciprocally free - in intuiting his own freedom he recognizes the value of freedom in others and acts to enable the other to retain it. In choosing for himself he chooses for all. He is not isolated, but free for others as well as for himself; indeed being for others is a basic element of an individual's identity. Bad faith is to relate in a conflictual manner to others, to try to subordinate their freedom to ours.

Existentialist freedom is not detachment. For Sartre and Simone de Beauvoir (1908-) it is commitment ('engagement'); for Albert Camus (1913-60) it is solidarity and complicity, a collaboration with others for relative, limited goals; for Gabriel Marcel (1889-1973) it is availability, community and fidelity. However, these similarities in interpersonal relationships disappear on the political plane where a great diversity of political imperatives are based on existentialism. Indeed, some existentialists move on to other positions such as Marxism (see Marxist Ethics*) or humanism.

Existentialist accounts of the individual as he makes moral choices in situation, the nature and importance of those choices, and the emotions involved, have much to offer. Their characterization of the difficulty of applying moral precepts to specific situations has cogency. Their analysis of human failings - moral cowardice, hypocrisy, etc. - is finely observed. Their emphasis on the virtues of courage, honesty, sincerity and integrity is admirable.

Yet existentialist ethics, because they reject moral norms, are open to abuse and provide little detailed moral guidance in vast areas of life. Individuals freely choosing must inevitably conflict unless they move to other moral systems, whether consciously or unconsciously. Existentialism is also unconvincing in dealing with wider political and social questions. It is fundamentally an ethic of individual freedom and authenticity rather than a source of detailed ethical analysis. It is also open to charges of being an elitist ethic which only the strong could sustain, since too many questions are left open for the individual. Moreover, it fails to recognize the importance of convention, habit and tradition in morality. And, most significantly, the normative character of God's laws and commandments as revealed in Scripture is rejected in favour of individual choice.

J.H.G.

EXISTENTIALIST PSYCHOLOGIES. Although existentialist psychologies, like humanistic psychology and Gestalt* psychology, have been influenced by the personalism and holism of the 'understanding' psychology (see Humanistic Psychology*) of Wilhelm Dilthey (1833-1911), their origins lie, essentially, in the philosophies of phenomenology and existentialism.

The influences of the latter are complex, since there is no overarching philosophical methodology that has impinged evenly on the range of existentialist psychologies. The more foundational strands include the theistic quest of Søren Kierkegaard* for the authenticity of individual and subjective truth; the 'God is dead' stance of Friedrich Nietzsche,* with his bid for human freedom from moral restraint; the phenomenological insights of Edmund Husserl (1859-1938), who urged that human consciousness should lay aside all assumptions and prejudice in favour of an objective description of what is observed; and the application of Husserlian thinking by Martin Heidegger (1889-1976) to the meaning of being. Themes of authenticity, choice, freedom, responsibility and meaning have become the hallmarks of the existentialist psychologies. The seedbed for these themes has been the continent of Europe and we can see something of this origin, and the therapeutic variety engendered, in the work of Ludwig Binswanger (1881-1966), Viktor Frankl,* Rollo May* and R. D. Laing (1927-89).

The Swiss psychiatrist Ludwig Binswanger, a personal friend of Sigmund Freud,* was one of the first to bring phenomenological and existential insights into therapy. His 'existential analysis', pioneered with his patients at the Kreuzlinger sanatorium, became a widely-used model for existential therapy through the translation of his writings into English during the 1940s and 50s.

Viktor Frankl, indebted to Kierkegaard and Husserl, founded the so-called 'third Viennese school of psychotherapy', both linked with and seeking to supersede Freud's psychoanalysis and the individual psychology of Alfred Adler.* Frankl's 'logotherapy', introduced in 1926, stressed human responsibility, spiritual awareness and the 'will to meaning'.

Rollo May, who had begun his psychotherapeutic studies in Vienna, completed his doctorate and psychoanalytical training in New York and was greatly influenced by the philosophical theologian Paul Tillich (1886-1965), introduced existential perspectives into the more humanistic tradition of the N. American counselling scene.

In Britain, Laing, looking to the existential ideas of Jean-Paul Sartre* put forward his 'social phenomenology' - not as a complete methodology but as the groundbase for his 'anti-psychiatry' perspectives. During the 1960s, Laing, along with two other existential psychiatrists, David Cooper (1931-86) and Aaron Esterson, spearheaded an attack on traditional psychiatric theory and practice, reversing notions of mental illness (see *Mental Health), based on the medical model, and replacing these with ideas that saw schizophrenia (see *Psychosis), for example, as 'a natural psychic healing process' (Peter Sedgwick in R. Boyers and R. Orrill, eds., Laing and Anti-Psychiatry, p. 33). Laing's influence has extended through the foundation in 1964 of the London-based Philadelphia Association, a charity which set up therapeutic communities where no treatment was given without the individual's consent. In more recent years, this association is given to exploring the works of such philosophers as Ludwig Wittgenstein* and Michel Foucault (1926-84), and the French psychoanalyst Jacques Lacan (1901-81).

Although these examples of existential and phenomenological emphasis are diverse, there are certain common themes which serve to distinguish the existentialist psychologies from other systems. Human nature is viewed as process: individuals are not seen to have fixed identities but to be in a state of flux and change. This perspective may lead to an awareness of inner emptiness, accompanied at times by notions of life's meaninglessness, and, consequently, may produce a pervasive sense of anxiety* (Angst). Such anxiety needs to be faced: responsible living will seek to create something constructive out of the ups and downs of the everyday world. Existential psychology sees four main dimensions to human existence and experience - the physical (Umwelt), the social (Mitwelt), the psychological (Eigenwelt) and the spiritual (Uberwelt) - and argues that in all these domains the individual needs release from habitual self-deception, and unreflective conformity to others, to an attitude that discovers an inner authority and the courage to see life's possibilities. This movement forwards may be spurred by 'existential guilt', in which the person acknowledges culpability at his or her neglect of the quest for individual 'authenticity'. Psychological disturbance may arise in the face of life's trials, where a sense of personal guilt and responsibility are resisted, where the stressed person is unsupported by friends and family, or where he or she feels overwhelmed by the apparent heedlessness of society and its institutions.

Existential psychotherapy and counselling build on these views, seeking to enable clients to be truthful with themselves, broaden their perspectives, and so learn from the past that they may live with commitment in the present and find meaning for the future. This goal of 'authenticity' is the achievement of a sense of 'being true' to personal insight and experience, rather than a bid for egoism. The focus in existential therapy is one-to-one rather than within a group,* and the therapeutic style is one of openness, flexibility and dialogue, in which there is a preparedness for insight and change within the therapist, as well as client. The therapeutic process is essentially free of specific technique, and the therapist seeks to foster a climate for the client's own journey of discovery. The enterprise is characterized by an exploration of and respect for the client's assumptions and values, an openness to clarify and, where appropriate, reinterpret the past, and a commitment to help the client face life's limitations and possibilities. This unstructured form of therapy can be adapted for crosscultural counseling* and handling very young children, although it is especially well suited to clients who face questions of meaning in relation to pending loss or life's transitional stages, such as adolescence.* Where existential methodologies are open to the transcendent, as with Frankl's logotherapy, there can be a great deal within their assumptive insights, aims and methods that eclectic Christian therapists can sift and use profitably.

See also: PASTORAL CARE, COUNSELLING AND PSYCHOTHERAPY.†

Bibliography

L. Binswanger, Being in the World (ET, London, 1978); R. Boyers and R. Orrill, Laing and Anti-Psychiatry (Harmondsworth, 1972); A. Collier, R. D. Laing: The Politics and Philosophy of Psychotherapy (Brighton and New York, 1977); V. E. Frankl, The Unconscious God: Psychotherapy and Theology (New York, 1975; London, 1977); J. N. Isbister, 'Anti-psychiatry: Christian Roots in the Thought of R. D. Laing', FT 106, 1979, pp. 23-49; R. D. Laing, The Divided Self (Harmondsworth, 1965; New York, 1969); idem, The Politics of Experience (Harmondsworth and New York, 1983); R. May, Love and Will (New York, 1969; London, 1970); R. May et al., Existence (New York, 1958); D. F. Tweedie, Logotherapy: An Evaluation of Frankl's Existential Approach to Psychotherapy (Grand Rapids, 1961); E. van Duerzen-Smith, 'Existential Therapy', in W. Dryden (ed.), Individual Therapy: A Handbook (Milton Keynes and Bristol, PA, 1990); I. D. Yalom, Existential Psychotherapy (New York, 1980).

R.F.H.

EXORCISM, see DELIVERANCE MINISTRY.

EXPLOITATION. The term ‘exploitation’ came into use in the early 19th century to describe the more organized and efficient approach to harvesting the earth’s natural resources (especially mining) which went hand in hand with the Industrial Revolution. Originally a quasi-technical term, it acquired its pejorative and political connotations as recently as the late 19th century, finding expression 1. in the rise of the international human rights (see Rights, Human*) movement, and 2. in Marx’s more technical definition of it as an inevitable product of the class struggle.

Both these movements have their philosophical roots in the liberal humanism of postEnlightenment thought, with its emphases on individualism,* materialism,* reason* and natural justice. However, the climate of concern for social justice in the 19th century, particularly in the English-speaking world, was significantly influenced by the largely evangelical movement for social reform. Secular historians attach particular importance here to the Clapham Sect.* In this way the emergence of human rights issues is the product both of Christian and humanist agendas.

A biblical critique of exploitation must address questions both of worth and of the limits of power* and authority,* as exploitation presupposes a worth contradicted and a power abused. The relevant themes are: 1. Creation* as the source of meaning, function and order, as much for material (Gn. 1:1) and animal (Gn. 1:21) as for human existence (Gn. 1:27), matters addressed profoundly by Gn. 1 - 11 as a whole. 2. OT jurisprudence* as the expression of covenant* society, where much attention is paid to protecting the weak (e.g. Ex. 21 - 22) and practising impartial justice (Ex. 23:1ff.), as expressions of God’s perfect character (Lv. 19:22) and as a condition of God’s continued favour (Dt. 4:2; 2 Ch. 7:14). 3. The developed view of prudent government in OT Wisdom literature (e.g. Pr. 11:14; 16:10-12). 4. The prophetic call for justice and mercy (Mi. 6:8; Am. 5:14-15). 5. The kingdom* ethic proposed by Jesus (Mt. 5-7, etc.), which both reflects and radically develops the above OT themes, e.g. the creation ideal for marriage (Mt. 19:3-6), and God’s favour towards the oppressed (Mt. 5:1-12). 6. Jesus’ model of accepting outcasts (cf. his treatment of women, children, servants of the Roman occupation, etc.) and his servanthood as the source of moral authority (e.g. Mt. 11:29-30). 7. The Pauline vision of the church as a new society, bridging gaps of race and culture (Gal. 3:26-27; Eph. 2:11-22).

Christian attitudes toward exploitation are informed not only by biblical motifs, however, but by five main interpretative traditions: 1. For Roman Catholic thought, the concept of mutual obligation as the basis of a Christian society is still fundamental, as is its Thomist philosophical framework. 2. Classic Reformed belief, based on the idea of a society under God’s law, sees a judicial basis in the permanence of the moral law and the example of OT civil law (supplemented by a churchly calling to ‘works of mercy’). 3. Evangelical thought as a distinctive movement arising from the Methodist Revival places characteristic emphasis as a reason for social justice on the inherent value of the individual by virtue of having a (convertible) soul, and so both reflects and criticizes the individualism of the post Enlightenment society in which it was born. 4. The Radical Reformation tradition, of which Anabaptist* life is the most enduring example, looks to a more literalistic acceptance of Jesus’ kingdom teaching and thus proposes the ‘realized eschatology’ of a society not simply negatively free from exploitation but which positively realizes the kingdom here and now. 5. Finally, liberation theology* has emerged more recently, claiming a Christian justification for the Marxist understanding of exploitation.

Each of the above can be challenged either for lack of sufficient biblical foundations or for over-dependence on the ideological climate present at its birth (and often for both). Nevertheless, there is a remarkable unity regarding two essential elements: 1. that creation in general and human life in particular have a spiritual worth beyond merely utilitarian considerations, which calls for a due order and mutual respect in human society on earth (if not more); and 2. that government is not merely or even primarily the possession of power but rather the service of God to promote good and resist evil. These convictions, though extremely broad, have far-reaching consequences not only for political but for personal attitudes towards the misuse of power for personal gain.

Bibliography

D. W. Bebbington, Evangelicalism in Modern Britain (London, 1989); D. D. Raphael (ed.), Political Theory and the Rights of Man (London and Bloomington, IN, 1967); C. J. H. Wright, Living as the People of God (Leicester, 1983) = An Eye for an Eye (Downers Grove, IL, 1983).

P.D.H.

EXTENDED FAMILY, see OLD TESTAMENT ETHICS.†

EXTROVERSION, see JUNG, CARL; MYERS-BRIGGS TYPE INDICATOR.

F

FAITH. In the OT, faith is more often expressed by verbs, such as ‘believe’ (aman), ‘trust’ (batan) or ‘hope’ (yhl), but in the NT it is much more common as a noun (pistis). It is the leading biblical term for the relationship humans are to have towards God. It expresses an orientation of the whole person. For that reason, faith is not merely intellectual assent to orthodox doctrine (fides, often used in the Middle Ages to express mental assent), but confidence, trust* and assurance of the graciousness of God as revealed in Jesus Christ (fiducia, as the Reformers referred to it). Faith does have a cognitive dimension, but it also has an affective dimension. Medieval theology taught that the former (called fides informis) grew into the latter (called fides caritate formata). The Reformers rejected this, insisting that faith includes a pious, loving disposition from the beginning. Faith is an assured knowledge that changes the believer.

The object of faith is God and his promises. Faith in God’s promises is based on the reliability of God’s own character, demonstrated in the believer’s experiences (see Ps. 78). This has two implications. 1. The content of faith (fides quae creditur) is as important as the act of believing (fides qua creditur), particularly since intensity of feeling does not make the object of belief true, and placing one’s trust in what is false can have fatal consequences. And faith is more than just a state; it is belief in certain credal tenets implied in one’s trust in the person of God revealed in Jesus Christ (e.g. that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah; that Jesus is the only way to the Father). 2. Since faith is placed in God’s promises, faith has a future or eschatological dimension and is therefore closely related to hope for things not yet seen (Heb. 11:1).

Faith is the means through which we receive justification* (not that which itself justifies us) and is necessary for righteousness before God (Rom. 3:21-26; 4:1-8). It is also the means by which the believer continues to live the Christian life (Rom. 6); as such, faith is to increase. The Reformers emphasized this in their doctrine of sola fides. Furthermore, though faith is a free act of human response to the grace of God, the NT makes it clear that faith is paradoxically a gift of God (Eph. 2:8-9) - an interior act of God’s grace, which John Calvin* referred to as ‘the principal work of the Holy Spirit’.

The present dimension of faith is the life of obedience* in which the believer demonstrates his or her faithfulness to God out of gratitude and love for the one whom he or she unconditionally trusts. Refusal to believe and rebellion against God are often linked in Scripture. This dimension of faith raises the thorny problem of the relation of faith and works. It is clear that genuine faith is not without works of love; there is no such thing as genuine Christian faith without obedience (Gal. 5:6; Jas. 2:14-26).

Another controversy throughout the church’s history has been the relation of faith and reason.* Positions range from understanding faith as a rational act to understanding it as a knowledge sui generis (see 1 Cor. 2:11-12; 2 Cor. 4:6). In any case, faith is not mere opinion, since one must have some warrant for believing; and faith is not scientific knowledge, since it is based on the infallible testimony of God whom one wilfully chooses to believe. A related issue has involved the medieval notion of ‘implicit faith’, whereby one gives assent to what the church teaches without really knowing or understanding what it is that one believes. This comes close to Karl Rahner’s (1904-84) contemporary idea of the ‘anonymous Christian’, which denotes the person who has a religious faith but who for reasons of ignorance is not aware of the God revealed in Jesus Christ. Placing one’s faith in the God of the Bible does not preclude doubt (except for Cartesian methodological doubt and extreme scepticism). Perhaps this is best expressed as ‘wondering’ how God will carry out what he has promised; it can be seen in the examples of Abraham (Gn. 15:2-6) and Mary (Lk. 2:34). In this regard, faith has an existential dimension to it.

Much of the recent discussion has focused on faith development,* a social-science description of sanctification.* Drawing on various psychological theories that describe the stages of human growth, faith development refers to the growth that occurs in one's religious life from childhood to death. Based on theories like Erik Erikson's* or Jean Piaget's,* and using ideas drawn from H. Richard Niebuhr,* Wilfred Cantwell Smith (1916-) and others, these schools trace the stages of a person's changing construals of value and meaning in life. This has yielded helpful insights for understanding religious development and how best to facilitate growth to the next more mature stage. Some have criticized this developmental approach for making psychological theory normative vis-à-vis the individual's experience of God's grace.* Furthermore, some argue that the structure of the stages distorts the phenomenon of faith whose object is a living person, God. Others question the description of faith as an activity of 'meaning-making' whereby, following the lead of Paul Tillich (1886-1965), one composes a sense of the ultimate character of reality around a central value or 'ultimate concern', hopefully ending in a mature adult faith that is centred on a meaning comprehensive enough to embrace all experience (see S. Parks, The Critical Years).

Bibliography

D. M. Baillie, Faith in God (Edinburgh, 1927); J. Calvin, The Institutes of the Christian Religion III.2, LCC 20-21; J. G. Machen, What Is Faith? (Grand Rapids, Michigan, 1925); J. H. Newman, An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent (1870; Oxford, 1985); S. Parks, The Critical Years (San Francisco, 1986); P. Tillich, Dynamics of Faith (San Francisco and London, 1957); A. Weiser and R. Bultmann, TDNT 6, pp. 174-228.

D.L.O.

FAITH DEVELOPMENT is the name given to a field of studies which seeks to understand faith* by constructing a synthesis between theology and developmental theories in psychology.

The two main theorists associated with faith development are the Americans John Westerhoff III and James Fowler (1940-). Working independently in the 1970s they produced two distinct models. Fowler's is the more scientific in form and method and has sparked a continuing academic debate among psychologists of religion and religious educators.

Assumptions common to both models include the following:

1. Faith is a universal human phenomenon. It must be understood as a mode of being and relating common to all people irrespective of specific religious allegiance or none. To be human means to have faith in something or someone. The content and object of faith are secondary.
2. Faith is a process of existential becoming. It is not static but dynamic. Because it is a mode of being rather than a set of beliefs, it is open to movement and change. Fowler speaks of faith as a verb as well as a noun.
3. Faith is concerned with constructing meaning. Its basis lies in relationships which enable the individual to make sense of experience and develop meaning. Hence the phenomenon of faith is universal though its content will be variable.
4. The faith process is capable of developmental analysis. Fowler uses concepts and methods drawn explicitly from developmental psychology. Westerhoff is less scientific in his approach. Both, however, use the idea of faith stages (Westerhoff calls them 'styles') to explain development.

The Westerhoff model

Westerhoff posits four styles of faith development which he likens to the rings of a tree. A tree with fewer rings is as complete and whole as one with more. The latter is simply an expanded tree, not a better one. Like trees, human beings expand in faith as they move from one style to another. Such movement does not result in discarding earlier styles but in incorporating them.

The first style is known as experienced faith. This centres on relationships of trust* established in the early months and years of life. The second is affiliative faith, which is the faith mode of the individual-in-community who accepts the faith of his or her peers and significant others without having yet arrived at a self-chosen, critical faith. It is typical of later childhood though it may well persist into adulthood. The third style, searching faith, is common in adolescence when the individual questions previous assumptions and begins to develop critical judgment. This leads to a growing crisis as he or she searches for a new way of making sense of the world and personal experience. The fourth style is called owned faith. It integrates the previous stages in a reconstructed faith through which individuals find meaning and a perspective which they are ready to own as theirs, i.e. a reconstitution of personal faith identity. The transition from searching to owned faith is marked by what Westerhoff calls 'the act of surrender', which can be likened to the evangelical idea of conversion.*

More recently, Westerhoff has reworked his original model, using the metaphor of three pathways or trails to God. Styles one and two are integrated into the affiliative-experiencing path concerned with developing a nurtured faith. This is contrasted with the illuminative reflective path centring on the searching style and therefore much less secure. The third is the unitive-integrating path which combines the first two to produce something like owned faith.

The Fowler model

Fowler's model is much more scientific in orientation and method, drawing on the work of Jean Piaget,* Lawrence Kohlberg (1927-87) and Erik Erikson.* Based on considerable empirical research, Fowler has constructed a model comprising seven stages. Unlike Westerhoff, Fowler regards these as hierarchical, sequential and invariant. Individuals cannot skip stages and thereby progress through the hierarchy. Each stage must be experienced in turn. Successive stages are increasingly complex, building on and incorporating the operations of previous stages.

Fowler's developmental stages are well-defined, integrated units, incorporating observable empirical characteristics which mark out one stage from another. Movement from stage to stage is triggered by crises and challenges which threaten the equilibrium of a person's current stage of development. Life crises would typically bring about transition.

Fowler's seven stages are not rigidly tied to chronological age but none the less can be related to human growth and development through the life cycle.

Stage 0: Primal faith. Faith is experienced as simple pre-linguistic trust. It is the faith of babyhood engendered by an infant's trust in its mother.

Stage 1: Intuitive-projective faith. This is the stage of unordered yet powerful images. The child constructs meaning by using these images to interpret experience but no concepts are yet available to order them intellectually.

Stage 2: Mythic-literal faith. The child from six or seven up to eleven years develops thinking skills based on a literal interpretation of the world. Story-telling is crucial to development but abstract thinking is not yet a feature.

Stage 3: Synthetic-conventional faith. The adolescent develops abstract thinking abilities and so is able to create meaning beyond the literal. This is also the stage of conformity to peer-group beliefs and may continue well into adulthood.

Stage 4: Individuative-reflective faith. The young adult develops critical judgment and begins to choose faith for himself or herself: a 'critical distancing from one's previous value system'.

Stage 5: Conjunctive faith. The dissolution of previous certainties sets in. The adult (typically in mid-life) must rework the faith meaning created in previous stages, often under the impact of a life crisis. The hallmark of this stage is critical openness.

Stage 6: Universalizing faith. A very rare stage attained by few usually later in life. Its central characteristic is the abandonment of self. Fowler cites Mother Teresa (see Teresa, Mother*), Dag Hammarskjöld (1905-61) and Martin Luther King* as examples.

Evaluation

Fowler's work has received critical welcome from educators, psychologists of religion and pastoral theologians. Its strength is twofold: 1. it offers a substantial model of human development which draws upon acknowledged theories and empirical studies; and 2. it attempts to integrate a theological understanding of faith with insights drawn from the human sciences.

Criticisms have included: 1. that Fowler offers a phenomenologically useful but theologically inadequate definition of faith; 2. that his method subordinates theology to psychology; 3. that his empirical basis is too restricted in being drawn mainly from middleclass Americans; 4. that he fails to allow for cultural and gender differences which might alter the model; 5. that his dependence on Piaget overestimates the significance of the rational in constructing and sustaining faith over and against the affective and imaginative dimensions of human development; and 6. that the model over-emphasizes individualistic psychology, failing to appreciate that individuals are formed by their social contexts.

Despite these criticisms, Fowler has contributed more than any recent figure to an integrated understanding of faith. In the words of a 1991 evaluation: 'It is possible to view the work of Fowler and others as a useful tool ... while more careful empirical work is always needed, and theoretical criticism is absolutely essential, some of the central themes of faith development are too important . . . to be cavalierly ignored' (Church of England Board of Education, How Faith Grows, p. 50).

See also: HUMAN DEVELOPMENT.

Bibliography

F. Bridger, Children Finding Faith (London, 1988); Church of England Board of Education, How Faith Grows (London, 1991); Church of England Board of Education and Board of Mission, All God's Children? (London, 1991); C. Dykstra and S. Parks (eds.), Faith Development and Fowler (Birmingham, AL, 1986); J. W. Fowler, Stages of Faith (San Francisco, 1981); J. H. Westerhoff, Will our Children have Faith? (New York, 1976).

F.W.B.

FALL, THE. The image of a 'fall' has traditionally been employed within Christian theology to express a cluster of pervasive biblical insights concerning human nature. These could be summarized as follows. 1. The present state of things, supremely that of human nature, is not what it is intended to be by God. The created order no longer directly corresponds to the 'goodness' (Gn. 1) of its original integrity. It has lapsed. It has been spoiled or ruined - but not irredeemably, as the doctrines of salvation (see Sin and Salvation†) and justification* affirm. The image of a 'fall', although not strictly biblical in itself, brilliantly conveys the idea that creation* now exists at a lower level than that intended for it by God. 2. All human beings are contaminated by sin from the moment of their birth.

In contrast to many modern existentialist philosophies (such as that of Martin Heidegger, 1889-1976) which affirm that 'fallenness' (Verfallenheit) is an option which we choose (rather than something which is chosen for us), the NT and Christian tradition (especially as represented in the writings of Augustine,* Luther* and Calvin*) portray sin as inherent to human nature. It is an integral, not an optional, aspect of our being. This insight, which is given more rigorous expression in the doctrine of original sin,* is of central importance to the doctrines of sin and salvation. In that all are sinners, all require redemption. The image thus points to the universal need for redemption - for restoration to the situation which pertained before the Fall. In that all have fallen short of the glory of God, all require to be redeemed.

The most significant theological debate concerning the Fall is the Pelagian controversy of the early 5th century. For Pelagius (fl. c. 383-424), it was only proper to speak of a 'fall' in an individual sense. An individual was not contaminated from birth by the original sin of Adam. Rather, individuals choose to imitate the sin of Adam, thus, in effect, contaminating themselves. For Pelagius, 'fallenness' is the outcome of individual acts of sin or disobedience; for Augustine (who here seems to reflect the NT more accurately), 'fallenness' is the state which gives rise to individual acts of sin or disobedience.

The more humanist writers of the 16th century (including Erasmus, c. 1469-1536, and Zwingli, 1484-1531) had serious reservations concerning the notion of an historical Fall, not least on account of its implications for human moral action. For Calvin, the Fall compromised human freedom,* but not human responsibility;* Erasmus held that these two could not be thus distinguished and separated. The advent of the Enlightenment* witnessed a sustained critique of the notion of the Fall, which was held to be detrimental to human dignity and autonomy. Especially in 18th century France (cf. the writings of Voltaire, 1694-1778, and Diderot, 1713-84), the idea was held to be conducive to political and social oppression, in that it encouraged individuals to think of themselves as powerless to resist repression (see Repression, Political*) or change their situations. The French Revolution was seen by some critics of Christianity as representing the triumph of secular reason and human autonomy over the pessimistic view of human nature allegedly sustained by the notions of original sin and the Fall. A sustained critique of the notion, especially the related doctrine of original sin, gradually became typical of secular and humanist critiques of Christianity, especially in the later 19th century (partly in response to Darwin's* theory of biological evolution, which was seen as posing a serious challenge to traditional interpretations of Gn. 3). More recently, however, there has been renewed sympathy within secular thought for the notion of a defect or flaw within human nature, as the renewed interest in the notion of tragedy suggests, and especially in the aftermath of the decline of the humanist optimism of earlier rationalism.

The notion of 'the Fall' has significant ethical and pastoral implications, of which the most important may be noted. It exposes the futility of the utopian delusions of various humancentred philosophies. It cuts the ground from under shallow and superficial views of human nature, which insist upon uncritically affirming the goodness of humanity. The shocking events of the 20th century - such as the horrors of the First World War and Auschwitz - have drawn attention to the darker side of human nature, all too often overlooked by liberal writers, and given theological expression in the concept of 'fallenness'. Ethical and pastoral reflection which ignores the flawed character of human nature is liable to be vulnerable to the charge of being utopian, unrealistic and naive. Perhaps the most influential exposition of this 'Christian realism' may be found in the writings of Reinhold Niebuhr.*

See also: COMMUNITY ETHICS.†

Bibliography

G. C. Berkouwer, Sin (Grand Rapids, 1971); D. Cairns, The Image of God in Man (London, 1973); R. Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man, 2 vols. (London and New York, 1941, 1943); C. R. Smith, The Biblical Doctrine of Sin (London, 1953); F. R. Tennant, The Origin and Propagation of Sin (London, 1902); N. P. Williams, The Ideas of the Fall and of Original Sin (London, 1927).

A.E.M.

FAMILY. Much ink has been spilled on defining 'the family'. That is because it is so hard to find a definition which embraces the Western nuclear family, the African extended family, 'gay marriages' and heterosexual families, single-parent families and so on. Scripture has a very fluid definition. The OT word for family (mispha) blurs the distinctions between family and tribe and between family and nation. The Bible keeps pushing out the boundaries of the family.

Modern families are under immense pressure. Social pressures include the separation of work* from home, often involving long working hours or shift work which cuts the time family members can spend with each other; the subordinate position of women, in spite of tremendous advances this century, which means that key family decisions are often still taken with the husband's interests uppermost in mind; the isolation of families because of the breakdown of community in many places; poverty,* which frequently leads to acute family stress; and the tendency for people to live longer, which means more older relatives for families to look after. Psychological pressures include the tendency for damaging 'rules' of behaviour within families to be handed down for generations. Moral pressures include the liberal, self-fulfilment ethic, which creates a moral atmosphere that can damage families: the self-fulfilment ethic comes too close to selfishness to prevent selfishness.

In the Old Testament

The OT contains a vision for families which can help to sustain commitment when family life becomes tough. Families are to help create a global family. Adam and Eve are given children so that their family can spread over the whole earth (Gn. 1:28). Children are given to Abraham so that his descendants can reverse the fragmentation of humanity at Babel: Israel was to become a planet-wide family by growing in size and attracting foreigners to Judaism. Individual families were to help build this family by procreation, by bringing foreigners into the nation (Dt. 21:10; Gn. 17:12-13) and by contributing to the community economically and politically (political power was to be centred on family 'elders'). Growing through families, Israel was to become a family. Each generation felt that it belonged to the same family as its ancestors and descendants (Am. 3:1).

Families were to pass on knowledge of God so that this global family would become a godly family. Parents were to do this by loving, teaching and disciplining* their children (Dt. 6:4-9; Pr. 13:24). This would benefit the nation (Dt. 6:2-3, 24-25). Children were to separate from their parents emotionally so that they could choose for themselves whether to adopt the faith (Gn. 2:24). They were to honour their parents so that the nation would benefit (Dt. 5:16).

As families created a godly family, God's glory would be reflected in the nation through relationships of equality, solidarity and liberty. The OT reflects the patriarchal assumptions of the surrounding cultures, but contains principles which would have encouraged partners to strain towards equality in marriage. In spite of a long tradition of exegesis to the contrary, the Adam and Eve partnership is one of equality in decision-making. The ideal of equality is celebrated in the Song of Songs. It is hinted at in Pr. 2:17 where the husband is described as 'partner', a term reserved for the closest of friends. Children were to honour their father and mother. Parental authority* was not absolute, since children were expected to separate from their parents - a move towards equality. Equality would encourage solidarity in the family - 'one-fleshness' in marriage (Gn. 2:24), for example, and the custom of gavel whereby family members stood by each other if they were in trouble. This in turn enabled families to encourage liberty. The purpose of gavel, which included the protection of relatives who had fallen on hard times, was to protect the family's economic freedom (e.g. Lv. 25:47-49). Families were to bring freedom from starvation and from enslavement to those outside the home (Dt. 24:19; Pr. 17:2). Families were to act as bastions of freedom by preventing the economic and political concentration of power (1 Sa. 8:10-18). Because families were pivotal to Israelite society, as their partnerships strained towards equality, solidarity and liberty, so these qualities would be displayed in the nation as a whole.

Families, then, were to create a global, godly and glorious family. But the OT is very realistic about their inability to do this on their own. Inter-marriage with foreign women became such a feature of Israelite society that the people were unable to escape the influence of foreign gods (e.g. 1 Ki. 16:31). Both the northern and southern kingdoms were exiled as a result. Far from drawing the world into a single family, God's family had been scattered into the world. The chain of faith between the generations was regularly broken. The book of Judges records the cycle of repentance by one generation and apostasy by the next. Spiritual leaders like Eli, Samuel and David all have sons who turn from God. It seems that the sons of Samuel's contemporaries turn away from God also, and then ask for a monarchy which they are warned will lead to the oppression of families (1 Sa. 7:2; 8:3ff.). Families abandon their defence of freedom. The failure of so many Israelite families to play their role in creating God's family (especially the shortcomings of David's family when David was in such close contact with God) is a great encouragement to modern families: God used Israel and David's family to create a society and a home fit for the Messiah. He still loves and uses families, in spite of their mistakes.

In the New Testament

Jesus is brought up in a home which models the parent-child relationship expected of families in the OT. His parents successfully pass on to him the faith: the religious authorities are amazed at his knowledge (Lk. 2:47). Jesus separates from his parents (Mk. 3:31), and honours them (Lk. 2:51). His upbringing equipped him for his work of saving that global family which human families had been unable to create on their own. The Son felt abandoned by the Father on whom he depended (Mk. 15:34); the Father saw his Son as a rebel (since Jesus bore our sins of rebellion, 1 Pet. 2:24); and the Son died as the family scapegoat (Father and Son colluded with the Son's brothers and sisters by not using their power to prevent the crucifixion). Father and Son experienced the rejection that often occurs in human families. It is important, however, to qualify the parallel between what happened on the cross* and human families. Often parent-child relationships cause pain because of a failure within the relationship: there was no failure in the Father-Son relationship. At the crucifixion, Father and Son were united by a common willingness to suffer for humanity (see Atonement*). Collusion in family scapegoating is usually unconscious: Father and Son colluded deliberately and consciously with members of their family who put Jesus to death, though for the Son's brothers and sisters the collusion was unconscious.

Nevertheless, by sharing the core hurt of human families, Father and Son saved their family from the failure of human families to bring it into existence. Individuals are adopted into this family by the Holy Spirit. NT language confirms that this community is indeed a family. Though Jesus announces the coming of the kingdom,* he instructs his followers to address God as Father rather than King. 'Kingdom' denotes the fact of God's authority: the nature of that authority is paternal. Paul uses the term 'brothers' on almost every page of his letters because he thinks of the church as a family. The godly nature of the family is assured by the Holy Spirit who writes God's laws in our hearts (cf. Je. 31:33). Thanks to the Spirit, the faith is successfully passed on from the Father to his 'sons'. This Father-Son relationship is primary in God's family, rather than marriage,* which is often seen as central. When marriage is central, single people often feel excluded (see Singleness*). By emphasizing the parent-child relationship, Scripture ensures that single people are not left out. Relationships in God's family are characterized by equality. The Father and Son are not exclusively masculine in character. They display so-called feminine qualities. So the Son is the 'image' of the Father (Col. 1:15). Since God's image was reflected equally in the man and the woman in Gn. 1:27, this may imply that Jesus reflects so-called 'masculine' and 'feminine' traits equally in himself, and that in so doing he also reflects the Father. This in turn suggests that God values the 'feminine' as much as the 'masculine', which implies that men and women will have equal value in heaven. The parable of the vineyard indicates that God has no favourites, which is the basis of equality (Mt. 20:1-16). The cross made possible the creation of a global, godly and glorious family.

This family contains models which can help human families realize the OT vision for family life. God's family is an extended family in which all can be included. This ideal was reflected by the first Christians, who made virtually no distinction between the family household and the 'household of God'. Believers ate together, worshipped in their homes and shared their possessions. The Father models parenting by loving his Son (Jn. 5:20), teaching him (Jn. 8:28), and disciplining him, in the sense that on the cross the Son bore the punishment that should have been ours (2 Cor. 5:21; Col. 3:13). By delegating the kingdom to the Son (Mt. 28:18), he models how parents should allow their children to separate. By handing the kingdom back to the Father (1 Cor. 15:24), the Son models how children should honour their parents. The Son offers back to his Father what he has done, as a child might offer back part of his or her life to his or her parents by affirming them and looking after them when they are old. This model is reflected in Paul's teaching about parent-child relationships in Eph. 6:1-4. Similarly, God's family models equality. Christ's death on the cross provides something of a role model for husbands. Husbands are to put their wives first by making sacrifices for them. Wives are to respond by putting their husbands first. There is to be mutual submission (Eph. 5:21-33). The husband's headship consists not of authority, but of helping his wife to be fully herself in a relationship of mutuality (cf. Eph. 4:15). The unity of God's family, reflected in Paul's 'body' imagery, models family solidarity. The liberty of the children of God models the liberty that families are to bring both to their members and to those outside the family. As these models are imitated in the church, they become visible to families who can identify with them, and be challenged by them. They will be helped to achieve in the present what God has intended in the past.

Help for families

How can these scriptural themes help families to face the pressures upon them? 1. Their strong emphasis on the goal of family life provides a morality which is more able to resist selfishness than is the self-fulfilment ethic. Families are to put the future of God's family before their own immediate pleasure. They are to identify with role models within that family. This will create a moral atmosphere that will promote family well-being.

2. Scripture provides healthy family rules that can begin to change the damaging patterns of behaviour frequently passed on from one generation to the next. The OT portrays families on the move, which will encourage families to expect change. Scripture counters the despair which undermines the desire for change by showing how the benefits of change outweigh the advantages of staying still. These benefits include the knowledge that through change families can become more like God's family, and that they will experience some of the joys of that family as a result. Role models within the heavenly family, as echoed in the church on earth, can show families how to change. Adoption into God's family can provide the psychic energy to change - as individuals know they are accepted in that family, that they belong to it and that they experience the Holy Spirit's power.

3. Scripture helps families to counter some of the social pressures upon them. It challenges the modern priority of work. The 'work' of the cross occurred in a family context (Father, Son and the Son's 'brothers'). It created a family rather than just a work community. Families have a key role in helping to create God's family, which means that work must not assume such importance that the task of families is neglected. Instead of the stereotyping of women's roles, which is still frequent in spite of the advances in this century, Scripture encourages spouses to relate on the basis of equality and mutuality. The role of families in building community will help to counter the isolation of individuals and families experienced so often today. OT families were to be a bulwark against poverty, and NT families shared their possessions with the needy. Modern families can combat the damaging effects of poverty on family life by sharing a little of what they have.

This theological model of the family can be described as 'eschatological' because it is forward looking. Families are to help create God's family and they are to be challenged by the nature of this family - what it will be like - when it is completed in the future. This eschatological model helps to round out the Catholic sacramental model which sees families as a vehicle of God's grace.* The sacramental model is weak on explaining how grace is mediated through families. The eschatological model suggests that grace is mediated as families are challenged by the future of God's family. It also rounds out the Protestant 'covenant' model, which suggests that family relationships should imitate God's relationship to his people. Though it need not be, often this covenant* model is presented in rather static terms. The eschatological model can bring into the covenant model a strong dynamic for change. Families are to raise their sights as they help to build the home of tomorrow.

See also: CHILDREN; FAMILY THERAPY; MOBILITY; PARENTHOOD, PARENTING; SINGLE PARENTS.

Bibliography

R. S. Anderson and D. B. Guernsey, On Being Family: A Social Theology of the Family (Grand Rapids, 1985); M. Moynagh, Home to Home: Understanding the Family (London, 1990); E. Schillebeeckx, Marriage: Human Reality and Saving Mystery (New York and London, 1965).

M.M.

FAMILY THERAPY treats the family* as a unit as the primary patient, and the individual family member as a part of the dynamic system of relationships and persons. Many schools of family theory and therapy have emerged, largely from 1950 to 1980 (identified with persons such as M. Bowen, W. Toman, S. Minuchin, V. Satir, J. Haley, M. S. Palazzoli, H. Stierlin and R. Skynner, or with places such as New York, Palo Alto, Milan, Heidelberg and the Tavistock Institute in London). All these share the following points, although with differing theoretical language and formulations, and with contrasting emphases on the intrapsychic and the interrelational dynamics.

1. The family system. The individual is viewed within the family context as a part of its functioning and balance as well as of its dysfunctioning and skewed homeostasis. The system is a dynamic, changing network influenced by the surrounding social systems, pursuing its developmental stages throughout the family life-cycle. The family is not only a nuclear unit of one or two parents and children, but a subunit of the joint family with extended loyalties, obligations and enmeshments. The present family is only a manifestation of the multigenerational patterns, processes, rules, myths, secrets, emotional mortgages, gifts, graces and blessings.

2. Principles of family therapy. Although central principles vary among theorists, key issues are: a. *Power. The energy within each person presses forward growth and wholeness so the power to change, mature and grow lies within the family. As the family is set more free to express and exercise its own power, it will move forward in progressive stages. b. Symptoms. Individual problems are symptoms of dysfunctional family transactions and the maladaptive behaviour changes as the family learns to relate in new ways. c. The patient. The identified patient is pointed to by the family as the cause of the family's problems, but the real patient is the family itself and as the focus is shifted to family stress,* the person is freed to change. d. Sequences and structures. The family as an organism functions in regular sequences and within consistent structures. As this organization of experience is modified, the stress level and symptom pattern also change. e. Intervention. The therapist is seen as an enabler or a coach, a person who joins with the family, becomes part of its processes, tracks its sequences and structures, assists in restructuring by challenging the symptom, the structure and the family reality, then separates from the family in a healthful leave-taking.

3. Multigenerational family process. The family possesses its own identity and process, which are visible in: a. the family collective mind, called the joint ego mass; b. relational triangles composed of two closely connected persons and a third person or issue in an outside position; c. the subsystems of spouses, siblings and parents with their own means of handling stress, conflict* and immaturity; d. the multigenerational transmission of traits which maps the past on to the future from generation to generation; e. emotional cut-offs by which persons avoid anxiety* by severing relationships; f. balanced and centred experience of separateness and connectedness which is called differentiation; and g. maintaining clear boundaries that are flexible and permeable. Good family boundaries are firm within the family but open to the community; dysfunctional families have rigid walls around the family and weak or absent boundaries between family members. All these concepts are interlocking and function not in cause-and-effect ways but as elements in the dynamic organism of the family system.

4. Family therapy and pastoral care and counselling. Pastoral care of families can invite healthy differentiation and nourish connectedness between persons in ways that respect personhood and invite growth of the whole family unit. The pastoral counsellor serves as a family advocate, consultant, educator and as needed therapist. Although the congregation is meant to be a community of faith with diverse and unrelated members which goes beyond the projections of the family of origin, it still functions as a system with subsystems in ways that are parallel to the family organism. Many pastoral interventions in congregational confusion and conflict function in ways that apply family therapy practice.

See also: CHARACTER.†

Bibliography

M. Bowen, Family Therapy in Clinical Practice (New York, 1978); E. Friedman, Generation to Generation (New York, 1985); V. Satir, Peoplemaking (Palo Alto, CA, 1972); R. Skynner, One Flesh, Separate Persons (London, 1976); S. Walrond-Skinner, Family Matters (London, 1988).

D.W.A.

FAMILY TREE, see HEALING OF FAMILY TREE.

FASTING (Heb. sum, 'to cover the mouth'; inna napso, 'to humble oneself', lit. 'to afflict the soul'; Gk. nesteuo, 'to fast'), a practice found in all societies, cultures and centuries, is prompted by a variety of objectives and rationales. Although it is a well-established spiritual discipline (see Disciplines, Spiritual*) occurring in both OT and NT and other religious literature, it is not confined to religious usage. The fasts of Mohandas (Mahatma) Gandhi (1869-1948) and the IRA hunger-strikes are well-known instruments of political pressure and protest against injustice, often evoking admiration, but morally questionable; whereas hunger lunches and abstention from food to identify with the poor and raise relief are clearly Christlike (Is. 58:6-7). Some health regimes use fasts to tone up the body.

The theology of fasting

Old Testament. In the OT, fasting is used to express repentance (Joel 2:12-13; Jon. 3:5-9) or a desperate plea for God's intervention when in peril (Est. 4:1-4). Consequently it was a sign of mourning and sorrow for sins, a stance of humility sometimes using sackcloth and ashes (Dn. 9:3), and in itself a petition, though often also accompanied by vocal prayer. (The natural abstention from food in bereavement may have been the origin of religious fasting, the historical roots of which are otherwise obscure.) On occasions it is resorted to for healing (1 Sa. 1:7-8; Ps. 35:13), protection, renewal and revelation, as when God spoke to Moses on Sinai (Ex. 34:28), but in essence in these cases fasting is also seen as a dramatic, serious appeal for God to act. This is the reason that God ordered the only fast for all the people under the law to be on the Day of Atonement, when he annually removed the nation's sin (Lv. 16:29-31).

Jesus' example and teaching. Jesus fasted (Mt. 4:2) and expected that his disciples would keep fasts also, along with the other two important Jewish disciplines, prayer and giving (Mt. 6:1-18). He inherits and therefore assumes all the OT understanding concerning this discipline, re-emphasizing the warning of Is. 58:1-5 against hypocrisy. Self-display and self-righteousness, as portrayed by the Pharisee in Jesus' parable (Lk. 18:9-14), are rejected, and consequently the Jewish practice of sackcloth and ashes (Mt. 6:16-18). The Day of Atonement with its compulsory fast and sabbath (Lv. 16:29-31; 23:26-32) is superseded by Jesus' 'sacrifice' of crucifixion and 'sabbath rest' of salvation without works.

Although some sections of the church, like Israel, have commanded compulsory fast days, these seem contrary to the spirit of Jesus' voluntary fasting, although a church or national fast would be acceptable as a corporate exercise if not enforced, as when Britain was threatened by Napoleon, or as in the case of Nineveh in Jon. 3. Even the four feasts mourning the end of the monarchy, the destruction of Jerusalem and the exile were destined to be turned into joyful feasts (Zc. 8:19). No doubt Jesus as a good Israelite would have fasted on the Day of Atonement, but his disciples were criticized for feasting and not fasting. Jesus' reply was that they would fast when he was taken away (Mk. 2:18-20; Lk. 5:33-35). The church age of the new wineskin is to be characterized by both feasting and fasting, since the kingdom is here but not in its entirety. Disciples will feast because they have met the bridegroom, but will also fast for his return.

The New Testament church. Since apart from the NT little is known about the 1st century church, it is inadmissible to assert, as some do, that fasting was not practised or that Jesus' view on the subject is unclear (e.g. Johannes Behm, 'Fasting,' in TDNT 4). What is clear is that: 1. Jesus gave both example and teaching in the Gospels, clearly indicating that it was an outward sign of an inner state; and 2. there are at least seven references to fasting in the best texts of the Acts and the epistles. Paul fasted (Acts 9:9; 13:2-3; 14:23) to receive light and power from God in the establishing of the church. 2 Cor. 6:5 and 11:27 have both been interpreted as references to involuntary hunger, but since the latter mentions both involuntary hunger (limos) and voluntary going without food (nesteia), it is likely that religious fasting is also in view there.

Fasting in church history

The sub-apostolic church fasted, as Clement of Rome (fl. c. 96) indicates. The Didache (c. 2nd century), in ch. 8, teaches fasting twice a week (Wednesdays and Fridays, to differ from the Pharisees - 'hypocrites', who fasted on Mondays and Thursdays), and also in preparation for Easter. The Shepherd of Hermas (2nd century) in ch. 5, shows fasting in relationship to prayer for the Lord's return. The Epistle of Barnabas 3:1, Polycarp (c. 69-c. 155) and Justin Martyr (c. 100-165) in his Dialogue 15:1 all show fasting as a regular Christian discipline. However, by the 3rd century, Tertullian* clearly treats fasting as meritorious (De Poenitentia 13; De Oratione 18) as do the Apocrypha and Tobit 12:8, and later teachers till the Reformation suggest its value for atoning for sin. While most teachers of this period warn against asceticism,* the theology of works of merit takes precedence over that of fasting being a discipline and means of grace.

Outstanding Christian leaders through the centuries practised fasting for a variety of reasons. Origen (c. 185-c. 254), Jerome (c. 342-420), Augustine,* Thomas Aquinas,* Martin Luther,* John and Charles Wesley,* David Brainerd (1718-47) and Charles G. Finney (1792-1875) are but a few.

Types of fasting

There are various types of fasts: 1. supernatural fasts - sustained by God, since a human cannot live without water for more than three days (e.g. Moses and Elijah, Ex. 34:28 and 1 Ki. 19:8); 2. absolute fasts - no food and water for a maximum of three days (Est. 4:16; Acts 9:9); 3. normal fasts - including water, either long (forty days, e.g. Jesus, Lk. 4:1-2), or short (one day, e.g. Lv. 23:12-14); and 4. partial fasts (1 Ki. 17:6; Dn. 1:12-16; 10:2-3). There are, however, also hypocritical fasts (1 Ki. 21:9-12; Is. 58:3-5; 1 Tim. 4:3).

Moses, Elijah and Jesus, each fasting for forty days, introduced respectively the Law, the Prophets and the kingdom (cf. Lk. 16:16). Though the NT emphasizes the joy of the kingdom of God, it is none the less appropriate that on occasion, such as during a time of spiritual dearth, churches and individuals should choose to seek the restoring of God's favour by fasting.

See also: CHARACTER.†

Bibliography

J. Behm, TDNT 4, pp. 924-935; R. D. Chatham, Fasting (South Plainfield, NJ, 1987); J. E. Hartley, TWOT 2, pp. 758-759; A. Wallis, God's Chosen Fast (Eastbourne and Fort Washington, PN, 1969).

R.T.F.

FATHERING, see PARENTHOOD, PARENTING.

FEAR may be defined as a state of mind, experienced in a threatening situation, and resulting in behaviour which is designed to escape or avoid the threat. In this state, unpleasant feelings prevail. The word is used in a multitude of other ways, many of which describe the state of the brain and nervous system when fear predominates. There is a high arousal, which is sometimes felt as anxiety,* with its well-known physical manifestations. Lovers of horror films will testify that the arousal is not always disliked.

In itself, fear and the reactions it triggers in our minds and bodies is a kind of signal of which we do well to take note, and then to act appropriately. Many fears seem innate in animals and humans, such as the fear of snakes or of birds such as a hawk. Ethologists, studying animal behaviour, have made major contributions to understanding the nature of fear as a biological process. Some fears are ageappropriate: fear of noises or strange objects may become much less in humans between the age of one year and six years. Other fears may be acquired in these early years by a process of conditioning.

Psychologists, studying both human and animal behaviour, have elaborated theories to attempt to explain excessive fears, and to help in their treatment. Thus, many phobias can be explained simply by a process of learning, though the method of becoming fearful may be very complex. The importance of these findings is that treatment of clinically severe fears and phobias may be based on unlearning what has been learned by faulty teaching, experience or conditioning.

Doctors have studied the clinical pictures of the neuroses* where fear is the predominant feature, as in anxiety states or phobic disorders. Symptoms such as a fast heart-rate causing palpitations, or gut symptoms such as nausea (sick with fear) or diarrhoea, and many others, may be the result of fear. Such fear may be appropriate in some situations, but in neurotic disorders it is almost always the result of poor adaptation to present needs. Since the physical effects of fear are mediated by adrenalin as well as other neuro-endocrine responses, the discovery of beta-adrenergic blocking drugs such as propranolol has proved of great value in such conditions as raised blood pressure, as well as many other more specific anxiety symptoms. In many depressive illnesses (see Depression*), fear in the form of severe agitation is often marked, and responds to treatment of the underlying illness, rather than to a direct approach to the fears involved.

The term 'anxiety' has often been used with exactly the same meaning as fear. In the theories which follow Freud* and others, the burying of a fearful experience by a process of repression (see Repression, Psychological*) has led to many treatment approaches. Thus, by a process of psychoanalysis* it was thought desirable to arrive at the painful experience that had been long-forgotten, and, by bringing the unconscious fear into the world of conscious awareness, it was hoped to cure the neurosis.

More simply, a man who had been injured in a burning tank in a war experience might, with the help of a therapist and a suitable amount of medication, be able to live through the past experience and recover from its harmful effects: this process of abreaction or catharsis is less used today. Post-traumatic stress* disorders may be treated by going over, with a trained listener in a safe place, the whole experience of mugging, near-drowning or whatever trauma gave rise to the disorder.

Fear may be wholly proper in relation to spiritual things, or the approach to God in worship (e.g. Ps. 86:11). This sense of the numinous is sometimes spoken of as awe or reverential fear (e.g. Acts 5:11).

Appropriate fear is what is meant by the fear of the Lord being the beginning of wisdom (Pr. 1:7); whereas it is the fear which has torment that is cast out by perfect love (1 Jn. 4:18).

Bibliography

J. A. Gray, The Psychology of Fear and Stress (Cambridge, 1987); I. M. Marks, Fears, Phobias and Rituals (London, 1984); S. Rachman, The Meanings of Fear (London, 1974).

G.D.

FELLOWSHIP. To have fellowship (Gk. koinonia) is to have a share in, to participate in, and to be in communion with, someone in something. Its secular usage is seen in Lk. 5:10 where James and John are said to be 'fellowshippers' (koinonoi) with Peter in his fishing business. The Christian understanding of fellowship, however, has developed into a much deeper concept. Fellowship is not the mere sharing of a common interest or the working towards the achievement of a common goal. It is 'a common participation in God's grace in Christ' (Bruce Milne). The basis of fellowship is the believer's participation in Christ.

In the OT, fellowship with God was disrupted through the Fall* (Gn. 3:8-10), with the result that people became alienated from one another and true community became unobtainable. The covenant* with Abraham (Gn. 15:1-21) looks to the creation of a new community and, based as it was on faith, anticipates the work of Christ which restores fellowship with God. Furthermore, the wilderness period is used to portray an ideal picture of fellowship between God and his people (e.g. Is. 43:19-21; 48:21).

The NT portrays not only how fellowship with God can be restored, but the consequences of that restoration for human relationships. Although the concept is not limited to Paul's writing it is brought into sharpest focus there. He variously describes it as 'fellowship with his Son Jesus Christ' (1 Cor. 1:9); 'the fellowship of the Holy Spirit' (2 Cor. 13:14; cf. Phil. 2:2); a fellowship 'in the gospel' and 'in God's grace' (Phil. 1:5, 7). The book of Hebrews speaks of it as sharing 'in Christ' (3:14), Peter of participating 'in the divine nature' (2 Pet. 1:4), whilst John writes of the result of our fellowship as being 'with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ' (1 Jn. 1:3).

Fellowship is more than a theoretical idea. The believer experimentally takes part in the experiences of Christ. Thus he or she participates in Christ's suffering (Rom. 8:17; Col. 1:24), death (Rom. 6:6, 8), burial (Rom. 6:4; Col. 2:12), resurrection and ascension (Rom. 6:4; Eph. 2:6; Col. 2:12; 3:1) and glory (Rom. 8:18; 2 Tim. 2:12).

A chief expression of fellowship in Christ was to be found in the fellowship meal. Participation in Christ gave rise to the sharing of bread and wine together (1 Cor. 10:14-17; Acts 2:42). Participation in the meal implied that one accepted one's fellow-diners as valid participants in Christ. The issue of whom one could have 'fellowship' with at a meal was consequently to dog the early church until the principle of salvation by grace through Christ alone was thoroughly established. (See Acts 10:1 - 11:18, esp. 11:3; Gal. 2:11-21.) This issue highlights that fellowship can only be on the basis of truth (Gal. 2:14). The fellowship meal further points forward (1 Cor. 11:26), to the time of the Messianic banquet when perfect fellowship will be realized (Rev. 19:9, 17).

The quality of fellowship in the early church was not perfect. Hence there are frequent exhortations to improve it by accepting one another (Rom. 15:7) and forgiving one another (Eph. 4:32), and to serve one another by bearing each other's burdens (Jn. 13:1-17; Gal. 6:2). There is also a realistic recognition of the fact that care can degenerate into busybodiness and prayer into gossip under the guise of fellowship (Gal. 6:4-5; 1 Tim. 5:13). The task of pastoral leadership was to facilitate fellowship by exhortation, rebuke, counsel and by further exposition of the meaning of the gospel which they had come to believe. Individualism,* which ignored the fellowship implications of discipleship, was foreign to their thinking.

The vertical dimension of fellowship with God, rightly understood, cannot but lead to a true fellowship with fellow-believers. Through the new birth a person is initiated into an accepting, forgiving and healing community. Thus the isolation, alienation and loneliness which are the result of sin, and the sinner's cutting off from God, should be overcome at the deepest level. Unfortunately, the church is caught between 'the already' and 'the not yet' of God's kingdom and may well, therefore, fail to live up to its ideal.

Encouragement to attain the ideal is not to be gained by the organization of more communal activities, which may sometimes sadly have the opposite effect, but by a greater appreciation of the meaning of fellowship. To reduce a Christian understanding of fellowship to drinking coffee after a service, engaging in recreational activities or the fulfilment of a particular work project, is superficial, if not erroneous. Such activities may stem from fellowship but are not fellowship in themselves.

Bibliography

R. Banks, Paul's Idea of Community (Exeter, 1980); P. F. Esler, Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts (Cambridge, 1987); R. P. Martin, The Family and the Fellowship (Exeter, 1979); B. Milne, We Belong Together: The Meaning of Fellowship (Leicester, 1978); J. Schattermann, NIDNTT 1, pp. 639-644.

D.J.T.

FEMINISM. There are many diverse strands in feminist theory. Feminists differ in their explanations of the origin and nature of woman's oppression and how best to gain liberation. This reflects the complex history of feminism. Its course has been shaped by the interaction of various social, political and philosophical currents. Perhaps the single most powerful influence on feminist ideology was the 18th-century Enlightenment* theory about an individual's natural rights.* Mary Wollstonecraft's A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792) was foundational, applying the principle of natural rights to women, arguing that women have equal worth with men and therefore have the same rights.

An organized women's movement emerged in the 19th century. At first it was allied to the struggle for the abolition of slavery* and the temperance and moral reform movements. Later, women who were fighting for social justice for others realized the extent to which women themselves were subjected to social injustices, and a movement to obtain political, legal and educational rights for women developed. Nineteenth-century socialism* added another layer to feminist thinking. The emphasis shifted from the rights of the individual woman to the economic rights of women as a class. Socialist feminists provided a critique of the capitalist* system, in which women as a class are oppressed by the sexual division of labour.

The women's movement re-emerged in the 1960s. Radical feminism was born out of the civil rights movement and the New Left. The radical feminists moved beyond demands for equal rights and attempts to change the system to the revolutionary goal of removing patriarchy, i.e. the systematic oppression of women by men in social structures and institutions. They argued that patriarchy was all-pervasive in our culture and that women were owned and controlled through the tyranny of marriage, sex and child-bearing. They advocated abolition of marriage* and the nuclear family,* which should be replaced by alternative forms of reproduction and child-rearing. Radical feminism sometimes led to separatism and the exclusion of men. Changing the laws on abortion,* rape* and violence* against women became key issues in achieving women's sexual rights.

Christian women were prominent in the 19th-century women's movement, but the relationship between Christianity and feminism has often been one of mutual distrust. Feminists both within and outside the church have accused the church of propagating a negative view of women. Those outside the church tend to regard Christianity as a patriarchal religion which has devalued women, and they view the church as a powerful agent of oppression. Awkward questions have been asked about the maleness of church hierarchies, the exclusively male language employed in hymns, liturgies and sermon illustrations, and the restrictions placed on women. The bias in traditional interpretations of the Bible has been challenged. Modern feminist theology has developed as a reaction and a protest to patriarchal theology.

There are three main groupings of modernday feminists:

1. The post-Christian feminists, believing that Christianity is irredeemably patriarchal, have abandoned the church and attempt to construct an alternative feminist religion (see, e.g., M. Daly, Beyond God the Father, Boston, MA, 1973).

2. The revisionists are critical of the malecentredness of traditional theology, but they do not reject the Bible completely. Among this revisionist group are Elisabeth Schussler Fiorenza (1938-), Catharina Halkes (1920-), Rosemary Radford Ruether (1936-), Letty M. Russell (1929-) and Phyllis Trible. They believe that there are liberating elements within the biblical text. Their aim is to reinterpret the Bible and liberate it from patriarchy. The most distinctive feature of their theology is their emphasis on 'woman's experience' as the key to interpreting the Bible.

3. Biblical feminists do not believe that the Bible itself is misogynist, but they challenge some of the ways in which it has been interpreted. Among this group are Paul Jewett (1919-91), Myrtle Langley and Virginia Ramey Mollenkott (1932-), who tend to employ a hermeneutic of deculturization. Others, such as Mary J. Evans (1946- ; see Woman in the Bible, Exeter, 1983; Downers Grove, IL, 1984) re-examine the biblical material but emphasize careful exegesis rather than the cultural conditioning of the Bible.

By means of careful exegesis, or by consideration of the cultural context, biblical feminists attempt to redress the balance. Fundamental to this perspective is the conviction that the Bible is God's Word, not merely men's words. Their contention is that both sexes were made in God's image* and shared the same place in the created order (Gn. 1:26-28; 2:18-25). Together they rebelled against God. They were found equally guilty and punished by hard labour, death and exile from God's presence (Gn. 3:1-24). After the Fall,* man's domination became oppressive (Gn. 3:16); the OT reflects this. But, there is no double standard in the way women relate personally to God. Jesus' attitudes were revolutionary and run counter to those of any culture. The good news of the gospel is for both sexes (Mt. 12:50). Women were included in Jesus' ministry (Lk. 8:1-3), received some of the most important revelations (Jn. 4:1-42; 11:17-27), and witnessed miracles (Mk. 5:24-34; Lk. 13:10-17). In a culture where women could not give evidence in a court of law, they were chosen as the first witnesses of the resurrection (Mt. 28:1-10; Mk. 15:47 - 16:11; Lk. 23:55 - 24:11; Jn. 20:1-18). Jesus' negative remarks about women were reserved for those who put domestic and maternal roles before obedience to the gospel (Lk. 10:38-42; 11:27-28). The inclusion of women continued in the early church as both men and women were empowered by the Holy Spirit to spread the gospel (Acts 2:1-21), and their fundamental equality with men was affirmed by the apostle Paul (Gal. 3:28).

At one extreme, the church's response to feminism has been reactionary and dismissive. Feminists have been caricatured and treated with deep suspicion. There has been a failure to take seriously any of the issues raised by the women's movement. At the other extreme, there has been an uncritical identification with the women's movement. Often this is because women have become disheartened and frustrated by the right-wing reaction of the church. They tend to drift into a more liberal theological position and liberal lifestyle. However, people sharing this biblical perspective have developed organizations which seek to educate Christians regarding the equality of men and women (e.g. 'Men, Women and God' in Britain, and 'Christians for Biblical Equality' in the US).

Though the radical feminist movement has passed its peak, there can be little doubt that a revolution has occurred in the way women think. In fact, feminism as a social movement has profoundly affected both men and women. If the church is to be relevant, a range of issues must be addressed. These include the following:

1. Traditional theology needs to be more open to the feminist critique and must seriously evaluate feminist hermeneutics. Feminist theology is not for women only.

2. Feminists are right to point out that women's experience has been ignored. The church's teaching must engage with the real issues in women's lives. It must get inside the futility, anger, hurt, powerlessness and contradictions many women feel. Single (see Singleness*) and childless (see Childlessness*) women, for example, complain that instead of alleviating their pain, the church exacerbates it by emphasizing marriage and child-bearing as a woman's vocation.

3. Women need to hear a message that offers hope in a language that they understand. Focusing on Jesus' radical, liberating treatment of women may help to convince them that he is a saviour for women as well as men. One fruitful evangelistic and apologetic approach for women may be to explore the extent to which Western literature and religious art reflect a patriarchal, cultural image rather than a positive, biblical image of woman.

4. The church is also accused of alienating women by using exclusively male language. In this debate about linguistic discrimination, there are two separate issues to be considered: a. the language used to describe God's people, the church; and b. the language used to address God. (See A. E. Lewis, ed., The Motherhood of God, Edinburgh, 1984.) There is certainly scope for modifying the language that we use to describe God's people in hymns and prayers, and to make sermons more gender-inclusive. From the biblical perspective, we are not free to address God as we see fit, but reference to the female imagery used to describe God (Ps. 131:2; Is. 42:14; 49:15; 66:13) could help some women to see how closely God has identified with their experience.

5. Women need help to recognize their spiritual gifts and every encouragement to play an active part in the Christian community. This is a much broader issue than the debate on the ordination of women. In that debate, we can lose sight of the NT teaching about the priesthood of all believers and the church as the body of Christ composed of people with different gifts (1 Pet. 2:5). For too long we have approached the role of women in the church from the wrong angle, emphasizing the restrictions that should be placed on women, when the real problem is how to help all believers to discover and use their gifts. Often church structures discourage both women and men from developing their gifts. The church has not always examined whether its practices are cultural, traditional or thoroughly biblical. The part played by women in biblical history and church history has been neglected. Those women could supply positive role models and provide inspiration for modern women.

6. The church community may mirror our society by dividing into sub-groups, and this can lead to the painful isolation of single women, single parents* and others who do not fit neatly into one of the groups. The caring Christian community will find creative ways of expressing its oneness as the family* of God and providing opportunities for relationships which are healing and enriching.

7. There is increasing confusion and uncertainty about gender roles and identity. People need help to reappraise their marriages, to think through their roles in parenting,* in domestic responsibilities and in the work place. Sexual problems may be linked to the confusion about gender identity. This is an area where the church could provide more sensitive teaching, counselling and support for those who struggle with their sexual orientation. (See M. S. van Leeuwen, Gender and Grace, Downers Grove and Leicester, 1991.)

8. The women's movement has led the way in objecting to the ways women are used in advertising,* pornography* and media violence. It has also provided practical help for women who are victims of violence. This must prompt some soul-searching in the Christian community about its silence on these issues and the extent of its social involvement.

See also: DISCRIMINATION; SEXUAL HARASSMENT.

Bibliography

O. Banks, Faces of Feminism (Oxford, 1981); A. Brown, Apology to Women: Christian Images of the Female Sex (Leicester, 1991); J. B. Hurley, Man and Woman in Biblical Perspective (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 1981); P. K. Jewett, Man as Male and Female (Grand Rapids, 1975); R. R. Ruether, 'A Method of Correlation', in L. M. Russell (ed.), Feminist Interpretation of the Bible (Oxford and Philadelphia, 1985); idem, New Woman, New Earth (New York, 1975); E. Starkey, What's Right with Feminism (London, 1985; Grand Rapids, 1986).

A.B.

FEMINITY, see SEXUALITY.†

FETISHISM, see SEXUAL DEVIATION.

FLESH. The word 'flesh' (usually basar in the OT and consistently sarx in the NT) is often misunderstood as referring to something inherently evil or as a part of the human being which contains, and is at odds with, the soul (ideas influenced by Hellenistic thought). On the contrary, it stands for the whole person from the perspective of his or her external and physical existence, in contrast to the internal and spiritual (Jn. 3:6; Rom. 2:28-29; 2 Cor. 4:11). It denotes the earthly life in its totality in a non-disparaging manner (Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:22, 24); as such it is that aspect of humans which binds them to the whole created order (see Rom. 8:23) and it distinguishes the creature from God (who is spirit and not flesh), emphasizing the frailty, limitations and mortality of human existence (Mk. 14:38; Rom. 6:19; 1 Cor. 15:50; cf. 1 Cor. 1:26 and 2:5, 13).

Accordingly, the term 'flesh' can refer simply to meat or bodily tissue (Lv. 6:27; 1 Cor. 15:39); the whole body (Pr. 14:30; 1 Cor. 6:16-17); the self (Ps. 63:1; Rom. 7:18); human beings (Mt. 16:17; Rom. 3:20); the whole human race (Pss. 65:2; 145:21; Joel 2:28; Acts 2:17); racial or genealogical lineage (Rom. 1:3; 9:8); or the realm of ordinary historical existence and society (2 Cor. 10:1-3; Phil. 3:3ff.). Christ came 'in the flesh' (see Eph. 2:15; Col. 1:22; Heb. 5:7). It is obvious that being 'in the flesh' in this sense is not incompatible with being 'in the Lord' (see Gal. 2:20; Phm. 16).

But being en sarki can become incompatible with being a Christian. When one allows one's God-given form of earthly existence to govern thinking and conduct, the sarx becomes sinful. What is evil is not the flesh itself, but limiting oneself to it and trusting human resources and efforts apart from God (see Gal. 6:12-13; 2 Cor. 11:13; Phil. 3:3). (It is for this reason that relying on the Law* for one's salvation is as carnal as sensuality; see Gal. 3:3.)

This ethical dimension to sarx is distinctly (though not exclusively) Pauline and goes beyond OT conceptions. Paul speaks of it as living or walking 'according the flesh' (Rom. 8:4-9, 12-14) - i.e. orienting one's whole being around what is earthly, assuming that human life consists simply in the flesh, and maintaining a self-sufficiency apart from God. To do this is to accept the natural end of flesh - namely, dissolution and death (Rom. 8:13; Gal. 6:8).

The carnally minded person is not able to understand divine revelation, accurately assess the identity of Christ or carry on spiritual warfare (Jn. 3:6; 1 Cor. 2:14; 2 Cor. 5:16-17; 10:3-4). As flesh, humans are not able to inherit the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 15:50).

Paul further develops the ethical dimension of sarx by arguing that, when we orient our lives around sarx, it becomes a power (opposed to God's Spirit) that shapes us and enslaves us. Flesh (designating the whole person) becomes the willing instrument of sin, such that we disobey God in every area of our lives (as the list of 'works of the flesh' in Gal. 5:19-21 indicates). Only the power of God's Spirit is able to free us from servitude to the flesh. And even then the flesh continues to war against the Christian who has received God's Spirit (Rom. 7; 1 Pet. 2:11).

It is important to stress that Paul does not link flesh to sin on the basis of Gk. notions of the intrinsic and irremediably evil character of the material part of human existence, but only on the basis of a life-sustaining attitude of denial of the creature's relation to God.

The Christian is instructed not to walk according to the flesh, but to 'put on' Christ and the 'new self' (Rom. 13:14; Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10, 12ff.). This does not mean denying our bodily existence. It requires a disposition that regards the flesh (in the ethical sense) as dead, having been crucified in believers who are now 'in the Spirit' (Rom. 6:11; Gal. 5:24). Again, this is still a physical (fleshly) existence, but one that now places ultimate confidence in Christ, not in self or earthly resources (Gal. 2:20). This is a powerful concept for us who are tempted to secure our lives through wealth, technology, good works, national power, and the like. Further, it requires the positive action of living according to the Spirit (Rom. 8:4; Gal. 5:16). This involves intentional behaviours - spiritual disciplines that allow God's grace to strengthen the flesh that is weak when the spirit is willing.

Bibliography

A. Hoekema, Created in God's Image (Exeter and Grand Rapids, 1986); G. E. Ladd, A Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids, 1974); J. A. T. Robinson, The Body (London and Chicago, 1952); D. Willard, The Spirit of the Disciplines (San Francisco, 1988); E. Schweizer et al., TDNT 7, pp. 98-151.

D.L.O.

FLETCHER, JOSEPH (1905-91). Professor of Social Ethics at the Episcopal Theological School of Cambridge, Massachusetts, Joseph Fletcher created one of the most lively moral debates in American church circles in the 1960s and 70s with the publication of Situation Ethics: The New Morality (Philadelphia and London, 1966). Fletcher presented situationism (see Situation Ethics*) as an alternative to legalism* and antinomianism.*

The Christian situationist recognizes the love commandment as the only absolute moral principle and examines each situation carefully to determine what love requires then and there. Other moral rules are 'illuminators' indicating common wisdom about what usually results in the most loving consequences for all involved; unlike the principle of love (see †), they have no universal significance, no absolute binding power.

Fletcher's moral theory is, thus, a form of act-utilitarianism, although Fletcher's version of utilitarianism (see Consequentialism*) is non-hedonistic (see Hedonism*). The situationist performs the action which will bring about the greatest good for all those involved. Fletcher, however, never clearly articulated what that good consists of and how it can be determined.

Joseph Fletcher's most lasting contribution to moral theology may be his early work in biomedical ethics rather than his popular Situation Ethics and its companion volume Moral Responsibility: Situation Ethics at Work (Philadelphia and London, 1967). His Morals and Medicine (Boston, MA, 1954) was groundbreaking as an attempt to apply moral theory to medical problems of contraception (see Birth Control*), sterilization* and euthanasia.* He continued his work in medical ethics with The Ethics of Genetic Control (Garden City, NY, 1974) and ended his teaching career as a visiting lecturer in medical ethics at the University of Virginia.

See also; ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE.†

T.D.K.

FOETUS, see ABORTION; AMNIOCENTESIS; EMBRYOLOGY; ETHICS OF MEDICAL CARE;† LIFE, HEALTH AND DEATH.†

FOLK RELIGION. Folk (implicit or popular) religion is a vague term, covering an unsystematic, non-organized, evolving collection of ideas and rituals more closely related to the experience of ordinary people in any culture* than the confessional statements of any institutional religion.

1. Aspects of folk religion

Rites of passage (baptisms, weddings, funerals) particularly focus any understanding of folk religion, because they reflect the human need for help in negotiating times of crisis. Folk religion is also about maintaining life as it is, hence for country people in Britain, annual festivals (Harvest, Remembrance, Christmas) are important, and even in cities church buildings symbolize continuity.

People derive important meaning from folk rituals and symbols. They learn ideas about God, fate, luck, merit and magic. Secularization* has not ended this religious 'search': many otherwise-secular Japanese turn to Shinto and Buddhism for births and deaths: the city of Liverpool wept and prayed after the Hillsborough football disaster; there is the recent growth in celebrating Hallowe'en.

P. G. Hiebert (1892-1987) uses an anthropological model to help understand the phenomena of folk religion, phenomena as diverse as seeking guidance for daily living, prayers for healing,* the practice of magic, and invocation of saints. He groups these phenomena in a middle zone (of 'human history'), bridging what in many Western cultures is a gap between an upper zone (of the God of truth, the creator and judge, the God of 'cosmic history') and the tangible world (of 'natural history') which we experience in daily life. He asserts that it is no wonder that folk or popular religion prospers when so much orthodox religion overlooks the presence of God in this middle zone of human experience.

2. Responses to folk religion

Folk religion must be taken with the utmost seriousness. John Habgood (1927-) likens it to the submerged part of an iceberg whose visible tip is represented by active church-goers. But, like natural theology, folk religion can be criticized for under-emphasizing grace* and revelation.* For example, an anthropological explanation of natural priesthood in folk religion is in conflict with a Christian theology of ministry. Some popular religious ideas are also pastorally dangerous, denying the reality of death,* or ignoring the needs of the poor (Mk. 10:17-31).

But accepting that religious rituals and symbols are often misunderstood, folk religion can be seen as the expression of a universal human need, the first stage in faith development.* In J. Westerhoff's terms, 'the faith of utter dependence' (the most elementary faith) can grow into 'adult owned faith' and full personal commitment. Such mature faith, arising out of a conversion of heart and mind, refuses to manipulate 'god', or make the satisfaction of human need (e.g. personal healing) central to religion, but recognizes God as Lord or cosmic, natural and human history.

3. Folk religion and evangelism

Apologetics, pastoral theology (see Practical and Pastoral Theology†) and popular religion alike are responses to human life as it is. H. Oppenheimer shows how folk religion (often strong on morality) remains undernourished and impoverished until surrounded by the grace of God - specifically until people have reason to be grateful to God the creator because of the cross* and resurrection* of Jesus Christ. Popular Christianity (the same is true in other religions) may bear little resemblance to orthodoxy, requiring discernment and continual christological reflection.

Growth into maturity of faith may be resisted particularly when such faith is focused on rites of passage. By definition, this religion is required only at times of crisis. The 'priest' is perceived as an unattainable ideal (a remote figure - like God), not as someone whose faith can be imitated. The symbols become 'ends' rather than signs to something greater. However, if aspects of life's continuity can be seen alongside these moments of crisis, and if our common humanity be recognized in the person of Christ, then the minister at a rite of passage may be both their helper and a bringer of good news.

To embrace and work with popular religion is demanding. If people in anger resist their world-view being challenged by something bigger it can be painful (as when penitence was expressed alongside thanksgiving at the service in London, following the end of war in the Falklands in 1982). But the pastor's call is to follow Christ's example and embrace people for God's sake with all their faults.

Bibliography

E. Bailey, A Workbook of Popular Religion (Dorchester, 1986); J. Bax, The Good Wine (London, 1986), ch. 3; C. Chapman, Shadows of the Supernatural (Oxford, 1990), pp. 142-147; D. Davies, 'Natural and Christian Priesthood in Folk Religiosity', Anv 2.1, 1985, pp. 43f.; C. Hart, 'Natural Priesthood, the Priesthood of All Believers and Parochial Ministry', Anv 6.3, 1989, pp. 243-250; P. G. Hiebert, 'Folk Religion in Andhra Pradesh', in V. Samuel and C. Sugden (eds.), Evangelism and the Poor (Oxford, 1982; Bangalore, 1983); M. Silversides, Folk Religion: Friend or Foe? (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1986); G. Smith, Christianity in the Inner City: Some Sociological Issues (Bromley, 1988), pp. 5-20; J. Williams, 'The Sociology of Religion and Contemporary Strategies for the Church', Anv 6.2, 1989, pp. 135-148.

G.O.S.

FOOD is a fundamental requisite for human life and, as might be expected, occupies an important role in the physical, social and commercial areas of human polity as well as in those areas that are explicitly religious. The biblical texts suggest four general principles which appear to have great relevance to present-day society and industry.

1. Food is a God-ordained provision for physical life

The supply of food, either directly, or indirectly as resources such as land,* which permits its production, is an expression of the goodness of God (Dt. 8:3, 7, 18; Ec. 2:24-26; 5:18-20). Both OT and NT illustrate God's concern for the physical needs of people: the divine insight and wisdom given to Joseph in handling the Middle Eastern famine (Gn. 41); provision for Israel's journey through the wilderness (Dt. 8:16); provision for individuals (1 Ki. 17:4; 18:4); and Christ himself both looked and acted with compassion towards the crowds of 4,000 and 5,000 men (Mt. 15:29-39; 14:13-21). What is true for nations and individuals is also relevant for families and their children. However, humankind is not simply a beneficiary but also a steward (see Stewardship*) and tenant in God's creation (Gn. 1:26-28; Lv. 25:23), and we are under an obligation to use these resources wisely to provide for our continuing existence. We must not squander or destroy them, but rather ensure that every person receives a share in God's provision for humankind's basic bodily needs (Gn. 2:16; 3:2; Lv. 19:9-10; Dt. 24:19-22; Mt. 6:25-32; 1 Tim. 6:8).

2. Food should be safe, nutritious and palatable

The hazards of unpalatable or poisonous food are mentioned on several occasions in Scripture (Ex. 15:25; 2 Ki. 2:19-22; 4:39-41), illustrating how individuals and, implicitly, organizations are responsible for ensuring that their activities, their property and their products are not harmful to other members of their community (Ex. 21:28-36; 22:6). In contemporary terms, it is evident that the whole area of misinformation and misrepresentation is immensely important to both the food industry and the consumer.

For example, despite the view held by many in the Western world that the food industry is lax in attending to the safety of food products, the opposite is now largely the case. The activities of unscrupulous operators were notorious in the 19th century. Legal action to contain their activities commenced with the Sale of Food and Drugs Act in 1875 in the UK, and has been followed by further legislation culminating in the Food Act of 1990 which requires a manufacturer to exercise all due diligence to ensure the hygienic quality of a food product. The major food companies do pay close attention to such issues and, in practice, the most common reasons for food poisoning are inadequate understanding and control of the raw materials and processing procedures by small catering operations.

The two general statements identified above in fact represent the principal driving forces in the food industry:

a. The need to operate efficiently and profitably. That such an endeavour has had success and is beneficial to the consumer is seen in the fact that only 3%-4% of the working population in developed economies are involved in food production, whereas the major proportion of the population in developing countries is obliged to contribute to growing its own food. However, the majority of the staple food items which are produced with high efficiency in the Western world are sold with very low profit margins. There is therefore a tendency, even temptation, for the food companies to promote other products of relatively low raw-material cost and nutritional value (e.g. snack foods), which have a much higher profit margin. Undoubtedly such materials have an attraction because of their value in a social context, but their purchase is further stimulated by advertising. Other pressures, including convenience and cost, contrive to move such items in the diet from being peripheral, which is perfectly reasonable, to a more central role, especially in children's diet, which is not desirable.

b. The awareness that food should be nutritious. Companies are increasingly conscious of the need to provide foods of an appropriate nutritional plane. Consumer groups provide a valuable check for any companies where commercial considerations and pressurized selling outweigh nutritional issues. The 'baby-food story' is an example where initial good intentions by the industry led for a period to damaging results through the persistent pursuit of aggressive marketing strategies (A. Chetley, The Baby Killer Scandal). However, consumer demand may lead companies to manufacture products of whose nutritional value they are not wholly convinced, e.g. high-sugar cereals. Similarly, consumer demand for wheat bread in some tropical countries, where it is difficult to grow that cereal, has had deleterious social effects. Local cereals frequently are perfectly satisfactory nutritionally, but do not produce a product with the same cultural appeal. This unreasoned demand for wheat has, in practice, prompted local farmers to attempt to grow the crop. Subsequent failure led to bankruptcy, and the ensuing local famine resulted in the migration of rural families to the cities.

c. The requirement that foods should be non-toxic. In part, the sensitivity and publicity surrounding food quality and safety are a consequence of increased technology* and knowledge but limited understanding. For example, in the minds of the general public, 'natural' food is 'safe' food, but there is little awareness of naturally occurring toxicants, e.g. mycotoxins, cyanogens, protease inhibitors, lathyrins, glucosinolates and alkaloids. Great efforts have been made by the food industry and its associated institutions to detect and eliminate these from food raw materials and to protect consumers from their harmful effects. Great effort has also been made to remove any additions or colorants with even a suspicion of toxicity. It is ironic that the new analytical methods and the exhaustive toxicological testing which have permitted the detection and evaluation of these materials have provided press and individuals, who are thirsty for defamatory detail, with the arguments and publicity weapons to vilify the food industry. Premature statements and judgments which are ultimately shown to be wrong can be extremely damaging to the perplexed consumer, as well as to the companies and public organizations who advise and legislate on diet/health issues.

3. Food has a social significance

In addition to satisfying hunger and providing for the needs of the body, it is acknowledged in the Bible that food brings pleasure to the consumer and is an important component of family and social activities. As is still sometimes the case today, a meal is an opportunity for people to gather together and converse, to interact in a relaxed fashion and to preserve, if not enhance, family cohesion. A welcome to a meal may be a sign of forgiveness (Gn. 26:30; 31:54; 43:31) or of esteem (Gn. 18:6-8). In the recent past, festive occasions were signaled in a very positive manner by the food that was served. The situation is now changing, in that the advent of mass-produced and/or fabricated food, which is 'convenient' when eaten at home or 'fast' when consumed in the dinette, is being accompanied by an increased tendency to eat casually. The decline of formal meals and the collapse of the social groups which used to eat together mean that food habits are becoming increasingly structureless, individualistic and anonymous (L. Gofton, 'The Rules of the Table'). The biblical injunctions concerning care of the poor and hungry are as pertinent now as in the time they were written.

4. Food can have a spiritual significance

It is not surprising that such an important and basic element in human life should be invested with religious symbolism and significance. In the OT, the food laws, e.g. in Lv. 11, describe those animals which may be eaten while others are proscribed. There is good reason to believe that their purpose was not so much based on considerations of hygiene but as a reminder to Israel of their special calling to holiness and a distinctive role in God's purposes (see G. J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus). Within the NT, Jesus declared 'all foods clean' (Mk. 7:17-19). Within the early church this was reinforced by the vision given to Peter (Acts 10:11-16, 28) which was subsequently debated at the Council of Jerusalem. In the epistles, the use of food is referred to in a number of passages and Christians are advised to abstain from certain foods, not because they are 'unclean' (cf. 1 Cor. 10:26) but out of a principle of love which purposes to give no offence to a weaker brother and cause him to stumble. Food is not to be a cause for gluttony or excess (Pr. 23:2; 1 Pet. 4:3), selfishness or argument (1 Cor. 11:19-22), but rather its significance in the physical realm is accentuated by Christ describing himself in his ministry as the bread of life and even as flesh upon which the inner, spiritual man feeds (Jn. 6:35, 55). It is very significant that what Jesus asked his disciples to 'do ... in remembrance' of him (Lk. 22:19) was to eat bread and drink wine - a sacramental action in almost all the Christian churches. It is fitting, then, that when we eat we should give thanks, not only for the food itself but also for Christ, of whom it is a reminder, and for the beneficent provision of our heavenly Father (Jn. 6:11 ;Acts 27:35; Eph. 5:20).

See also: VEGETARIANISM.

Bibliography

A. Chetley, The Baby Killer Scandal (London, 1979); L. Gofton, 'The Rules of the Table: Sociological Factors Influencing Food Choice', in C. Ritson et al., The Food Consumer (Chichester and New York, 1986), pp. 127-153; G. J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (Grand Rapids, 1979).

J.M.V.B.

FORCE is the use of physical constraint to prevent someone from doing something, or to make them do something. Coercion, a wider term, includes force or the threat of force, and other actions or threats such as strikes,* lock-outs, economic sanctions* or boycotts.* This article will centre on the ethics of force as the prismatic case of coercion. It should be noted that some contemporary theologians (e.g. Juan Luis Segundo, 1925-) have maintained that all kinds of coercion should be thought of as violence,* a claim which, however, blurs important distinctions.

There are occasions on which force may and should be used, and occasions on which it certainly should not be. As an example of the former, we might think of a parent controlling a young child on a busy road; of the latter the tyrannical use of military strength by one country to overthrow and subjugate another. The range in between will include teaching, caring for the mentally handicapped or ill, policing and law enforcement, criminal punishment, peace-keeping and war-fighting. In all these tasks, and others, there will be proper and improper uses of force.

At least two major strands in the NT must be considered. One is exemplified by the saying of Jesus, 'Do not resist an evil person' (Mt. 5:39); the other by Paul's claim, 'The authorities that exist have been established by God . . . if you do wrong, be afraid, for he [i.e. the one in authority] does not bear the sword for nothing' (Rom. 13:1, 4). The former means, at the very least, that there have to be strong reasons for the Christian to use force rather than suffer it; the latter that the governing authorities work under God's hand for the social good. Both these strands are important and their implications must be followed through. The words of Jesus teach us that there is no absolute right of self-defence in the gospel, which rather demands that we should be ready on our own account to suffer at the hands of evil-doers. But this does not mean that we should stand by and see others suffer. The Christian may be called to play a part in maintaining social order as part of his or her service to the neighbour. In this way it can be understood how force may be employed in the service of others, for their protection. On this basis self-defence can also be justified in order to be able to protect others. The use of force can be a service of love (see †) and a witness to God's justice (see Justice and Peace†).

Love demands that force should be used only to meet the needs of others. For instance, policing includes protecting people for their own safety (traffic control, crowd control) and protecting society from the criminal plans of those who would endanger life and property* for their own gain. In addition, love and justice also demand that the claims of every individual person affected by the use of force should be respected. Force should be used directly only to prevent oppression by force, and proportionately (see Proportion*) to the oppressive force. Physical force must be used discriminately against those who themselves present or threaten physical danger to themselves or others. Love cannot will that third parties should be coerced and hurt, however great the good that is aimed at or the wrong to be prevented. For instance, a teacher cannot justly punish the best friend of a pupil who does wrong, whether or not such a punishment is effective in preventing and deterring the wrong.

The use of force, in other words, should be rightly motivated and subject to the control of moral reason. The meaning of moral reason in this connection has been most fully explored in examination of the morality of war* (and see Just-War Theory*). The moral limits on the use of force are determined precisely by the arguments which first justified that use of force. Since love and justice demand that force be only used to protect the weak, it can never be used directly to oppress others who are weak. This consideration gives rise to the principle of discrimination, which forbids the use of force directly against non-combatants in time of war. Analogous limits can and should be derived for other forms of coercion. Another moral limit is learned from the point that it is only the achievement of certain ends (the maintenance of justice, of law, of social order, etc.) that can justify the use of force. This means that any use of force must be proportionate to the ends to be achieved. More good than evil should be done; and if, in the nature of things, this cannot be assured, then the balance must be carefully and prudently weighed. This requirement rules out all use of 'violence', if violence is understood as 'the use of force which is not subject to the control of reason'. It also includes the point that minimum force should always be employed. This may mean that a particular injustice cannot be put right because the only means available are means which morally are simply too costly. Their use would do more harm than allowing the injustice to continue.

The scale on which force is used is not of itself the determining factor in deciding the moral question. For instance, some would claim that only non-lethal force may ever rightly be used. They would argue from the prohibition on killing* that no purpose can justify the taking of human life. Others would claim that other boundary lines should be drawn on the scale of force which can rightly be used, e.g. the size or kind of weapons to be employed. However, arguments based on the proportionate use of force could draw this kind of boundary relative only to particular circumstances. There are, for instance, occasions when life may be taken in order to save or protect other lives. By the same token, of course, life may not be taken simply to prevent theft; the police are not justified in killing a bank robber unless he directly threatens other lives, and then only when there is no other way to stop him.

The principle of discrimination is of cardinal importance in our day. The second half of the 20th century has seen the development or growth of various methods which attempt to achieve their ends by threatening or harming third parties. One thinks of nuclear weapons and deterrence,* terrorism,* and general strikes, to name but three. All these kinds of coercion, and others, work chiefly by acting on the wills of populations at large, placing the general public under some kind of duress.* Even if such means appear to be successful in gaining their ends, love and justice would place large moral questions against them. Those directly affected are people who are innocent of the political struggle; and such people, whether whole populations or not, are being made means by whom others try to get at the wills of the rulers, etc. To use people as means in this kind of way can never be loving or just, for it ultimately denies them the respect which they deserve as human beings. It can only be suggested here that this consideration might make us a little more cautious about the current enthusiasm for sanctions as a political weapon against an unjust regime. For sanctions are often likely to operate more against the poor than against the wealthy or the enforcers of such a regime.

Bibliography

J. Ellul, Violence: Reflections from a Christian Perspective (ET, New York, 1969; London, 1970); O. Guinness, Violence: A Study of Contemporary Attitudes (Downers Grove, IL, 1974); P. Ramsey, War and the Christian Conscience (Durham, NC, 1961); M. Walzer, Just and Unjust Wars (New York, 1977; Harmondsworth, 1980).

D.J.E.A.

FORGERY is the fraudulent creation or alteration of a document, or the fabrication of an article (such as a painting designed to be attributed to an old master), with the intent to deceive and misrepresent. Frequently it takes the form of signing another's name for the purpose of stealing. Forgery, of the type described here, is a blatant violation of the commandment not to steal (Ex. 20:15) and amounts to bearing false witness (Ex. 20:16). As well as the temptation to forge in order to steal for personal gain, there are other circumstances and conditions which probably offer a greater temptation to otherwise mature citizens.

Most people who become embroiled in forgery generally discover, in retrospect, that their journey into the problem took place over an extended period of time, and was paved with good intentions. The good intentions normally serve to cover and justify the inappropriate rationalizations that undergird the wrong behaviour. The chosen behaviour is frequently embraced at the start as harmless, or as a once-only event, or as a means to avoid an unnecessarily embarrassing problem, or as a reasonable approach to a temporary need. Furthermore, forgery is typically undertaken in an effort to deal with yet another and more basic problem.

To illustrate, a man has been experiencing considerable difficulty in his business over an extended period of time, and this has generated a lot of financial pressure for him. The local bank has been willing to extend some small unsecured bridging loans to help out in the short run. The passage of time, however, finds the bank officers becoming concerned, and they begin demanding that some collateral be put up to secure the loan and protect their depositors. At this juncture, the owner stalls for more time, but the business climate is not helping and the pressure is mounting. The bank finally demands that specific security be offered as collateral or it will begin court proceedings to recover the loan through the sale of general assets. The banker and the owner finally agree that the only solid asset in the man's net worth is his and his wife's equity in their home. The suggestion is therefore made that the owner secure his wife's signature, authorizing the establishment of a new mortgage on their home that will serve as collateral for the business loan. At this point the owner rationally acknowledges to himself that this is the correct line of action to take. Emotionally, however, he encounters a different set of realities. He is too embarrassed to share with his wife that things have come to this low point, and he fears that this will place a heavy emotional burden on a basically nervous wife. What should he do? Should he tell his wife? Should he forgo making the new mortgage and let the bank take him to court? In fact, he signed his wife's name to the document and proceeded on as usual, telling himself that it would all be repaid in six months and that everything would be all right. He forged his wife's signature.

Actions of this type are taken daily by people who otherwise would never think of themselves as forgers. Most acts of forgery are related not to intended thefts but to rationalized, self-serving false justifications.

See also: FRAUD.

R.C.C.

FORGIVENESS is the mutual recognition that repentance* of either or both parties is genuine and that right relationships have been restored or achieved. The three requirements for forgiveness are: the restoration of an attitude of love (see †), since wrongdoing is not a valid reason for not loving the wrongdoer; the working through of pain, anger* and alienation* until both parties perceive that the repentance process is mutually satisfactory; and the opening of the future to appropriate relating, with trust* and good faith which permits risk, spontaneity and the possibility of further failure or conflict.

All forgiveness, whether human or divine, proceeds in similar process. God has done all in Christ (see Justification, Doctrine of*) to move towards us in our brokenness, and he invites our repentant response. God's gracious love is unconditional, but the consequent forgiveness is conditional. It requires the repentant response which receives love, reappropriates relationship, and experiences reconciliation.*

Human forgiveness also is grounded in a non-conditional love, but it requires the working through of those conditions for constructive relating that are requisite to authentic reconciliation. The restoring of an attitude of love is a prerequisite to the forgiveness process. It is not in itself forgiveness, though love is a forgiving attitude which reaches towards restoration. Wrongdoing is not a valid reason for not loving another.

Enemy-love is the nature of God and of God's children, and thus motivates a willingness to forgive and to work at the forgiveness process until authentic reconciliation is possible. Human love, though rarely if ever unconditional, can be enabled by divine grace* to love with as few conditions as possible, and to extend forgiveness against any injury.

See also: SIN AND SALVATION.

Bibliography

D. Augsburger, Caring Enough to Forgive (Ventura, CA, 1981); J. Patton, Is Human Forgiveness Possible? (Philadelphia, 1985); L. Smedes, Forgive and Forget (San Francisco, 1984).

D.W.A.

FORNICATION refers to sexual intercourse between unmarried persons. In the NT, the word commonly translated 'fornication' in the AV (porneia) is an umbrella term for extra-marital sex of all kinds, which NIV translates as 'sexual immorality' (e.g. Acts 15:20; 1 Cor. 6:13).

Christian ethicists agree that fornication is wrong, but there are important differences of interpretation. Many, taking their cue from a broad understanding of porneia, take the NT's ban on fornication to imply a total condemnation of all extra-marital intercourse.

Others, treating the term more narrowly as a synonym for promiscuity, believe the ethical veto does not extend to intercourse between committed but officially unmarried couples (see Cohabitation*) who are in a relationship of deep troth. Fornication (in the sense of promiscuous behaviour) is wrong, they argue, because it takes intercourse out of the contexts of personhood, love, sharing and commitment. Such behaviour, even if mutually welcomed, is exploitative because its primary goal is not the giving and sharing of self, but the gratifying of sexual desire.

J.H.O.

FOSTERING is the care and nurture, within a family, of persons who are not members of that family by birth. Definitions of fostering include, without exception, the tasks of rearing and encouragement by those who are not natural parents. It is essentially a fixed-term arrangement not characterized by permanence, which is the primary feature of 'adoption'.*

Fostering has become increasingly popular in the 20th century. Persons fostered include: young children, whose birth parents cannot for a period of time meet their needs; older people, whose families are unable to give them the level of support they require; and other individuals, who need a substitute family for a certain period in their lives. Such people may include those with physical disability or learning difficulties, those suffering psychiatric illness, young single mothers (see Single Parents*) needing family experience and support in learning to parent their babies, and young people without adequate housing or family support (see Homelessness*).

For young children who cannot remain within their own families, fostering has for many years been the preferred method of caring, particularly since the Children Act of 1948. The Curtis committee considered that, second to adoption, fostering is the best way of providing children with the experience of family life and personal care. Many would regard the provision of substitute parents as a basic human right of children who cannot be brought up within their own families. It can offer greater consistency and normality than care within a residential home.

For children, therefore, fostering may be arranged on two different bases:

1. Private fostering. This is an informal arrangement made by the child's parent(s) with another person. The child's parents take full responsibility for the placement and the agreed payment for the service. Private foster-parents have to be registered, and have to allow access to their homes for Health and Social Services personnel but are not selected by these officials. Private foster homes are often used by natural parents who wish to undertake further education courses, or whose demands in employment mean that they cannot fulfil their parental obligations for a period.

2. Statutory provision. The majority of foster homes in Britain are provided through a local-authority Social Services department or voluntary social-work agency working on behalf of such a body. The children who require fostering are normally 'placed in the care of' or 'looked after' or 'accommodated by' the authority. This responsibility is given to the authority either by the Courts or by a voluntary agreement between the parents and the Social Services department. The local authority then takes responsibility for 'fostering' the child with approved foster-parents. Social workers select, train and approve people who volunteer their services and who are considered suitable to take on the task of becoming foster-parents.

The demands of parenting* are always considered. Fostering and hence parenting other people's children require particular characteristics and commitment on the part of the caregivers. The majority of the children, young people and others for whom fostering is sought have special needs. Many have experienced breakdown, disruption and loss in their lives. Hence in their foster-families they need even more care, love, security and stability than others, and may make heavy demands on the families with whom they are placed. Although professional support and training are available to foster-carers, the quality of their own relationships in marriage and their family life patterns is crucial in providing 'good enough' parenting in the face of difficult and even hostile behaviour of children who are not their own.

When children are placed in foster homes there is usually an expectation that the arrangement will not be long term. The British law rightly requires that every possible effort be made to return children to their own families. Exceptions to this will include those who have been seriously abused (see Abuse*) by their own parents, those whose natural parents are not considered, on the basis of their proven lifestyles and past performance as parents, to be able to care adequately, and those who do not wish to resume caring for their children. Fostering therefore often includes contact with the child's natural parents and family. If plans for the child include rehabilitation with the birth parents, such contact will be regular and will increase as the return to their own families is achieved.

At the end of the 20th century, the formal requirements of fostering are necessary in order to protect those who need the nurture and security which substitute family care should provide. Such is the nature of our society that, even with stringent procedures required by legislation, the system is never without its failures, as human beings are tempted to take advantage of responsibilities entrusted to them. However, it does seem important to recognize that in God's pattern for meeting our emotional, physical and spiritual needs, the value of nurture within a family is clear.

L.E.A.G.

FOWLER, JAMES, see FAITH DEVELOPMENT; TRUST.

FRANCIS OF ASSISI (1182-1226), founder of the Franciscan order, one of the two major mendicant movements of the 13th century. Born of a wealthy Italian merchant and a French mother, Francis received the typical education of his time. As a young man he participated in the local fighting between Assisi and neighbouring towns and was captured and imprisoned. In his early twenties he had a series of visions and dreams that resulted in his conversion.* He severed his relations with his father, renounced his possessions, and began to rebuild churches. In 1209 when at mass he heard Mt. 10:5-14, the instructions of Jesus to his disciples, and he took them as the guide for his life.

Soon others joined him. In 1210 Francis and his small band of followers gained papal approval of their life and mission. The original rule is lost, but it seems to have contained rules for their common life and the observance of the vows of poverty, chastity* and obedience.* The small band had a powerful influence, resulting in both a revival of piety and increased missionary activity. Francis himself travelled to Egypt during the Fifth Crusade and tried in vain to convert the sultan.

By 1217 his followers had become an order whose members were found in several countries of Europe. In 1221, 3,000 friars attended the chapter meeting in Assisi. Increasingly the organization of the order was left to others and Francis devoted himself to prayer and meditation. In 1224 he received the stigmata. He was blind and ill during the last years of his life. Two years after his death he was canonized.

The spirituality* that Francis taught is characterized by a focus on Christ, especially on imitating his words and deeds. Christ is encountered here and now in meeting the needs of others. God is present in all his creatures, and so all created things are to be revered. His spiritual ideal is still a model for today as is evidenced by the many books on his life and work.

Bibliography

J. H. Smith, Francis of Assisi (New York, 1972).

A.G.V.

FRANKL, VIKTOR (1905-). Frankl's Man's Search For Meaning was based on his own experiences of suffering and working with others, as a prisoner in Auschwitz and Dachau in the Second World War.

A Viennese psychiatrist influenced by Søren Kierkegaard,* Martin Heidegger (1889-1976), Karl Jaspers (1883-1969), and Edmund Husserl (1859-1938), Frankl developed an existential analysis of the human person, critical of mainstream psychoanalytic theories, focused on the three dimensions of the somatic, psychic and spiritual. The therapy derived from this approach he called 'logotherapy', which attempted to extend the scope of psychotherapy beyond the psyche, to include 'the spiritual', 'the meaning'. Where psychoanalysis* speaks of the pleasure principle, and individual psychology of the will-to-power, Frankl is concerned with 'that which most deeply inspires man', 'the innate desire to give as much meaning as possible to one's life, to actualize as many values as possible - what I should like to call the will-to-meaning' (The Doctor and the Soul, p. x).

Frankl's reflections on his prison experiences correspond with Friedrich Nietzsche's* dictum 'He who has a why to live for can bear with almost any how.' The way a person accepts suffering gives opportunity to add deeper meaning to life. The striving to find such a meaning is the primary motivational force in human beings. But Frankl sets this in a context of moral objectivity. The meaning of our existence is not invented but detected. Values do not push us, but rather pull us. Always there is freedom of choice; what all human beings need is a striving and struggling towards some goal of which they are worthy. What matters is not the meaning of life in general, but the specific meaning of a person's life at a given moment. Rather than speaking as Abraham Maslow* does of 'self-actualization', therefore, Frankl speaks of human existence being basically 'self-transcendence'. We find fulfilment through reaching out beyond ourselves. We can discover a meaning in life by giving something to life, e.g. in creative work, or by experiencing some value in nature or culture, and especially by suffering, the stand one takes towards what cannot be changed. Logotherapy functions as an educative approach to discovering the transcendent, the spiritual domain of human beings, their freedom of will, and their responsibility. It recognizes the value of the tension between what we have achieved and what we still should become, and seeks to help us towards that.

Frankl thus offers an interpretation of the human condition which avoids the pessimism of Sigmund Freud* and the inflated selfabsorption of some humanistic psychologies. He points out that it is human beings who invented the gas chambers of Auschwitz; but that it is also human beings who have entered those gas chambers upright, with the Lord's Prayer or the Shema Yisrael on their lips.

Frankl understands the question of God's existence in terms of his existential analysis of Ultimate Meaning. There is in all authentic human life a basic religiousness, though this is often repressed or denied. Logotherapy can itself lead to religion, just as true religion may itself be logotherapeutic - i.e. it can help people towards meaning in their lives.

Bibliography

The Doctor and the Soul (New York, 1965); Man's Search For Meaning (London and Boston, MA, 1962).

J. J. Shea, 'On the Place of Religion in the Thought of Viktor Frankl', in J. R. Fleck and J. D. Carter (eds.), Psychology and Christianity (Nashville, TN, 1981).

D.J.A.

FRAUD may be defined as 'the perpetration of intentional falsehood in order to gain something from another'. Fraud is, thus, more than 'negligence' in that it involves positive, intentional deception. Fraudulent deception may be attempted through intentional omission or concealment of information, innuendo, gesture and the like, as well as through overtly false communication.

Fraud is thus a subset of the larger category of the lie (see Truth*), which could be defined as any intentional communication of a falsehood. It is a lie utilized to gain something from another or to induce someone to surrender a legal right. It is lying as a deliberate strategy to enrich oneself at the expense of one whose confidence has first been gained. Fraud is also a subset of the larger category of theft.* It is theft not by deeds or stealth but by means of untruthful communication. It is criminal deception, using false representations to get an unjust advantage or injure the rights or interests of another. Fraud is cheating or dishonestly tricking people out of their rights or their goods.

The term 'fraud' may be applied to a person who is an imposter, unqualified to provide a specialized service being offered. Most often, fraud refers to business and legal affairs (e.g. tax fraud, insurance fraud) because it has to do with goods, services and rights. The sale of merchandise or services that fall short of reasonable expectation and the promise of the vendor might be fraud. Deceptive advertising,* a misleading lure or bait held out to consumers, might also be fraud.

Fraud is motivated by a desire to obtain something more easily and quickly than would be the case if the truth of the matter were known to all parties. The root of fraud is some combination of need and greed. Impatience or perceived urgency often plays a role in motivating fraud. In a highly competitive market environment, sales and advertising personnel may be led to provide an imbalanced if not fraudulent depiction of their goods or services.

Fraud must be prohibited or an unregulated predatory ('let the buyer beware') combat will rule, undermining all possibility of a peaceful or just society. Fraud is a challenging enough social problem where there is a face-to-face encounter of seller and buyer. The size, speed, complexity and impersonal nature of the modern economy make regulation slow, inconsistent and difficult. Thus, the integrity of the participants (individual and corporate), not just the existence of laws and agencies of enforcement, will determine the extent to which fraud is a problem in society.

The Bible condemns all forms of theft and dishonesty. Fraud, theft by means of dishonesty, is specifically prohibited in many texts (e.g. Lv. 6:1-5; Dt. 25:15-16; Pr. 11:1). The prophets, too, criticized fraud (Je. 5:26-28; Am. 8:5-6).

In an interesting Gospel episode, Jesus says to the rich young man, 'You know the commandments,' quotes the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth and ninth commandments, and adds 'Do not defraud' to the list (Mk. 10:19)!

Jesus' linking of lies with the devil (Jn. 8:44-47), his emphasis on speaking and living the truth, his general concern for the poor and for freedom from the grip of 'Mammon', for living lives of simplicity, integrity and love of neighbour, rule out all possibility of fraud. So, too, Paul writes that 'thieves ... the greedy ... swindlers' do not inherit the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 5:11; 6:10). Christians are to put off falsehood and stealing, instead speaking the truth in love and giving to those in need (Eph. 4:25, 28). They are also to pay prompt and fair wages to their hired labourers (Jas. 5:4). Ananias and Sapphira's sudden deaths could be seen as an indication of the seriousness of fraud, in this case failure to live up to a financial promise to God (Acts 5:1-11).

A promising counterpoint to this canonwide denunciation of fraud is the example of Jacob, his mother Rebekah and his wife Rachel. God chooses Jacob to become Israel, despite his fraud in deceiving his brother Esau, his father Isaac, and his father-in-law Laban (Gn. 27; 30; 31). Even a fraud can be chosen and transformed by God.

Fraud is not just illegal and criminal. 1. It is immoral and sinful, and it is wrong most of all because it is an offence against the God of truth, honesty and justice. 2. Fraud harms one's neighbour, directly as theft from him or her, indirectly in undermining the fabric of trust* in human relations and in setting a bad example, especially for children and the weak. 3. Fraud harms the self:* its integrity (the conflict between my action and what I know to be the truth), its dignity (stooping to such a low level), its freedom (it takes effort to cover up my fraud), and its relational health (fraud alienates me from God and my neighbours).

Christians might respond on four fronts to fraud in society. 1. It is important to formulate and enforce laws and rules setting civil, criminal and ecclesiastical boundaries to prevent fraud as much as possible. 2. People in church and society need better education regarding the multiple consequences of fraud and deceit, not only in socio-economic terms but in relation to the life with God. 3. Christians might address the fundamental problem of motivation, of the purpose of one's life and of one's business enterprise. Through evangelism and education, Christians might propose alternative and better life goals and corporate goals, other than the all-consuming desire to make a profit, and thus undermine the basic motivation of most fraud. 4. Christians might devote much more energy and thought to the positive articulation of honest business practice. Rather than becoming society's specialists in saying 'No' to fraud, Christians might specialize in saying 'Yes' to the creative and redemptive, entrepreneurial potential of truth, love and fidelity in economic life.

See also: ECONOMIC ETHICS;† FORGERY.

D.W.G.

FREEDOM is a complex concept, having metaphysical (see Free Will and Determinism*) and moral as well as political aspects. Beside the question whether a person's actions can be free from causal determination (and the consequences if they cannot) is the question whether, free from such determination or not, they are free in the sense that they are in accord with that person's true nature. In this sense it is possible to think of rational or moral freedom; the opposite of such freedom is not causal determination but irrationality or sinful action. In addition there is the further question whether freedom in that or in any other sense is sufficient for the ascription of moral responsibility* for actions.

Where freedom concerns human political or social relations, it may be thought of in negative or in positive terms: it is freedom from or freedom to. Understood negatively, the free person is one who is free from external impediment, free to do what he or she wants to do unconstrained by pathological compulsions or by other people or authorities. Laws against censorship* and in favour of toleration often rely upon freedom in this sense. This is the freedom of the political liberal or libertarian, and it is also one of the significant senses of freedom that is compatible with determinism. Freedom is held by many to be a human right; for others it is not meaningful to speak of freedom (in the abstract) as a right, only of particular freedoms enshrined in common or statute law.

But freedom (or freedoms), even if granted, do not ensure that a free person is free in the further sense that what he or she does is in accord with his or her true nature. For what that person wants to do may be immoral or misguided. Only in libertarianism, and in certain versions of existentialism, is such freedom exalted to the position of the supreme value. In such systems the fact of free decision is allimportant for the maintaining of human authenticity.

While a contrast between a person's real nature, and what he or she in practice values, is an obvious one, the contrast itself is not free of difficulties. It carries with it the danger that someone other than the agent will claim to know what is best for that person. This has not only paternalistic but even, in a political context, totalitarian implications. For it may be held by those in commercial influence or political power, for example, that a person is truly free only when he or she buys a particular product, or subjects himself or herself to a particular political authority.

No metaphysical view of freedom should be adopted by the Christian which is at odds with the divine decree of whatever comes to pass, with the divine providential rule of the creation. Yet in Scripture, and particularly in the NT, greater prominence is given to freedom as a moral idea than to the metaphysical issues of freedom and determinism that have preoccupied modern philosophers and theologians.

Two freedom-themes are given great prominence in the NT: the fact that Christ makes his people free, and the fact that freedom is not lawlessness but results in conformity to the moral law.*

As Scripture portrays the 'natural man', he is in bondage to sin, not a physical bondage but a way of thinking and acting that a person cannot, by his own powers, redirect ethically. He does not want to please God. Although actions may publicly conform to the moral law (Luther's 'civic righteousness'), this is as a result of various pressures and habits, not as a result of correct motivation, the love for God and desire for his glory. Outward conformity does not ensure inward conformity, and mere outward conformity is a sign of ethical bondage.

Christ frees, not by releasing such a person from his (or her) obligations* and by allowing him to do whatever he wishes, or by introducing randomness or indeterminism into human choices, but by providing, in conversion,* the motive and the inward strength of will to keep the commands of God. This is freedom, though it is not perfect or total freedom, since the one who is freed still also acts out of weakness and incorrect motives. Hence the Pauline struggle between 'flesh' and 'spirit', which is not a struggle between the body and the soul but between what a person is and what that person, in Christ, wants to be. This is the condition Augustine* characterized as posse non peccare ('able not to sin'), not non posse peccare ('not able to sin').

Augustine's phrases are significant. The freedom relates to sin, and since sin, in Scripture, is conceptually related to the law of God, the freedom in question is not freedom from the law or even freedom to keep it, but it is the freedom that comes from keeping it.

In the 18th century Immanuel Kant* provided a secularized version of this Christian teaching, according to which the free man is the moral man is the rational man, since freedom comes, for Kant, in the keeping of the moral law. This is a secularized version, because the law in question is not the divine law, but one which the human rational agent himself creates and endorses. None the less Kant's abstract conceptualizing preserves the formal linkage between freedom, morality and rationality that is to be found in the pages of the NT.

Ever since the apostle Paul raised the question 'Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?' (Rom. 6:1, AV), the charge has been repeatedly levelled against the Christian doctrine of freedom that it implies, or at least permits, antinomianism* or libertinism. But this is not so, not only for the reasons already given but for the more central and compelling reason that as a Christian a person has died to sin and is united to Christ. So how could one who is united to Christ live a course of life that is completely contrary to the moral character of Christ and a total repudiation of his work as redeemer? How could a believer do those things the pardon of which required the offering up of his or her Saviour? The fact that individuals, either in real life or in fiction (as in James Hogg, The Private Memoirs and Confessions of a Justified Sinner, 1824), abuse the doctrine of grace* is not an argument against it.

Bibliography

H. G. Frankfurt, The Importance of What we Care About (Cambridge, 1988); A. J. P. Kenny, Will, Freedom and Power (Oxford, 1976); M. Luther, The Bondage of the Will (ET, London, 1957).

P.H.

FREE WILL AND DETERMINISM. The positions on the nature of the human choice fall into three basic categories: determinism, indeterminism and self-determinism. In terms of their cause these fall, respectively, into actions caused by another, uncaused, or self-caused.

1. Determinism

Some believe that human choices are determined (or caused) by another. Proponents of this view believe that human choices are the result of antecedent causes, which in turn were caused by prior causes, and so on.

Naturalistic proponents of this position include B. F. Skinner,* who holds that all human behaviour is determined by genetic and behavioural factors. On this view, humans are like a brush in the hands of an artist. They are not the cause originating the action but simply the instrument through which it is expressed.

The philosophical argument in favour of determinism takes this form. All human behaviour is either uncaused, self-caused or caused by something else. However, human behaviour cannot be uncaused, since nothing occurs without a cause. Further, human actions cannot be self-caused, for no act can cause itself. To do so, it would have to be prior to itself, which is impossible. The only remaining alternative, then, is that all human behaviour is caused by something external to it.

In response, opponents make several points:

a. It is a misinterpretation of self-determinism to assert that actions cause themselves. For example, self-determinists do not believe that actions cause actions but that 'actors' cause actions. Self-determinism does not mean that one is determining oneself. Rather, the self (free agent) is causing its own free actions. In other words, 'self-caused' does not mean the cause of one's self but causing by oneself.

b. Determinism is self-defeating. A determinist insists that both determinists and nondeterminists are determined to believe what they believe. However, determinists believe self-determinists are wrong and ought to change their view. But 'ought to change' implies they are free to change, which is contrary to determinism.

c. Other opponents (e.g. C. S. Lewis*) argue that complete determinism is irrational. In order for determinism to be true, there would have to be a rational basis for thought. But if determinism is true, then there is no rational basis for thought, since all is determined by non-rational forces. So, if determinism claims to be true, then it must be false.

Theistic defenders of determinism insist that God is the ultimate cause who determines all human actions. Both Martin Luther's* Bondage of the Will (1525) and Jonathan Edwards'* Freedom of the Will (1754) are examples of this theistic determinism. Edwards argued that all actions are caused, since it is irrational to claim that things arise without a cause. But for him a self-caused action is impossible, since a cause is prior to an effect, and one cannot be prior to oneself. Therefore, all actions are ultimately caused by a First Cause (God). 'Free choice' for Edwards is doing what one desires, but God gives the desires. Hence, all human actions are determined by God.

Opponents of theistic determinism respond as follows: a. Defining free choice as 'doing what one desires' is contrary to experience. For people do not always do what they desire, nor do they always desire to do what they do (cf. Rom. 7:15-16).

b. Edwards also misunderstands selfdeterminism as causing itself. Rather, it means simply that a self can cause something else to happen. That is, a free agent can cause a free action.

c. Edwards has a faulty, mechanistic view of human personhood. He likens human free choice to balancing scales in need of more pressure from the outside in order to tip the scales from dead centre. But humans are not machines; they are persons made in the image of God* and regarded as responsible for their actions.

d. Edwards wrongly assumes that selfdeterminism is contrary to God's sovereignty. For God could have pre-determined things in accordance with free choice, rather than in contradiction to it. Even the Calvinistic Westminster Confession (1646) declares that 'Although in relation to the foreknowledge and decree of God, the first cause, all things come to pass immutably and infallibly, yet by the same providence he ordereth them to fall out, according to the nature of second causes, either necessarily, freely, or contingently' (V.ii).

2. Indeterminism

According to this view, at least some (if not all) human actions are uncaused. Thus, events and actions are contingent and spontaneous. Two proponents of this view were Charles Peirce (1839-1914) and William James.* Some contemporary indeterminists appeal to Heisenberg's (1901-76) principle to support their position. According to this principle, events in the subatomic realm (like the specific course of a given particle) are, to our present understanding, completely unpredictable.

Opponents of indeterminism offer several objections: a. They contend that Heisenberg's principle is misapplied, since it does not deal with the causality of an event but with its unpredictability. b. All forms of indeterminism fall shipwreck on the principle of causality, since they deny these events have causes. c. Indeterminism robs humans of their moral responsibility, since they are not the cause of these actions. If not, then why should they be blamed for evil actions. d. Indeterminism, at least on a cosmic scale, is unacceptable from a biblical perspective, since God is causally related to the world as both originator (Gn. 1) and sustainer of all things (Col. 1:15-17).

3. Self-determinism

According to this view, a person's moral acts are caused by himself or herself. The arguments for this view go like this: a. Moral actions are uncaused, caused by another, or caused by oneself. However, no action can be uncaused, since this violates the fundamental rational principle that every event has a cause. Neither can a person's actions be caused by others, for in that case they would not be that person's actions. Further, if one's acts are caused by another, then how can one be held responsible for them? Both Augustine* (in On Free Will and On Grace and Free Will) and Thomas Aquinas* were self-determinists, as are Arminians.

b. Human beings have moral responsibility.* But moral responsibility demands the ability to respond (=free choice).

c. The Bible insists that there are actions that people ought to perform (cf. Ex. 20). But 'ought' implies 'can' (=free choice).

d. Both the Bible and common understanding entails that some acts are praiseworthy (e.g. heroism), and some are blameworthy (e.g. cruelty). But if one is not free to perform the act, then it makes no sense to praise or blame one for doing it.

e. If God determines all acts, then he is responsible for the origin of sin, not Satan. For if a free choice is doing what one desires and God gives the desire, then God must have given to the devil the desire to rebel against him. But this is morally absurd, since it would be God working against himself.

Of the objections to self-determinism, one is that if everything needs a cause, then so do acts of the will, in which case they are not caused by oneself. In response, self-determinists claim this confuses the 'actor' (agent) who causes the act and the 'act' being caused. But the principle of causality does not demand that every thing (or person) has a cause but only that every event has a cause. That is, if a free agent (e.g. a human person) is the first cause of his or her own free actions, then it is meaningless to ask, 'What caused that person to do it?' In brief, God caused the fact of free choice (by making free agents), but free agents are the cause of free actions.

Others object that self-determinism is contrary to God's predestination. But selfdeterminists respond that God can predetermine according to his 'foreknowledge' (1 Pet. 1:2), insisting that 'those God foreknew he also predestined' (Rom. 8:29). God, they insist, can determine the future by means of free choice, since he omnisciently knows how they will freely act. Still others insist that, regardless of what free choice Adam may have had (Rom. 5:12), fallen human beings are in bondage to sin and not free to respond to the gospel unless God works in them by the Holy Spirit to enable them to do so. But this view seems contrary to both God's consistent call on people to believe (e.g. Jn. 3:16; Acts 16:31), as well as to direct statements that even unbelievers have the ability to respond to God's grace (Mt. 23:37; Jn. 7:17; Rom. 7:18; 1 Cor. 9:17; Phm. 14; 1 Pet. 5:2).

Finally, some argue that if humans have the ability to respond, then salvation is not of grace (Eph. 2:8-9) but by human effort. However, this is a confusion about the nature of faith.* The ability of a person to receive God's gracious gift of salvation is not the same as working for it. To think so is to give credit for the gift to the receiver rather than to the Giver who graciously gave it.

Bibliography

D. A. Carson, Divine Sovereignty and Human Responsibility: Biblical Perspectives in Tension (London and Atlanta, 1981); R. Swinburne, Responsibility and Atonement (Oxford, 1989).

N.L.G.

FREUD, SIGMUND (1856-1939) was the initiator of the theory and method of psychoanalysis.* His ideas have influenced thought and culture well beyond the field of psychology. Born of Jewish (but not orthodox) parents in Freiburg, Moravia, the eldest of a family of eight, he moved when a few years old to Vienna, where he lived until the final year of his life. His father was a merchant of modest means.

As a young man, Freud had a sense of destiny and a confidence in his capacity to succeed which he attributed to his mother's 'special regard'. Financial constraints, from which he was hardly free throughout his life, made him abandon other early ambitions and become a medical student. His real interest was in scientific research, and he gained considerable recognition for his work in anatomy and physiology. Lack of money, however, prevented him from pursuing some very fruitful ideas further, and he qualified and practised somewhat unwillingly as a doctor.

Subsequently, Freud went to Paris to study under Jean Martin Charcot (1825-93), one of the first doctors to take the condition of hysteria seriously, and he was interested in the reproduction of their symptoms by hysterical patients under hypnosis.* The success obtained by a colleague, Josef Breuer (1842-1925), in obtaining symptom relief for a patient by letting her talk, encouraged Freud to experiment along the same lines, concentrating on the treatment of patients with neuroses.* From these beginnings the clinical practice and the theory of psychoanalysis developed.

Freud was impressed by Charles Darwin's* work and shared the hope that scientific discovery would reveal the secrets of the universe, rendering religious 'explanations' unnecessary. He extended his strong deterministic beliefs (see Free Will and Determinism*) to psychology, postulating a biologically based theory of instincts, that human behaviour was meaningful, motivated and goalseeking, and that much mental activity was unconscious.* This he deduced from what his patients revealed first under hypnosis, then through free association, and from his observations of the lapses of ordinary people. One of the main outcomes of his work was to break down the divide between normal and abnormal human psychology.

Many of Freud's theories developed from his own self-analysis, undertaken in an effort to understand some of his behaviour and moodswings. His own early relationships had been complex: his mother was a second wife, only twenty-one when he was born, and he had a step-brother with a son a little older than himself, whom he loved, but of whom he also felt jealous. A younger brother died in infancy. As painful memories arose, he recollected, amongst many other things, murderous wishes against this infant usurper, and towards his father, whom in his fantasy he destroyed and replaced in possessing his mother. Theories of omnipotence of thought, of love-hate relationships, the Oedipus complex and infantile sexuality (see †) resulted from the analysis (undertaken between the years 1897-99). The latter was one of the main reasons he was ostracized by most of the medical establishment, not only in Austria but also abroad, and he encountered considerable social opprobrium. At first, Freud believed that his patients had actually been sexually assaulted in childhood; later he concluded that for many the accounts expressed a repressed wish. The whole question has been reopened in the light of more recent findings of the extent of child abuse.*

Freud's own sexual life and conduct were on strictly ethical and moral lines. He was a faithful husband, a loving father and a generous and loyal friend, providing for the needs of this extended family, and an extremely hard and disciplined worker.

Freud revised and developed his theories throughout his life, confining himself to individual psychology, until his later years when he extended his ideas to social psychology. In 1913 he published Totem and Taboo, linking Darwin's notion of the primal horde to his own theories about the Oedipus complex and problems of guilt* and expiation. Other speculative works followed, on the struggle between an individual's libidinal wishes and the demands of society, the role and future of religion, and the connection between Jewish guilt, Christianity as wish-fulfilment and anti-Semitism. Freud was a life-long atheist; religion was an illusion from whose strictures and promises humans needed to be liberated by science. He alternated between profound pessimism* at the unhappy human condition, and some optimism over the possibility of progress through self-awareness and scientific advance.

For much of his life, Freud was somewhat isolated, though with a small, close-knit group of adherents (most of his inner circle were Jewish). He was happy for group members to develop their own theories, but these had to be consonant with his basic tenets, which he was convinced represented the truth, and he keenly felt any defection (such as that of Carl Jung*). International recognition came slowly, in the USA (where he lectured once) and in Europe. At the very end he was made a member of the Royal Society in England, the country in which he finally took refuge, finding it 'free and generous'. The last sixteen years were clouded by the loss of close family members and friends, the burning of his books by the Nazis, and threats to family safety, the loss of savings, and a painful and recurrent cancer of the jaw, though he continued to write and to see patients up to the time of his death.

Bibliography

The Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, 24 vols. (ET, London and New York, 1953-74, repr. 1978-81); The Psychopathology of Everyday Life, vol. 6; Five Lectures on Psycho-Analysis, vol. 11; Totem and Taboo, vol. 13; The Future of an Illusion, vol. 21; Civilisation and its Discontents, vol. 21; Moses and Monotheism, vol. 23. J. N. Isbister, Freud: An Introduction to his Life and Work (Cambridge, 1985); E. Jones, Sigmund Freud: Life and Work, 3 vols. (London and New York, 1953-57).

J.R.G.

FRIENDSHIP. A new interest in the importance of friendship is beginning to emerge, in part because of the realization that the individualism* of Western culture has been damaging and one-sided. Recognition of the importance of community (see Community Ethics†) is paralleled in church life by emphasis on relationships and groups for support and encouragement. As welcome as this is, a theological recovery is also required, so that friendship may be moved from the sidelines back to the centre of a view of God and his relationship with us.

In classical times a great deal of emphasis was put on the importance of friendship (Gk. philia; Lat. amicitia) in the moral life, and important philosophical treatments were written by Plato,* Aristotle* and Cicero (106-43 BC). In Aristotle's analysis, friendship is based on a relationship in which something is shared - that is its essence. There are three categories of friendship, two of which are inferior: 1. a friendship based on pleasure (two or more people enjoying a common activity); and 2. a friendship based on usefulness (as when neighbours or business associates derive mutual advantage from a relationship). 3. True friendship, however, is based on virtue,* not profit or pleasure.* Such friendship is found when one loves someone for the moral qualities he or she has, and desires good for that person.

This tradition was carried into Christian thought through the writing of Ambrose* and Augustine,* and influenced later medieval thinkers, especially as they reflected on the qualities of the close spiritual relationships provided by the development of monasticism* and religious orders. Among these the most noteworthy is Aelred of Rievaulx (c. 1110-67), whose work On Spiritual Friendship draws on Cicero and Augustine, but is richly supplied with examples from the Bible. Aelred distinguishes between friendship for pleasure, worldly friendship and friendship based on true spirituality; true friendship is guided by charity, not by selfish interests. At one stage Aelred points to the theological significance of amicitia with his paraphrase of 'God is love' (1 Jn. 4:16) as 'God is friendship' (an anticipation of the insights of Thomas Aquinas*).

In the later Middle Ages and the Reformation, friendship becomes less important as the conception of morality and the Christian life moves from one of virtues and relationships to one of conscience,* obedience to authority,* and law. Friendship as a moral category was thought to be incompatible with an ethic based on duty* and obligation.*

The language of friendship did not disappear however; it blossomed in devotional literature and was applied to the mystical relation of the soul to God. But in both Catholic and Protestant contexts the notion of love (see †) was often sentimentalized or developed in terms of self-abnegation: the soul in union with God was to be absorbed in his Being. Friendship with God became a mystical category, not a theological or moral one.

One result of these various trends was to confirm the notion of love (agape) as by definition opposed to any element of self; virtue comes to be defined as basically unselfish love, a denial of any element of any self-regarding motivation. Since the essence of friendship is a mutual relationship, friendship was thought to be excluded from the doctrine of Christian love which was described increasingly in terms of total self-giving and self-sacrifice. The fact that Anders Nygren's* Agape and Eros (ET, London, 1932-39), which stresses this view, had no real analysis of philia indicates the vacuum in Western thought.

The NT does not support a substantial difference between agape and friendship. Philia is used to describe Jesus' love for Lazarus (Jn. 11:36), but also for the love of the Father for the Son (Jn. 5:20). Agape, too, is used in various relationships: in Jn. 3:16 it is the love of God for the world, but it is used as the friendship of Jesus for Mary, Martha and Lazarus (Jn. 11:5). It is also used for the unworthy love of the Pharisees for the praises of men (Jn. 12:43). In the usage of Paul, agape is the term for the qualities of love in 1 Cor. 13; but also is used of Demas who deserted Paul because he was 'in love with this present world' (2 Tim. 4:10, RSV).

There is thus a strong biblical and theological basis for the approach taken by Thomas Aquinas that charity (agape) is in essence a kind of friendship. He writes, 'There is a sharing of man with God by his sharing his happiness with us, and it is on this that a friendship is based. As Paul says [1 Cor. 1:9], "God is faithful by whom you were called into the fellowship of his Son". Now the love which is based on this sort of friendship is charity; thus it is clear that charity is a friendship of man and God' (STh 2a2ae 23:1). God's love to us is the sharing of his life with us, to enable us to enter a relationship of friendship love with him, made possible by the Holy Spirit making us more like Christ.

The notion of friendship can be seen as a good way of bringing out the meaning of the covenant* relation between God and his people, and of Jesus' love for his disciples (Jn. 15:15); but many Protestants (e.g. G. C. Meilaender) will remain sceptical about incorporating mutuality into agape; even Catholic writers have noted the 'breath-takingly audacious' (F. Kerr) and 'almost blasphemous' (P. J. Waddell) conception that sinful man can be friends with God when Aristotle himself ruled that out because of the absolute inequality in such a relationship.

But man brings to the relationship not himself as such, but what God gives him through grace: a self changed by the Holy Spirit. This makes possible a friendship where each loves the other for what he is: we love God for what he is, and God loves us for what we are and are to become, chosen and perfected in Christ.

The love which Christians are to have for their neighbour can also be seen as essentially a friendship. We love others not on the basis of their attractiveness or usefulness, or out of sheer benevolence,* but because we want them to share in God's happiness. The same love that we have for God is extended to others, namely seeing them as loved by God. This is also the only realistic basis on which to love our enemies - we do not love them for what we share on the human level, but because we know they are loved by God, and it is that love in which we all share.

Bibliography

J. Houston, The Transforming Friendship (Oxford and Batavia, IL, 1989); F. Kerr, 'Charity as Friendship', in B. Davies (ed.), Language, Meaning and God: Essays in Honour of Herbert McCabe (London, 1987); M. A. Macnamara, Friendship in St Augustine (Fribourg, 1958); G. C. Meilaender, Friendship: a Study in Theological Ethics (Notre Dame, IN, 1981); A. W. Price, Love and Friendship in Plato and Aristotle (Oxford, 1989); G. Vansteenbergh, DSp 1, cols. 500-529; P. J. Waddell, Friendship and the Moral Life (Notre Dame, IN, 1989).

D.A.W.

FROMM, ERICH (1900-1980). Born in Germany into an orthodox Jewish family (though he later renounced his faith), Fromm studied sociology and psychology, and trained in psychoanalysis.* He practised in Frankfurt before emigrating to the USA in 1934. His 'humanistic psychoanalysis' synthesized his studies of the Talmud and the OT with Freudian psychology, and with Marxist and Weberian social perspectives. In the first of many major books, The Fear of Freedom (London 1942), Fromm applied psychoanalytical tools to a critique of Western society, a theme further developed in later works, notably The Sane Society (New York, 1955). The Art of Loving (New York and London, 1957) was a very widely read exploration of the relation of love to the total personality; To Have or To Be? (New York, 1976; London, 1979) explores the choice for humankind between on the one hand material possessions and power, and on the other the pleasure of shared experience and human values. In Man For Himself (New York, 1947; London, 1949), Fromm offers a psychology of the moral life and human character, and in various other writings (You shall Be as Gods, New York, 1966; The Dogma of Christ, New York and London, 1963; and Psychoanalysis and Religion, New Haven, CT, and London, 1950) he explores the relationships between religious faith, moral and spiritual values, and psychoanalytic theory. He argues for a 'humanistic religion', being unhappy with the concept of God, but believing in the importance of spiritual reality, and the value in therapy of helping patients towards a 'religious attitude'.

Bibliography

D. Helminiak, 'Spiritual Concerns in Erich Fromm', JPT 16, 1988, p. 222; P. Morea, Personality (Harmondsworth, 1990), ch. 5.

D.J.A.

FRUSTRATION results when a course of action which would lead to the attainment of a desired goal is thwarted. The way in which a hope is balked, or a design defeated, is endlessly variable, but the condition that follows is unpleasant, linked to feelings of disappointment and failure. It is frequently, in modern parlance, linked to sexual frustration, but this is only one special use.

A situation may be described as frustrating when there appears to be an insoluble problem, beset with barriers which seem to make a solution impossible in spite of a strong wish to overcome them. The capacity to tolerate frustration is usually seen as a measure of such a person's strong will or self-discipline.

Modern psychology has sought to explain frustration in terms of experimental studies. In 1939, J. Dollard and N. E. Miller (1909-) made a notable contribution by linking aggression to frustration. Their hypothesis was that frustration led to aggression (easily shown in pigeons or rats) and anger (as often observed in humans).

J. A. Gray argues that fear* and frustration are much the same thing and that non-reward (the essential feature in frustration) is the same as punishment* (which plays a large part in fear and anxiety*). Gray admits that equating fear and frustration runs counter to our intuitions. Both result in states of distress which can be relieved by drugs such as alcohol and benzodiazepines. Frustration and fear lead to conflicts which bring many to counselling and therapy (see Pastoral Care, Counselling and Psychotherapy†) and therapy.

In ordinary experience it is abundantly confirmed that 'hope deferred makes the heart sick' (Pr. 13:12). There is a clash between biblical and contemporary values over frustration. Expectations of fulfilment are among the hallmarks of modern hopes. This is true of the two strongest instincts in human life, the sexual and the aggressive drives. Children in most cultures are taught ways of learning to delay gratification of these basic impulses. Similarly, acquisitive impulses may be controlled, but the modern view is, 'I want it now.'

Counselling offers understanding and insight, shared with the person suffering from the consequences of frustration. Aid in problem-solving is built in to much casework, and is directed to helping the client to make his or her own decisions, which may resolve conflict. Medical and psychological consequences are legion. Hysteria was seen as a response where intolerably strong drives which could not be fulfilled might lead to a dissociative state, or a running away from the problem. Anxiety in many forms may result from frustration. Where anger,* as part of frustration, is turned inwards, severe depression* may result. There are many who show antisocial behaviour which is attributed to frustration.

Symptomatic treatment of the anxiety or depression may be needed, especially when there are physical symptoms caused by frustration. Frequently the remedy is neither medical nor psychological but social. Thus if work and earning money are the desired goal, and economic recession and unemployment prevent this, both suicide rates and depression increase. Only meaningful work will treat such frustration and restore self-esteem and wellbeing.

The higher the moral standards, the more frustration is likely. Coming to terms with the demands of the Sermon on the Mount* may require the metaphorical loss of eye or hand. The demands of chastity* are only one example of the way frustration hurts: handling anger and its related feelings is even more difficult for many.

It seems clear from the NT that raising the stakes with Pharisaical adding of burdens of rules and regulations is bad, partly because it increases the risk of frustrating failure. This should be borne in mind by parents, educators and Christian teachers, who should bear in mind that Christ's yoke is easy and his burden light.

Perhaps conflict is inevitable between a rigorist* or ascetic* interpretation of the NT and one which makes allowances for failure, forgiveness* and the need for tolerance of human weakness. Perfection is the goal, but we must not add burdens to people, often in matters which are morally neutral. The aim should not be to create unnecessary frustration.

Bibliography

J. A. Gray, The Psychology of Fear and Stress (Cambridge, 1987); J. Dollard et al., Frustration and Aggression (New Haven, CT, 1939).

G.D.

FRY, ELIZABETH (1780-1845), a pioneer in prison reform and women's philanthropic work. Born the daughter of John Gurney, a prosperous Quaker in Norwich, Elizabeth became personally convinced of the Quaker faith in her late teens. In 1800 she married Joseph Fry, a London merchant, and had eleven children.

Elizabeth first visited Newgate, a notorious London gaol near her home, in 1811. She discovered dirty, overcrowded conditions in which there was virtually no attempt at rehabilitation. In 1817 she organized a team of ladies to read the Bible to female prisoners each day while they were given sewing lessons. Monitors were appointed to supervise small classes of fellow-prisoners and soon the new approach proved so successful that it was imitated elsewhere. In 1812 Elizabeth established the British Society for Promoting Reformation of Female Prisoners to link various Ladies' Committees, and in 1827 published Observations on the Visiting, Superintendence and Government of Female Prisoners, which was bold enough to advocate the end of capital punishment. Although penal policy in the 1830s began to favour solitary confinement, which Elizabeth disliked, from 1838 she was able to propagate her views as a Quaker travelling minister in continental Europe. Elizabeth was an inspiration for ladies to take up Christian caring outside the home. She was eager to co-operate with other evangelicals in organizations such as the Bible Society, but she saw her activities as an outgrowth of the Quaker belief that all human beings deserve respect.

Bibliography

J. Rose, Elizabeth Fry: A Biography (London, 1980).

D.W.Be.

FUNERALS, see BEREAVEMENT; BURIAL AND CREMATION; DEATH AND DYING; LIFE, HEALTH AND DEATH.†

G

GAMBLING is 'an agreement between two parties whereby the transfer of something of value is made dependent on an uncertain event, in such a way that one party will gain and the other lose' (Churches' Council on Gambling, 1974).

Thus defined, gambling includes gaming (playing for money), betting (staking money on the uncertain outcome of an event) and participating in lotteries (when prizes are allocated at random). Skill may be involved, but the element of chance predominates.

Insurance* is not usually considered gambling, because clients intend to avert unavoidable risks by paying their premiums, not embrace artificial risks by parting with their stake money. Similarly, the practice of casting lots in the Bible (e.g. 1 Ch. 24:5; Acts 1:26) cannot be bracketed with gambling, because the intention was either to discern God's will or to ensure fairness. Business investment and speculation are harder to categorize, as they span a much broader spectrum of intent.

Thomas Aquinas* permitted gambling, providing it was not motivated by covetousness,* characterized by unfairness (loaded dice) or used to exploit the young and psychologically immature.

Following his lead, some modern Christians find gambling ethically acceptable. They point especially to the good material results achieved through State lotteries and church raffles. The building of the Sydney Opera House, the Montreal Olympics, and the London Metropolitan water supply were all financed through public lotteries. Moreover, they argue, gamblers may be well motivated. Many elderly people who go to bingo sessions do so to escape loneliness, not out of greed, and those who buy raffle tickets are usually more concerned to make a contribution to the good cause than to win the prize.

Nowhere, they point out, does the Bible condemn gambling. Indeed, the NT invites Christians to 'put their hope in God, who richly provides us with everything for our enjoyment' (1 Tim. 6:17). If the stewardship* principle allows for expenditure on leisure activities, surely those who find gambling enjoyable are as ethically correct as their neighbours who prefer to buy tickets for the theatre or pay for a meal at a smart restaurant.

Other influential figures from church history have a much more negative view. Tertullian* wrote bluntly, 'If you say you are a Christian when you are a dice-player, you say you are what you are not, for you are a partner with the world' (De Spectaculis, xvi). Hugh Latimer (1485-1555) preached his famous 'Sermon on the Cards' in 1529 to deter Christians from gaming.

William Temple* (Essays in Christian Politics and Kindred Subjects, London, 1927) listed four reasons why gambling is wrong in itself. 1. It glorifies chance. In the Bible, God is revealed as a God of order (cf. 1 Cor. 14:33). He leaves nothing to good fortune and provides for all his people's needs. Because gambling glorifies chance, it encourages people to trust their luck rather than rely on God's providence. 2. Whatever its defenders may claim, said Temple, gambling disregards the stewardship principle. Christians accept that they are only caretakers of their property, not owners. Gamblers are risking what belongs to God. 3. Gambling attempts to profit out of someone else's loss. That is the antithesis of Christian teaching on neighbour love. 4. Those who promote gambling (including governments who sanction State lotteries) make their appeal to human covetousness, a selfish approach to life which is condemned both by the Ten Commandments and by the teaching of Jesus (Ex. 20:17; Lk. 12:15). As Jeremy Taylor* put it in his famous 'Sermon on the Cards', preached in 1660: 'If a man be willing or indifferent to lose his own money and not at all desirous to get another's, to what purpose is it that he plays for it? If he be not indifferent, then he is covetous or a fool: he covets that which is not his own, or unreasonably ventures that which is.'

Those who oppose gambling point to the human disasters which sometimes follow in its wake. Once deeply ingrained, the habit can master its victims. They may steal for their stake money. They often lose their jobs. And marriage breakdowns may follow.

Whichever side of the argument is considered weightier, all agree that excessive gambling is wrong. Organizations like Gamblers Anonymous exist to help compulsive gamblers (see Dependence*) and their dependants.

Bibliography

National Council for Social Aid, Christianity and Gambling (Oxford, 1983).

D.H.F.

GAUDIUM ET SPES, see SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL.

GAY RIGHTS, see HOMOSEXUALITY.

GENDER, see SEXUALITY.†

GENEROSITY, see GIVING.

GENE THERAPY, see GENETIC ENGINEERING.

GENETIC COUNSELLING. As knowledge of genetic disease increases, more people need information about their risks and help in working out how to handle this information. Genetic-counselling centres, usually hospital-based, aim both to inform and to provide such help.

If an individual belongs to a family where several members are affected by a particular disease, he or she may want to know about their own possible future disability. Others may have a child with some form of handicap (see Disability and Handicap*) and wish to know the outlook for any future children, while yet others may have lost such a child or had a pregnancy aborted because serious abnormalities had been detected. The genetic counsellor will collate the family details and give the enquirer as accurate information as possible.

Where risks are high he or she will then discuss what courses of action are available or advisable. If, for example, an individual is at risk of developing a certain type of cancer, then a strategy for regular examination can be instigated so that early detection will allow optimum treatment. For other diseases, no such preventive measures may be possible, and the person concerned will need to think carefully whether he or she really wishes to know if the disease gene (or predisposition) is present.

Where parents are at high risk of having a handicapped child, the decisions before them may be more difficult. Possible options would include the use of reliable contraception (see Birth Control*) to ensure that they have no children themselves. This is a hard decision in our family-orientated culture, particularly if the couple have had a brief taste of parenthood through a child who died young.

For many conditions, pre-natal detection is possible using tests such as amniocentesis,* chorion biopsy or ultrasound scanning. Should the test show the foetus to be affected then abortion* would be offered, so couples facing this possibility need to weigh up whether or not this would be acceptable for them.

Another difficult option would be the use of artificial insemination (see Reproductive Technologies*) by donor or ovum donation (though at present donated ova are only rarely available). These techniques can enable a couple to avoid a high risk of having an affected child when no pre-natal test is available, but clearly are not to be undertaken lightly.

Having established the risk to be faced, the genetic counsellor will talk through the various options available to the couple and work out with them which course of action is the best for them. If a couple make it clear that they would not contemplate abortion, then the counsellor would explore other possibilities with them.

Thus this non-directive genetic counselling is largely informative and supportive, and decisions with moral implications are the choice of the individuals concerned since it is they who have to live with the results of their choices. Inevitably, though, the counsellors' views may have some impact on those seeking help.

There is no clear Bible teaching on genetic counselling, so general principles have to be applied. A first principle is that Christians seek truth and this includes ascertaining the facts about risks and what can be done about them. They are by no means committed to making use of the techniques they hear about.

A second principle is that of the value of the family unit. There may be a tension between the need for sharing what may be upsetting information within the family,* yet respecting confidentiality* where individuals wish to keep their knowledge to themselves.

Both the OT and NT stress the worth of the individual. Christians may disagree on the stage in development at which this great value becomes established (see Embryology*); but the command to love one's neighbour as one's self is fundamental.

Medical teaching in the UK and the USA maintains that the needs of the individual have priority over those of the State, but as materialism combined with scarcity of resources becomes commoner, this cannot be taken for granted. Whatever views may be held on the morality of the various techniques described, the prior concern must be for the individual or couple coping with grief and difficult decision-making.

A.C.B.

GENETIC ENGINEERING. The term 'genetic engineering' encapsulates people's fears regarding future abuses of science, since it is seen as having the potential to manipulate human nature. For some, it is 'playing God' in the most objectionable of ways. However, present-day human genetics is far less monolithic than this term suggests, ranging as it does from genetic screening and the use of DNA probes to pre-emptive intervention and selective abortion,* from genetic counseling* to somatic and germ line gene therapy, and from the human genome project (with its efforts to produce the complete nucleotide sequences of the human genome) to cloning and eugenics (see Manipulation*). This range of possibilities is made possible only because contemporary molecular genetics allows for the manipulation of the genetic content of human cells. Consequently, it holds out prospects both for dramatically extending the range of current medical therapies, and for effecting radical changes to the way in which medicine itself is practised. Hitherto intractable genetic diseases, such as cystic fibrosis and muscular dystrophy, are being unravelled, and the genes involved have been defined. Also, the nature of cancer as an acquired genetic disease is being clarified.

Genetic screening was revolutionized in the late 1970s by the advent of the recombinant DNA technologies, that in turn have led to the development of DNA probes for detecting large numbers of human genetic variants and genes with known functions. The amount of information stemming from these procedures is enormous, and its use demands serious ethical assessment. Criteria are required for determining who is to be tested, and what those with positive tests are to be told and whether their privacy* and confidentiality* can be maintained under all circumstances. The testing of people for susceptibility to a disease (e.g. severe arthritis or manic depressive illness) can be used sensitively and constructively, but it may serve to stigmatize individuals because of their genetic constitution. The consequence of genetic testing of the foetus is frequently abortion following a positive finding, although the prospects of treatment of afflicted foetuses are improving.

The precision of genetic information is not always as great as some claim, and care needs to be exercised to ensure that it does not lead to genetic determinism.

Somatic cell gene therapy, which was first tested in humans in 1989, involves the correction of gene defects in patients' own cells, the cells in question being somatic cells (i.e. ordinary body cells). The strategy involves gene replacement, gene correction or gene augmentation, the genes being introduced via retroviral vectors. The aim of this form of gene therapy is to modify a particular cell population and so rectify a particular disease in a particular patient. As such, it is similar to procedures like organ transplantation (see Transplant Surgery*), but is far more powerful than any indirect genetic therapies. However, there are technical difficulties associated with the expression and appropriate regulation of new genes in somatic cells, and with its current limitation to disorders stemming from defective function of genes in the specialized cells from which blood cells are derived. For some time it will be confined to attempts at correcting single gene defects, such as found in thalassemia and phenylketonuria.

Since its aim is the alleviation of disease, and not the improvement of the human species, it fits within Christian goals for health care.* Ethical issues of significance include the need to balance any potential benefits and harms, and assess the safety and effectiveness of new techniques. There must be unequivocal evidence from animal studies that the inserted gene will function adequately and have no deleterious effects; there needs to be assurance that the new gene can be accurately placed into the target cells and that it will remain there long enough to be effective, that it will be expressed in the cell at the appropriate level and only in that tissue, and that neither it nor the retroviruses will harm the cell or the patient. It is important to assess the benefits of gene therapy against current alternative therapies (such as bone marrow transplantation), and to ensure that the interests of the patients are paramount. For the foreseeable future, it should be viewed as the treatment of last resort.

It may be objected that somatic cell gene therapy is unethical since it represents the beginning of a slippery slope, its inevitable concomitant being germ line gene therapy and eugenics. Understandable as this objection may be, there is a considerable moral gulf between gene therapy to treat disease and gene manipulation to alter behaviour or morality.

Germ line gene therapy involves inserting the gene into the germ line (sperms, eggs and embryos), so that when the modified individual reproduces, all offspring will have the inserted gene instead of the original defective one. It is attempting to manipulate an early embryo so that the individual it will become is not afflicted with a fatal disease. Animal experiments have shown this form of gene therapy to be associated with high risks, since gene expression may occur in inappropriate tissues. Since the foreign gene is inserted randomly into the host DNA, some facets of normal embryological development may be disrupted with serious adverse consequences. Further, any damage to the DNA caused by this procedure will stay in the germ line and be passed on to subsequent generations. But what if it becomes a safe and effective procedure?

Were this to happen, there are various arguments in favour of germ line gene therapy. Some genetic disorders may be amenable to treatment only in this way (e.g. brain cells in hereditary central-nervous-system disorders, which are not open to genetic repair after birth). It would also dispense with the need to repeat somatic-cell gene therapy in different generations of a family with a genetic disorder, by eliminating the defective gene from the population and so improving the efficiency of gene therapy. In assessing these arguments, it is pertinent to point out that germ line therapy involves obtaining embryos via in vitro fertilization (see Reproductive Technologies*), determining which ones require treatment, and then carrying out the therapy. However, the far simpler procedure of refraining from implanting defective embryos achieves the same therapeutic aims without running the risks of inserting a new gene into a defective embryo. This simpler course of action requires the disposal of defective embryos, and may be rejected by some on the ground that it is unethical to select healthy embryos and reject defective ones. Neither would it satisfy those wishing to eliminate a defective gene from the population.

Enhancement genetic engineering involves the insertion of a gene in an attempt to alter a particular trait of an individual. This approach has ethical problems, since it aims to alter a healthy individual in a permanent manner. This is similar to providing growth hormone to normal individuals in order to improve their sporting prowess. The extra gene (whether normal or modified) may have adverse consequences resulting from protein imbalance. However, an alternative preventive use of enhancement genetic engineering can be imagined, such as altering the concentration of a protein that leads to heart disease. If the goal in this instance is the alleviation of disease, it may be ethically justified, representing a form of preventive medicine; the scientific situation would have to be clarified before this approach could be seriously contemplated.

See also: EMBRYOLOGY; EMBRYO TRANSFER.

Bibliography

W. F. Anderson, 'Human Gene Therapy', Science 256, 1992, pp. 808-813; C. K. Boone, 'Bad Axioms in Genetic Engineering', Hastings Center Report 18.4, 1988, pp. 9-13; H. Bouma III et al., Christian Faith, Health, and Medical Practice (Grand Rapids, 1989); J. A. Bryant, 'Mapping the Human Genome: The Human Genome Project', Science and Christian Belief 4, 1992, pp. 105-125; P. J. M. Van Tongeren, 'Ethical Manipulations: An Ethical Evaluation of the Debate Surrounding Genetic Engineering', Human Gene Therapy 2, 1991, pp. 71-75; L. Walters, 'Human Gene Therapy: Ethics and Public Policy', Human Gene Therapy 2, 1991, pp. 115-122.

D.G.J.

GENETIC SCREENING, see GENETIC COUNSELLING; GENETIC ENGINEERING.

GENEVA CONVENTION. This term is used to refer to a series of international treaties that codified the rules of war.* A major role in this work has been played by the International Committee of the Red Cross, founded in 1863 through the inspired Christian leadership of Jean Henri Dunant (1828-1910).

The first treaty, signed in 1864 by sixteen European powers, provided for the care of the sick and wounded soldiers, the neutrality of the medical corps, the humane treatment of prisoners, and the display of a distinctive emblem, such as the Red Cross, by persons and places involved in medical work. These articles were extended and amended in a series of meetings held at the Hague in 1899 and 1907, and at Geneva in 1906, 1929, 1949 and 1977. The most important of these meetings was held in 1949 in response to the horrors of the Second World War, and it drew up the most complete of the Geneva Conventions. The articles included the following: 1. provision for care of the wounded and sick in land warfare; 2. rules for the care of those who were injured or shipwrecked at sea; 3. laws guaranteeing the just treatment of prisoners of war; and 4. provisions that protected citizens of occupied territories by condoning such practices as deportation, taking of hostages, torture, collective reprisals, wanton destruction of property, and discrimination based on race, religion or nationality. In 1977 another conference supplemented these with two additional protocols that extended the protection of international law to wars of liberation or civil wars. Over 150 nations have signed the 1949 conventions, but far fewer have agreed to the 1977 protocols.

R.G.C.

GENOCIDE. The word 'genocide' was first widely used after the Nazi holocaust to describe the purposeful attempt to destroy a racial, religious or political group. The systematic elimination of six million Jewish men, women and children in Europe inspired the United Nations to draw up the Genocide Convention. The General Assembly approved the convention in 1948 and brought it into effect as Resolution 96 in 1951. The resolution departed from previously normal principles by declaring that State authorities as well as those who practise their commands are equally guilty. It also lays it down that genocide does not constitute 'a matter essentially within the domestic jurisdiction', but is of international concern.

Although the term 'genocide' immediately conjures up the image of the Nazi concentration camps and gas chambers, other horrific examples of deliberate genocide have darkened the pages of human history. In early history whole tribes were eliminated by their conquerors, as was later the case with the Mongol armies as they swept through central Asia. In 1915 the Turks sought to wipe out their Armenian population, and the Pol Pot regime in the late 1970s eliminated all professional classes of Cambodians.

The United Nations Genocide Convention outlines the specific activities which constitute genocide. In seeking to destroy a people, genocide may include: 1. killing members of the group; 2. causing serious physical or mental harm; 3. deliberately inflicting on the group such living conditions as will bring about its destruction; 4. imposing measures aimed at preventing reproduction within the group; and 5. forcing the group's children to be given to members of other peoples. It may be observed that all five of these activities were perpetrated by the Germans in Hitler's 'final solution' to the Jewish question.

In the definition of genocide the above activities are not carried out because the particular individuals or families are singled out as criminal elements or enemies of the State. The victims are destroyed purely because they belong to their racial, religious or political group. So in Nazi Germany even assimilated Jews were eliminated, although they were culturally identified with their German neighbours and were loyal servants of the German State. Totally harmless women and children suffered the same humiliating fate for no other reason than that they were Jews.

Nazi Germany's 'final solution' provides a clear example of the fact that genocide normally presupposes the idea that the victimized people is naturally inferior or even sub-human. Thus Spanish Argentinians in their genocidal hunting down of Chaco Indians believed that the Indians were more animal than human. Nazi propaganda likewise depicted the Jews as sub-human 'vermin', and this teaching was supported by highly sophisticated pseudoscientific journals which purported to demonstrate that the Jewish brain resembles that of an animal more than that of human beings. Such teaching fitted the mood of German nationalism and the master-race philosophy of Richard Wagner (1813-83) and Friedrich Nietzsche.*

In this context the biblical teaching concerning the divine creation of all humanity becomes particularly significant. The Bible affirms that all humanity - all races and classes as well as both men and women - are made in the image and likeness of God (see Image of God*). The genealogy in Lk. 3 reminds us that God is the father of Adam and thus of all people. Jesus Christ traces his descent not just from Abraham, the father of Israel, but also from Adam, the father of all humanity. In Jesus therefore there can be no status distinctions between races, classes or genders.

Genocide may also stem from a genuine or imagined fear* of the other people. In earlier centuries Christians developed a fear of the Jews, believing that they were in league with the angel of death to plot for the destruction of Christians. Scandalous rumours spread that Jews captured Christian children in order to drink their blood, and maidens for their sexual pleasure. Fear can darken people's minds and prevent loving or rational discernment. Such fear played a major part in driving Christian peoples in Europe to destroy Jewish communities in their midst. 1 Jn. 4:18, however, declares that fear cannot co-exist with love. While John is primarily teaching that God's love casts out the human fear that God will destroy us in judgment, the principle applies more widely. Love for our neighbour precludes irrational fear.

In facing the sad realities of human and church history with its catalogue of examples of genocide, we are forced to confess the depth of human sin. Selfish pride, irrational fear, gullible acceptance of current propaganda and a stereotyping judgment of other groups which dehumanizes them - such depravity lies deep within all human beings. Genocide is therefore an ever-present danger.

M.F.G.

GERM LINE GENE THERAPY, see GENETIC ENGINEERING.

GESTALT THERAPY has its roots in the Gestalt and existential psychologies* of Germany in the first third of the 20th century and the humanistic psychology of the US in the 1950s and 60s. The figures of Frederick (Fritz) Perls (1893-1970) and Laura Perls (1906-90) are pre-eminent in the unfolding story. The conceptual contexts of Gestalt psychology included the 'understanding' psychology (see Humanistic Psychology*) of Wilhelm Dilthey (1833-1911), with its emphasis on the integrated whole, and the phenomenology of Edmund Husserl (1859-1938), whose philosophy argued the prerequisite of a scientific and descriptive approach to human consciousness.

The Ger. word Gestalt was first used within a psychological framework in 1890 by the Austrian psychologist and philosopher, Christian von Ehrenfels (1859-1932), who reasoned that there is a 'gestalt, or form' quality, present in the whole of a structure, which is absent from any of the parts that make up that whole. In 1912, three young German psychologists, Max Wertheimer (1880-1943), Kurt Koffka (1886-1941) and Wolfgang Köhler (1887-1967), working in the vicinity of Frankfurt, founded the Berlin Gestalt school, which rejected both the reductionist* views of John B. Watson's (1878-1958) behaviourism* and the bid for a 'higher' mental process in constructing human awareness of the environment, as favoured by the Austrian Gestaltists. The Berlin school became the main trendsetter in Gestalt psychology. In time, many of its psychologists left for the US where, in spite of their earlier resistance, they capitulated to Watsonian 'objectivism' and, to quote Fritz Perls, gave priority to 'installing quantitative measures and excessive experimental restrictions' (F. S. Perls et al., Gestalt Therapy, pp. 25-26).

Fritz Perls, working as a psychiatrist and psychoanalyst in Germany during the 1920s and 30s, became disenchanted with orthodox Freudianism* and, following the advice of the neo-Freudian, Karen Horney (1885-1952), sought analysis with Wilhelm Reich (1897-1957). Reichian thinking, stressing that the body is as important as the mind in the development of resistances (see Defence Mechanisms*), was highly formative on Perls' later thinking and practice. In 1926, while working at the Institute for Brain-Damaged Soldiers in Frankfurt, under the directorship of Kurt Goldstein (1878-1965), Perls met his wife, Laura, a Gestalt psychologist. The influences of Goldstein's 'holism' and emphasis on 'selfactualization' and, in turn, the existentialism* of Paul Tillich (1886-1965) and Martin Buber (1878-1965), with whom Laura Perls also worked, were strong in the eventual establishment of Gestalt therapy. Added to these psychoanalytic, humanistic and existential strands, the optimistic cultural climate in the Germany of the 1920s, as expressed in the Bauhaus movement of architecture and applied art, and his personal friendship with the Austrian theatre director, Max Reinhardt (1873-1943), stirred in Fritz Perls a love of drama and theatricality which infused the workshops of his later years. In 1933, the Perls fled Nazi Germany and settled in South Africa, where they founded that country's first psychoanalytic institute. With the rise of the National Party after the Second World War, and the threat of a stricter form of apartheid,* the Perls emigrated to the US. In New York, they soon became the focus of a small group of therapists, writers and political activists, which settled on the term 'Gestalt therapy' as an approach that emphasizes that human perception sees the world as made up of coherent, intelligible configurations or 'gestalts'. In 1952, the first Institute of Gestalt Therapy was set up in New York.

While Laura Perls has remained a stable, and increasingly acknowledged, central figure in the development of Gestalt therapy, Fritz Perls, its avowed and charismatic leader in the earlier years, lived a restless existence through the 1950s and 60s. Eventually settling at the Esalen Institute in California, Perls became caught up in the so-called 'human potential movement' of the 1960s, a pot-pourri of openended approaches - psychoanalytic, existential, humanist and transpersonal - to therapy and personal growth. In 1969, the year before his death, Perls founded a Gestalt community at Cowichen, Vancouver Island.

Gestalt therapy, it is argued by many today, has been misunderstood and misrepresented as a result of the overly confrontational and antiintellectual stance of its earlier protagonists. Latterly, the theory and practice of Gestalt therapy has been more clearly established and a greater professionalism encouraged through the training offered by, amongst others, the Gestalt Centre in London and the Scottish Association for Gestalt Education, and the founding, in 1985, of the British-based Gestalt Psychotherapy Training Institute. The influence of Gestalt therapy has spread to the areas of organizational development and management training.

The assumptive basis of Gestalt therapy sees the person as an 'organismic' whole, functioning through the bodily, mental and spiritual dimensions of the total organism. Following some of the concepts of the early Gestalt psychologists, Gestalt therapists argue that, at any point of time, in healthy functioning, the individual's prior need (e.g. a pressing thirst) stands out as a 'figure' against the general 'ground' of what is being experienced. This overall configuration is the 'gestalt', of which, ideally, the person becomes aware (with the thirst as 'figure'), and then responds to it by action (taking a drink) and integration (the satisfaction of a quenched thirst). In creative adjustment, a series of gestalts emerge and dissolve as they are recognized and handled constructively. In disturbed functioning, the healthy cycle can be blocked at any stage: the need is not acknowledged, no action is taken to meet that need, the met need is not integrated or allowed to melt away. Gestalt therapy recognizes four main patterns (see Defence Mechanisms*) which can disrupt awareness of the self* and the environment, and thus lead to the 'unfinished business' of such 'incomplete gestalts': introjection, in which elements of the environment are taken into the self unreflectingly; projection, where there is displacement from the self into the environment; retroflexion, involving an unproductive inner dialogue rather than engagement with the outside world; and confluence, in which there is a merging of the self with the surrounds, avoiding distinctiveness.

In the face of such maladjustment, Gestalt therapy, through individual counselling or group therapy,* seeks to provide a context for the client to work towards a greater awareness of moment-by-moment experience, the cultivation of an inner strength, a fuller integration into everyday life and an increased ability to relate to others. With these aims in mind, the Gestalt therapist operates with a style that is unique to each therapeutic relationship. There is great emphasis on the 'hereand-now' experience within the counselling process. This immediacy is stimulated and fostered by the therapist's willingness to share something of his or her own feelings and reactions as the counselling progresses, and by the asking of 'what?' and 'how?', rather than the more analytical 'why?', questions. The holism of Gestalt theory is further expressed in creative experimentation in which clients, once relational trust is established, may be encouraged to act out what they are feeling, sensing or thinking through dramatization, re-enacting a dream, art work, dance or other physical movement. At such times, the 'empty chair' technique may be used, where a client is invited to express himself or herself to the imagined presence of someone significant or to enter into a dialogue, for example, between his or her 'stronger' and 'weaker' selves.

The holism, immediacy and quest for integration in Gestalt therapy have attracted a number of Christian counsellors and psychotherapists who have incorporated something of the aims, techniques and language of this methodology into their therapeutic work. One eclectic approach that assimilates some of the perspectives of Gestalt is that of Ian Davidson (1932-), who writes, 'Gestalt ... is a tool, a way of seeing, a wholeness of perception, a method of personal growth, a grasping of hoped-for possibilities, like faith itself ...' (Here and Now, p. 181).

See also: PASTORAL CARE, COUNSELLING AND PSYCHOTHERAPY.†

Bibliography

M. Buber, I and Thou (ET, New York, 1970; Edinburgh, 1971); P. Clarkson, Gestalt Counselling in Action (London and Newbury Park, CA, 1989); I. Davidson, Here and Now: An Approach to Christian Healing through Gestalt (London, 1991); M. Parlett and F. Page, 'Gestalt Therapy', in W. Dryden (ed.), Individual Therapy: A Handbook (Milton Keynes and Bristol, PA, 1990); F. S. Perls, The Gestalt Approach and Eye Witness to Therapy (New York, 1976); F. S. Perls et al., Gestalt Therapy: Excitement and Growth in the Human Person- ality (New York, ³1972; Harmondsworth, 1974); V. Van De Riet, M. P. Korb and J. J. Gorrell, Gestalt Therapy: An Introduction (New York, ²1985).

R.F.H.

GIVING can be understood as a demand or responsibility placed upon us, for almsgiving is an obligation common to many worldviews. This article also explores the overwhelming motivation for giving as response to the love of God.

1. The virtue of giving

Alms-giving is one of the five ‘pillars’ of Islam, and in Buddhism the laity are required to give food and alms to enable monks to fulfil their teaching role. Money is appropriately given to support ministers of the gospel (see Thomas Oden, Ministry through Word and Sacrament). Contemporary Judaism summons all humankind to act for the common good and to give to relieve the poor for God’s sake. But anthropologists recognize gift-giving as a universal of human behaviour, often accompanied by an ethical concern about the inner attitude of the giver, which is sometimes expressed as ‘the golden rule.’* This concern for motivation leads us to recognize with the psychologist that human maturity should always include elements of unconditional self-acceptance, decreasing self-centredness and a courage to take risks. In Christian spiritual writings, maturity has been expressed in terms of an attachment to God with a corresponding detachment from the pressures, fears and anxieties of the material world.

2. Christian giving

The NT (Mt. 6:1-4; Lk. 11:41; 12:33) encourages alms-giving (Gk. root eleos, ‘mercy’), in continuity with earlier teaching (Ps. 41:1; Pr. 19:17; Dn. 4:27; Tobit 12:8). Jesus allowed himself to be interrupted by human need (Mt. 9:20; 15:22), and told the rich young man to ‘Go, sell ... give ...’ as a prelude to receiving treasure in heaven and starting a life of discipleship (Mk. 10:21). Christ, who gave his life for enemies (Rom. 5:8), taught love for enemies (Mt. 5:43-45). Giving can mirror the Father’s love for all and be a doorway to sharing God’s joy (Acts 20:35). As a joyful response to the love and forgiveness of God, kindness is done ‘to Jesus Christ’ (Mt. 25:40), and expresses self-giving devotion to God (Mt. 10:21). See the generosity of Zaccheus (to whose house ‘salvation’ had come, Lk. 19:9) and the lifestyle of the church in Acts (Acts 2:44-46; 4:32-35; cf. Phil. 4:10-20). It is culpable to ignore the opportunity for alms-giving (Lk. 16:19-31), because the rich are to express their security in God by such generosity. But charity alone is inadequate - God (in Jesus’ parable in Mt. 20:1-16) gives both work and wages, reflecting the context for OT alms-giving, namely a covenant based on justice that protected the poor (Ex. 20:22 - 23:19).

3. Symbolic giving

Gifts are symbolic. They reveal priorities and express relationships. For example, in some group training exercises, the giving of some object represents the giving of self involved in group membership; or, in studies of people who have behaved in an altruistic manner, researchers have tried to identify the ‘ethic of care or giving’ that makes some people active ‘rescuers’ rather than passive ‘bystanders’. Similarly, pastoral leaders need to reflect carefully on the meaning of anything they are given, and be ready to receive it in God’s name. Oden shows how, in the history of pastoral care, gifts (money or kind offered within worship) both provide for ministry and express love for God, mirroring the way Jesus expressed his human dependence (Lk. 8:2-3; 5:29). The apostolic collection from the Gentiles offered to Jewish Christians in Jerusalem (Acts 11:29-30; Rom. 15:26-27) was highly symbolic in that it provided famine relief, but also expressed a radically new solidarity in Christ, a Christological basis for future giving (2 Cor. 8:9; 9:15), so that generosity and mutuality became recognized as authentic marks of the church. Such giving that arises out of love (1 Cor. 13:3; and in the OT this included loans, according to Pss. 37:26; 112:5; Pr. 19:17) finds expression not only in the 'conversion of the pocket', but also in giving time, energy, experience, skill or some other expertise - and more recently in giving blood, donating an organ for transplant and in giving one's life for another.

4. Giving and society

It follows that giving can have social and political dimensions. In European history, because the church was such a large landowner, monasteries and churches became channels through which society benefited from Christian giving. Expressing justice and advancing the 'common good' today, governments make fiscal provision for disadvantaged sections of society, and give economic aid to disadvantaged nations. But such 'giving' can easily lack integrity. Japan (the world's largest aid-giver) has wasted precious tropical hardwoods on building sites; other 'aid-givers' have often received a greater sum back from developing countries in interest on loans. So 'trade, not aid' has sometimes been advocated as the more generous policy. However, while trading commits the 'giver' to greater involvement with the receiver, the benefits of trade can be restricted to a small élite, from whom little extra wealth 'trickles down' to the poor. The 'gift' of education, to develop adult literacy skills, new socio-political awareness and a higher standard of managerial competence has been a way of 'giving power to the people' (see P. Freire, Pedagogy of the Oppressed).

5. Giving and the church

Strict integrity is also needed in handling financial gifts between churches. Figures show that when large sums of money have been given overseas from Britain and the USA, significant amounts have gone astray, and some donors refuse to give where there is no managerial accountability. But the danger of such commendable caution is that the self-sufficient, wealthy giver can retain inappropriate control over the recipient, and thereby deny the mutuality and common dependence on God that characterize Christian giving. At the small scale of personal giving, this interdependency can lead to involvement in and prayer for the lives and ministry of the recipients. An equivalent divesting of control is necessary on the larger scale.

6. The OT tithe and Christian giving

The payment of a tithe (a tenth) represented someone's whole life offered to the covenant God within the community's celebration (Gn. 14:17-20; 28:20-22; Dt. 7:12ff.; 15:15; 26:1ff.). Crops, fruit, animals and money were given (Lv. 27:30-33), and thereby provision was made for the poor, the Levite and the priests (e.g. Nu. 18). To omit to give God's tithe was 'robbery' (Mal. 3:8-10). Tithing was 'faith in practice', a generosity seen elsewhere in the OT (e.g. Ex. 25:1ff.; 31:1ff.).

Christ fulfilled the OT (e.g. Mt. 5:17-20; Heb. 7), and often in parables spoke of money as symptomatic of spiritual priorities. The tithe has enduring value today in so far as Christians a. give, pray and fast to the glory of God (Mt. 6:1ff.); b. give in a planned manner but also respond joyfully to God's gracious blessing (1 Cor. 16:1-2); c. are concerned for justice more than ritual practice (Mt. 23:23); d. pay attention to motive more than the amount of the gift (1 Cor. 13:3), so as to affirm the generosity of the poor (Lk. 21:4; 2 Cor. 8 - 9); e. aim through giving to express the grace of the gospel (Acts 11:29-30; Rom. 15:26-27); and f. use giving as a way to minister to their ministers. Our Lord's total self-giving alone constitutes the basis for Christian giving: 'Freely you have received, freely give' (Mt. 10:8).

Bibliography

R. J. Foster, Money, Sex and Power (London, 1985), pp. 1-87; P. Freire, Pedagogy of the Oppressed (London and New York, 1972); T. C. Oden, Ministry through Word and Sacrament (New York, 1989), pp. 200-225.

G.O.S.

GLASSER, WILLIAM (1925-). Advertised as ‘a new approach to psychiatry’, Dr William Glasser’s Reality Therapy, first published in New York in 1965, and rapidly a best-seller, was one of several severely critical responses to psychoanalytic* approaches to so-called ‘mental illness’. Glasser rejected the concept of mental illness that ‘People do not act irresponsibly because they are “ill”; they are “ill” because they act irresponsibly’, and he also challenged all the other central postulates of psychoanalytic theory. He argued that the ‘mentally ill’ are unable to satisfy their basic needs of relatedness and respect in a responsible way, because they deny the reality of their world. His key words are reality, responsibility* and right and wrong.

According to Glasser, the human needs to love and be loved and to feel that we are worthwhile to ourselves and to others are bound up with maintaining a certain standard of behaviour. Morals, standards and values are all intimately related to the fulfilment of our need for self-worth (see Self-esteem*). The complicated business of acquiring responsibility thus becomes, for reality therapy, an essential ingredient, and this can be achieved through the development of an emotional relationship between the client and a responsible therapist. The responsibility for change rests with the client, and the skill of therapy is to facilitate a sense of responsibility in the client.

Glasser has also written The Identity Society (New York, 1975), Mental Health or Mental Illness? (New York, 1960) and Schools without Failure (New York, 1969).

D.J.A.

GLUTTONY, see DEADLY SINS.

GODLINESS is the ideal quality of a Christian’s life, the sign of spiritual health and the means of glorifying God. The term itself, which is becoming ominously rarer in contemporary Christian speech, has for four centuries carried the thought of humble reverence for God expressed in devotion to him, desire to please him, conscientious conformity to his word, concern and compassion for those in need, and a capacity to endure, press on, and keep worshipping in face of all kinds of adverse pressure and discouragement. It is thus a weighty word, comparable in its breadth of meaning to pietas (piety), a key word in Calvin’s* Latin. In the OT, ‘the fear of the Lord’ is a pantechicon phrase that includes all aspects of God-centred, self-abasing, law-loving, worship-oriented living, in other words the whole substance of godliness in its pre-Christian form. In the pastoral epistles and 2 Peter, the Gk. word eusebeia, elsewhere a generic label for religiousness of any kind, signifies godliness in the full Christian sense: evidently by the sixties of the 1st century it was becoming a technical theological term.

In these texts the focus of godliness is the ‘mystery’ (revealed reality) of Jesus* Christ, the incarnate mediator, now risen and glorified (1 Tim. 3:16), and the formula for godliness is to turn resolutely from sin in order to live uprightly henceforth in readiness for Christ’s return (Tit. 2:11-14). The ‘sound’ doctrine (1 Tim. 1:10; 6:3; 2 Tim. 1:13; 4:3; Tit. 1:9; 2:1) - i.e. the teaching that is healthful in the sense of health-giving - is the teaching that accords with (makes for, and leads to) godliness (1 Tim. 6:3; Tit. 1:1). Power, which here means the influence of the Holy Spirit inducing Christlike ways of behaving, is fundamental to godliness (2 Tim. 3:5; cf. 2 Pet. 1:3), and there is no genuine godliness without it. Godliness is to be added to faith, goodness, knowledge, self-control and perseverance, for godliness (living for God and to God day by day) synthesizes all these into a stable mix, and so becomes the immediate basis for the regular loving service of others that is to be added to godliness to complete the Petrine bouquet of virtues (2 Pet. 1:5-7). Godliness involves accepting one’s responsibilities for others, e.g. in family support (1 Tim. 5:4, where the verb is eusebeo, meaning to express eusebeia towards another person). Godliness is God’s will for all his people at all times (1 Tim. 2:2), even under the persecution and hostility that every Christian will meet in some shape or form (2 Tim. 3:12).

Godliness is exemplified and modelled most clearly by the psalmists, the Lord Jesus Christ, and the apostle Paul. The psalmists praise and pray, confess, complain, celebrate and rejoice from the heart, not concealing any feeling, and thus they display to us the motivational, perceptual, emotional and doxological impulses that make up the inside story of godly living. Though the psychology and inner life of God incarnate must obviously have dimensions and depths that are wholly beyond our ken, Jesus in the Gospel narratives exhibits all the character qualities that Paul calls 'the fruit of the Spirit' in believers - love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness and self-control (Gal. 5:22-23) - along with a single-minded zeal for his Father's will and glory that is so intense as to be almost terrifying (see Jn. 2:13-17; cf. Lk. 12:49-50; 13:31-35), which also believers are clearly meant to imitate (cf. Rom. 12:11). Paul, as one such imitator, consciously models godliness to guide his converts (1 Cor. 11:1; cf. 4:16; Phil. 3:17; 4:9; 1 Thes. 1:6; 2 Thes. 3:7-9), and his own real godliness is mirrored and profiled very clearly in 1 Corinthians 1 - 4, 2 Corinthians, Philippians, 1 Thessalonians, 2 Timothy and Philemon.

Three errors that recur in the church's thought and life are: focusing on ethical effort in disregard of faith, contemplation and worship (legalism*); focusing on faith, contemplation and worship in disregard of ethical effort (antinomianism*); and focusing on the externals of behaviour in disregard of motivation (formalism, exemplified by the Pharisees). The teaching that makes for godliness unites these concerns and never allows them to be detached from each other.

J.I.P.

GOLDEN RULE, THE. A term used for well over 200 years, it designates Christ's exhortation to his disciples, recorded in Mt. 7:12, 'So in everything, do to others what you would have them do to you, for this sums up the Law and the Prophets' (cf. Lk. 6:31).

The nearest parallel in Mark's Gospel is to be found in our Lord's quotation from Leviticus in Mk. 12:31: 'Love your neighbour as yourself.' This is also quoted by Paul, as summing up the law, in Rom. 13:9.

There are some parallel sayings in other religions, and in ancient Gk. philosophy. Most are negative, like this from a Hindu source: 'Let no man do to another any act he wishes not done to himself by others, knowing it to be painful to himself' (Mahabharata, Shanti parva, cclx.21).

Rabbinic parallels are also negative. Hillel the Elder (fl. 1st century BC) is reported as saying, 'Do not do to your neighbour what is hateful to you; this is the whole Law, all the rest is commentary' (Shabbath 31a).

The more positive Muslim statement, 'No man is a true believer unless he desires for his brother that which he desires for himself,' may itself have been influenced by the words of Jesus, although we cannot be certain of this.

As a maxim, the Golden Rule, in the form it takes in the teaching of Jesus, expresses the essential altruism, inwardness, homogeneity and positive character of his ethic.

G.W.G.

GOOD, THE, see GOODNESS; HAPPINESS; SUBJECTIVISM.

GOODNESS is excellence of quality, particularly the moral qualities of benevolence* (lit. wanting what is good), and it is thereby akin to love (see †) and mercy.* God not only does good (beneficence), he is good (benevolence). While it is ascribed ultimately to God, it is used derivatively of his creatures in so far as they reflect the goodness of their maker.

The biblical picture

The psalmist says of God, 'How great is your goodness' (Ps. 31:19), and that men 'will celebrate your abundant goodness . . . The LORD is good to all; he has compassion on all he has made' (Ps. 145:7, 9). Again and again in praise to God for his mighty works, God's goodness recurs: 'Give thanks to the LORD, for he is good; his love endures forever' (Pss. 106; 107). Jesus picked up on this OT theme when he asked, 'Why do you call me good? No-one is good except God alone' (Mk. 10:18).

Yet the creation* is full of God's goodness (Ps. 33:5), and the Genesis narrative records God's own appraisal of what he made: 'it was good . . . it was good . . . it was very good' (Gn. 1:10, 12, 18, 21, 25, 31). On this basis the NT affirms the goodness of food and marital sex, over against some other-worldly ascetics (1 Tim. 4:1-5; cf. Ps. 107:9). God's goodness follows us throughout life (Ps. 23:6) and it leads to repentance (Rom. 2:4, AV). In the believer, goodness is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22), the fruit of walking in the light (Eph. 5:9).

This biblical picture has been a major source of Christian ethical reflection. It affirms: 1. God alone is altogether good, so that morally he transcends everyone else; 2. every good thing we possess comes from God; 3. the goodness of creation derives from and is dependent on God; 4. creation's gifts are therefore to be received and enjoyed with thankfulness; 5. while sin has marred the goodness of creation, particularly human nature, God's goodness calls us to repentance and the good work of his Spirit creates moral goodness in his people.

God as the Good

The history of Christian ethics has been profoundly influenced by this relation of God's goodness to that of his creatures. Plato* had conceived of a form of the Good, but it was an impersonal ideal. His Demiurge (the maker of the physical world) fashioned things according to such ideals, desiring that everything be good, but he was limited by irrational forces in nature. Aristotle* wrote that the highest good for human beings must be something intrinsically good, something for the sake of which every other good is to be sought. But this highest good, a full human life lived virtuously under the rule of reason, is devoid of the resources of biblical faith in the visible incarnation of perfect goodness in Jesus Christ, and his saving goodness that creates the good in us. Augustine,* who came to Christianity out of his study of Platonism, saw that God is the good which Plato had sought, the God whose goodness fills the earth and surrounds our lives, and whom we know in Jesus Christ. Augustine's Confessions recounts this discovery. Other conceptions of the good, like Aristotle's, are anthropocentric, thinking of goodness only in terms of human good, but Augustine says God made us for himself and our hearts are restless until they rest in his goodness. Love for God must therefore replace all lower loves in governing the soul. As the Westminster divines put it later, the highest end (good) of man is to glorify God and enjoy him for ever.

Creation's goodness

Augustine also found in the biblical view of goodness a key to understanding evil.* If everything in creation has its exemplar in the mind of God, then evil must be a privation of that divinely intended goodness (like an apple that rots). Sin is just such a privation due to our failure to love God fully in all his goodness.

By the same token, since the human body God created is good, no neglect or abuse of it should be allowed. Augustine showed a deep appreciation of nature's beauty and disagreed with some Platonists who said we should flee from the sensory world. He advocated a broad education in mathematics, music, history and literature on the ground that all creation's resources are good. If pagans have said things that are true, even though they misused what they know, Christians can reclaim that truth for themselves and restore it to the whole of God's truth from which it was in effect torn. Love for truth is love for what is good. Of course, knowledge is not the highest good: God is, but in his goodness all creation participates. So love for God cannot preclude loving truth or loving the creation. We should love them because God loves them, delighting in them to his praise as the psalmist did. Love for the good God is the unifying virtue that gives other good things their proper place.

Thomas Aquinas* further developed this line of thought. God, he asserts, is the good of every other good, the one who makes every other good the good it is. This is because God introduces his own likeness into created things in varying ways and degrees, so that the whole array of creation together manifests his goodness. In that sense, all being is good; all things tend, if only implicitly, towards God. Not only the human heart, but everything in creation is made for God and is restless until it rests in his likeness.

Human goodness

That God is the highest good for all creation has implications for human goodness. God's goodness is the norm, so a person is good in so far as he or she is like God in benevolence and loving kindness. To 'be good' is not just to be 'on one's best behaviour': that might be a hollow facade, and in any case behaviour is a matter of what we do overtly rather than what we are inwardly. It can be beneficence without benevolence. The latter is a virtue, and as such it involves attitudes, intentions, desires, the will, an inner disposition to act in beneficent ways. A good person, truly virtuous, is thus one who in his or her heart desires what, and as, God desires. To be good is to be like God, to image his goodness in both the inner reality and the outward activities of one's life.

Virtue* finds outward expression as 'good works' flow from the inner virtue of goodness. By themselves they are not virtuous: 'If I give all I possess to the poor ... but have not love, I gain nothing' (1 Cor. 13:3). But works of love done from the heart are what goodness is about. As faith without works is dead, so is goodness without good works.

To do good we direct our actions to beneficial ends. Beneficence and benevolence are teleological concepts; beneficence is a teleological principle for making ethical decisions. Thus the first precept in Aquinas' statement of the natural moral law is that 'good is to be done and ensued, and evil is to be avoided'. All other precepts of natural law,* he says, are based on this. Later ethicists see the principle of beneficence, that we have an obligation to do good and prevent harm, in the utilitarian's (see Consequentialism*) rule about maximizing the balance of good over evil. In this way, the biblical conception of goodness continues to influence Western ethical thinking, whether or not contemporary thinkers recognize it.

Locating perfect goodness in God alone, like Augustine's identification of God as the good, has suggested an argument for the existence of God. Anselm,* in his Monologium, argued from the degrees of goodness existing in creatures to a standard of perfect goodness by which they are measured, and which accordingly must exist. This was apparently the first of several forms of the moral argument for God's existence.

Bibliography

Augustine, Confessions, LCC 7; idem, The Nature of the Good in Augustine: Earlier Writings LCC 6; Thomas Aquinas, STh 1a5-6.

A.F.H.

GOOD WORKS. The issue of 'good works' figured at the heart of the Reformation debate about justification.* Protestant theologians claimed faithfulness to Paul in teaching that justification is by faith alone, so that our 'good works' contribute nothing at all to our standing before God. On the other hand Roman Catholic theologians emphasized the eschatological nature of justification, and replied that our acquittal at the final judgment would depend on whether we had, by the grace of God and by faith in Christ, obeyed the commandments and atoned for our sins.

Although the disagreement was very sharp, recently attempts have been made to minimize the differences between these positions. Certainly, from the point of view of ethics and pastoral theology, we may say that both sides emphasized the necessity for 'good works' as the practical response of the Christian to the grace of God in Christ (cf. Jas. 2:17ff.). As far as Christian life is concerned, it is a matter purely of academic interest to discover the precise relationship between the death and resurrection of Christ as the objective foundation of our salvation, and our own response as its proximate cause. Protestants need to ensure that they take seriously the biblical teaching of final judgment* by works, and the emphasis on human responsibility that follows from it (Mt. 25:31-46; Jn. 5:29; Rom. 2:6-10; 1 Cor. 3:10-15; 2 Cor. 5:10; 1 Pet. 4:17-19; Rev. 20:11-15), and Catholics need to be careful that the emphasis on this in their tradition does not rob them of a proper biblical assurance of salvation here and now (Jn. 5:24; 10:27-30; Rom. 5:1-2; 8:31-39; Heb. 6:16-20; 1 Pet. 1:3-9; 2 Pet. 1:3-4; 1 Jn. 5:6-13).

The expression 'good work(s)' is used thirty times in the NT, and typically refers to works of mercy and charity towards others in need. So Dorcas' practical care for the widows of Joppa is called her 'good works' (Acts 9:36), and Paul defines the 'good works' of the godly widow as 'bringing up children, showing hospitality, washing the feet of the saints, helping those in trouble and devoting herself to all kinds of good deeds' (1 Tim. 5:10; cf. 2 Cor. 9:8). Such practical service is probably the main content of the expression in other places where this is not immediately obvious from the context (e.g. Tit. 1:16; 2:7, 14; 3:1, 8, 14).

This fits with the overall structure of NT ethics, which does not focus on obeying the commandments, but on following the leading of the Holy Spirit in imitation of Christ and the apostles (Mt. 10:24-25; Jn. 13:13-17; Rom. 8:5-9; 1 Cor. 11:1).

S.M.

GOSPEL AND ETHICS. In the GraecoRoman imperial cult, 'gospel' (Gk. euangelion) referred to announcements of the accession of an emperor, the birth or coming of age of his heir, or significant imperial actions and decrees. In the NT, 'gospel' vocabulary is used of God as king. The unique, historic events of the birth, ministry, death and resurrection of Jesus are a public, universal announcement of God's plan and action to save the world. This 'gospel' warns that human beings are sinful in the religious sense of arrogantly rebelling against God or of failing to trust in him. It offers forgiveness* to those who repent and turn to God in Christ, and proclaims hope of eternal, resurrected life beyond the grave.

At every stage the spiritual themes of sin (see Sin and Salvation†) and its counterpart, faith,* are inseparable from the ethical themes of evil and good. To be a sinner in relation to God is also to fall short of the character and behaviour which would be described as 'good', 'loving' or 'truthful' in relation to other people and the material world. Ethics comes before the gospel, in that ethics helps to focus the significance of sin and pin-point what needs to be forgiven. So some writers have seen Jesus' teaching in the Sermon on the Mount* as an 'impossible ethic' to drive the sinner towards the gospel. More emphasis is placed in the NT, however, on the fact that Christian ethics derives from the gospel. The NT scholar J. Jeremias (1900-79) suggests that the Sermon on the Mount should be described not so much as Christian morality but as 'lived faith'.

The connection of gospel and ethics assumes fundamental analogies between relationships in the material world and those in the mental or spiritual realm. When Paul, for example, argued for the importance of his fund to relieve poverty in the Jerusalem church, he appealed to gospel events. The Lord gave up the richness of his heavenly existence and became poor. Believers have become correspondingly richer in their experience of life in Christ. Therefore they should be willing to become economically poorer to help others become richer (2 Cor. 8:9, 13).

Forgiveness is another gospel theme at the heart of Jesus' ethics. God is merciful. As creator he allows his sun and rain to benefit the most evil or ungrateful person. As redeemer he has provided an atonement* available for the sins of the world. These salvation truths demand concrete ethical responses. Followers of Christ should take risks to love, lending money which may not be returned, and befriending people who have been hostile or violent (Lk. 6:34-36).

Attempting to define more closely how gospel and ethics relate has led to some deep divisions. The Reformation doctrine of justification* by faith stressed that God 'imputes' righteousness to the repentant believer in Christ's atoning death. Status or relationship with God changes and that permeates through other aspects of the believer's life as the Holy Spirit* leads to ethical change (sanctification*). The Counter-Reformation was suspicious of this language, fearing it might sever the vital connection between a right relationship with God and a quality of rightness or justice in human relationships. They continued to use the term 'justification' for an ongoing process including sanctification. Protestants argued that this could undermine the assurance in Paul's gospel and imply that our moral efforts secure God's favour. Since Hans Küng's (1928-) work on justification, the differences have narrowed but not disappeared.

Evangelicals this century have been suspicious of extending the connection between gospel and ethics from personal to social ethics.* Nineteenth-century criticism raised doubts about the historicity of gospel events such as the birth, miracles or resurrection of Jesus, or about belief in an end to history with the return of Christ. These were increasingly treated by the 'social gospel' school as powerful myths whose main role was to motivate social ethics. Liberal optimism about the fatherhood of God inspiring 'the brotherhood of man' has been replaced by many in the later 20th century with a liberationist model of God's bias towards the poor and oppressed as they struggle, perhaps violently, to be free (see Liberation Theology*).

Evangelicals have remained committed to the eternal importance of a personal response to Christ as Lord and saviour. Making the gospel known to individuals carries a high priority for the energy and resources of the church. There is a feeling that wrestling with complex social issues undermines the simplicity of the gospel and distracts energy from evangelism.

Despite these fears, since 1970 there has been much evangelical interest in social ethics. Biblical studies have highlighted the kingdom of God* not just as a collection of saved souls but as a community of persons with social relationships. Just as belief in resurrection of the body gives an ethical value to the physical side of mortal life (see Paul's argument in 1 Cor. 6:13-14), so belief in a future redeemed community gives an ethical value to relationships and structures in the communities in which we find ourselves now. Because the issues are complex and we do not have all the answers, we should not be deterred from putting them on the church's agenda. The gospel affirms the value of human life in this world and the next.

Bibliography

N. Biggar, 'Showing the Gospel in Social Praxis', Anv 8.1, 1991, pp. 7-18; T. Chester, Awakening to a World of Need (Leicester, 1993); J. Jeremias, The Sermon on the Mount (London, 1961); H. Küng, Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection (Philadelphia and London, 1981); A. E. McGrath, Justification by Faith (Grand Rapids and Basingstoke, 1988); V. Sinton, 'Evangelical Social Ethics: Has it Betrayed the Gospel?', in M. Tinker (ed.), Restoring the Vision (Eastbourne, 1990); A. Verhey, The Great Reversal: Ethics and the New Testament (Grand Rapids, 1984).

V.M.S.

GOSPEL AND LAW, see LAW AND GOSPEL.

GOVERNMENT. In contemporary usage, 'the Government' refers to the executive branch of the State in distinction to its legislative and judicial branches. In this article, the term 'government' will refer more broadly to 'political authorities', whatever their precise institutional form.

The diversity of biblical material relating to government arises from the different political contexts in which biblical authors wrote, rather than, as is often supposed, from some fundamental scriptural ambiguity as to the nature and purpose of government. Amidst this undoubted contextual diversity, the divinely established nature and purpose of government nevertheless emerge clearly. Government is consistently seen as instituted, authorized and circumscribed by God, and its legitimacy as dependent upon the proper exercise of that authority, the purpose of which may be formulated as the establishment of justice (see Justice and Peace†) in the public realm of society.

The classic Pauline statement of this purpose in Rom. 13:1-7 has, rightly, been regarded in Christian tradition as of special normative significance, but it is necessary to interpret it in the light of the whole biblical narrative. In certain sections of the Bible, political authority is reflected upon from the perspective of the outsider (the patriarchal narratives), the subjugated (the Exile, the Gospels), the oppressed (the Exodus story, the Apocalypse), or the governed (Dt. 17:14-20). These essential perspectives highlight, in the first case, the limited and relative value of government, and in the second and third, its capacity, in a fallen world, for violent abuse and even idolatrous or demonic perversion. In the latter cases, the force of the denunciations of oppressive governments derives from the assumption of a divinely given purpose for government.

Israel's divine calling as covenant* community included the establishment of social, legal and political structures which displayed before all the nations the order of just relationships which God required. The distinctive content of these relationships was given in the Law,* of which one striking characteristic was concern for the rights of 'the poor'. To set Israel clearly apart from the Canaanite practice of ascribing deity to kings, Israel was to confess Yahweh alone as her king (e.g. Dt. 33:5), and, initially at least, to renounce the specific institution of kingship.

Political and judicial authority in Israel was, instead, first exercised by local elders, chosen by the people, constituting a rudimentary system of decentralized local government (cf. Ex. 5:6, 15, 19; Dt. 1:9-18; Nu. 1:16; 11:16). In merciful response to the incapacity of this system to deal with escalating injustice, God then appoints 'judges' to restore obedience to the just demands of the Law (Jdg. 2:16), though without dismantling the system of tribal eldership.

The people's subsequent cries for a king modelled on those of the surrounding nations reveal their disobedient desire to put a king in God's place, even though their appeal is also motivated by a legitimate desire for a more secure enforcement of justice (Jdg. 8:22-23; 9:1ff.; 1 Sa. 8; 9:16). Deuteronomy 17:14-15 ('When you enter the land ... be sure to appoint over you the king the LORD your God chooses'), together with the subsequent blessing of the reigns of David and other righteous kings (cf. Ps. 72), suggests that there was no divine disapproval of monarchy per se. (No specific forms of government are either enjoined or prohibited in Scripture.) Rather, what is condemned is faith in human power rather than in God, as well as the unjust and arbitrary practice of kingship which is the unavoidable consequence of such misplaced faith (cf. Dt. 17:15b-20).

Prophetic denunciations of the abuse of political authority were trenchant (e.g. 1 Ki. 11:29-39; 14:1-16; 21:17ff.; Je. 22; Am. 7:7-17). That the same criteria of justice and righteousness were applied to the rulers of other nations (e.g. Is. 10:5ff.; Je. 19:15; 27:1-11; Dn. 2:37-38; 4:27) also points to the universality of the divine requirement for political authority. Just government was not merely a special obligation on the covenant people.

NT references to government are consistent with the OT vision in holding to the divine origin of and limits upon, political authority, and hence to the divine judgment merited by political rulers who perpetrate injustice - indeed the arrival of the Messiah testifies to a God who overthrows governments (Lk. 1:52). In the context of the subjugation of Palestine by the powerful Roman Empire, Jesus announces the imminent arrival of the kingdom of God.* This kingdom challenges Roman political authority by asserting its wholly derivative character (Jn. 19:11), and by exposing its authoritarian style of government (Lk. 13:32; 22:24-27). The injunction to 'give to Caesar what is Caesar's' (Mk. 12:17) presupposes the existence of definite limits on what Caesar may legitimately claim.

Apostolic proclamation of Jesus as Lord was perceived to be no less a challenge to the practice of Roman political authority; hence in Acts 17:7 Paul and Silas are charged with heralding Jesus as a rival king. The consistent apostolic position was already clear: 'We must obey God rather than men' (Acts 5:29). It is against this background that Paul's acknowledgment of the divine origin of Roman political authority in Rom. 13

(and Peter's in 1 Pet. 2:13-14) must be viewed. God has authorized the office of government as 'God's servant to do you good', specifically, to punish wrong and promote right conduct (Rom. 13:4; cf. 1 Pet. 2:14). The effect of declaring before Roman ears that government is a mere 'servant' is first to repudiate Roman claims to the deity of the Emperor, and secondly, by bringing government under the limits of divine law, to undermine the Roman concept of absolute political sovereignty.

The detailed practical meaning of the principle that the distinctive purpose of government is the establishment of justice in the public realm can be elucidated with reference to the substantial biblical teaching on what justice actually requires in numerous particular contexts. Further elucidation can be obtained from the Christian tradition, e.g. the works of Augustine,* Luther,* and Calvin* (see also Calvinistic Ethics*). Certain possible implications regarding the nature and operation of contemporary government can be suggested.

1. The idea that the authority of government is limited to its specific purpose points to the need for effective constitutional restraints on the exercise of that authority. An important one operative today in many Western democracies is making executives accountable to independent and democratically elected legislatures. However, in view of the fact that democratic procedures are no guarantee of just outcomes, this is insufficient in itself; indeed non-democratic governments may also act justly.

2. Doing justice in the public realm may be understood as rendering to each person or institution in society what is their due, i.e. protecting the rights and duties of each. If so, then the role of government may be defined as the public guaranteeing of such rights and duties. By anchoring justifications of government activity in a coherent and comprehensive Christian conception of rights and duties, governments can be warned both against exceeding the competence attached to their office, and against rationalizing their passivity in the face of serious injustices.

See also: POWER; RIGHTS, HUMAN.

Bibliography

E. Brunner, Justice and the Social Order (London and New York, 1945); A. P. D'Entreves, The Notion of the State (Oxford, 1967); J. Maritain, Man and the State (ET, Chicago, 1951; London, 1954); P. Marshall, Thine is the Kingdom: A Biblical Perspective on the Nature of Government and Politics Today (Basingstoke and Grand Rapids, 1984); G. S. Smith (ed.), God and Politics: Four Views on the Reformation of Civil Government (Phillipsburg, NJ, 1989).

J.P.C.

GRACE. An adequate understanding of grace is indispensable in Christian ethics. Misunderstandings of grace as tolerance, or as amnesty, abound. The biblical definition of grace unites forgiveness* and moral absolutes.

1. The biblical redefinition of grace

The dominant meaning of the Gk. word (charis) was 'to find favour from a superior who bestows an undeserved gift'. Aristotle* defined charis as 'Helpfulness, towards someone in need, not in return for anything' (Rhetoric ii.7), i.e. 'charity', as we would say today. The LXX primarily uses charis to translate the Heb. hen, which denotes the undeserved mercy* by which a stronger person aids someone weaker. Grace in this sense resolves the first aspect of the human moral dilemma: the need for mercy in response to failure to live with perfect love and obedience. However, charity alone is insufficient in resolving the second dilemma: the capacity and power to live appropriately. The foundation for the more encompassing Christian understanding of grace is laid in the Heb. hesed, i.e. God's covenant* faithfulness. This conveys both aspects of grace: forgiveness, for Israel did not deserve God's love; and power to fulfil God's law.*

For Paul, who gave to charis its distinctively Christian meaning, grace always relates to the cross* and to Jesus* Christ (see Rom. 3:24-26; 5:1-21; 1 Cor. 1:18-19). Christ is the basis and even the content of its meaning (e.g. Rom. 5:15; 16:20b; 1 Cor. 1:4; 16:23; 2 Cor. 13:14). As T. F. Torrance (1913-) says, 'Grace is in fact identical with Jesus Christ in person and word and deed' (The Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers, p. 21). Grace is God's being and action in Jesus Christ, both to forgive humankind's spiritual and moral failure, and to offer the perfect human response to God's moral demands.

2. Historical understandings of grace

Theologians have described many aspects of grace. 'Uncreated grace' is the being of God in triune communion. 'Created grace' is the action of God in people which empowers moral behaviour (Tertullian, De Anima 21; Thomas Aquinas, STh 1a2ae 108-109). The suggestion that grace heals human nature ('healing grace') led to the belief that the sacraments 'contained' grace ('sacramental grace') and enabled their recipients to perform meritorious deeds ('habitual grace').

Debate has raged throughout church history over whether grace actually enables one to be righteous, or whether it only accounts one as righteous. Augustine* rejected Pelagius' (fl. c. 383-424) insistence that God's grace gave people the capacity to live morally on their own (see On Nature and Grace, 53; On Grace and Free Will, 23-26). The Protestant Reformers asserted that believers remain sinful within themselves, and are righteous only in Christ. Otherwise, one risks believing that the source of moral goodness is within oneself, and Christ is functionally no longer necessary, except as an enabler and example. Martin Luther* denounced as blasphemous the assertion that 'our works create us or we are the creators of our works'. Such a view makes us 'our own gods' (Works, vol. 39.1). John Calvin* proclaimed, 'I renounce myself and my nature in which only shame and confusion are to be found, but I come to Him in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ ... He speaks for me, and it is in His name that I present myself, just as though I were He Himself' (Sermon on Galatians, 3:26-29).

3. Grace and law

There is no dichotomy between grace and law. Grace does not remove the imperatives of God's moral absolutes. In response to its salvation from slavery, Israel was called to observe the law of the covenant. Similarly, because of their deliverance from slavery to sin in Christ, believers are called to observe God's moral law. The imperatives of the law always follow, rather than precede, the indicatives of God's grace.

God's grace precedes and constitutes any response people make of faith,* obedience* and service. Karl Barth* asserts that God's will is not known in the 'guise of rules, principles, axioms, and general moral truth' (CD III / 4, p. 12). One discovers God's will in relationship with Christ. Apart from such a relationship, moral laws are inadequate, for through them people can seek dominion over God and rationalize their moral failure. Humankind's moral incapacity is not solved by moral pronouncements or by calls to obedience. The capacity to do the good that people know is pleasing to God results from their being brought into relationship with himself through adoption (Gal. 4:4-7). Thus they are enabled by the Holy Spirit,* on the basis of their life in Christ, to do works pleasing to him. Because of God's grace, relationship with God and a life of moral obedience are found in Christ rather than in one's own efforts. Emil Brunner* calls this 'the great inversion of existence ... and it becomes manifest that the attempt to attain God by our own efforts rather than to base all our life on God, legalism, is the root of sin' (The Divine Imperative, ET, London and New York, 1937, p. 76).

Disobedience and unfaithfulness are not merely the violation of a standard. They are the defiling of a relationship. Scripture refers to unfaithfulness as whoring and adultery (Je. 2 - 3; Ho. 9:1; Mal. 2:11). Obedience to the commands of God is fundamental to the Christian life, but rather than being a strenuous human effort to comply with God's orders, it is the joyous living out of what Christians are in Christ. Christians are not to live like the Gentiles (Eph. 4:17-24) but are to show by their lives that they are in the light (Eph. 5:8); to live like those who have been reconciled to God (Col. 1:22), who have been made alive in Christ (Col. 2:13) and clothed with him (Gal. 3:27). The old conduct has been put away, or more accurately, put to death (Col. 3:7-10).

4. Grace and freedom

Augustine summarized his ethical teaching in the often-misunderstood axiom 'Love and do what you will' (oblige et quod vis fac in the context of his defence of paternal chastisement means 'Love God, and what you then will, do'). He goes on to say, 'Let love's root be within you, and from that root nothing but good can come', and the root of love is Jesus Christ ('Homilies on 1 John' in Later Works, LCC 8, p. 316). This expresses the radical freedom of the Christian ethic. Moral obedience is a response to the salvation which is received by faith in Christ, rather than an obligation by which salvation is earned. Christians are freed to live with neither selfcondemnation nor self-adulation.

Both grace and freedom are confused when too closely aligned with tolerance. To tolerate someone else's self-destructive behaviour because of the conviction that out of love people must be allowed to do as they please is not love but the antithesis of love. The moral indifference that dominates contemporary ethics under the banner of tolerance is in fact the insidious endorsement of anti-love. Human life cannot be merely tolerated as it is, for even the best human effort is insufficient to deserve God's favour. By God's grace in Christ, people are freed to live in his life which is pleasing to God, and actively pursue what is best and lifegiving for their neighbours. Grace thus enables both humility* and hope* in Christians' encounters with their own as well as others' moral dilemmas.

Bibliography

H. Conzelman and W. Zimmerli, TDNT 9, pp. 372-415; J. Moffatt, Grace in the New Testament (London, 1931); J. Oman, Grace and Personality (Cambridge, 1917; ²1919); T. F. Torrance, The Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers (Edinburgh, 1948); W. T. Whitley (ed.), The Doctrine of Grace (London, 1932).

T.A.D.

GRATITUDE is the appropriate response to a benevolently given gift, or to what someone is, or has done for one. It is a happy emotion, a gladness to have what is given, and to receive it in particular from the giver. One who dislikes the gift cannot be grateful for it, though he or she may be grateful for the 'thought', i.e. glad of the giver's benevolence.* If a person is glad to have the item given, but does not like to receive it from the particular person who has given it, then the receiver's emotion is not gratitude. Gratitude is the affirmation of a certain bond between the giver and the recipient. To the extent that what was given was owed to the recipient, or was required by duty to be given, gratitude is not appropriate, though it is appropriate for the recipient to be glad that his or her debtor has paid the debt. Gratitude also seems inappropriate to the extent that the giver is not motivated by benevolence towards the recipient. Gratitude also motivates actions - most notably giving thanks, returning favours, and doing kindnesses; but the truly grateful person does not see such actions as repayment of any debt.

It is clear from this definition why gratitude figures in the Christian life. The heart of the Christian message is about a gift (see Grace*) that God has freely and benevolently given to his people - the gift of eternal life, of liberation from sin and death, of admission to fellowship with himself and participation in his kingdom. The sense of glad dependency on the giver that characterizes Christian gratitude bonds the believer to God in love, and is a veridical perception of the goodness of the new life in him, his goodness (benevolence), and our dependency on him. For this reason gratitude is one of the central Christian virtues. As a virtue,* gratitude is not just an occasional feeling, but a well-confirmed trait of personality* or character (see †), a reliable disposition to feel gratitude to God and to perform Christian actions out of gratitude to him.

Gratitude is by nature circumstantial: as a response to a gift, it is not appropriate where no gift is given. Thus in the ordinary circumstances of life, gratitude is only sometimes fitting. But Paul exhorts the Thessalonians: 'Be joyful always; pray continually; give thanks in all circumstances, for this is God's will for you in Christ Jesus' (1 Thes. 5:16-18). The reason that gratitude to God is always fitting, and can in principle be felt in all circumstances, is that this circumstance - that God has justified us through Christ's death and adopted us as his children - holds regardless of what the local circumstances of our lives may be. Thus Christian gratitude - like Christian hope* and Christian peace* - is a psychological foothold outside the temporal order. Gratitude also ties Christians to the temporal order, when they thank him for particular daily blessings - the health of their children, the spread of the church, the success of their work, particular answers to prayer. But this more circumstantial gratitude depends, for its Christian authenticity, on the readiness to give thanks in all circumstances; for it is this that ties us decisively to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Bibliography

F. Berger, 'Gratitude', Eth 85, 1975, pp. 298-309; P. S. Minear, 'Gratitude as a Synthesis of the Temporal and the Eternal', in H. A. Johnson (ed.), A Kierkegaard Critique (New York, 1962); R. C. Roberts, 'Virtues and Rules', Philosophy and Phenomenological Research 51.2, 1991, pp. 325-343; idem, Spirituality and Human Emotion (Grand Rapids, 1983), ch. 6; Thomas Aquinas, STh 2a2ae 106-107.

R.C.R.

GREED, see COVETOUSNESS.

GREGORY I (c. 540-604), influential pope and writer, also called Gregory the Great. After holding high civil office in Rome he became a monk. Recruitment to the ranks of the clergy issued in his becoming Bishop of Rome in 590. His achievements distinguished him a 'founder of the medieval papacy'.

His writings included the Pastoral Rule (c. 591) on the duties and qualities of the bishop as shepherd of souls, which for secular clergy had an influence almost as wide as Benedict's Rule for monks. Alfred the Great (849-c. 900) translated it into Old English. Preaching, spiritual direction* and the bishop's own example are prominent.

Gregory's massive exposition of Job, Moralia (finished c. 595), likewise became a standard manual of moral theology (see Christian Moral Reasoning†) and asceticism* in the medieval West. Applying a threefold pattern of interpretation - historical, allegorical and moral - it considers the relationship between the active and the contemplative life. With his Homilies on Ezekiel, it made him a recognized master on mysticism (cf. C. Butler, Western Mysticism, London, 1922).

Gregory's theology was a moderated Augustinianism. He ensured the continuing dominance of ascetic ideals in Latin Christianity, and fulfilled a remarkably energetic role as a pastoral administrator.

Bibliography

ETs of Pastoral Rule: J. Barmby, NPNF, 2nd series, XII; H. Davis, ACW 11; J. Bliss, 3 vols. in 4 (Oxford, 1844-50).

F. H. Dudden, Gregory the Great, 2 vols. (London, 1905); G. R. Evans, The Thought of Gregory the Great (Cambridge, 1986).

D.F.W.

GRIEF, see BEREAVEMENT; LIFE, HEALTH AND DEATH.†

GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT (GNP) is one of the names for the total national income of a country, usually measured every year. It is a measure of a country's total economic activity. There are three ways of measuring total national income: by production, by income and by expenditure.

GNP, the production method, aggregates all of the firms' output. This is done by totaling up the value added by each firm's contribution to products. If the value added was not computed, there would be double counting of the value of output in instances where firms are engaged only in the intermediate production of goods which they pass on to other firms to finish off before they are sold. The income method aggregates all personal incomes (wages, rents and profits) but excludes transfer payments (e.g. State pensions, student grants) in order to avoid double counting. Lastly, the expenditure method adds up all items of final expenditure on goods and services by consumers and governments but excludes intermediate expenditure (e.g. payments for raw materials) by firms. When allowance is made for imports and exports, these three methods should give the same totals. In practice they are not precisely the same because errors creep in at every level of the information collection.

There is a range of other measures of national income which use gross value as their starting-point. Net national income is derived by subtracting depreciation, i.e. wear and tear of capital equipment, from the gross figure. It is possible to have national income measured at market prices or at factor costs: factor costs are obtained by subtracting any indirect taxes (e.g. Value Added Tax) from the prices which give the value of goods and services, and adding in the value of any subsidies. GNP at constant prices has deflated the yearly values in order to control for inflation and to see if real growth has occurred. Gross domestic product (GDP) is a measure of the activity within a national boundary; imports and capital inflows are subtracted but exports and capital outflows are added. In some developing countries, GDP can be higher than GNP, whereas in most developed countries, GNP is higher than GDP. Per capita values can be obtained for any of these national income measures by dividing the total by the head of population. However, the most usual value to calculate is the income method per head of population.

These measures are often used to give an idea of a country's wealth and standard of living. They are used by policy-makers and governments, and general economic targets are set for the whole economy using these measures. This use started largely after the acceptance of Keynesian economic theories in the 1930s. If GNP at constant prices is increasing over time, it suggests the economy is growing. Comparisons of per capita income between countries are used to give a rough idea of comparative standards of living. For a number of reasons it is important to see these measures only as rough indicators. Within one country, some aspects of economic activity will not be counted because they are not paid for, and yet they affect our quality of life: e.g. housework or child care. Countries also have different accounting conventions. In the former Soviet Union, payments to government employees for personal services such as hairdressing and entertainment were not included in national income. Countries which have a private system of health or education will have a different base for their calculations from those which use public funds for these services, etc. Also, aggregate measures do not tell us anything about the distribution of incomes within a country, which can be very important for its social stability. Although aggregate measures are imperfect for representing standards of living, at a broad level, they do accurately reflect differences between developed and developing countries.

Underlying much of the use of national income measures is the idea that economic growth must be a good thing. However, an increasing group of economists and politicians are questioning this assumption, mostly because of the effects of economic growth on our global environment* and the way it uses up exhaustible natural resources. Donald Hay in Economics Today, ch. 8, contains a review of these debates. That growth is necessarily good, and that it is more important than issues of distribution, are clearly materialist assumptions which Christians would want to question. However, if a country were to advocate a no-growth option, there would be considerable resultant problems of unemployment and regional decline for a domestic economy to address.

Bibliography

D. A. Hay, Economics Today (Leicester, 1989).

S.D.

GROTIUS, HUGO (1583-1645) was born in Delft. Influenced by liberal ideas, he became a friend of Arminius (1560-1609) and a leader of the Remonstrants. At fourteen he graduated from Leiden and then occupied high legal posts, obtaining in 1613 a seat in the States of Holland. In 1618 he was imprisoned for life for opposition to the Gomarian Calvinism of the Synod of Dordt. In 1621 he escaped and fled to Paris, becoming from 1634 until his death the Swedish Ambassador to France.

His De Veritate Religionis Christianae (1627) was a widely used simple and direct apologetic work. His Defensio Fidei Catholicae de Satisfactione Christi developed a 'governmental' theory of the atonement* wherein the key was God's willingness to accept Christ's sacrifice. He also pioneered in historicalphilological studies of Scripture and produced an equivocating work on predestination.

His greatest work was ethical and legal. He is, with reason, often regarded as the father of international law. While Francisco de Vitoria* and others had written previously, Grotius' work commanded wide assent and was accepted as authoritative. De Jure Praedae (1605) discussed rules for captured ships, while Mare Liberum (1609) defended freedom of the seas. His masterpiece was De Jure Belli ac Pacis (1625) which combined philosophy with reflection on current treaties (jus voluntarium). It elaborated just grounds and rules for war (see Just-War Theory*). He sought laws governing States, hence antecedent to institutions, and postulated a legal ground in a law of nature (see Natural Law*) mediated by an absolutist version of a social contract.* This law was independent of God. While firmly believing in God, he was an influence in separating ethics from theology.

Bibliography

De Jure Belli ac Pacis (ET, New York, 1964).

A. H. Chroust, 'Hugo Grotius and the Scholastic Natural Law Tradition', New Scholasticism 17.4, 1943, pp. 101-133; E. Dumbauld, The Life and Legal Writings of Hugo Grotius (Norman, OK, 1969); C. S. Edwards, Hugo Grotius: The Miracle of Holland (Chicago, 1981); W. S. M. Knight, The Life and Works of Hugo Grotius (London, 1962); H. Lauterpacht, 'The Grotian Tradition in International Law', British Yearbook of International Law 23, 1943, p. 51.

P.A.M.

GROUP DYNAMICS. All of us belong to various groups (family, church, college, union, etc.) which have some significance for us.

Although sometimes used more loosely, the term 'group dynamics' technically refers to the academic field of inquiry into the nature, development and maintenance of groups, their interrelationships with individuals, other groups and larger institutions with particular reference to their psychological and social factors. Group dynamics began as an identifiable field of inquiry in the 1930s, associated initially with Kurt Lewin's (1890-1947) work on field theory in the USA, and in the past few decades a considerable amount of empirical research has been published.

A 'group' in this sense is more than just an aggregate of people. It is typically defined as 'a collection of individuals who have relations to one another that make them interdependent to some significant degree' (D. Cartwright and A. Zander, Group Dynamics, p. 46). For instance, an aggregate of tourists separately looking round a church is not a group, but a collection of tourists with a guide, focusing together on specific tasks, is a group. A collection of people in a room may not be a group: if someone shouts 'Fire!', their interdependence and shared focus of interest constitutes them a group.

Groups are inevitable and ubiquitous; the dynamics they generate are powerful, and can have positive or destructive consequences.

Social scientists are concerned to ask what conditions are necessary for the formation of groups (e.g. spontaneous or deliberate), their selection, duration, maintenance or disintegration. Much research has centred on how groups establish norms ('What we, in this group, think, believe or behave'); the influence these have on members; group cohesion (external threats, dedication to task, etc.); conformity (fear of sanction, group disapproval, etc.); power and influence in groups; patterns of leadership* and factors affecting group performance; the structure of groups and the influence of size. Research methodology has posed problems. Some use observational methods, some use experimentation (sometimes with hidden manipulation - which raises ethical questions). Some theories draw on the psychology of interpersonal relations, some on Gestalt, field and psychoanalytic theories. All have their own hidden values and assumptions.

Training groups ('T' groups) to help leader and manager experience group dynamics, their own behaviour in groups, and others' response to them became popular in the 1960s, the groups varying with the theoretical perspective of the trainer. One approach which had a significant influence on pastoral training was that of W. F. Bion (1897-1979), who documented various patterns of relatedness within the behaviour of small groups (i.e. eight to ten people). He postulated two types of mental activity: 'work-group' activity, which is directed to the task for which the group exists; and the largely unconscious 'basic assumptions' activity, which can either assist or obstruct the group's task. The fundamental hidden desire of the group is to survive, and three common basic assumptions may guard against the anxiety that the group may disintegrate. These are what Bion calls: 1. dependence, in which group members place all their hopes in one of its number to solve all their needs; 2. expectancy, in which the group hopes that a new leader or circumstance will arise - sometimes related to the belief that the interaction of two of the members of the group (pairing) will produce the needed resolution; and 3. fight-flight, in which the group finds its cohesion in defending itself against some supposed external threat.

In 1978, Bruce Reed's (1920-) Dynamics of Religion drew on some group dynamics theory to provide a social study of the nature of religious activity.

The work on the functioning of management teams by R. M. Belbin (1926-) has been used within Christian communities in the understanding and management of differing gifts. Belbin's research and self-perception inventories have indicated the benefits for constructive task-oriented group functioning of a variety of different personality types. An understanding of personal attributes can facilitate an understanding of best team roles (cf. Myers-Briggs*). Belbin indicates that an ideal team might need a range of skills such as 'company worker' (loyal and dutiful); a 'chairman' (self-confident and controlled); a 'shaper' (outgoing and dynamic); a 'plant' (i.e. an 'ideas person'; individualistic, unorthodox); a 'resource investigator' (extroverted, curious); a 'monitor evaluator' (unemotional, prudent); several 'team workers' (socially oriented, mild, sensitive); and a 'completer/finisher' (painstaking, orderly, conscientious, anxious). Such a team would work more constructively than one composed of people with identical gifts. Others have drawn up alternative lists.

A knowledge of group dynamics can be particularly useful to pastors in helping identify different types of groups within congregations, suiting group size to the task and the capacity of its members, and developing awareness of the interaction of different groups within the church. There are dangers, however, in adopting any one model too enthusiastically, since the variables in the study of groups are many and interactive, and no one theory covers every situation. Especial care is needed to avoid transferring theories about small group (e.g. family) behaviour on to large groups (e.g. congregations) and introducing techniques from group therapy* into task-related friendship groups.

Bibliography

J. Adair, Developing Leaders (Maidenhead, 1988; New York, 1989); M. Argyle, The Psychology of Interpersonal Behaviour (Harmondsworth, 1967); R. M. Belbin, Management Teams (Oxford and New York, 1981); W. R. Bion, Experiences in Groups (New York and London, 1961); D. Cartwright and A. Zander, Group Dynamics (London, 1968); C. B. Handy, Understanding Organisations (Harmondsworth, 1985); B. Reed, The Dynamics of Religion (London, 1978).

D.J.A.

GROUP THERAPY covers a range of activities which harness the properties of groups for therapeutic purposes: in particular for improving participants' interactional skills, increasing self-awareness and improving individual functioning. The therapist, leader, consultant or central person creates a climate and a context in which change can occur. A wide spectrum of beliefs, values, assumptions and theoretical formulations underlie the different experiences offered, involving shortterm or long-term commitments, and requiring different qualifications and training in those who lead them.

A basic assumption underlying group therapy is that it is natural for people to live in social groupings, and that interaction with others is necessary for socialization and personal well-being. Since it is also within relationships that most problems arise, groups are seen as a natural and useful context for the resolution of difficulties.

Among groups formed for various purposes are those which are mainly recreational and educational, those which are life-enhancing and growth-promoting, those offering support in times of developmental stress, those focusing on a particular problem, and those which treat personality malfunction and pathological conditions. In some, an activity is in itself thought to be therapeutic; in others, activities such as art and music are specifically arranged for therapeutic purposes; in others, talking is the main or only medium.

The use of groups developed in a variety of settings, receiving considerable impetus with the development of group dynamics* as a discipline. Following the Second World War, the shortage of psychiatric facilities and the increase in patients needing such facilities encouraged the use of groups as an economy measure, but their positive advantages were soon discovered. Some hospitals and other institutions tried with varying degrees of success to develop therapeutic communities in which a conscious effort was made to involve all staff and inmates in an overall programme according to their training and capacity.

T-groups, or skill-training groups, developed in the USA under the leadership of Kurt Lewin (1890-1947) in the 1940s and 50s to help managers in industry improve their performance. Members learned to understand the dynamics of groups by studying their own processes as these were allowed to develop unhindered by the usual adoption of social roles (role strip). Educational in intention, T-groups had an essential research component, carried out by an observer, who gave immediate feedback on performance. This became the most-valued ingredient and subsequently the primary focus, other ways being found of dealing with task-related and organizational problems. T-groups lasted from a few days up to a week, and incorporated opportunities for observing subgroupings and inter-group behaviour; they were used in training a number of mental-health professionals and others preparing to lead groups. Encounter groups and sensitivity groups are now more generally used for this purpose.

The 1960s saw an explosion in group experiences on offer, in particular those associated with the Esalen Institute at Big Sur, California. These began largely in response to widespread disenchantment with the dehumanizing effect of an achievement-oriented culture, with its subsequent breakdown of family and community life, resulting in feelings of isolation and anomie. They were a reaction, too, to long-term psychotherapy and analysis, with its stress on the cerebral. These experiential groups were seen as life-enhancing 'therapy for normals', and usually lasted for short periods, frequently under charismatic leadership. They encouraged immediate interaction, the breaking-down of defences, and confrontation. Emphasis was on the 'here and now' of the encounter, rather than on gaining insight.

Marathon groups, involving almost continuous encounter and usually lasting from one to three days, stimulated intense emotional reactions and provided opportunities for the immediate trial of new ways of behaving. Groups of these types have proliferated under a variety of names, some with skilled and trained leaders, and some with enthusiasts with little training. Some participants have found them affirming and positive, but they have been very destructive for others. Key factors are the values embraced, views on the proper resolution of life's problems, and the ethics, integrity and competence of the leader.

Distinct from these are groups which focus on personality malfunction and on patients with a clearly diagnosed pathology. The main divisions in this category are groups based on psychoanalytic* and other psychodynamic theories, those based on group dynamic theories, on behaviourist* and cognitive* theories, on interpersonal theories, and those which emphasize particular techniques (e.g. Gestalt,* Transactional Analysis*). In groups based on psychodynamic theories, old conflicts are laid bare and brought into awareness, and old fixations in development are liquidated; in group analytic psychotherapy (see Analytical Psychology*), the group is seen as having the character of an individual, developing defences and resistances which it is the task of the therapist to analyse and to interpret the transference;* free-floating discussion takes the place of free association. Groups based on group dynamic theories typically highlight conflicts around dependence, aggression, competition and intimacy, and provide opportunities for members to fill roles, engage in power struggles, display deviance or conformity to group norms, or to scapegoat and form subgroups. The leader identifies these issues and encourages the group to work on them. Groups based on interpersonal theories stress the current, observable behaviour between group members; those on behavioural theories identify behaviours needing modification and devise a strategy for change and maintenance.

A key distinction is between those who treat individuals in the context of the group (e.g. Gestalt, behaviourist, psycho-drama) and those who relate to the group as a whole. Emphases also vary as to the interaction between group and individual, between therapist and group, and the level of therapist intervention. Some leaders of some types of group are less active than others; some vary their input at various points in group development. The size and composition and the frequency and duration of groups vary considerably with the aims and methods adopted. (For a useful table of comparison, see A. Stein et al., 'The Group Therapies', in J. Lewis and G. Usdin, eds., Treatment and Planning in Psychiatry.)

With increased awareness of group processes, the categories of different groups tend not to be as discreet as they were, and more than one method may be used at different times in a group's life. Some writers (e.g. D. Whitaker and M. Lieberman, Psychotherapy through the Group Process) have attempted a rapprochement between psychodynamic and group dynamic theories, as for example in group conflict theory. Others (e.g. I. D. Yalom, The Theory and Practice of Group Psychotherapy) see the main role of the leader as exploiting the inherent therapeutic possibilities of the group to facilitate change.

Although not all characteristics are present in all therapeutic groups, the main advantages of group treatment have been described as: 1. universalization, i.e. the discovery that others share similar problems; 2. acceptance by others, aided by the phenomenon of group cohesion; 3. catharsis; 4. self-disclosure; 5. altruism,* i.e. discovering the ability to help others; 6. vicarious learning through observing the learning of others; 7. learning from interpersonal interaction; 8. gaining insight; 9. receiving direct information and advice; and 10. the instillation of hope through observing improvement and receiving encouragement. Some of these factors depend on the individual, some on the leader and some on the group (see B. Bloch and E. Crouch, Therapeutic Factors in Group Psychotherapy).

In order for a group to be effective, the following components have been identified: 1. sound composition and organization; 2. careful attention to pre-group screening, diagnostic assessment, and patient selection and preparation; and 3. active and responsible group leadership, based on a firm grounding in group theory and dynamics. The personal characteristics of the leader, particularly warmth and the ability to clarify and stimulate, have been identified as crucial to success, and more important than the theoretical position adopted. (See A. Stein et al. in Treatment and Planning in Psychiatry; for a full discussion of curative factors, see I. D. Yalom, The Theory and Practice of Group Psychotherapy.)

S. H. Foulkes (1916-76) in Group Analytic Psychotherapy highlights the qualities required by the leader of a psychotherapeutic group as of supreme importance, especially in the light of their popularity and proliferation. Among the qualities he cites are: ethical integrity, including intellectual honesty; interest and expertise in the subject matter, requiring high intelligence; skills in observation and communication; respect for the beliefs of others; a freedom from neurotic* disturbance; and insight into his or her own unconscious* motivations and transference. He stresses that the leader must not succumb to a wish for power, since groups provide rich opportunities for its exploitation.

Bibliography

B. Bloch and E. Crouch, Therapeutic Factors in Group Psychotherapy (Oxford, 1985); S. H. Foulkes, Group Analytic Psychotherapy (New York, 1975); W. H. Friedman, Practical Group Therapy (London, 1989); J. Lewis and G. Usdin (eds.), Treatment and Planning in Psychiatry (Washington, DC, 1982); H. Mullan and M. Rosenbaum, Group Psychotherapy (New York, 1978); D. Whitaker and M. Lieberman, Psychotherapy through the Group Process (London, 1965); I. D. Yalom, The Theory and Practice of Group Psychotherapy (New York, 1975).

J.R.G.

GUILT. The term 'guilt' may be used to refer either to the state of having transgressed the law, or to the emotion of feeling oneself to be in the wrong.

In his 1957 paper, 'Guilt and Guilt Feelings' (see Psychiatry 20.1, Feb. 1975, pp. 114ff.), Martin Buber (1878-1965) distinguished what he called 'civil guilt', namely an objective state of a person in relation to society's laws, from 'existential-religious guilt' on the one hand and 'psychologic guilt' on the other. The second of these (existential-religious guilt) is to do with our moral responsibility in personal relationships. Christians believe that objective moral guilt results from our sinful transgression of the divine pattern for human life. 'All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God' (Rom. 3:23; cf. Jas. 2:10). Such moral guilt can be dealt with by experiencing the forgiveness* of God. For the believer in Christ, there is no further condemnation from the divine law (Rom. 8:1), since Christ has himself carried the burden of his sin (see Sin and Salvation†), and God has declared him justified in Christ. Objective guilt also results from moral wrong in our relationships with other people, and can be dealt with by experiencing forgiveness from them.

The third of Buber's alternatives (psychologic guilt) refers to the subjective experience of guilty feelings, which may or may not be related to objective moral guilt. It is possible to be guilty without feeling guilty, and possible to feel guilty without objectively being guilty. To feel guilty is to experience a painful emotion,* which people often tend to repress in ways which can lead to neurotic* symptoms.

Psychologists have understood the genesis of guilty feelings in various ways. Melanie Klein,* for example, indicated that guilt feelings arise as a child is coming to terms with the ambiguity of the external world. Erik Erikson* argued that guilt feelings arise in relation to that phase of development (see Human Development*) in which a child is testing out his or her place in the social world in relation to other significant people. It is probable that guilt feelings grow from a number of different roots including biological factors, social expect-tancies and the development of moral capacity.

A number of writers, notably Bruce Narramore (1941-), have further divided subjective guilt feelings into two categories: 'selfcondemning guilt' and 'constructive sorrow'. On the one hand, 'guilt feelings' can describe self-condemning emotions, which may be appropriately labelled neurotic or punitive. Sometimes these result from wrong that has been done by the person. Sometimes they are the expression of a false guilt which arises from a psychological state of anxiety or depression,* unrelated to objectively wrong attitudes or behaviour. There may also be 'delusional guilt', sometimes as a symptom of depression. Many psychologists (e.g. Albert Ellis* in Reason and Emotion in Psychotherapy, Secaucus, NJ, 1977, including an expanded version of his paper 'There is No Place for the Concept of Sin in Psychotherapy') are unwilling to accept the concept of 'wrong' in this sense, and regard Christian focus on guilt as psychologically damaging. Many others (following, e.g. Karl Menninger in Whatever became of Sin?, New York, 1973) have sought to recover a moral context for personal therapy, in which personal responsibility* can be affirmed and facilitated.

It is sadly the case that some Christian ministry has focused so heavily on sin and so insufficiently on grace* that it has increased rather than relieved guilt. Therapy, counselling and Christian pastoral care (in the broadest sense, including preaching and teaching as health promotion or illness prevention) can all be helpful in relieving troubled people of inappropriate feelings of false guilt, and in coming to terms with appropriately handling feelings of true guilt.

On the other hand, subjective guilt can sometimes be what Narramore calls a 'lovebased' - rather than a punitive - emotion, which can serve a creative purpose in enabling people to make constructive changes in their lives. 'Constructive sorrow' is an appropriate Christian response to continuing sin in a believer's life. In contrast to the punitive approach to guilt, which leads to a self-centred punishing and essentially destructive attitude, 'constructive sorrow' is an approach to wrong directed lovingly towards others in an attempt to move beyond the wrong into a creative reshaping of future possibilities. Narramore refers to Paul's statement that 'Godly sorrow brings repentance that leads to salvation and leaves no regret, but worldly sorrow brings death' (2 Cor. 7:8-10). Christian ministry should not be focused on destructive feelings of punitive guilt, looking to the past, which can only be harmful. Rather, motivation for constructive change should arise from the other-directed 'godly sorrow', looking to creative new possibilities for the future with the grace of God. This is part of the meaning of forgiveness.

See also: PASTORAL CARE, COUNSELLING AND PSYCHOTHERAPY.†

Bibliography

H. McKeating, Living with Guilt (London, 1970); S. B. Narramore, No Condemnation (Grand Rapids, 1984); P. Tournier, Guilt and Grace (ET, Crowborough, 1987).

D.J.A.

H

HABIT. A habit is an automatic response learned through repeated use or disuse of some capability. As learned, habits differ from reflexes, such as blinking in bright light, and instincts, such as the newborn's tendency to suck when presented with a breast. As automatic, a habitual response differs from a deliberate response, such as handing over a certain amount of change, after calculation, in a context of ordered monetary exchange. As learned through repeated exercise, a habit differs from a response learned suddenly, like a snake phobia acquired by a single bite. A habitual response may be behavioural (e.g. pronouncing one's r's in an American way), affective (e.g. reacting to minor irritations with a feeling of anger), or intellectual (e.g. thinking '25' in response to '5 x 5').

